

Hello Everyone,

For a long time, I stayed quiet about what happened because I was afraid of the consequences. I've decided to share my experience now because I don't want anyone else to go through what I did. This is my personal account of the events and how they affected me.

This review reflects my personal experience and why I would strongly caution others before interacting with this person.

My experience was one of the most stressful and emotionally damaging situations I've been through. During our interactions, I felt pressured and extorted using private high school photos of me. I believed these photos were being used to intimidate and control me, leaving me feeling trapped and afraid of what would happen if I didn't comply.

I was also pressured into paying back $50 for Minecraft, despite the game originally costing only $30. This felt less like resolving a disagreement and more like being forced to pay money under pressure. Whenever I questioned what was happening or tried to stand up for myself, I felt manipulated and gaslighted into believing I was the one in the wrong.

Another experience that deeply affected me was being pressured into blocking Maple and Mizu. I felt blackmailed into cutting off contact with people I cared about because I was worried about the consequences if I refused.

On top of that, I was publicly humiliated and repeatedly called a scammer, which damaged my reputation and caused unnecessary embarrassment. Instead of trying to resolve issues privately, I felt I was intentionally shamed in front of others.

I also experienced threats that made me fear for my safety and privacy. They had access to my legal name and used that information in ways that made me extremely uncomfortable. Even after I tried to distance myself, I felt that my online activity was being monitored and that I was being stalked.

Overall, my experience left me feeling anxious, isolated, and constantly worried about what would happen next. I am sharing this review so others can make their own informed decisions based on my experience. I hope no one else has to go through what I experienced.

He pushed me to the breaking point of wanting to Kill Myself...

I'm 18 now, but he was clearly asking for pictures of me when I was in highschool. In my prime (when i was skinny and not chubby) I was 10-13 when i was not chubby, this was disturbing for me because of past SA.

Even after I tried to cut off contact, I felt that my boundaries were not respected. I was repeatedly pressured and harassed into following him on Twitter again and re-adding him on Discord after I had already chosen to remove him. Instead of respecting my decision to end communication, I felt that I was continuously pressured to re-establish contact, making it difficult to move on and leaving me feeling uncomfortable and unsafe.

Another part of my experience that had a lasting impact was being publicly humiliated. From my perspective, he falsely portrayed me as a "backstabber" and a "scammer" because he believed I had used him for money and for buying me Minecraft. Instead of discussing the situation privately or trying to resolve any misunderstandings, he shared these accusations with others, which damaged my reputation and caused me significant embarrassment and distress. I felt unfairly judged and publicly shamed over allegations that I strongly dispute.

The impact this had on my mental health was severe. Throughout this experience, I felt constantly anxious, overwhelmed, and emotionally exhausted. As someone who struggles with Borderline Personality Disorder (BPD), the repeated pressure, threats, and public humiliation made my symptoms significantly worse. I experienced intense emotional episodes during this period and found myself struggling far more than I had before these events. There were times when I felt so overwhelmed by everything that happened that I had urges to hurt myself. No one should be put in a situation where they feel that level of fear, distress, or emotional pain.

Also to add to the "I have to pay him back" thing, I am a HighSchool Grad, I graduated without a job, He is making me pay him back for minecraft when i dont even have the funds to pay him back, my friend ares had to get her friend to send me money to pay him back. She only wanted to protect me as well as maple, mizu and everyone else who has helped me through this hard time.

A significant amount of this behavior also took place during voice calls. In my experience, I was pressured into staying in calls and participating in streams even when I wasn't comfortable doing so. I felt that my boundaries were repeatedly ignored, and saying no often led to more pressure or conflict.

One incident that particularly disturbed me was when he left me and my friend alone in a voice call while his stream was still live, without us realizing we were still being broadcast. From my perspective, we were not made aware that the stream was still ongoing, which made me feel that my privacy and trust had been violated. That experience left me feeling extremely uncomfortable and added to the overall distress I experienced throughout our interactions.

He then messaged me later after saying he was quote "sleeping/passed out". Why would you pass out when you had "gaming friends" still on your stream without knowing, it's kind of weird. My friend and I also talked about personal information while we were on his stream.

Looking back on everything that happened, what still shocks me is how easily I was manipulated into situations that I never would have agreed to under normal circumstances. At the time, I was in a vulnerable state emotionally, and I found myself giving in to demands because I was afraid of what would happen if I didn't. I often felt like I had to choose between complying or facing threats, humiliation, or further conflict.

Over time, this had a profound effect on my confidence and judgment. I began questioning my own decisions, doubting my memory of events, and feeling like I had no control over the situation. I found it increasingly difficult to stand up for myself because I worried that saying "no" would only make things worse. Instead of feeling free to make my own choices, I felt trapped by fear and pressure.

There were also parts of this situation that affected my personal life and relationships. At one point, I felt like I had to hide the fact that I had a boyfriend from him because I was afraid that it would lead to more conflict, pressure, or emotional retaliation. I didn't feel safe or comfortable being open about my life because of how previous situations had escalated.

Looking back, it's upsetting that I felt I needed to hide something so personal just to avoid further stress or confrontation. It made me feel like I had to carefully manage what I said and did in order to prevent negative reactions, instead of being able to live normally and openly.

That constant sense of caution and fear of how he might respond contributed to how trapped and anxious I felt throughout the entire experience.

Another concern I want to mention is that I felt I was being monitored and that my boundaries around distance and privacy were not respected. After I had tried to create separation and move away from the situation, I noticed continued attempts to reconnect with me through different accounts and platforms.

In one instance, I felt uncomfortable when I was added or contacted through an alternate account that I use, as well as through spaces connected to my real-life friends. This made me feel like I did not have space to fully disengage or feel safe online, because even after trying to step back, contact was still being made in ways that felt persistent and unwanted.

From my perspective, this contributed to a feeling of being watched or tracked across different accounts and platforms. Whether or not that was the intention, the effect on me was significant. It made me feel anxious about my online presence and unsure about where I could safely interact without being reached out to again.

Overall, this pattern added to the stress of the situation and made it much harder for me to move on or feel in control of my own online spaces.

One pattern I also felt repeated throughout this situation was that whenever concerns were raised about his behavior or when people tried to hold him accountable, the focus often shifted away from what had happened and toward him feeling wronged or attacked. From my perspective, it sometimes felt like instead of addressing the specific issues being brought up, the situation would turn into discussions about how he was being treated or misunderstood.

This made it difficult to have calm or constructive conversations about what had happened, because any attempt to explain how I felt or what I experienced would often get reframed into something else entirely. It left me feeling like accountability was avoided rather than addressed, and that my concerns were not being fully acknowledged.

Over time, this pattern added to my frustration and confusion, because it felt like the focus was never on resolving the harm I felt had been done, but instead on shifting attention away from it. I'm sharing this because I think it contributed to why the situation escalated and remained unresolved for so long.

I also want to mention something that deeply affected me personally. At one point, I opened up and told him I struggle with an eating disorder, which developed after being bullied, and I also shared insecurities about my body.

Instead of being supportive or respectful, I felt that this was used against me. During a call, I was fat-shamed and called "fat," which was extremely hurtful and humiliating, especially given how vulnerable I had been when I disclosed that information. This made me feel unsafe sharing anything personal and added to the emotional harm I was already experiencing.

Being treated that way after opening up about something so sensitive had a serious impact on my self-esteem and mental wellbeing, and it's something that has stayed with me.

I also want to be clear that I understand my rights to report this kind of behavior to relevant authorities and platforms. In Australia, I can report serious online abuse, including threats and the misuse of intimate images, to the appropriate cybercrime and law enforcement channels. I am considering my options and keeping records of everything that happened.

I'm sharing this not as a threat, but to make it clear that situations involving harassment, coercion, and exploitation can be taken seriously and formally reported.

When I tried to distance myself or set boundaries, I felt that I was met with more pressure to reconnect, explain myself, or do what was being asked of me. This cycle made it much harder to leave the situation than I ever imagined it would be. Looking back now, I can see how much my fear and emotional vulnerability affected my ability to recognize unhealthy behavior and protect myself.

One of the hardest parts of this experience is realizing how much it changed me. I lost confidence in my own instincts and constantly worried about saying or doing the wrong thing. It took me a long time to understand that I had been making decisions from a place of fear rather than genuine choice. I am sharing this because I hope others recognize that manipulation and pressure can happen gradually, and before you realize it, you can find yourself agreeing to things you never truly wanted simply because you felt you had no safe alternative.

He makes me feel sick to the stomach.

If you are reading this, Sindictae, I want to say something directly.

Please don't respond with hate, and please don't publicly humiliate or retaliate against me for sharing my experience. I am not writing this to start more conflict or to hurt you. I'm sharing it because of how deeply this situation affected me and because I needed to speak about what happened.

Despite everything, I do still care about you as a person. I don't want to see you continue down a path where your actions are harming other people or yourself. From my perspective, it seems like multiple people have tried to tell you that you need help, and I strongly believe you should take that seriously.

I'm not saying this to attack you, but because I genuinely think support could make a difference for you. It seemed like even you knew something wasn't right, but weren't able or willing to address it. I hope you choose to get help and support before things get worse for you or others.

I also hope you can understand why I needed to speak up about my experience. I'm trying to move forward, and I don't want more harm to come from this situation for either of us.

I am sharing all of this because I needed to get my experience out in the open after staying silent for a long time out of fear, confusion, and emotional exhaustion. It has taken me a while to fully process what happened and understand how deeply it affected my mental health, my sense of safety, and my ability to trust people again.

My intention is not to encourage harassment or retaliation against anyone, but to document my experience so others can make informed decisions. I don't want anyone else to feel the same level of pressure, fear, or emotional distress that I went through during this situation.

Since distancing myself, I have been focusing on rebuilding my wellbeing, setting stronger boundaries, and recovering from the impact this had on me. Speaking about it is part of that process, even though it is difficult.

I will not be engaging further in arguments or back-and-forth discussions about this. My experience is my own, and I am choosing to move forward with my life in a healthier direction. I sincerely hope that everyone involved is able to reflect, learn from the situation, and seek whatever support they may need.

Above all, I hope this serves as a warning for others to prioritise their safety, trust their instincts, and step away from situations that feel controlling, harmful, or unsafe.

Thanks alot InterstellaVTT
