Nevertheless, differences in writing style between the books of Jeremiah and Kings, as well as distinctions in the use of the names of Judah's kings make any final determination of the authorship of the books of the Kings uncertain. If due weight is given to the long section dealing with Judah (2 Kin. 18:1—25:26), it may reasonably be said that both books of Kings, except the final appended historical notice (2 Kin. 25:27–30), are the work of an author who lived through the last days of Judah and the fall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. Perhaps the spiritual reform that followed the recovery of the Book of the Law during Josiah's reign (c. 622 B.C.) provided the necessary impetus for the author to gather up his sources and write an account of Israel's faithfulness to the covenant from the days of David until his own time.

To compose a work covering nearly four hundred years, the author of the Book of Kings would need excellent source material. Three sources are specifically named: (1) The Book of the Acts of Solomon (11:41), which detailed the events of the Solomonic era; (2) The Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Israel (cited seventeen times in 14:19—15:31), which were the court records of the northern kingdom; and (3) The Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Judah (mentioned fifteen times in 1 Kin. 14:29—2 Kin. 24:5), which were court records of the southern kingdom. Furthermore, the author might have had biographical accounts of David (1:1—2:11), Elijah, and Elisha (1 Kin. 16:29—2 Kin. 9:37), and access to the Book of Isaiah (compare Is. 36—39 to 2 Kin. 18:13—20:19). Such material was preserved in priestly and prophetic centers in both the northern and southern kingdoms.

Commentary

1:1—11:43 First Kings has two large sections. The first focuses on Solomon's reign, following David's death, and presents the United Kingdom. (The second begins at ch. 12 and presents the division of the Israelite nation into the northern kingdom and the southern kingdom after Solomon's death.)

1:1—2:11 This section places Solomon's reign in the context of the provisions of the Davidic covenant (2 Sam. 7). The narrator emphasizes that Solomon's accession to the throne was the Lord's sovereign will.

1:1–4 David was about seventy years old at the time of his death (2 Sam. 5:4; 1 Chr. 29:26–28), and the long years of warfare had doubtlessly taken their physical toll. warm: Using a healthy person's body warmth to care for a sick person is a medical procedure noted by the second-century Greek physician Galen and the Jewish historian Josephus.

IN CONTEXT

Political Infighting

Anyone who laments the state of politics and government today might pay careful attention to the account of Adonijah's bid for the throne of Israel (1 Kin. 1:5). With a dynasty in the making, the question was, who would succeed David? Adonijah enjoyed popular support, but David named Adonijah's half-brother, Solomon, as heir to the throne (1:11–14, 28–30, 38, 39).

Solomon extended grace to Adonijah (1:50–53), but the older brother refused to accept a lesser role. Desperate to maintain a foothold in the power structure, he enlisted Solomon's mother, Bathsheba, in a ploy to marry David's mistress, Abishag (2:13–18). The marriage would have implied to the public that Adonijah was the rightful heir to the throne, since a king's harem normally went to his successor. Solomon saw through the scheme and called for Adonijah's execution (2:22–25).

1:5 The name of David's fourth son, Adonijah, means "The Lord Is My Lord" (2 Sam. 3:2–4). Amnon and Absalom, David's first and third sons, both experienced violent deaths (2 Sam. 13:28, 29; 18:14). Chiliab, his second son, apparently died at an early age. I will be king: Adonijah, the oldest surviving son, might have assumed that he would inherit the crown even though Solomon had been designated as successor (1:13, 17, 30; 2:15; 1 Chr. 22:9, 10). Adonijah evidently knew of the intended royal succession, because he deliberately avoided inviting those who would support the king's choice (vv. 8, 10). Adonijah thus exalted himself against God's will.

1:6 rebuked: While David had been a most capable leader and a man of deep spiritual sensitivity, he had not exercised proper parental discipline of his children (2 Sam. 13:21–39; 14:18–24).

1:7 In gaining important allies to support his quest for the crown, Adonijah sought the assistance of Joab, David's general, and Abiathar, the high priest.

1:8 Zadok was descended from the priestly line of Eleazar (2 Sam. 8:17). Benaiah served as the commander of the king's bodyguard and was considered one of David's mighty men (2 Sam. 23:20–23). The prophet Nathan had long been David's confidant, spiritual advisor, and conscience

(2 Sam. 12:1–25). Shimei is probably the man who later became Solomon's district governor (4:18); he should not be confused with David's foolish enemy, Shimei the son of Gera (2:8; 2 Sam. 19:18–23).

1:9, 10 Zoheleth means "Serpent." Perhaps this was the shape of an outcropping of rock that was a well-known rendezvous point. Adonijah's ceremonial meal was held at En Rogel near the intersection of the Hinnom and Kidron valleys, a place well situated for Adonijah's purposes. En Rogel had positive associations with David (2 Sam. 17:17).

1:11 It is a mark of David's integrity that Nathan, who had confronted him with his terrible sin, was still welcome in the royal household (2 Sam. 12:1–15). Nathan went to Bathsheba because she would not want to see Adonijah displace her son Solomon as heir to the throne. As David's wife, Bathsheba had immediate access to him, and she also had considerable influence in civil and social matters (15:10–13; 19:1–3; 21:5–15, 25). If Adonijah became king she and Solomon could probably expect to die in a royal purge of all potential claimants to the throne (15:29; 16:11; 2 Kin. 9:30–37; 10:1–17; 11:1).

1:12–27 Nathan and Bathsheba planned together (v. 14) how Nathan could confirm Bathsheba's report to the king. Nathan knew of David's solemn oath to Bathsheba (vv. 13, 30; Lev. 19:12), but was concerned that David might fail to act quickly against Adonijah's attempted usurpation of the crown. Bathsheba's report of the crisis was couched in terms that would provoke in David a proper sense of alarm.

1:25, 26 Giving the names of Abiathar, who was with Adonijah, and of Zadok, Benaiah, and Solomon, who were not, helped David see the situation that was developing.

1:27, 28 Has this thing been done: Nathan's question was both respectful and tactical. David had to act, even though he was reluctant to oppose his rebellious son (read the story of the rebellion of Absalom in 2 Sam. 15—18).

1:29, 30 An oath in the name of the LORD was the strongest oath a faithful Israelite would take (17:1). During the OT period, Israelites would use very strong language in oaths (Ruth 1:17). Jesus told his followers to avoid oaths completely (Matt. 5:33–37). who has redeemed my life: In these words of praise, David celebrated the innumerable times that the Lord had acted on his behalf, to deliver him from his enemies and from his own sins. Some of David's psalms were written in connection with those times of God's deliverance (Pss. 40; 142).

1:31 King David live forever: Bathsheba put her seal on the occasion by bowing before him and expressing the hope that his kingdom would never end.

1:32, 33 David summoned the recognized leaders in Israel who had not been party to the conspiracy (vv. 8, 10, 26) to lend their support to the coronation of Solomon. Solomon's prestige would be enhanced by riding upon the royal mule (2 Sam. 13:29; 18:9; Zech. 9:9; Matt. 21:5). Gihon was a spring, the principal water supply for Jerusalem. It was in the Kidron Valley east of the city. By means of a shaft leading from this spring, Joab had aided David in the capture of Jerusalem (2 Sam. 4:8; 1 Chr. 11:6), and it would be from this spring that King Hezekiah would have his famous water tunnel constructed to the pool of Siloam during the threat of the Assyrian invasion of 701 B.C. (2 Kin. 20:20).

1:34–37 The plans for public proclamation, with David's sanction and with a priestly blessing, were designed to let the people of the city know that Solomon was to be the next king of Israel.

1:38 The Cherethites and Pelethites were David's bodyguard (2 Sam. 8:18; 15:18; 20:7). Their association with David stretched back to his days among the Philistines, with whom both groups are usually identified (1 Sam. 30:13, 14; Ezek. 25:16; Zeph. 2:5).

1:39, 40 Solomon's anointing by the priest Zadok was normal procedure for an uninterrupted succession to the throne. When there was an interruption in the dynastic line, the anointing was performed by a prophet (19:15–18; 2 Kin. 9:1–10). Every priestly anointing would recall the words of Ps. 2, in accordance with the words of the Davidic covenant of 2 Sam. 7. The anointing announced that the anointed one was now the adopted son of the living God. Every anointing in the OT points forward to the ultimate Anointed One, the Messiah Jesus. The blowing of the horn celebrated and announced the anointing of a new king. The joy of the people seemed boundless, as the earth seemed to split with their sound.

1:41–49 The noise first, and then the news of the anointing of Solomon at Gihon, quickly reached Adonijah and his party at En Rogel just a few hundred feet further south (v. 9). This led to the complete demoralization of the coconspirators of Adonijah.

1:45–49 The clamor of the royally sanctioned coronation of Solomon at Gihon easily reached the ears of those gathered with Adonijah over the hill at En Rogel, which was just a few hundred feet south.

1:50–53 Adonijah's quest for mercy at the bloodstained (Lev. 4:7, 18, 25, 30) horns of the altar (v. 50) was in keeping with the traditional function of the altar as a haven of refuge for those who had committed unintentional crimes (Ex. 21:12–14). Later Joab also would try to find safety there (2:28).

1:53 Even though David was still alive (2:1–12) and the coronation had not yet taken place, the public celebration at his prophetic anointing at Gihon (1:38–40) was basically the same as declaring Solomon Israel's king. The name Solomon is related to the Hebrew word for "peace" (shalom) and the verb meaning "to be complete" (shalem). Go to your house: Solomon gave temporary clemency to his half brother, likely out of respect for his father.

A Father's Final Charge

A farewell charge like David's to Solomon (2:1–9) was a fairly common way for fathers in the ancient world to pass on a legacy to their successors. David's last words provide a useful model for parents today to give final instructions to their children. David's charge contained several elements: • A blunt recognition and acceptance of death (1 Kin. 2:2).

• A challenge to Solomon to act responsibly (2:2).

• A review of God's covenant with the nation of Israel (2:3) and with the house of David (2:4).

• Instructions about serving justice and honoring David's commitments (2:5–9).

2:1–3 he charged Solomon: David was following spiritual precedent as well as the custom of the ancient Middle East by passing on instruction to his son (1 Chr. 28; 29). David's charge to Solomon was reminiscent of Moses' words to the Israelites (Deut. 31:6) and the Lord's admonition to Joshua (Josh. 1:6, 7, 9). The specific instructions given here echo the standards of righteousness associated with the Mosaic covenant (Deut. 5:33; 8:6, 11; 11:1, 22).

2:4 not lack a man: God had made an unconditional covenant with David (2 Sam. 7:12–16; 1 Chr. 17:11–14), granting to him a continual posterity and a royal dynasty. Although the Davidic covenant was an everlasting sacred promise, individual kings through their evil behavior could fail to receive the benefits of the covenant (Ps. 89:3, 4, 14–24, 27–37). The line of promise would be preserved and Israel "would not lack a man," but there would come a time when the promised Ruler would not be on an earthly throne (Hos. 3:4). God's prophets predict that the heir of the throne of David will yet reign over a repentant, regathered, and restored Israel (Jer. 33:19–26; Ezek. 34:22–31) in fulfillment of the promises contained in the Abrahamic, Davidic, and new covenants (Ezek. 37:21–28; Mic. 7:18–20). The NT reveals that all this will be realized in Jesus Christ, the Savior King (Acts 3:25, 26; 15:16, 17; Gal. 3:26–29; Rev. 3:21), who is David's Heir in the ultimate sense (Acts 2:22–36).

2:5–9 David's parting advice singled out some problems that had not been solved. One concerned Joab. The bold, headstrong Joab had murdered two generals (2 Sam. 3:27; 20:10), and he had killed David's son Absalom (2 Sam. 18:14). He had joined Adonijah's ill-fated conspiracy (1:7, 19). Another problem concerned Shimei, who had treated the king shamefully on a previous occasion (2 Sam. 16:5–13; 19:16–23). gray hair: Both Joab and Shimei had lived a long time without requital for their wicked deeds. The aged king knew that these men would likely continue to be a problem to Solomon even as they had been to him.

2:7–9 David also included directions of kindness for the household of Barzillai, who had stood by him throughout the period associated with Absalom's rebellion (2 Sam. 17:27–29; 19:31–39). To eat at the king's table carried with it not only distinct honor, but royal favor (2 Sam. 9:7; 2 Kin. 25:29). It meant that the royal household would make provision for this family in perpetuity.

2:10–12 David's obituary will be recalled throughout Israel's history. His death, and the fact that he left a successor in his son Solomon, were the twin facts that showed that the Lord was going to accomplish His plan to establish the Davidic House and the coming rule of the Savior King.

2:10 There is a so-called tomb of David today on Mt. Zion in Jerusalem marking approximately where he might have been buried.

2:12 Solomon sat on the throne: By these words both his coronation as well as the establishment of his reign are indicated. The dramatic anointing marked him out as his father's true and only successor (1:38–40).

2:13–17 come peaceably: Adonijah would have Bathsheba believe that his request for Abishag was simply compensation for not receiving the crown that all had expected to go to him. Yet Adonijah's plea carried with it serious ramifications. Taking a member of the king's harem would normally be interpreted as a claim to the throne (2 Sam. 3:7–10; 12:8; 16:21–22). Abishag had cared for David in his old age (1:1–4, 15).

2:18–22 the kingdom also: Solomon not only saw through Adonijah's plot, but recognized Joab and Abiathar as fellow conspirators. All three were dealt with severely (vv. 23–35).

2:23, 24 Solomon's actions, though severe, were what he believed to be the means whereby he would be able to maintain faith with Yahweh, who had made him the king.

2:25, 26 hand of Benaiah: This mighty man of David did not participate in Adonijah's plots (1:8, 26). Furthermore, he participated in the anointing of Solomon at Gihon (1:38).

2:27 When Abiathar was removed from office as a priest, his influence was greatly restricted. Solomon spared Abiathar's life in recognition of his past service to God and David (2 Sam. 15:24, 29; 1 Chr. 15:11–15). With this act God's word to Eli came to fulfillment. Eli's descendants were removed from serving the Lord (1 Sam. 2:30–33).

2:28–31 Because Joab was a murderer (2 Sam. 3:27; 18:14; 20:10), he could not claim the protective sanctity of the horns of the altar (1:50). Therefore, he could not escape execution (vv. 29–31).

2:32–34 The recital of Joab's evil deeds brought about the reason for his execution, to remove the innocent blood from the head of David and his household.

2:35 Solomon then decisively appointed his two loyalists to the positions vacated. Benaiah became the captain of the army and Zadok the high priest. Zadok was a descendant of Eleazar, the son of Aaron (1 Chr. 6:4–8).

2:36–46 At first Solomon placed Shimei under an extended house arrest rather than executing him outright for his shameful treatment of David (2:8, 9). However, Shimei felt he must pursue two slaves that had run away. This disobedience led to his death. all the wickedness: Shimei had openly opposed and cursed David (2 Sam. 16:5–13; 19:16–23). He openly violated the terms of the agreement with Solomon (vv. 36, 37). By executing Joab and Shimei and removing Abiathar, Solomon fulfilled David's instructions to him (vv. 5, 8) and also solved the problem of a hostile high priest.

3:1—4:34 This section emphasizes God's approval of Solomon as David's successor by noting the divine bestowal of wisdom upon him, that he might rule the kingdom effectively. This section has four divisions: (1) Solomon's desire for wisdom (3:1–15); (2) Solomon's judicial wisdom (3:16–28); (3) Solomon's administrative wisdom (4:1–28); (4) Solomon's fame for wisdom (4:29–34).

3:1 married: In the ancient Middle East, political alliances were often ratified by the marriage of the son of one king to the daughter of another. Except in unusual circumstances, the pharaohs of Egypt did not observe this custom (but see 1 Chr. 4:17, 18). Therefore, the giving of Pharaoh's daughter to Solomon attested to the Israelite king's growing prestige and importance to the Egyptian king. Pharaoh gave the important town of Gezer to the couple as a wedding present (9:16). The moral and spiritual failure of Solomon in his later years was a by-product of his many marriages with foreign wives. Each of these would come with her own retinue of pagan servants and priests of her pagan religion. See ch. 11 for a development of this sad theme. house of the LORD: Both Solomon's palace and the temple are called a house. Just as Solomon occupied the palace, the Lord was considered uniquely present with His people in the temple.

3:2, 3 Whether the worship ceremonies took place in specially constructed enclosures or at an open-air sanctuary (13:32), such hilltop areas or high places provided a setting where Canaanite religious rites could be infiltrated into Israel's worship (11:7; 2 Kin. 16:4).

3:4, 5 Gibeon is a hill about six miles northwest of Jerusalem.

3:6, 7 The term for child often refers to a servant or to an inexperienced person still in training for a profession (19:21; 20:14, 15; 2 Kin. 4:12). With proper humility, Solomon stressed his relative youth and inexperience.

3:8, 9 an understanding heart: The phrase suggested not only the willingness and patience to listen to all sides of an issue, but also the desire for the ability to reason.

The Gift of an Understanding Heart

Instead of asking God for wealth, health, or happiness, Solomon asked for "an understanding heart" (1 Kin. 3:9). The request itself showed remarkable wisdom, but it also made a great deal of sense given the circumstances in which Solomon found himself.

He was following in the footsteps of a remarkable man (1 Kin. 3:6). He was young and perceived himself to be inexperienced (3:7). He was saddled with the responsibility of leading God's people (3:8), a people who had shown themselves on frequent occasions to be stubborn, rebellious, and hard on their leaders. And he had just emerged from a messy fight over succession to the throne (1 Kin. 1; 2). Most of his enemies had been eliminated. But could he ever forget the intrigue surrounding those events? Likewise, could he ever forget the many attempts that had been made on his father's life? And what about the circumstances surrounding his own birth (2 Sam. 11; 12)? Given Solomon's heritage, he had many reasons to ask for the ability to "discern between good and evil" (1 Kin. 3:9).

3:10–12 God answered Solomon's request in abundant measure, granting him not only an understanding heart, but one that was wise for handling the crucial affairs of life in a fair and skillful manner. The abilities that God gave to Solomon were truly exceptional. Solomon's newly acquired wisdom (1 Kin. 4:29–34) would be tested often (vv. 16–28; 10:1–13, 23, 24) and much needed for the critical problems that would face his administration. The succeeding chapters will attest to Solomon's administrative skills in the political (ch. 4), architectural (chs. 5—7), and socio-economic areas (9:10–28; 10:14–29). Solomon's wisdom, however, would provide no guarantee of spiritual wisdom (1 Kin. 11:1–13).

3:13, 14 what you have not asked: Because Solomon chose a greater gift than riches and honor, God promised him everything else as well (Matt. 6:33).

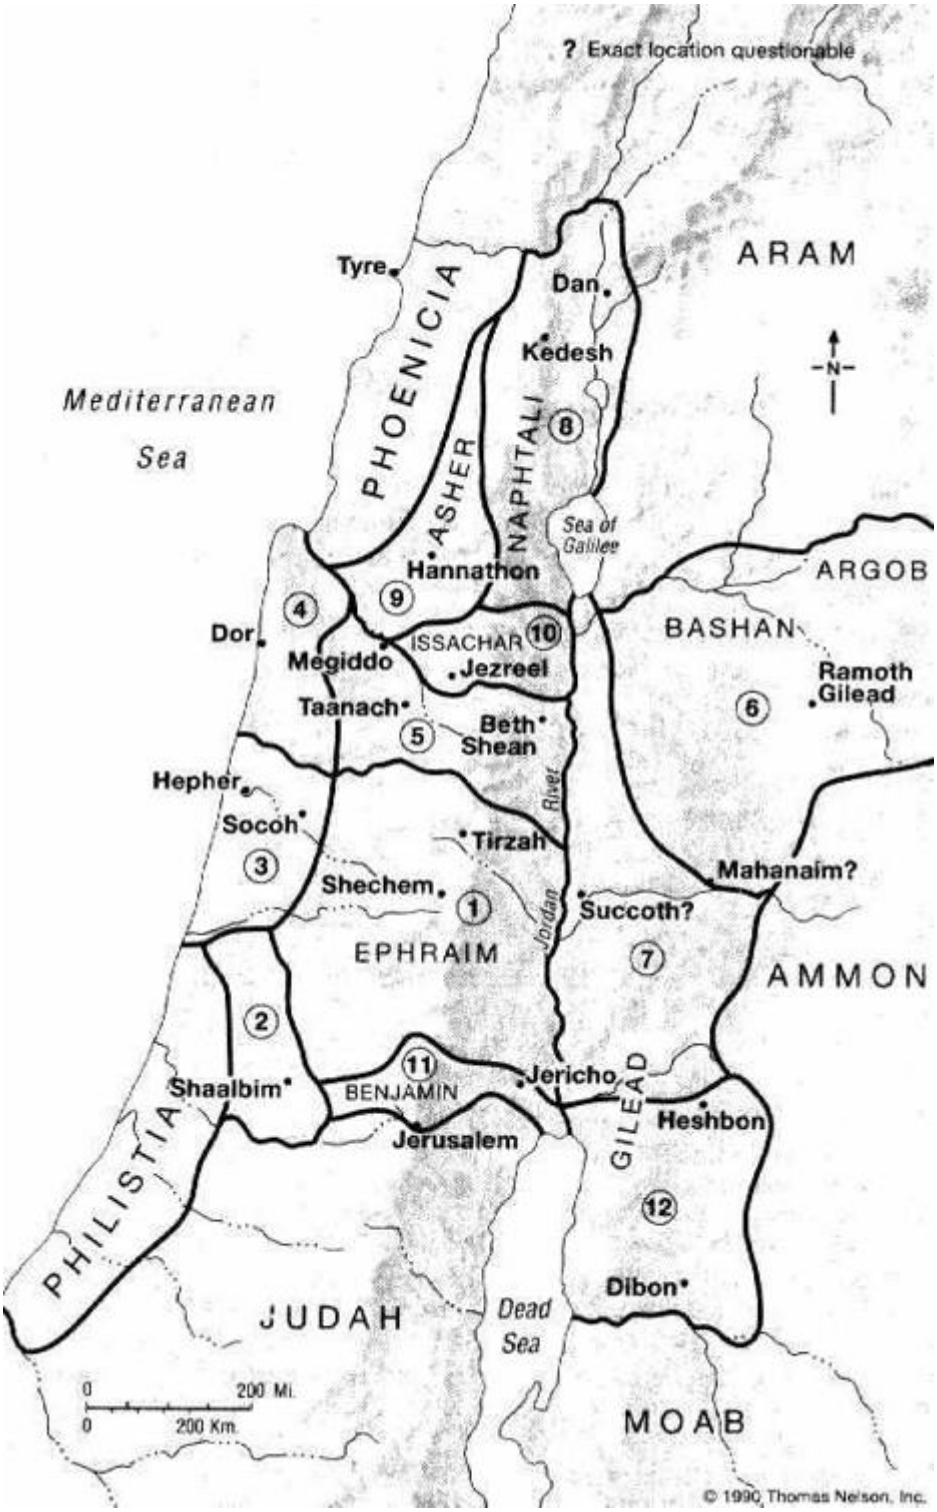
3:15 a dream: Dreams were one of the ways that God revealed His will (Gen. 20:3; 37:5; Dan. 2:3). Although David had brought the ark of the covenant to Jerusalem (2 Sam. 6), the tabernacle and its furnishings remained in Gibeon, which served as an important worship center (v. 4; 2 Chr. 1:3–5).

3:16–25 The fact that harlots could appear before Solomon suggested that he made himself available to persons of all stations of life who had a legitimate claim for justice.

3:26, 27 yearned with compassion: Her love as a mother made her give up her own child rather than see it die.

3:28 wisdom … justice: These important qualities which marked Solomon's reign from the beginning would characterize the rule of Israel's Messiah in a far greater way (Is. 11:1–5).



The growth and extension of Israel's borders under Solomon's leadership required extensive military expenditures. Coupled with this were ambitious building and commercial projects throughout his expanding kingdom. As a result, Solomon faced an urgent need for ever increasing revenues. To address this need, Solomon divided Israel into twelve districts and appointed governors over each district. These governors were responsible for levying and collecting taxes to provide for the needs of Jerusalem and the royal palace. The increasingly heavy taxes upon Israel created major dissension because the region of Judah was exempted. Furthermore, the divisions of the districts violated the old tribal boundaries.

4:1–6 Solomon's wisdom was also demonstrated in his appointment of proper officials for all the needs of state. For civil affairs, Solomon appointed scribes and a chief officer over the district officials (Azariah). He chose Benaiah to replace Joab as commander for the army (2:35). As a part of his personal staff, he appointed a special advisor, the king's friend; a chief of protocol, the recorder; and a minister of palace and state, to be over the household. This last position became a powerful office in royal administration. Men who occupied this powerful position were Obadiah (18:3), Eliakim (2 Kin. 18:18), and Shebna (Is. 22:15).

4:7–19 These twelve governors were in charge of Solomon's districts. They were responsible for handling lesser administrative tasks and raising revenue for the crown. The districts did not follow tribal boundaries.

4:18, 19 Not the same person as the Shimei at 2:8. This Shimei may be the Shimei of 1:8—a supporter of Solomon.

4:20, 21 numerous as the sand: God fulfilled His promise to make Abraham's descendants numerous, a great nation (Gen. 15:5, 18). Solomon's empire extended far beyond the traditional boundaries of Israel. Through this greatly expanded empire, Jewish people not only traveled to far-flung regions, but they took with them their knowledge of the living God. River: The Euphrates. God's promise to Abraham (Gen. 15:18) was fulfilled in part in the hegemony of Solomon. By various trade arrangements, treaties, and power plays, Solomon extended his empire far beyond Israel's traditional boundaries. However, the complete fulfillment of God's words to Abraham in Gen. 15 still lies in the future.

4:22 kors: The kor was the same size as the homer (Ezek. 45:14), six and a quarter bushels, a normal load for a donkey.

4:23 oxen … fowl: Meat was a rare item in a person's diet, suggestive of a feast (Prov. 9:1).

4:24, 25 The name Solomon is related to the word peace. It is fitting for this name to be associated with the time of Israel's great reign of peace. The vine and fig tree are symbols of God's blessing for those who obey His covenant.

4:26 forty thousand stalls: Some Greek manuscripts read four thousand (a figure also found in 2 Chr. 9:25). According to 10:26 and 2 Chr. 1:14, Solomon had 1,400 chariots. Since three horses were considered a chariot team and would be quartered together, four thousand would be about the number of horses Solomon needed.

4:27, 28 The immense provisions needed for the royal house (vv. 22, 23) were supplied monthly by each of the twelve governors (4:7–19).

"understanding"

(Heb. tebunah) (1 Kin. 4:29; Job 12:13; Prov. 3:13; 21:30) Strong's #8394: The verbal root of this noun means "to distinguish" or "to discern." Thus this noun conveys the idea of discernment. The Hebrew word is directly connected to the idea of wisdom in 22 passages, including Prov. 8 where they are both personified (Ex. 31:3; 1 Kin. 7:14; Prov. 8:1; 10:23). Due to its close association with wisdom, the word occurs often in Proverbs. Solomon contrasted understanding with folly (Prov. 14:29; 15:21; 18:2). He also exhorted his son to apply his heart to understanding (Prov. 2:2). Ultimately all discernment is from the Lord (Prov. 2:6), whose wisdom is infinite (Ps. 147:5; Is. 40:28).

4:29 In addition to giving Solomon a hearing (3:9) and discerning (3:12) heart, God gave him largeness (or breadth) of heart. All three terms underscore Solomon's understanding. This verse describes Solomon's understanding as limitless and immeasurable, like the sand on the seashore, just like the numbers of the Israelites (v. 20).

4:30 The term men of the East has been associated with Mesopotamia (Gen. 29:1), the east bank of the Jordan (Is. 11:14), or with Arabia in general (Judg. 6:3, 33; 7:12). All these are places whose inhabitants had a reputation for wisdom (Obad. 8). The fabled reputation of the wisdom of Egypt had been attested to in Egyptian literature for more than a millennium before Solomon's time.

4:31 Ethan the Ezrahite: See the title of Ps. 89. Heman: See 1 Chr. 16:42 (where Jeduthun may be the same as Ethan).

4:32–34 proverbs … songs: Solomon was the author of a large part of the Book of Proverbs. He is also traditionally assigned the authorship of the Song of Solomon, Pss. 72 and 127, and Ecclesiastes.

5:1—8:66 The building program of the Solomonic kingdom has five sections: (1) preparations for building the temple (5:1–18); (2) building the temple (6:1–38); (3) the palace complex (7:1–12); (4) the temple vessels (7:13–51); (5) the dedication of the temple (8:1–).

5:1, 2 Hiram: This Phoenician king ruled over Tyre for 34 years (978–944 B.C.). Loved reflects traditional Middle Eastern diplomatic vocabulary for political alliances and reinforces the biblical evidence that Hiram was David's friend and ally (v. 12; 2 Sam. 5:11, 12). Hiram initiated the relationship with Solomon, based on his earlier relationship with David. When Solomon wrote to Hiram (vv. 2–6), he spoke freely of the Lord as the God of David and himself. Hiram responded with praise (v. 7).

5:3 house: Although God did not allow David to build the temple (2 Sam. 7:13), David made preparations for it (1 Chr. 21:18—22:19; 28:9—29:19). name: God's name was associated with His revealed character and reputation (Ex. 3:14, 15), as well as His sovereign ownership of everything (Ex. 20:24; Ps. 22:22).

5:4, 5 The shift from "the Lord his God" (v. 3) to the LORD my God demonstrates that Solomon and his father had the same faith.

5:6 cedars … Lebanon: In addition to the Bible, other ancient literature attests to the extensive use of wood from the cedar trees of Lebanon for building and furnishing temples and palaces. The principal building material in Jerusalem was limestone. none among us: Since Israel did not have cedar forests like those in Lebanon, the Israelites did not have workmen skilled in building with it.

5:7 Blessed be the LORD: The acknowledgment of another people's deity is well known both in the Bible (10:9; Dan. 3:28) and in other ancient Middle Eastern literature.

5:8–11 Hiram's reply indicates that he was a shrewd businessman. Not only would Solomon pay the wages of Hiram's servants, but he would make the payments to Hiram (vv. 6, 11; 2 Chr. 2:10). In addition to men and material, Hiram also supplied gold to Solomon, for which he apparently demanded collateral (9:10–14), and which Solomon could later redeem (2 Chr. 8:1, 2).

5:12–14 labor force: The workmen were put to work as forced labor gangs on public projects. Solomon's long and extensive use of this type of social conscription to accomplish his vast building projects became a source of considerable difficulty for his successor Rehoboam (12:4).

5:15–18 quarried stone: Stonecutters were common laborers who cut and crushed rocks from a quarry.

6:1 four hundred and eightieth year: Many scholars take this date as the key date for establishing the time of the Exodus. The division of the kingdom at the death of Solomon can be dated at 930 B.C. (11:41–43). Allowing forty years for Solomon's rule (11:42), the fourth year of his reign would be 966 B.C. If the Exodus took place 480 years before 966 B.C., its date was 1446 B.C. Some consider this date too early for what occurs in the Book of Exodus and date the Exodus in the thirteenth century B.C. They suggest that the 480 years may be a round figure representing twelve generations, or that it may have been arrived at by adding the length of various concurrent or overlapping periods as though they were placed in one lineal string of eras.

Sparing No Expense

Whenever modern-day churches draw up plans and budgets for buildings in which to worship, they face an age-old tension: what is appropriate in terms of size, materials, beauty, and expense? For Solomon, there seems to have been only one answer to that question as he proposed to build God's temple: spare no expense!

A more lavish building project has rarely been seen. The cost of such a venture today would be virtually incalculable. Was Solomon justified in incurring such an expense? The question is not easily answered.

On one hand, the project contributed to a number of economic and other problems of Solomon's reign such as heavy taxation, a growing underclass of foreigners, and the depletion of the forests of Lebanon. The temple was by no means the sole cause of these troubles (9:15–19), but it was built with a policy of "only the best," which seemed to typify the Solomonic empire. Even "silver … was accounted as nothing in the days of Solomon" (10:21).

On the other hand, Solomon apparently recognized that architecture is not neutral; it makes a statement. In fact, to the extent that temples and church sanctuaries follow (or sometimes dispense with) architectural forms and principles, they are works of art. Solomon's temple was a remarkable work of art, built to the glory of God (8:12, 13). Was it built to the glory of Solomon as well? Probably, since most great works of architecture are monuments to those who build them. Yet God apparently approved of Solomon's achievement, for He blessed the sanctuary with His presence (8:10, 11).

Yet even as the construction went forward, the Lord reminded His builder that what mattered was not a house of cedar and gold, but keeping the Law (6:11–13). Perhaps that is the most important architectural principle of all when it comes to houses of worship: it is not the size, beauty, or costliness of the structure, but the sincere devotion and obedience of those who worship in the structure. After all, the Lord does not dwell only in sanctuaries built by people, but in the people themselves (8:27; Acts 7:48; 17:24; 1 Cor. 6:19, 20).

6:2, 3 house … for the LORD: For the interior of the temple Solomon followed the floor plan of the tabernacle but doubled its dimensions. sixty cubits: The standard cubit was about 18 inches. The dimensions here are approximately 90 feet long, 30 feet wide, and 45 feet high. Solomon's temple was constructed on Mt. Moriah (Gen. 22:2; 2 Chr. 3:1) at the threshing floor of Ornan (or Araunah, 2 Sam. 24:24). Like the tabernacle, the temple was divided into the Most Holy Place, the holy place, and an outer courtyard. The outer court contained a bronze altar for sacrifices and a brass basin set on the backs of twelve bulls. On the east end of the temple there was a porch. Before the entrance to the porch were two freestanding pillars: Jachin (to the right) and Boaz (to the left; 7:21). Passing over the front porch one would enter the holy place. Here was the holy furniture so symbolic of Israel's religious experience: the gold plated table of the bread of the presence, ten golden lampstands, and the portable altar of incense. A veil separated the holy place from the Most Holy Place, in which were housed the ark and the mercy seat guarded by two cherubim. Only the priests could enter the temple itself to minister before the Lord.

6:4 This was long before the use of glass panes, of course. The windows were openings for light and ventilation. Often there might be lattice work for decoration and for protection against falling from the openings (2 Kin. 1:2).

6:5, 6 Three-storied chambers were built along the temple's outer walls. A series of ledges served as resting places for the beams of the floors. This meant that the three floors were progressively wider as one went up.

6:7–10 The rock was precut at the quarry for its proper fit in the temple building, so no … tool was heard at the temple itself. This required a high degree of skill in measuring, cutting, and fitting the immense stones in place.

Solomon constructed the temple on Mount Moriah, north of the ancient City of David. The temple was built according to plans that David received from the Lord and passed on to Solomon (1 Chr. 28:11–13, 19). The division into a sanctuary and inner sanctuary corresponds to the division of the tabernacle into the holy place and Most Holy Place.

6:11 word of the LORD: This message to Solomon might have come by means of a prophet. On other occasions, Solomon had more personal encounters with the Lord (3:5; 9:2; 11:11).

6:12, 13 The most important work of Solomon was certainly the building of the temple. God promised to bless Solomon and his work if he faithfully obeyed His commands.

6:14–19 The ark of the covenant of the LORD (Deut. 10:8; Josh. 3:11) is so named because it housed the two stone tablets of the covenant—the Ten Commandments (Deut. 10:1–5). The ark symbolized the presence of the sovereign God in the midst of His people (8:10, 11; Josh. 3:13).

“gold”

(Heb. zahab) (1 Kin. 6:20; 2 Sam. 21:4; 2 Chr. 9:1, 9; Job 23:10) Strong’s #2091: This word almost always denotes the substance of gold, although occasionally it represents an alloy of gold (1 Kin. 10:16) or the color gold (Zech. 4:12). Gold symbolized wealth and was quite often mentioned along with silver, both of which were abundant during Solomon’s reign (Gen. 13:2; 2 Chr. 1:15; Ezek. 16:13). In the OT, most references to gold relate to the tabernacle or to Solomon’s temple and palace (Ex. 25:3; 2 Chr. 2:7; 9:13–27). Although gold was valued highly and continues to be, the Scripture asserts that certain qualities are to be valued more: wisdom (Job 28:17), loving favor (Prov. 22:1), and the judgments, law, and commandments of the Lord (Pss. 19:9, 10; 119:72, 127).

6:20–22 the inner sanctuary: The Most Holy Place was a cube of thirty feet. with pure gold: The amount of gold is given as six hundred talents, or about 21 tons, in 2 Chr. 3:8.

6:23–28 A great deal of attention was given to the placement of the cherubim, with special reference to their immense wings. This room symbolized the presence of the living God, and special care was necessary in construction. With all the care given here, only one person would enter the room, and that was the high priest, on one day of the year. The cherubim represented the glorious, wondrous angels that serve God in heaven. But they were never venerated. They were only symbols of a Greater Presence.

6:23–26 The two cherubim were overlaid with gold and set so as to face the door to the holy place (2 Chr. 3:12, 13). These cherubim were large, standing fifteen feet high. They were in addition to the two cherubim on the mercy seat (8:6–8). A cherub was probably similar to the winged sphinxes common in ancient Middle Eastern sculpture. These creatures had a human face, a lion’s body, and wings (Ex. 25:19).

6:27, 28 The inner room symbolized the dwelling place of the living God among His people. Only one person would enter this room, and that was the high priest on one day of the year.

6:29, 30 The decoration of the temple must have been exquisite. cherubim, palm trees, and open flowers: These same three figures are mentioned in vv. 32, 35. The temple was decorated with beautiful carvings, even in places most people would never see. The beauty of the building was a symbol of the beauty of God's presence.

6:31, 32 The entrance to the inner sanctuary was two doors made of olive wood. A veil or curtain hung there as well (Ex. 26:31–36; 2 Chr. 3:14).

6:33, 34 Double-leaved, foldable doors made of cypress wood gave access to the holy place.

6:35, 36 The use of the inner court was restricted to the priests.

6:37, 38 seven years: The period of time was necessary because of the greatness of the task. Solomon had immense crews engaged in building the temple (5:13–18).

7:1, 2 Solomon’s desire to complete the Lord’s house before building his own house is commendable. House of the Forest of Lebanon: Rows of cedar pillars as well as the free use of cedar throughout this building, gave a forest-like appearance to it. The building apparently was used at least in part as an armory (10:16, 17; Is. 22:8).

The Cedar Trade

The parched and war-torn landscape of modern-day Lebanon makes it difficult to imagine, but 3,000 years ago the area was flourishing with massive cedar trees. The timber was so plentiful that Solomon sent thousands of laborers to cut and transport cedar wood to Jerusalem, where he built numerous structures with it, including his impressive residence, appropriately called the House of the Forest of Lebanon (1 Kin. 7:2).

Cedar was also used for the construction of the temple (5:6–10; 6:9, 10, 15–18). It was used again many years later in the construction of the second temple, after the Babylonian exile (Ezra 3:7). Solomon was by no means the only ruler to import the fragrant, durable, and attractive cedar, as well as cypress and fir. Lebanon is known to have traded these woods with Syria, Egypt, and the nations of Mesopotamia. Yet something happened to this lively economy between the time of Solomon and the time of Christ. In fact, a massive change occurred in the overall ecology of the Palestine area. Scripture suggests that it was part of God’s judgment of Israel for turning away from Him.

The forests of Lebanon were decimated by over-cutting. Solomon contributed to that, yet even his demand for cedar was apparently exceeded by that of the Babylonian ruler Nebuchadrezzar, according to extra-biblical sources and possibly the biblical prophets as well (Hab. 2:17). As a result, the ancient cedar forests vanished within generations, never to be replaced, despite attempts to reforest the land.

7:3–7 The Hall of Pillars was a colonnaded entry hall to the Hall of Judgment. The Hall of Judgment was where the king could hear and decide cases too difficult for lesser officials.

7:8 house where he dwelt: Solomon's own house and that of Pharaoh's daughter are mentioned last. The gate between the palace complex and the temple area is called "the gate of the escorts" (2 Kin. 11:19).

7:9–11 costly stones: Exquisitely dressed blocks of the best quality limestone.

7:12 The great court was an outer court enclosing the entire temple and palace complex.

7:13, 14 Huram was of mixed parentage. His father was a Phoenician artisan who had married a widow from the tribe of Naphtali (2 Chr. 2:14). Like his father, Huram had become a master craftsman; his contributions to the work on the temple were extensive (7:40–47).

7:15–22 Among the major works of Huram were the freestanding pillars of bronze near the entrance of the temple. These were objects of great beauty and gave the appearance of formidable strength. These pillars spoke of the power and might of God.

7:15, 16 A cubit was usually reckoned at about eighteen inches in length. Thus these pillars were about 27 feet high. In addition, each had a capital of another 7 1/2 feet. They must have been unusually imposing, wonderfully ornate structures.

7:17–22 Jachin … Boaz: Giving symbolic names to the pillars helped teach their meaning in the true worship of the living God. Jachin means “He Will Establish.” Boaz may mean “In Him Is Strength.” Another possible meaning is “He Is Quick.” These two free-standing pillars were placed near the porch in front of the temple (2 Chr. 3:17). There is a question about the height of the capitals. Verse 16 records it as five cubits (as does Jer. 52:22), but 2 Kin. 25:17 as three cubits. This apparent discrepancy may involve simply a difference in what was measured, with 2 Kin. 25:17 recording the size of only the upper portion of the capitals.

7:23–26 Cast in one piece and set upon twelve bronze oxen, the Sea of cast bronze replaced the laver of washings for the tabernacle (Ex. 30:17–21). While the quantity of water held by the Sea is given here as two thousand baths (about 11,500 gallons), three thousand baths (17,500 gallons) is recorded in 2 Chr. 4:5. The figure in 2 Chronicles could be an error of copying (in the previous verse the number three occurs four times), or possibly it is an example of using different standards for the length of the cubit.

7:27–38 The ten carts each containing a bronze laver (v. 38) were arranged beside the molten Sea, five on either side, and were used for rinsing the burnt offerings (2 Chr. 4:6). These carts were both functional and ornamental. A biblical view, as represented here by the elaborate artistry associated with the furnishings of the temple, seems to be quite different from a common idea in which people speak distastefully about art and design in the context of worship, believing that such things “distract” from worship. But as our God is a God of great beauty, objects of beauty that are devoted to His glory may be used in association with His worship. All the while, we recognize that there is no object of human crafting that may truly represent His inexpressible loveliness.

7:39–48 The furnishings of the temple were designed to correspond with similar furnishings in the tabernacle. The golden altar replaced the altar of incense (Ex. 30:2–4), ten golden tables (2 Chr. 4:8) took the place of the table of the presence (Ex. 25:23–30), and ten lampstands were substituted for the one golden lampstand (Ex. 25:31–40). Although there were ten tables and lampstands where before there was one, their functions remained the same, all ten being considered one unit (2 Chr. 29:18).

7:49–51 The gifts of David dedicated to service in the temple were probably stored in one of the side chambers. David’s personal example of giving (1 Chr. 29:1–9) provided a high model of godly concern in leadership.

8:1, 2 Having been brought to Jerusalem previously (2 Sam. 6), the ark of the covenant was now put in its place in the temple. With the erection of the temple and the placement of the ark, the division of spiritual activities between Gibeon, the location of the tabernacle, and Jerusalem, where the ark had resided in a temporary shelter, was now at an end. From now on the Deuteronomic ideal of centrality of worship could be realized (Deut. 12:1–14). Because the temple was completed in the eighth month of Solomon's eleventh year of reign, Solomon must have waited some eleven months for the dedication of the temple. This would allow all the furnishings to be completed and installed, final touches to be added, and ample preparation to be made for this solemn yet joyful event. The Feast of Tabernacles, occurring at the conclusion of the ceremonial year and commemorating God's granting of rest in the Promised Land to His people would provide a particularly appropriate occasion. Moreover, the covenant renewal observed in connection with this great feast (Deut. 31:10) made this time all the more appropriate. Accordingly, the festal season was lengthened to two weeks to allow the sacredness and joy of these days to have their full effect (2 Chr. 5:11–13).

8:3, 4 The holy ark was carried by the priests; all was done as God's Law demanded.

8:5–7 The joy of the people is seen in the abundance of sacrifices of sheep and oxen. The placement of the holy ark in its proper place without incident was truly a reason to celebrate. They had brought the symbol of the living God into the shrine which had been built to honor Him.

8:8 poles could be seen: This statement probably means that the carrying poles of the ark, which were not to be removed from their rings (Ex. 25:15), were so long that if one were to attempt to see their length, one would have to look into the Most Holy Place to see their ends. The ark with its poles was thus aligned crosswise to the door (or north to south).

8:9 The two tablets of stone upon which the Ten Commandments were inscribed were known as the "tablets of the covenant" (Deut. 9:9) and were kept in the ark (Deut. 10:1–5, 8) along with the jar of manna (Ex. 16:33, 34) and Aaron's rod that budded (Num. 17:10).

8:10, 11 As a cloud had covered the tabernacle and God's glory had filled it when it was inaugurated (Ex. 40:34, 35), so now a cloud filled the temple. This visible presence of God's dwelling with His people—sometimes called the “shekinah glory”—gave the people assurance and incentive for obedient and holy living.

8:12, 13 Then Solomon spoke: God’s dwelling in dark clouds is often mentioned in the Scriptures (Ex. 19:9; 20:21). This is a sign of His transcendence. Yet He is both near and far, both immanent and transcendent. God is obscured by a dark cloud; but at the same time He chooses to be present in His exalted house.

8:14–21 Here is a model for public declaration in a formal setting. Throughout there is glory given to the Lord, as well as a fair assessment of the work of His people in accomplishing His will.

8:20, 21 the LORD has fulfilled: Israel’s God is a keeper of promises. His promise to give Abraham’s descendants a land (Gen. 15:13, 14, 18–21; Josh. 14:12–15) had been provisionally realized (Josh. 21:43–45). Solomon also appropriated God’s promise to David (2 Sam. 7:12–18). Subsequent kings in the Davidic line could likewise by faith enjoy the blessings of God promised in the Davidic covenant (Pss. 2; 89:3, 4, 19–24, 27–37). Ultimately the continuing promises in the Abrahamic and Davidic Covenants will come together in the New Covenant (Jer. 31:31–34), and all will be fulfilled in Israel’s Greater David (Ezek. 37:24–28), Jesus Christ (Acts 2:29–36; 3:25, 26).

8:22–30 Solomon had begun his reign with a conscious dependence on God (3:9). His long public prayer (vv. 22–53) recognized that continuing need in his life (vv. 26, 28) and the lives of his people (vv. 30, 31, 33, 35, 38, 44, 46–48). In his prayer Solomon stressed God’s faithfulness, and the need for similar faithfulness on the part of Israel, rulers and people alike, if God’s full blessings were to be realized.

8:27–29 heaven … temple: The God of Scripture is infinite; all that He has made, vast as creation may be, finally has its limits. No mere building, no matter how wonderful, can be thought of as the dwelling place of God. Yet in His grace the Lord condescends to be viewed as having His dwelling among men. God’s dwelling in a temple prefigured the Incarnation when the Creator became man, born in a stable in Bethlehem.

(Heb. techinnah) (1 Kin. 8:28; Jer. 42:2, 9; Dan. 9:20) Strong’s #8467: This word signifies a petition for favor or mercy. Supplication is almost always directed to God, but Jeremiah used the word twice to represent a formal petition he made to a king (Jer. 37:20; 38:26). Of the twenty-four occurrences of this word in the OT, thirteen are in connection with Solomon’s prayer dedicating the temple (8:23—9:3; 2 Chr. 6:14–42). Other words with the same root (and indicating supplication) occur seven times in the same context. Supplication is generally a petition for God to be merciful in the impending distress; thus personal enemies are cited on several occasions (Pss. 55:1–3; 119:70; Jer. 36:7). The Bible specifically records that God heard the supplications of David (Ps. 6:9), Solomon (9:3), and of wicked King Manasseh, who humbled himself before God (2 Chr. 33:12, 13).

8:30 Since God was present in the temple in Jerusalem, prayer was to be directed toward this place (Ex. 15:17; Dan. 6:10).

8:31, 32 Solomon’s first request asks for righteous judgment. In such situations where there was insufficient evidence to establish a charge, the accused was obliged to take an oath declaring his innocence.

8:33, 34 sinned against You: Solomon’s second request asks for forgiveness of sin, where sin against God has caused Israel to be defeated.

8:35–40 Solomon’s third and fourth requests deal with healing the land after distress or drought due to the people’s sin (Deut. 28:21–24, 38, 42, 52, 59–61). The remedy in such cases of judgment is repentance and prayer for forgiveness, followed by renewed faithfulness to the standards of God’s covenant.

8:41–43 Solomon’s fifth request deals with prayer by a foreigner. Unlike God’s people or resident aliens within the commonwealth of Israel (Deut. 10:18, 19), foreigners have no particular claim on the ear of God. But God’s people expected foreigners to be drawn to Him through the worship of His people.

8:44–53 Solomon’s sixth and seventh requests concern matters relative to wartime situations. Battle (v. 44) was to be waged in accordance with divine directions (Deut. 20; 21:10–14) and could be lost by disobedience (Deut. 28:64–68; Josh. 7). Believers must face all of life’s crucial encounters with trust in God and faithful adherence to the standards of His word (Pss. 91; 119:57–61, 161–168, 173–176).

8:54–59 he arose … from kneeling: The parallel account of 2 Chr. 6:12–42 records that Solomon knelt on a tall platform that he had built for the occasion in order that all might see him praying before God. Chronicles reports that Solomon closed his prayer with a plea (Ps. 132:8–10) that God would continue residing with His people and remembering His promises to David (2 Chr. 6:41, 42). The writer of Kings records Solomon's dedicatory blessing on the congregation of Israel, in which Solomon praises God for giving the people their present rest (vv. 54–66; Deut. 12:9–25), invokes God's continued presence and direction of His people (vv. 57–60), and challenges the people to be loyal to God and His laws (v. 61). Chronicles adds that Solomon's prayer and blessing were accompanied by heavenly fire that consumed the sacrifice on the altar (2 Chr. 7:1–3).

8:60 all the peoples: This verse does not limit God to the Jews only but includes Gentiles as well.

8:61 The Hebrew term translated loyal basically means "at peace with," hence, "complete" or "perfect" (11:4; 15:3, 14).

8:62–66 The ceremony concluded with many special sacrifices (v. 62) and ended on a high note of joyful (v. 66) praise and thanksgiving to God for His goodness.

A House of Prayer for All Nations

Solomon's prayer of dedication for the temple at Jerusalem showed that Israel's God was a God for all nations. The king anticipated that foreigners from all over the world would be drawn to the house of worship. So he asked God to honor their prayers in order that "all peoples of the earth may know Your name and fear You" (1 Kin. 8:41–43).

One early answer to Solomon's prayer was a visit by the queen of Sheba (10:1–13), who had heard of the splendors of Solomon's kingdom but wanted to see them for herself. After reviewing his accomplishments, she praised God for what he had done for Israel (10:9). Other visitors had similar reactions.

The temple was located at Jerusalem, but as Jesus pointed out (quoting Isaiah), it was meant to be "a house of prayer for all nations" (Is. 56:7; Mark 11:17). Likewise, Israel was to be a blessing to the nations and a light showing the way toward the one true God (Gen. 12:1–3; Is. 51:4).

Similarly, Jesus teaches His followers to be a light to the nations (Matt. 5:14–16). Rather than bringing people to a central place of worship, believers—who are themselves temples of the Holy Spirit (1 Cor. 6:19, 20)—are to go to the ends of the earth, taking the Good News of God's grace to all the peoples of the world (Matt. 28:19).

9:1—11:43 The account of Solomon's rule closes by relating the socio-economic successes of the era, coupled with the attendant apostasy and growing secularism that such attachments often bring. Solomon's kingdom had begun well but would be brought low by his own spiritual failures. This section has four subsections: (1) special relationships and activities (9:1–28); (2) the visit of the queen of Sheba (10:1–10); (3) the splendor of the era (10:14–29); (4) closing details relative to the era (11:1–43).

9:1–9 the second time: God had appeared previously to Solomon in Gibeon (3:4–15). The Lord's warning was a necessary reminder for Solomon, who would come to compromise the conditions required for enjoying God's blessing. Solomon would have to endure the consequences of disobedience (11:1–11).

9:10–14 These twenty cities (v. 11) lay east and southeast of Acco in the tribal allotment to Asher. Apparently they had been ceded to Hiram as collateral for the gold necessary for furnishing the temple and palace complex. Hiram's displeasure with them would later result in Solomonredeeming the towns by repaying the debt in some other manner (2 Chr. 8:1, 2).

9:14 one hundred and twenty talents of gold: This is an immense amount (see also the gift of the queen of Sheba in 10:10). A talent was said to be the full load one man could carry (2 Kin. 5:23). It was equal to three thousand shekels, or about 70 pounds.

A model of the ancient city of Megiddo, showing its impressive defensive wall built by King Solomon (1 Kin. 9:15).

9:15 The identification and location of the Millo are uncertain. Probably the word refers to architectural terraces and buttressing on the slope of the eastern hill of Jerusalem. Hazor, Megiddo, and Gezer: These three cities were important commercial, administrative, and military centers for Solomon. Archaeological excavations have uncovered common design elements in the walls and gates of all three.

9:16 Gezer, which had been a strong Canaanite city, was part of Ephraim's territorial assignment. Ephraim had never taken Gezer; however, Egypt had conquered the city. Its key location on the edge of the lowlands west of Jerusalem made it a splendid gift for Pharaoh to give on the occasion of his daughter's marriage to Solomon.

IN CONTEXT

Storage Cities

Solomon's storage cities (1 Kin. 9:17–19; 2 Chr. 8:4–6) were essentially supply depots that warehoused government supplies such as food, building materials, and military equipment. They also were a measure of a kingdom's prosperity, prestige, and power.

Solomon's kingdom was divided into twelve administrative districts (1 Kin. 4:7–19), and many of the revenues collected by the governors were probably channeled through the supply cities before delivery to Jerusalem (4:21). Excavations at Beth Shemesh (1 Sam. 6:12) and Lachish have uncovered long, rectangular rooms used for storage. Likewise, a large underground silo dating to Solomon's era has been found at Megiddo, with capacity for almost 13,000 bushels of grain.

Solomon was not the only ancient ruler to build storage cities. As slaves in Egypt, the Israelites built the supply cities of Pithom and Raamses for Pharaoh (Ex. 1:11). Likewise, King Jehoshaphat and Hezekiah of Judah built storage cities during their reigns (2 Chr. 17:12; 32:27–29).

9:17–19 Three cities were key to Solomon's defensive strategy. Lower Beth Horon and Baalath served to defend Judah's western front. Tadmor is probably the important commercial city in Syria, later known as Palmyra.

9:20, 21 The five nations listed here are peoples who constituted the early inhabitants of Canaan. Several such lists are given in the OT (Josh. 3:10). Solomon assigned their surviving members to work on public projects in accordance with the principle of compulsory labor (5:13).

9:22–25 These three times a year included the Feasts of Unleavened Bread, Pentecost, and Tabernacles (Deut. 16:16). Not only did Solomon show himself a faithful spiritual shepherd by leading His people in worship, but continual attention to prescribed religious duties would keep the temple finished, or properly maintained.

9:26, 27 Ezion Geber was at the head of the modern Gulf of Aqaba. Its key location as an outlet to the Red Sea and the regions beyond made it commercially important to Solomon and to Hiram, his Phoenician trading partner (2 Chr. 8:17, 18).

9:28 One of the main commercial sites reached via Ezion Geber, Ophir may have supplied gold for Solomon to repay his debt to Hiram (5:8–11; 9:11–14). Solomon also received a generous gift of gold from the queen of Sheba (10:10).

10:1, 2 Located in southwestern Arabia (present-day Yemen), Sheba was the homeland of the Sabeans, a people whose far-flung commercial enterprises stretched from Syria to east Africa to distant India. The Sabeans dealt in such precious commodities as gold, gemstones, perfumes, and rare spices. The queen of Sheba came to ask Solomon hard questions (Heb. hidot, meaning "riddles," enigmatic issues," "perplexing sayings"; Prov. 1:6) to satisfy her own mind and to examine his wisdom. She serves as an example of what must have happened on a lesser scale throughout the reign of Solomon. His wisdom, which became proverbial (4:29–34), was an attractive force. Wise men and sages from other cultures came to Jerusalem and learned of the wisdom that is rooted in the fear of God (Prov. 1:7). This suggests a lively intellectual climate in Jerusalem during the reign of Solomon the Wise.

10:3–9 Solomon's brilliant replies to the queen of Sheba's difficult questions (v. 3), as well as the skillful use of his wisdom for the needs and interests of his kingdom convinced her that such wisdom must be divinely bestowed. Her acknowledgment of Solomon's God and the Lord's covenant faithfulness toward Israel does not necessarily mean that she made a commitment of personal faith in the Lord. Such recognition of foreign deities was common in the literature of the ancient world. However, the possibility exists that she experienced a spiritual awakening as a result of her time with Solomon (5:7).

10:10–15 one hundred and twenty talents: Solomon used the gold not only to furnish the temple (6:20–35; 7:49–51) and palace (10:18–21) but also to make five hundred ornamental shields, which were placed in the House of the Forest of Lebanon (10:16, 17).

10:16, 17 Made of wood (or basketwork) and covered with gold plating, these shields were intended for ceremonial occasions. These shields would be carried off after Solomon's death by Sheshonq I of Egypt's twenty-second dynasty. Rehoboam would replace them with bronze shields (1 Kin. 14:25–28).

10:18–21 The throne of ivory was probably made of wood inlaid with ivory, as well as being overlaid with finest gold. Solomon received ivory as a result of his trading ventures with Hiram (v. 22).

10:22, 23 Solomon's merchant ships are linked to his commercial arrangements with Hiram.

10:24, 25 all the earth: This phrase refers to the international reputation of Solomon's wisdom.

10:26 one thousand four hundred chariots: The reasonableness of the figure given here may be seen in that Shalmaneser III of Assyria reports that at the Battle of Qarqar (853 B.C.) he faced a combined enemy chariot force of 3,900, some two thousand of whom were supplied by Israel.

10:27 silver … cedar: The point is that Israel under Solomon enjoyed its greatest period of prosperity. This time of prosperity and peace also must have allowed for the growth of scholarship and for arts and music.

10:28, 29 Keveh is probably the city of Que attested in a ninth century B.C. inscription found in southern Asia Minor. Que is probably also the Cilicia of classical literature (Acts 6:9). Solomon's wide-ranging dealing in horses from Que to Egypt brought him perilously close to, or in actual violation of, breaking the prohibition of acquiring great numbers of horses (Deut. 17:16). Evidently Egyptian horses and chariots were highly prized, so that Solomon could make a tidy middleman's profit in selling them to Syrian and Hittite kings.

The Wise King

A list of Solomon's political, administrative, military, and architectural achievements would be one of the most impressive of the ancient world. Under his leadership, Israel expanded its influence from the Euphrates to the Mediterranean, and from Asia Minor to the Gulf of Aqaba and Egypt.

Yet underlying all of Solomon's accomplishments was a God-given wisdom for which he was renowned in his own day and is remembered today (1 Kin. 3:6–14): • The judgment that he rendered in the case of the harlots and the child won the respect of the entire nation (3:16–28).

• His wisdom was said to surpass that of all other known wise men of his day (4:30, 31).

• He gave 3,000 proverbs (4:32), many of which are contained in the Book of Proverbs.

• He composed 1,005 songs (4:32), including Pss. 72 and 127.

• He demonstrated competencies in botany, horticulture, zoology, and ichthyology (4:33; compare Prov. 30:24–31; Eccl. 2:4–6).

• Visitors from throughout the world traveled to Jerusalem to hear his opinion (1 Kin. 4:34), including the queen of Sheba (10:1–9).

• He was the originator of most of the Book of Proverbs and all of Ecclesiastes and the Song of Solomon; several pieces of extra-biblical literature are attributed to him as well.

• Folktales from ancient Israel, Arabia, and Ethiopia celebrate Solomon's wisdom and even ascribe magical powers to him.

11:1–43 This chapter is the sad close to a brilliant reign. It presents the sin of Solomon in his many wives (11:1–13) and describes the decline of Solomon through his adversaries Hadad the Edomite (11:14–22), Rezon of Zobah (11:23–25), and Jeroboam of Israel (11:26–40). The chapter closes with the death of Solomon and the end of the Solomonic Era (11:41–43).

11:1 many foreign women: The word order in the Hebrew text emphasizes the word foreign, with a secondary emphasis on the adjective many. Solomon had committed two egregious sins. Taking foreign wives violated the Lord's prohibitions against marrying Canaanite women (v. 2; Ex. 34:12–17; Deut. 7:1–3); taking many wives violated the standard of monogamy established at the beginning (Gen. 2:24, 25), and resulted in rampant polygamy, something God had also forbidden to Israel's future kings (Deut. 17:17). Doubtless many of Solomon's marriages were in accord with the common ancient Middle Eastern convention of sealing alliances by marriages between members of the royal houses contracting the alliances. Solomon's yielding to the customs of the day would have serious spiritual consequences for himself (vv. 3–13) and his people (2 Kin. 17:7–20). David also had more than one wife (2 Sam. 3:2–5). David's early marriages were prompted by love (1 Sam. 18:17–28) and compassion (1 Sam. 25:2–42). Yet some of David's later marriages may have been prompted by the same acquisitiveness that later motivated his son Solomon (2 Sam. 5:13–16).

11:2 clung to these in love: Our harsh assessment of Solomon's many wives is mitigated somewhat by the use of this phrase (v. 1).

11:3 seven hundred … three hundred: If the reference to 60 queens and 80 concubines in Song 6:8 is to Solomon's wives, it represents a much earlier period in Solomon's reign.

11:4 Although it is true that David did not always live up to God's standards, he was loyal to God and trusted Him implicitly, even when he was rebuked for his sins (2 Sam. 12:13; Pss. 32:1–5; 53:1–5). Because of the influence of his many wives, Solomon compromised his faith by worshiping foreign gods.

11:5, 6 Ashtoreth was a Canaanite goddess of love and war. Milcom was the national god of the Ammonites.

11:7, 8 The use of a high place in association with the worship of foreign gods shows the terrible danger that the high places presented to Israel (3:2–4; 14:23; Mic. 1:3). Chemosh was the national god of Moab.

His worship was practiced repeatedly by God's people (2 Kin. 23:13). The veneration of this deity is also attested in the recently discovered Ebla Tablets in a form that suggests his association with the city of Carchemish along the upper bend of the Euphrates River. Molech is associated with human sacrifice and with Baal (Jer. 7:31, 32; 19:5, 6; 32:35).

11:9–13 God appeared twice before to Solomon (3:5; 9:2). Solomon's spiritual odyssey may be seen in the details of his three audiences with God. While God graciously postponed the division of Solomon's kingdom until after his death, internal troubles appeared while he was still alive (vv. 14–40).

11:11–12 your servant: That is, Jeroboam the son of Nebat (11:26; 12:20).

11:13 one tribe: The tribe is Judah, the principal tribe of the southern kingdom. Simeon had assimilated with Judah by this time (12:17, 20, 21).

11:14–22 Hadad the Edomite was one of the survivors who had escaped when David defeated the Edomite army (2 Sam. 8:13, 14). Pharaoh's ready reception and favorable treatment of Hadad probably had political ramifications, the pharaoh seeing in him a potential future ally on Israel's border.

11:23–25 Having escaped David's earlier campaigns against the Arameans (2 Sam. 8:3–6), Rezon would later become king of Damascus and his people would remain a constant threat to Israel.

11:26 The meaning of the name Jeroboam is in some doubt. It may mean, "The People Increase" or "The People Contend." The second meaning would have been very fitting for Jeroboam I, as the rebellion of the northern kingdom, rooted deeply in ancient jealousies, was based immediately on reaction to the oppressive taxation policies announced by Rehoboam, Solomon's son (2 Kin. 14:23). While the name of his father, Nebat, is well-known, his father must have died when he was young, for his mother is called a widow. The plight of widows was quite difficult in the ancient world. The Ephraimite Jeroboam, a highly gifted and at first trusted official for Solomon (v. 28), would come under Solomon's wrath (v. 40). Like Hadad the Edomite (v. 17), he fled to Egypt where he found refuge. Eventually Jeroboam was instrumental in bringing about the prophesied schism of the country (12:2–19). He became the first king of the northern kingdom (12:20).

11:26, 27 this is what caused: The phrasing suggests that there was a problem in the building projects that led to Jeroboam's rebellion. These two verses explain something about Jeroboam's background. He was a major officer of one of the large work groups. Among the projects to which Jeroboam had been assigned were the building of the Millo (9:15), and the repair of the City of David.

INSIGHT

Hadad, Solomon's Sworn Enemy

Solomon had never met Hadad the Edomite (1 Kin. 11:14), or had contact with him. Yet Hadad was Solomon's sworn enemy. The source of his hostility was the slaughter of his father and other Edomite males by David's general, Joab (11:15–17). That tragedy was largely the result of a feud between the Israelites and the Edomites, which had gone on for centuries.

11:28, 29 The prophecy of Ahijah of Shiloh was fulfilled literally (12:1–20). Ahijah, whose name means "My Brother Is the Lord," would remain God's loyal prophet down into his old age (14:1–18).

11:30–32 God had already warned Solomon that all but one tribe would be taken away from Solomon' s heir (v. 13; 12:20). Only ten tribes, however, are promised to Jeroboam. The twelfth tribe might be Simeon, which was absorbed by Judah. Possibly Benjamin existed as a buffer state between Israel and Judah, at times linked with the southern kingdom (2 Chr. 11:3; 14:8) and at times with the northern kingdom.

11:33–35 they have forsaken Me: See the list of particulars in vv. 4–8.

11:36 This is a biblical image of one of the divinely intended functions of Davidic kings in ancient Israel. In the midst of the darkness of a pagan world, the Davidic kings were to be a lamp to the nations, in anticipation of the Coming One who is the Light of the World (John 1:1–9; 1 Kin. 15:4; 2 Sam. 21:17; 2 Kin. 8:19; 2 Chr. 21:7).

11:37, 38 an enduring house: Although God gave Jeroboam the opportunity to establish a lasting dynasty, he proved unworthy (12:25–33; 14:10–18). Jeroboam's name would forever be associated with the spiritual infidelity that would ultimately bring the northern kingdom to ruin (2 Kin. 17:21–23).

11:39, 40 Solomon, whose reign was characterized by peace more than that of any other king in Jerusalem (4:24), ended his life in strife as he sought to kill Jeroboam. Shishak (or Sheshonq I, 945–924 B.C.) was the first pharaoh of Egypt's strong twenty-second dynasty. Ironically, this future destroyer of Israel appears here as a protector of one of its future kings.

11:41–43 Because of his considerable sin, the golden era that Solomon initiated would die with him. Had he lived out his life in righteousness, and had he taught his son Rehoboam to succeed him in true justice, the golden era might have endured for generations.

11:41 The book of the acts of Solomon is mentioned only here; compare the references to the book of the chronicles of the kings of Israel (14:19) and the book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah (14:29). It is likely that the author of the present Book of Kings drew on these sources.

11:42 The symmetry of the forty years (2:10–12) of the reigns of David and Solomon may be a providential congruity, speaking of God's blessing on each of their reigns.

11:43 rested with his fathers: The meaning of this idiom in the Hebrew Bible is burial in the same place as one's ancestors. There may also be an indirect reference to life after death. Rehoboam his son: It is usual in a royal obituary to state who it was that followed the deceased on the throne. This provides a sense of continuity.

12:1—22:53 The second major part of 1 Kings, the divided kingdom, begins here. The story continues in 2 Kings.

12:1–24 The accession of Rehoboam and the division of the kingdom into the northern and the southern. The kingdoms would remain divided until each was overrun by foreign invaders, the northern kingdom in 722 B.C. and the southern kingdom in 586 B.C.

12:1–3 Rehoboam: His name may mean "The People Are Wide," referring to the expansion of the nation of Israel under the hand of God. Unfortunately, Rehoboam became a means of harming the expansion of God's people, even prompting civil war and the secession of the ten northern tribes. Situated in Ephraim, Shechem was an important center of Israelite activity. It was the first place mentioned in Canaan with reference to Abraham (Gen. 12:6). By going for his coronation to a place with ancient ties to the history of his people, and which was situated in the region of the northern tribes, doubtless Rehoboam believed that he was making a strategic move. The term all Israel refers to representatives of the northern tribes who had convened to consider the confirmation of Rehoboam as king of all the land.

12:4, 5 A system of forced labor had been imposed by Solomon to accomplish and maintain his building projects (see 5:13–18). Because this burdensome service was especially hateful to the northern tribes, relief from it was a crucial issue.

12:6, 7 By elders is meant the chief government officials who had advised Rehoboam's father Solomon (4:1–19). Their advice was to show moderation and temperance.

12:8, 9 The young men were men of Rehoboam's generation whom he had appointed to government office.

12:10, 11 little finger … father's waist: The advice of Rehoboam's own advisors was that the system of forced labor should be intensified until their sting become like that of a scorpion. Scourges were leather whips that could have more than one tail to which barbed points or metal spikes were attached.

12:12–14 Foolishly, Rehoboam followed the advice of the hotheaded young men.

12:15 from the LORD: Even at this crucial time of national schism, God was sovereignly working through human events to accomplish His will, which had been made known through earlier prophecy (11:29–39).

12:16 What share have we in David: The ancient rivalry felt by the northern tribes now came to a peak in resentment against the tribe of Judah and the house of David. Saul was from the tribe of Benjamin and had been regarded as "one of their own." David, from the south, had seemed distant. Rehoboam's insensitivity to the volatile situation led to a division of the nation.

12:17 cities of Judah: The southern section also included the tribal allotment of Simeon. But Simeon was absorbed by Judah; their allotment was "within the inheritance of the children of Judah" (Josh. 19:1).

12:18 The resistance of the northern tribes to the king's agent Adoram was forceful and decisive—they killed him!

12:19 That is, to the day of the narrator. In the end, Israel's rebellion was its own destruction.

12:20 Jeroboam … king: The coronation of Jeroboam had been prophesied by Ahijah the prophet of the Lord (11:29–31). Nonetheless, the actual coronation apparently was done apart from priest or prophet of the Lord; there was no divine anointing, no true religious ceremony. Only the kings of the southern kingdom would have the sanction of the Davidic covenant (2 Sam. 7).

The Divided Kingdom

Tensions had existed between the tribes since the time of the judges, especially between Judah in the south and Ephraim, the most influential tribe in the north. Many of Israel's leaders, such as Joshua and Samuel, had come from the tribe of Ephraim. But David was from the southern tribe of Judah. These factors, along with the moving of the capital and the center of worship to the southern city of Jerusalem, strained the relationship more. Solomon's taxation to fund building the temple and palace in the southern city of Jerusalem alienated the northern tribes even further.

After Solomon's death, his son Rehoboam was approached by the people of Israel with a request that the taxes that they had been forced to pay under his father's numerous building programs be lessened. Rehoboam rejected his elders' advice to be lenient, and he insulted the people by threatening to make their burden even heavier (12:14). This was the final event that split the nation into two kingdoms. Rehoboam remained king of the southern kingdom while Jeroboam became king of the northern kingdom.

Citing the example of the calves created by Aaron near Mount Sinai, Jeroboam erected statues of two golden calves for worship so that his people would not be forced to travel the great distance to Jerusalem. With these idols, Jeroboam led his people away from the worship of the one true God, by combining true worship with the false worship of their neighbors.

The northern kingdom, known as Israel, and the southern kingdom, known as Judah, existed separately for another two hundred years. At times, the two fought each other; at other times, they cooperated in a friendly alliance against threatening neighbors. However, the period would become known more for the great prophets who rose up during times of spiritual instability than for either side's political success.

12:21 Rehoboam's first inclination when he arrived in Jerusalem was to lead a war of reprisal against Israel. Benjamin: People of the border tribe might have gone either direction.

12:22 According to 2 Chr. 12:15, Iddo the prophet and Shemaiah together wrote a history of Rehoboam's reign. His name means "Yahweh

Has Heard." The chronicler also reports that Shemaiah prophesied Judah's humiliation in the invasion of Shishak (2 Chr. 12:5–8). The Septuagint indicates that Shemaiah was the prophet who had predicted the division of the kingdom (1 Kin. 11:29–39). Man of God is one of the several terms used for God's prophets (1 Sam. 13:1).

A Chicken in Every Pot

When a nation enjoys the blessings of peace and prosperity, it has much for which to be thankful. But with affluence and power come temptations to forget that God is the source of every good thing. We see this in Israel's history.

Under Solomon, Israel briefly emerged as a powerhouse of wealth and military might. Its influence extended from the Euphrates to Egypt (1 Kin. 4:21) and its affluence to a majority of its citizens, whose prosperity is summarized as "eating and drinking and rejoicing" (4:20). As Solomon's reign put a temporary stop to threats from without and strife from within, everyone lived in safety, "each man under his vine and his fig tree" (4:25). In twentieth century terms, David's successor put "a chicken in every pot."

Yet storm clouds were brewing. The cost of maintaining Solomon's court was enormous (4:22, 23). His many building projects, including his gilded temple and his even more lavishly appointed palace, required increased taxes that created unrest and ultimately led to a tax revolt (10:14, 15; 12:4, 18). The system also created a two-class society of privileged citizens and menial workers, an underclass made up mostly of foreigners (9:15, 20–23). And while trade was lively (9:26–28; 10:22, 23), it contributed to the depletion of natural resources.

However, these problems remain in the background of 1 Kin. 4—10, which describes the general peace and prosperity that Israel enjoyed after so many years of turmoil. Glowing reports of the empire's power and prestige cascade from the text until the beginning of ch. 11, where the good news suddenly comes to a halt with the transition, "But King Solomon loved many foreign wives" (11:1).

Things head downhill from there as Solomon turns away from the Lord to idols (11:4–8). God pronounces judgment on him (11:9–13) and raises up adversaries against him (11:14–25). Jeroboam rebels (11:26–28), and the kingdom divides after Solomon's death (12:1–19).

12:23, 24 this thing is from Me: The foolish behavior of Rehoboam brought about God's judgment in dividing the nation into two new kingdoms.

12:25—16:24 This section traces the early kings and early history of the divided kingdom. The northern kingdom's first king established spiritual compromises that would characterize Israel's spiritual condition throughout its existence. God's cause would fare little better in the southern kingdom, where only Asa receives divine commendation in this period.

12:25 built Shechem: That is, he fortified the ancient site (12:1). This strategic and historic city became the first capital of the northern kingdom. In fortifying this site, and Penuel (Gen. 32:30, 31), Jeroboam seems to have wanted to associate his reign with classic religious sites from the early history of Israel.

12:26, 27 However, Jeroboam knew in his heart that merely having a new presence in Shechem and Penuel would not in itself make the people of the northern kingdom forget the glories of the temple in Jerusalem.

12:28 Not only would they strike a familiar chord from Israel's history, but the two calves of gold would arouse the interest of the remaining Canaanites in the northern kingdom. The result of Jeroboam's action was religious confusion and apostasy; it would bring God's sure condemnation (14:9). It should be recognized that this is the first time the Scriptures mention any deliberate attempt to establish a heterodox doctrine, a substandard cult as an official practice for the nation of Israel. While judgment was announced on this apostasy (ch. 13), the execution of this judgment would not take place for over two hundred years (the schism came in 930 B.C.; the destruction of the northern kingdom did not come until 722 B.C.). Jeroboam appealed to the people in several ways. (1) Traveling all the way to Jerusalem was too far, and unnecessary. (2) These calves were gods. (3) These calves were worshiped by their ancestors.

12:29 Bethel was north of Jerusalem in Benjamite territory, although its precise location is uncertain. It has been identified with Beitin; recent archaeological discoveries suggest Tell Bireh. Ai was nearby. In any case, Bethel had enjoyed a prominent place in Israelite history throughout the earlier patriarchal (Gen. 28:10–21) and post-conquest (Judg. 20:26–31) eras. Dan was in the northern portion of Israel. It was known as Laish and Leshem (Josh. 19:47; Judg. 18:7) until its capture by the Danites (Judg. 18:29). By that time it had already achieved a reputation as a center for pagan worship (Judg. 18:30). Jeroboam's choice of these two sites was a brilliant move. He had one site in the northernmost part of his kingdom and another in the southernmost part; both had long ties to Israel's past. No longer must the people make the long, arduous, and dangerous trip to Jerusalem. Jeroboam said, in effect, “We have brought religion to you.”

12:30 The divine declaration is simple: this thing became a sin. The exclusive claim of Jerusalem as the central place of the worship of God in the holy temple (6:1) was now being ignored by the people of Israel.

12:31–33 Jeroboam’s new religious institutions included starting a new religious order that did not include the Levites; setting up shrines at high places (3:2, 3); and replacing the Feast of Tabernacles with a fall festival in the eighth month. His various attempts at religious innovation would quickly incur God’s denunciation (ch. 13) and earn him a reputation that would live in spiritual infamy (13:33, 34; 22:52).

13:1, 2 man of God: This prophet is unknown to us. The phrase by the word of the LORD occurs seven times in this chapter (vv. 1, 2, 5, 9, 17, 18, 32) and emphasizes that the man of God was functioning at the command of God and in God's power. Jeroboam … altar to burn incense: Having established his own deviant religion and his apostate priesthood, Jeroboam hardly had compunctions about serving priestly functions.

13:3 The word sign indicates something miraculous (Ex. 4:21; Jer. 33:20, 21). Miraculous signs may indicate either the intended purpose of the deed or its wondrous effects, both ideas often occurring together (Deut. 6:22; Ps. 78:43).

13:4, 5 Unlike David, who confessed his sin when he was accused by Nathan the man of God (2 Sam. 12:13), the wicked Jeroboam sought to arrest his accuser. Instead he found his own arm "arrested" and the altar destroyed.

13:6–10 In mercy, the prophet was used by God to heal the hand of the king, but he would have none of his hospitality or reward.

13:6, 7 the LORD your God: This language may be simply deferential to the prophet, but here it may indicate a recognition by Jeroboam that he was no longer really serving the living God.

13:8–10 not go in: In biblical times, sharing a meal was more than just a social custom. It implied an intimate fellowship. Great religious ceremonies from the Passover to the Lord's Table center on people eating together. The prophet did not want his act of mercy to suggest that God accepted Jeroboam's deviant worship.

13:11 Besides being an important cult center (12:29), Bethel may have had one of the early prophetic schools (2 Kin. 2:3–7). an old prophet: Perhaps the aged prophet had been previously associated with such a group. Whatever his status then, at this point he clearly tells lies (v. 18).

13:12–18 The prophet was clearly an apostate. He had not spoken against Jeroboam; instead, he boldly lied to the Lord's true prophet.

13:19 went back with him: The man of God had withstood Jeroboam's attempt to save face by having the prophet stay with him (v. 7), yet now the prophet failed to discern the deception and plainly violated God's clear instructions (v. 9). The prophet would pay a terrible price for his disobedience (v. 24).

13:20–23 Whatever his motives were for bringing the man of God to his house, the aged prophet now received a true word from God. He realized too late his awful part in the condemnation of the man of God. The divine sentence (v. 22) would be speedily executed (v. 24).

13:24–28 The way the lion stood by both the man of God and his donkey shows that the lion did not kill for food but was God's executioner (vv. 25, 26, 28).

13:29–32 The old prophet (v. 11) was brought back to biblical faith at the sight of the death of the true prophet from Judah. The true but disobedient prophet had paid a terrible price for his disobedience to what he knew to be the word of God (vv. 20–24).

13:32 the saying … will surely come to pass: This confession proclaims renewal of faith in God's word by the prophet who had become deceitful. The mercy of God is at His disposal! The Lord had healed the hand of Jeroboam (v. 6) because of His mercy, and the Lord restored the faith of the deceitful prophet because of His mercy as well.

13:32 cities of Samaria: The city of Samaria did not in fact come into being for nearly a half century (16:24), but the author mentions it here from his own later perspective.

13:33, 34 Rather than learning from the report of this incident, Jeroboam became even more set in his evil way. His apostasy would earn for him his reputation as the one who "made Israel sin" (16:26).

14:1 Abijah: The name means “My Father Is the Lord.”

14:2 In a time of distress Jeroboam turned not to one of his own prophets but to the true prophet of God who had predicted his kingship (11:29–39). Although Ahijah was now old (v. 4), his spiritual insight was not so dim that he could not see through disguised human intentions (v. 5).

14:3 ten loaves: The gifts that Jeroboam’s wife took along are not those customarily given by a king (2 Kin. 8:7–9) but rather were common fare (1 Sam. 9:6–8). Jeroboam no doubt was hoping he could deceive the prophet by sending a simple gift.

14:4 Located about twenty miles north of Jerusalem, Shiloh had been the religious center for the nation during the time of the judges and was the location of the tabernacle (Josh. 18:1; 1 Sam. 1:3). The city was destroyed by the Philistines after the loss of the ark (1 Sam. 4:1–11; Jer. 7:12–15).

14:4–6 Although he could not see, Ahijah could “see” by means of the revelation of the living God.

14:7–16 Despite the prophetic sanction of the establishment of his kingdom (v. 7), Jeroboam’s sins were severe enough to prevent his house from staying on the throne of Israel (vv. 8–10). Worse news still would come for his family. The child would die just as his mother returned to her city Tirzah (vv. 12, 13, 17). Moreover, an enemy would rise to destroy the household of the king (vv. 14–16).

14:10 bond and free: Like “heaven and earth” in Gen. 1:1, the two opposites together mean totality, or all kinds and classes of people (2 Kin. 14:26).

14:11, 12 Dogs were scavengers in the ancient Middle East and came to symbolize the dregs of society (2 Kin. 8:13).

14:13 something good: Abijah’s character receives special divine consideration. Although the age of Jeroboam’s son is not certain, he may have been quite young.

14:14 cut off the house: As prophesied here, the end of Jeroboam’s line would soon be accomplished (15:27—16:7).

14:15, 16 God had promised that He would uproot Israel should it violate its covenantal obligations (Deut. 28:63, 64). wooden images: The worship carried on here concerns the goddess Asherah. She had become associated with Baal (Judg. 3:7; 2 Kin. 23:4). Her worship would become one of the sins that would bring about the downfall of the northern kingdom (16:33; 2 Kin. 17:9–11).

14:17 Famed for its beauty (Song 6:4), Tirzah was a royal retreat and the capital of the northern kingdom's first two dynasties (15:33).

14:18 all Israel mourned: The sorrow of the people was also part of Ahijah's prophecy (v. 13).

14:19 The book of the chronicles of the kings of Israel is mentioned often in 1 Kin. as an early source book for the history of the northern kingdom. These chronicles should not be confused with the biblical books of 1 and 2 Chronicles 14:20 Each of the subsequent kings of Israel would be judged against the example of the wickedness of Jeroboam (15:34). Only with Ahab (16:31) was a worse pattern set.

14:21–31 The greater attention was given to Jeroboam I in the northern kingdom in this document (compare 13:28—14:20). Despite his foolishness and wickedness, Rehoboam the son of Solomon was the divinely designated heir of the Davidic promise (2 Sam. 7). He and each of his successors would be measured in terms of faithfulness to Yahweh in the pattern established by David. In contrast, the kings of the northern kingdom would be measured in terms of their unfaithfulness to God as established by Jeroboam I. Some of the kings of the southern kingdom demonstrated a relative faithfulness to Yahweh, such as Asa (15:11). Others followed the pattern of folly and wickedness that Rehoboam established. None followed the Lord to the same degree or in the same manner as did David. Hezekiah (2 Kin. 18:1—20:21) and Josiah (2 Kin. 22:1—23:30) were the best of the series.

14:21 the city which the LORD had chosen: These words celebrate not only Jerusalem (Deut. 12:1–19) but also the Davidic kingship.

14:22 Judah did evil: Although Rehoboam apparently began his reign well (2 Chr. 11:5–17, 23), his spiritual condition soon deteriorated (2 Chr. 12:1). Despite the fact that Judah had several spiritually sensitive kings, apostasy ultimately took its toll in the southern kingdom, just as it also did in the northern kingdom (2 Kin. 17:18–20).

14:23 The high places were a problem throughout the history of Judah and Israel (Mic. 1:3). At times, the worship offered on them might have been done sincerely, in the true worship of God (3:2–4; 2 Kin. 12:3). But these were also the places in which Canaanite worship rites were practiced in honor of Baal and where other foreign gods were worshiped as well. Sacred pillars refers to standing pillars of stone or wood. God had prohibited Israel from setting these up (Deut. 16:22). Wooden images is literally “Asherahs” (v. 15), and refers to obscene wooden symbols that were associated with the sexual worship of the Canaanite deity of that name.

14:24 perverted persons: Male prostitutes were part of the fertility rituals of ancient Canaan (Deut. 23:18). Here the word is a term that means “devoted to sacred service.” abominations: This is an exceedingly strong term; it describes perverted activities that impelled God to dispossess the Canaanite peoples from their land (Deut. 18:9, 12).

14:25 Shishak: Although Jerusalem and Judah were spared total annihilation at this time because Rehoboam repented, Jerusalem was looted as a result of the sins that took place “on his watch” (2 Chr. 12:1–9). Egyptian records confirm that Shishak’s invasion was widespread and highly successful.

14:26–28 The sacking of treasures of the house of the LORD (v. 26) is particularly shocking, when we think of the long and detailed description of Solomon’s greatest accomplishment, the building and furnishing of the holy temple in Jerusalem (chs. 6—8).

14:27, 28 bronze shields: A compelling symbol of the ruin of the temple treasures is seen in the change from shields of gold (v. 26; 10:16, 17) to bronze.

14:29 The book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah is mentioned 15 times in Kings. Apparently it was an official record of events in the southern kingdom down to the days of Jehoiakim. Neither this work nor “the chronicles of the kings of Israel” (v. 19) is to be confused with the biblical books of Chronicles.

14:30, 31 The early history of Rehoboam and Jeroboam (11:26—12:17) led to their continuing enmity and war.

15:1 Although it may reflect a popular name for Abijah (2 Chr. 12:16), Abijam is a strange name for a king of Judah, as it ties together the Hebrew word for "Father" with the Hebrew word for "Sea"—normally a deity of Canaan. It is possible that this name reflects the Canaanite influence that had come even into the royal family this early in Judah's reign. The alternative name Abijah is a standard name of praise to God. It means "My Father Is the Lord."

15:2 The daughter of Uriel of Gibeah (2 Chr. 13:2) and Tamar (2 Sam. 14:27), Maachah was the granddaughter of Abishalom and the favorite of Rehoboam's eighteen wives. A woman of strong will, she wielded a good deal of influence during the reign of her son Abijam and her grandson Asa. The mothers of the kings of Judah are named to show that the claims to the throne are legitimate.

15:3 The word translated loyal here (Heb. shalem) denotes one who is wholly devoted to God. Contrast this negative assessment of Abijam with the positive use of the same term when Asa is evaluated (15:14).

15:4 for David's sake: That is, because of God's love for David and the promise He had made to him (2 Sam. 7). lamp: This is one of the lovely images of God's intended blessing on the Davidic house.

15:5 The quality of David's reign is celebrated. Uriah: At the same time, his most grievous sin is not omitted (2 Sam. 11; 12).

15:6 Because Rehoboam reigned until his fifty-eighth year (14:21), Abijam probably knew little respite from war (14:30). Abijam did at least trust God during the war against Jeroboam, and God gave him a decisive victory (2 Chr. 13:2–20).

15:7, 8 This follows the pattern established for recording the obituaries of the kings of Judah.

15:12 perverted persons: This term is used for sacred prostitutes in the Canaanite religious practices (22:46; 2 Kin. 23:7).

15:13 removed Maachah: Asa's many spiritual activities (2 Chr. 14:2–5; 15:1–18) are telescoped into a few statements here (vv. 11–15). Although the reforms mentioned in vv. 11, 12 took place early in Asa's reign (2 Chr. 14:2–5), the chronicler indicates (2 Chr. 15:16) that the deposing of Maachah took place in the fifteenth year of his rule (895 B.C.). Maachah's removal came as a result of a time of covenant renewal (2 Chr. 15:1–15) and a consequent reaction against her vile idolatry.

15:14, 15 In some instances the high places were intended as places where the Lord was worshiped (3:2; 1 Sam. 9:12); in other cases they were used for pagan purposes (2 Chr. 14:2, 3).

15:16 war: There were periods of peace between the two nations (the league of Ahab and Jehoshaphat, ch. 22). But this was a period of warfare, particularly in the border areas.

15:17 Ramah was about five and a half miles north of Jerusalem on the main north-south commercial route through the land, and it was therefore of great importance to both kingdoms. It gave east-west access to both the foothills of Ephraim and the Mediterranean coast, so it was of strategic military importance as well. Baasha was striking a blow for control of the center of the land.

15:18 To stave off the penetration of Israel into Judah, King Asa plundered the temple for money to try to make a military alliance with Damascus. Since the campaign mentioned here took place in the first decade of the ninth century B.C., the king involved was Ben-Hadad I (900–860 B.C.). Tabrimmon: There is a deliberate change in the Hebrew spelling of this name, based on an antipathy toward the god who is represented in the original name. Instead of writing Tab-Ramman, meaning "Thunderer," an epithet of the storm god Hadad (Zech. 12:11), the author wrote Tab-Rimmon, the Hebrew word meaning "Pomegranate."

15:19, 20 Asa apparently suggested that for all practical purposes a treaty between the house of David and Damascus had been in effect since the days of Solomon.

15:21 The retreat of Baasha from Ramah was due to the renewed treaty between Asa of Judah and Ben-Hadad of Damascus.

15:22 Asa's swift action in taking Ramah allowed him to dismantle its fortifications and the use of the material to fortify two nearby strategic Benjamite towns, Geba and Mizpah. The control of these three sites afforded advanced defensive protection for Jerusalem and northern Judah.

15:23, 24 diseased in his feet: Here is another case of a godly leader who did great exploits for the Lord but ended badly. The exact nature of Asa's malady is uncertain. Some scholars suggest gout, others dropsy, and still others some form of gangrene or venereal disease (the Heb. word for "feet" may at times be a euphemism for the genitals).

15:25, 26 Nadab: His name means "Generous" or "Noble," but he did not live up to his name.

15:27, 28 Baasha killed him: As Baasha, a military commander for Nadab, had done to his master, so it would be done to his own house. Zimri, one of the commanders of his chariot corps, would conspire against Baasha's son Elah and kill him (16:9, 10).

15:29, 30 The death of Nadab was in line with prophetic fulfillment, an act of God's judgment on the house of Jeroboam I (14:9, 16). Nonetheless, the manner of his death was condemned by God through His prophet Jehu (16:2, 7).

15:31, 32 This follows the pattern established for recording the obituaries of the kings of the northern kingdom.

15:33 Baasha … in Tirzah: The second capital of Israel (14:17) was located in the highlands of Ephraim between Shechem (the first capital, 12:25) and Mount Gilboa.

15:34 did evil: Political exchange had not signaled any improvement in the spiritual climate of Israel.

16:1–7 As the son of the prophet Hanani whom Asa had executed (2 Chr. 16:7–10), Jehu (not to be confused with Jehu the king of Israel, 2 Kin. 9:2) came from the southern kingdom. His long prophetic ministry lasted into the days of Jehoshaphat. Like his father before him, he confronted sin fearlessly—even in the royal house.

16:2–4 In the ancient Middle East considerable attention was given to the proper care of the body of the diseased. Usually the body was interred on the day of death. When a body was left to the dogs and the birds, an intolerable feeling of shame extended to all family and friends of the deceased. For examples, see the ignoble ends of King Ahab (22:38) and Queen Jezebel (2 Kin. 9:33–37).

16:5–9 The first two dynasties of Israel ended in tragedy. Like Jeroboam's son Nadab (15:28), Baasha's son Elah was assassinated. There were three more claimants to the throne before the year 885 B.C. was finished: Zimri, Tibni, and Omri. With the advent of Omri, Israel's third dynasty would be established.

16:10–12 The assassination of Elah and the annihilation of his house by Zimri (v. 12), while treacherous, had prophetic sanction because of the wickedness of Elah and his father Baasha.

16:13, 14 idols: Here the plural of the term for "vapor" is used. This is a contemptuous term describing the deities of false, pagan theology.

16:15—22:40 The era of the third dynasty in the northern kingdom, the house of Omri. This section deals with especially the wicked king Ahab. Despite God's patience and repeated efforts to warn Ahab and bring him and his nation back to righteousness, especially through the great prophet Elijah, this king went stubbornly on in his sin and thus incurred the terrible judgment of God for himself, his posterity, and his nation.

16:15–17 As Baasha had done (15:29), so Zimri also fulfilled prophecy against a royal house (vv. 8–14).

16:18–20 Because he burned the king's house in Tirzah, Zimri may have contributed to Omri's building of a new capital city and royal residence (v. 24), perhaps one that could be defended better.

16:21, 22 The source of Omri's political base is not certain. According to Josephus, Tibni was killed in the dynastic power struggles that brought in the dynasty of Omri.

16:23–28 The short reign of twelve years is not indicative of what Omri accomplished. He was one of the more impressive of the kings of Israel in terms of his accomplishments. He invaded Moab and figured prominently in an alliance aimed at stopping the westward advance of the rising power of Assyria. Omri's exploits are commemorated in the Moabite Stone and the Assyrian annals. Indeed, he was so important to the Assyrians that they called Israel the "The House of Omri" long after his death. Yet the author of Kings describes little of Omri's achievements, because he did evil in the eyes of the LORD."

The hill on which King Omri of the northern kingdom built the city of Samaria (1 Kin. 16:24). It remained the capital city of Israel until the nation fell to the Assyrians in 722 B.C.

16:24–28 Omri's choice of Samaria as the site for his new capital city was doubtless motivated by several factors: its central geographic setting, its commercial location, and its defensive potential. As a Canaanite territory, it had political, ethnic, and religious independence from all previous allegiances.

16:29—22:40 The reign of Ahab. Whereas Omri was an exceptionally gifted king in terms of military, commercial, and strategic gifts and accomplishments (v. 23), there were only six verses given to the account of his reign. Ahab receives more than five chapters! This is for two reasons. First, Ahab followed his father Omri in intensifying evil over the kings who had lived before him. But then he accelerated the process to an almost unbelievable degree by making the worship of Baal the official cult of the northern kingdom. Second, Ahab was not allowed by God to promote his wickedness without a challenge. That challenge came in the person of Elijah, one of the most courageous, powerful, and enigmatic figures in the pages of Scripture.

16:29 The name Ahab is a combination of the Hebrew words for "brother" and "father." The term "father" likely refers to God, and "brother" speaks of a relationship with God. Thus the meaning, "{ My} Brother { Is} Father." By his life, Ahab gives the lie to his name.

16:30, 31 The first level of evaluation of Ahab is the same as that given to his father (compare v. 30 with v. 25). a trivial thing: By these words we realize that in Ahab we come to the very lowest point in the degeneration of the spiritual life of the kings of Israel. Each of the kings of the northern kingdom from Nadab (15:26), Jeroboam's son, to Omri (16:26), Ahab's father, had been guilty of walking in the perverse pathway of Jeroboam I. Ahab acted as though the sins of Jeroboam were a trivial thing. He did this in two ways: first, in his marriage to Jezebel; second, in his promotion of Baal worship as the state religion. Ahab's marriage to the Phoenician princess Jezebel was politically important and demonstrated the rising prominence of Israel's third dynasty. As in the case of the foreign wives of Solomon before him (11:1–13), Ahab's marriage produced tragic results. Jezebel was an exceedingly competent, highly gifted, powerful person—and she was exceedingly evil. She could influence Ahab to be wicked (ch. 21). However, when she was absent from Ahab, he had moments of relatively good behavior (ch. 20). Her father was both king and priest of Baal in Sidon; similarly, Jezebel was princess and priestess of Baal. Her Phoenician name was Abizebel, meaning "My Father (Baal) Is Noble." The Hebrew scribes deliberately dropped a letter from her name. Thus she would be known forever as Jezebel, a dishonorable name meaning "Lacking Honor." he went and served Baal and worshiped him: The outrage is that Ahab had gone quite beyond a mere combining of beliefs. He became a full-fledged worshiper of Baal, the Canaanite deity, for whom his wife Jezebel was a priestess.

“Baal”

(Heb. baal) (1 Kin. 16:31; 18:21; Judg. 2:13; 2 Kin. 10:20) Strong’s #1168: Baal was a pagan god of storms and fertility, worshiped throughout the ancient Middle East because of his association with powerful forces. His name literally means “Owner,” “Master,” or “Husband.” In Canaanite literature, Baal is often associated with the fertility goddess Asherah, whose sacred “Asherah poles” are mentioned numerous times in the OT (2 Kin. 21:7). Worship of these pagan deities involved self-mutilation, ritual prostitution, and infant sacrifice. Despite these despicable practices, the Israelites themselves adopted Baal worship—a factor which eventually led to God’s punishment (Judg. 2:11–15; Jer. 19:4–6).

16:32, 33 Further, Ahab established an altar for Baal, a temple of Baal, and a wooden image. In these actions Ahab went a considerable distance in establishing the Baal cult as the state religion of Israel. The worship of Baal in Israel would ultimately spell the end of both kingdoms (2 Kin. 17:16–23; Jer. 2:1—3:25). The sin that Ahab and Jezebel brought into the nation of Israel was a total rejection of the living God.

16:34 In defiance of Joshua’s curse (Josh. 6:26, 27), Hiel built Jericho. Jericho had been occupied at various times (see Judg. 3:13), but not as a permanently occupied fortified city. Either Hiel offered his sons as foundation sacrifices (following ancient custom) or they died in some mishap. One way or the other, Joshua’s curse was carried out.

17:1–4 No prophet had arisen since Moses (Deut. 18:15–19) like Elijah. His name means “The Lord Is My God.” Elijah would speak for God fearlessly in the midst of the spiritual vacuum that gripped the northern kingdom throughout the days of Ahab, Ahaziah, and Jehoram. A prophet par excellence, his ministry and his stand against the rampant Baalism of the land reached the highest circles of government in Israel. Malachi would predict Elijah’s return before the coming “great and dreadful day of the Lord” (Mal. 4:5). Tishbite has been understood traditionally as referring to a town named Tishbe or as designation for the settlers in Gilead. A formal, solemn oath (see David’s words in 1:19), as the LORD God of Israel lives was also a brilliant declaration. Elijah, who stood unafraid before the king of Israel, unannounced and uninvited, could do so because he stood before One whose glory, majesty, and power were infinitely greater than Ahab’s. dew nor rain: Because the Canaanite belief was that only Baal could govern the dew and the rain, Elijah’s pronouncement was as an immediate challenge: Who is really God, Baal or the Lord? (see 18:21; Deut. 28:12; 33:28).

17:5 The Brook Cherith was across the Jordan, far from the palace in Samaria.

17:6–8 The Lord of all creation may use any means He wishes to feed His prophet, even the ravens.

17:9–11 Zarephath was in Phoenician territory, seven miles south of Sidon, the stronghold of Baal. The Lord’s sustaining Elijah first by a raven and then by a widow provided the prophet with a dramatic test of faith at the outset of his ministry. The widow, too, would be taught the value of trusting in God alone (v. 24). Many widows were exceptionally poor, as they had few options in an agrarian culture. This one was in a desperate plight when she encountered God’s prophet.

17:12 the LORD your God: The widow of Zarephath was a woman of faith in the living God, even though she lived in a foreign land. Bread here denotes a round cake. The flour bin was a large earthenware container (Gen. 24:14), while jar denotes a smaller, portable container such as a jug or flask.

17:13 me … first: Elijah’s challenge to the widow would call for faith in the midst of her desperate circumstances.

17:14 The LORD God of Israel acknowledges the woman’s identification of the Lord as Elijah’s God (v. 12), but also points the widow directly to Him who is the Sustainer of all.

17:15–17 While an apostate Israelite nation suffered because of the drought, God supplied the daily necessities to a non-Israelite who willingly took Him at His word. The fresh supply of oil and flour each day would be a reminder to both the prophet and the widow of the value of personal trust in Him who alone is sufficient to meet every need (Phil. 4:19).

17:18 Sin is not always the immediate cause of suffering (John 9:3; Heb. 12:7–11).

17:19, 20 Elijah stayed in an upper room, temporary quarters on the roof accessible from outside the house. This arrangement that preserved the privacy of all parties and protected the widow's reputation in the community.

17:21 Elijah's action in the stretching out of himself on the dead lad three times may symbolize the power of the thrice holy God (Num. 6:24–26; Is. 6:3). Elisha later would perform a similar act (2 Kin. 4:34; Acts 20:10).

17:21, 22 cried … heard: The scriptural motif of crying and being heard or calling and being answered, is a theme that emphasizes intimacy of fellowship or communion (Pss. 22:24; 91:15; 102:1, 2).

17:23, 24 now … I know: The widow's belief had now grown into fullness of faith. That Elijah was indeed a "man of God" (v. 18) had been proved by word and deed. The entire incident demonstrates that the Lord is the God of Israelite and Gentile alike (Acts 10:34–35; 11:18; Rom. 3:29), and that He is the author of life itself (Luke 20:38; John 11:25, 26).

The fertile plains surrounding Mount Carmel, site of Elijah's victory over the prophets of Baal (1 Kin. 18:1–40).

18:1, 2 The NT indicates that the drought ended in the fourth year (Luke 4:25; James 5:17). If the point of reckoning here is late in the third year, the end of the drought may well have not occurred until some three and a half years after its inception.

18:3 Although Jewish tradition has identified them, this Obadiah is probably not the author of the Book of Obadiah. Nothing in that book points to so early a date as this time. The Obadiah here is a highly sympathetic figure, whose great faith in God and heroic actions help us gain a more balanced picture of the situation of people of faith in Israel at the time. in charge of his house: This phrase reflects an official title (4:6). Obadiah was Ahab's palace official and minister of state, in both cases serving as the king's personal representative.

18:4 That there could be one hundred prophets for Obadiah to hide may be seen from the fact that associations of prophets who met and may even have lived together are known from this period onward (1 Sam. 10:5; 2 Kin. 2:3–7; 6:1, 2). Over twenty thousand caves have been found in the vicinity of Mt. Carmel, many of them capable of holding fifty men.

18:5–11 Keeping horses alive was important to maintain military preparedness in a world where there was nearly always the threat of new hostilities.

18:12–14 Obadiah was not quite sure whether he could trust the Lord's prophet. Obadiah recognized that God's Holy Spirit might come upon His servants (Judg. 6:34; 11:29) in such a way as to carry them to other places (Ezek. 8:3; 11:1). Obadiah had already jeopardized his life in hiding God's prophets. Reporting Elijah's presence without producing him to an already infuriated Ahab might well cost him his life (vv. 9, 14).

18:15–17 Hosts means "armies," a title for the LORD to designate God's control of a vast heavenly army ready to act at his command (Rev. 19:11–21) and His place as the commander of Israel's forces (Judg. 1:3), and also His universal sovereignty (Is. 37:16). Elijah acknowledged that he was standing before his supreme commander.

18:18 Baals: The wording indicates that Ahab had a practice of attending services at various local shrines where this deity was worshiped.

18:19–21 The wife of Ei, Asherah was a fertility goddess whose exploits and veneration were linked with Baal (14:15). The worship of Baal and Asherah held a constant fascination for Israel from earliest times (Ex.

34:13; Num. 25; Judg. 2:13) and eventually caused Israel's demise (2 Kin. 17:16–18).

18:22, 23 Although there were other prophets alive at the time (v. 13), Elijah focused on the fact that he alone stood ready to confront the 450 prophets of Baal.

(Heb. shem) (1 Kin. 8:20; 18:24; Ex. 6:3) Strong’s #8034: The Hebrew word shem may be related to a root meaning “to mark,” but this is uncertain. In Bible times, a person’s name not only served as a means of identification but could also describe a person’s character, position, or destiny (read 1 Sam. 25:25 for the meaning of Nabal’s name, “Fool”). Sometimes a person was renamed, reflecting a change in that person’s character or status (Gen. 35:10). The various names of God are especially important. Each name reveals a particular aspect of His nature (for example, God Most High or the Lord of Hosts). For this reason, His name is to be honored and should never be used irreverently (Ex. 20:7). By sharing His name with Israel, God indicated the intimacy of His covenantal relationship with them (Ex. 3:13–15).

18:24–26 The contest between the Lord and Baal would reveal who was the true god of storm. Such a god would have lightning in his arsenal of weapons (Ps. 18:12–14; Hab. 3:11). Sending fire for the wood and the offering would be a reasonable test of the power of the rival deities.

18:27, 28 The sharp words for he is a god were mocking and derisive. Perhaps their god was lost in thought, meditating, and simply needed them to call louder. Is busy is a euphemism. In his harsh attack on the folly of idolatry, Elijah suggested that the reason their god did not answer was that he had gone to a celestial men’s room.

18:29 no voice: Nothing the priests did elicited a response from their supposed god.

18:30 repaired the altar: This was an earlier altar that had been used by the true people of God on a legitimate high place (3:2–4). Elijah avoided all contact with the altar that was associated with Baal.

18:31 The numerical symbolism of twelve stones cannot be missed. The people of Israel had descended from twelve tribes.

18:32 Rebuilding the altar in the name of the LORD would be a reminder that the Lord had not abdicated His position; He was still the God of all Israel, including the northern kingdom, where pagan syncretism and full Baal worship prevailed.

18:33–35 third time: The three applications of water not only made the sacrifice thoroughly soaked and beyond human trickery but may again attest the power of the thrice holy God (17:21).

18:36 The phrase LORD God of Abraham, Isaac, and Israel so characteristic of worship in the early period (Gen. 50:24; Ex. 3:6, 15, 16), reminded Elijah's hearers of the inviolability of the Abrahamic covenant. The God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, was still the God of the northern kingdom, and the nation's only hope of life, protection, and blessing in the land of promise (Deut. 30:20; 2 Kin. 13:23).

18:37 Elijah's prayer had two elements. First, he wished that the Lord would demonstrate clearly to the people that He alone is the living God. Second, he prayed for the full revival of God's people. The first prayer would be answered in a dramatic manner.

18:38 Showing who really was the god of storm, Baal proved impotent, while the fire of the LORD destroyed everything on the site.

18:39 God's power over fire, water, and rain (v. 45) demonstrated that He, not Baal, is the LORD, He is God!

18:40 The prophets were executed because of their blatant sin and the ruin they had brought upon the nation.

18:41, 42 The respective reactions of the king and the prophet are enlightening. A compromising king, as bidden, gladly celebrated, while a faithful prophet bowed down and prayed for the promised result of the Lord's miraculous victory.

18:43, 44 This cloud may have seemed as small as a man's hand when it was first visible from Mount Carmel's height, but Elijah sensed the approach of the growing storm and warned Ahab that he had better hurry.

18:45 Elijah had announced more than three years earlier that there would be no more rain unless it came from the hand of the living God (17:1).

18:46 girded up his loins: Elijah tucked his garment into his sash, enabling him to run freely the 13 miles to Jezreel.

19:1–3 The aftermath of a great victory may become a new time for defeat. This was what happened with Elijah, following what he thought was his greatest moment. With the clear vindication of Yahweh, the living God, on Mount Carmel, and with the shameful defeat and execution of the wicked prophet-priests of Baal, surely he must have thought that there would now come a national revival (see his prayer in 18:37). But he found that nothing had really changed.

19:1, 2 The report Ahab told Jezebel did not cause her to repent or to turn from Baal to God. Ahab merely reported the facts that led to her personal embarrassment. Her response was to issue a death warrant for Elijah.

19:3 Elijah understood Jezebel's intentions when he saw her response, and he realized dejectedly that the Lord's victory on Mount Carmel would not necessarily bring a quick end to the paganism that was rampant in the land. Some ancient translations read "he was afraid" instead of "he saw." However, Elijah was not a man of fear, and he certainly had no reason to be afraid of Jezebel since he knew the living God and His power. What he faced was profound disappointment. He saw that nothing really had changed. He saw that despite the tremendous demonstration of the reality of God's power on Mount Carmel, the people would soon forget and would revert to their old evil ways. He … ran for his life, not from fear, but from a desire that Jezebel not be the one to kill him. Actually he wished for death, but he prayed that his death would be at the Lord's hand.

19:4 The broom tree has sufficient foliage for shade and often grows to a height of ten feet. It grows abundantly in Israel.

19:5, 6 God brought Elijah a cake and water, even as He had provided for him in earlier days (ch. 17).

19:7 Although the angel of the LORD can at times refer to God Himself (Ex. 3:2–6), in the Book of Kings it means a supernatural messenger (2 Kin. 1:3; 19:35).

19:8 As it frequently does in the Scriptures, Horeb refers to Mount Sinai itself, "the mountain of God" (Ex. 3:1).

19:9 The Hebrew text has "the" cave. This use of the definitive article here may be specific, suggesting that this was "the cave" in which Moses had hidden when he experienced the presence of Yahweh on the mountain of God (Ex. 34).

19:10 zealous: Like Phinehas of old (Num. 25:7–13), Elijah had a passion for God that made him stand against the idolatry he saw all around him. I alone am left: In his depression, he thought he alone was faithful to God. When he was killed, there would be no one left to serve God.

19:11, 12 the LORD was not in: Although each of the things mentioned in vv. 11, 12 could signal God's presence (Ex. 40:38; Zech. 14:4, 5; Acts 2:2, 3), Elijah learned that God is not just a God of the spectacular. At times, the work of God is experienced in a still small voice, "the sound of a gentle stillness." Elijah had called for lightning, and he had called for fire and national revival. What Elijah did not see was that God was at work in the lives of many people (v. 18).

19:13, 14 What are you doing here: In the first instance (v. 9), the question invited Elijah to consider his reasons for coming to this particular place. Based on his reply and God's self-revelation, the second question may imply something like: it is time to be elsewhere, serving God both in the normal routine of life and in accordance with His specific commissions.

19:15, 16 Elijah's work for God was far from complete, but it would now take a new direction. Elijah would anoint Elisha (vv. 19–21), Elisha would anoint Hazael (2 Kin. 8:7–15), and Jehu would be anointed by Elisha's servant (2 Kin. 9:1–10). The importance of Elijah's task may be seen in that Elisha became Elijah's designated successor, and Jehu and Hazael became kings.

19:17 The three individuals, Elisha, Jehu, and Hazael, were instruments of God. One would follow the other in works of judgment on God's hard-hearted people.

19:18–20 There were still many people who were faithful to the living God. Seven thousand had not stooped to worship Baal. Although in each generation there are great spiritual leaders who do the work of God, there is a community of God among everyday people whose lives are not spectacular but who live faithfully for God.

19:21 Unlike those whom Jesus would mention in his teachings (Matt. 8:18–22; Luke 9:57–62), Elisha turned back to his home only to break fully with his past. As Joshua had faithfully served Moses in a period of training for a position of great responsibility, so Elisha would humbly serve this later "Moses" until Elijah was taken into heaven (2 Kin. 2:1–12). The use of the word servant for Elisha matches the use of this word for Gehazi, the servant of Elisha in 2 Kin. 4:12.

Elijah and Elisha

Elijah’s victory on Mount Carmel ended with the slaying of 450 prophets of Baal (18:20–40). His ministry spanned Canaan from the Brook Cherith near his birthplace (17:1–7) to Zarephath where he performed the miracle that sustained the widow and her son, and to as far south as Mount Horeb (not shown). In Samaria, Elijah denounced King Ahab’s injustice against Naboth of Jezreel (21:17–29). Near Jericho, he separated the waters of the Jordan River to cross over and subsequently was carried to heaven in a chariot of fire (2 Kings 2:1–12). Elisha healed Naaman of leprosy in the Jordan River (5:1–19) and led the blinded Syrians to their defeat at Samaria (6:8–23). In Damascus, Elisha prophesied the death of Ben-Hadad and the succession of Hazael as king of Syria.

20:1 The king of Syria was Ben-Hadad II (860–842 B.C.). Although there is a modern nation called Syria, the ancient name for the people who had their capital in Damascus was Aramean, and their land was Aram (2 Kin. 5:1). One of the distinctive features of the ancient Middle East was the practice of forming alliances. Coalitions such as the thirty-two kings were common in times of war (Gen. 14:1–16).

20:2 When he is associated with his wicked wife Jezebel, Ahab appears as thoroughly evil. But in this chapter he appears as a capable leader in a time of international turmoil, and as a person who had some sense of the power and presence of God (vv. 13, 14).

20:3, 4 Taken by themselves, Ben-Hadad's words are mine meant no more than that Israel was a client state to the more powerful Aramean state. Ahab's reply All … are yours would then have been acceptance of such a treaty, in which Israel was the subservient party.

20:5, 6 The language was no longer that of political formalities; this was a demand for complete surrender of everything of value, of any person of worth, of whatever was pleasant in Ahab's eyes, to be handed over to the foreign monarch.

20:7, 8 Ahab apparently held out little hope of withstanding so vast an enemy host. His elders (v. 8) counseled him against submitting.

20:9 first time … this thing: The distinction may be in the admission of a subservient status of Israel to Aram, as against the actual surrender of persons and goods to the suzerain nation.

20:10 Ben-Hadad's boast was that his striking power was so great that Samaria would be ground to a powder, yielding barely enough for each of his soldiers to carry away a handful.

20:11 Ahab's proverbial reply reminded Ben-Hadad that a boast alone would not get the job done.

20:12 The notice that Ben-Hadad was drinking during the time he should have been preparing for battle shows his arrogance. He was celebrating victory before he had begun fighting (v. 16).

20:13 This prophet is not named. We are reminded that there were many true prophets of the Lord at that time (18:13; 20:35). I will deliver … you shall know: Just as God had demonstrated His person and power on Mount Carmel (ch. 18), He would now make Himself known to Ahab in the coming battle.

20:14, 15 The prophet revealed the outlines of the strategy Ahab should use. To his credit, Ahab obeyed the divine command and mustered his force.

20:16 This was an alliance of thirty-two kings from small areas in Aram and the surrounding territories. But they were all getting drunk—an arrogant act before the battle had even begun.

20:17–21 Ahab followed up his probing skirmish with a well-timed charge by his main striking force. Ben-Hadad, the king of the Arameans, barely escaped (v. 20) with his life. The resulting great slaughter (v. 21) was a tremendous victory for the army of Ahab.

20:22 This is likely the same prophet through whom God had given an encouraging message (v. 13; contrast v. 35). Ahab ultimately trusted in human wisdom rather than divine standards (v. 42). The period of late spring to early summer was one of the two main seasons for military expeditions. Provisions were readily available for men and cattle. The end of the rains allowed the movement of troops and provisions to be made more easily.

20:23–25 The Aramean advisors reflected traditional ancient Middle Eastern theological conceptions. Their gods' powers, such as their gods of the hills, were limited to particular locations. But the living God is not limited by time (Ps. 90:2) or space (Ps. 139:7–12). This is a fact beyond the imagination of these pagan "theologians."

20:26–30 This Aphek is not the Philistine city where the ark was lost (1 Sam. 4:1), but another location just east of the Jordan in northern Gilead. Apparently the Arameans were launching their second campaign in the Jordan valley. The Arameans would learn that the living God can deliver His people in the valley as well as the hills (Ps. 23:4; Joel 3:12–14).

20:31 Ben-Hadad now appealed to Ahab's merciful nature. The Aramean king sent his servants to Ahab in the traditional attire of submission and repentance.

20:32–34 The term brother was commonly used when relations between kings were cordial (9:13). Ben-Hadad might have been implying, "We are both kings."

20:35–41 This certain man is probably a different prophet than the one mentioned earlier in the story (vv. 13, 22). sons of the prophets: Although this term first occurs here, prophetic associations were known at least from Samuel's time (1 Sam. 10). Obadiah had only recently been instructed about rescuing such groups of prophets from Ahab's purge (18:13–14).

20:42–43 The prophet's dramatic tale is symbolic; as Ahab had judged the case, so he would be judged (22:29–37).

20:43 Sullen here connotes stubbornness as well as a downcast spirit. Rather than being grateful to God for the victories, Ahab resorts to human reason and adamantly refuses to change his ways.

Ahab

Generally recognized as the most evil king of Israel, Ahab did at times display courage and even real humility before God (21:29). Unfortunately, he never served the Lord wholeheartedly. Like many today, Ahab struggled with an indecisive nature. All too easily he could be led into wickedness by his wife, the infamous Jezebel. His marriage to this Phoenician princess was politically important and demonstrated the rising prominence of Israel's third dynasty. But as in the case of the foreign wives of Solomon before him, Ahab's marriage to a pagan produced tragic results.

Jezebel's influence over her husband was much stronger than the godly influence of the prophet Elijah. It is only fitting that the most evil king in the history of Israel should have as his contemporary the most famous and dramatic of Israel's prophets. Ahab's feelings toward Elijah show through in his comments to him: "Is that you, O troubler of Israel?" and "Have you found me, O my enemy?"

Despite seeing the fire of the living God consume Elijah's godly sacrifices at Mount Carmel, Ahab still listened to his wife instead of listening to Elijah and obeying God. Ahab went beyond merely combining the worship of the true God with the worship of the false gods of the Canaanites. He rejected the living God by openly serving Baal and worshiping him. Ahab even built an altar for Baal, a temple for it, and a wooden image. By rejecting the true God, Ahab was also rejecting God's Law as a guide for his life. Hence, nothing stopped him from coveting his neighbor's vineyard and allowing his wife to murder Naboth in order to steal his land. Ahab's life of disobedience led to a tragic end. He died in battle and his blood was licked up by the dogs, as had been foretold.

The only legacy that Ahab left was negative. He is remembered to this day by the words, "Ahab the son of Omri did evil in the sight of the LORD, more than all who were before him."

21:1 Samaria was Ahab's capital city; its name is used to represent all of Israel (2 Kin. 1:3; 2 Chr. 24:23; Jon. 3:6).

21:2, 3 Technically, all land was the Lord's, who granted it in perpetuity to each Israelite tribe and family (Lev. 25:23–28). Accordingly, the property belonged to Naboth (Num. 36:2–9). Even the king was obliged to obey the Law (1 Sam. 10:25). Ahab therefore negotiated with Naboth for his property.

21:4–6 sullen: Once again (1 Kin. 20:43) the king's displeasure at not having his own way makes his spirit downcast.

21:7 In reminding Ahab that he was king and could do as he pleased, Jezebel reflected her Canaanite background where kings ruled absolutely (Deut. 17:14–20; 1 Sam. 8:11–18).

21:8–12 Such letters would be written by royal scribes on scrolls or tablets and then sealed with the sender's personal sign.

21:13, 14 two men, scoundrels: The charge against Naboth was serious (Ex. 22:28). Although two witnesses were required in capital cases (Deut. 17:6), these two men were scoundrels, easily bribed into giving false testimony (Prov. 19:28). Naboth was executed outside the city as the Law required (Lev. 24:14). God's Law was followed in the manner and place of his death, though his execution was an outrage against the whole spirit of the Law. As in the case of Achan (Josh. 7:24, 25), Naboth's sons were stoned to death with him (2 Kin. 9:26), preventing any successor of Naboth from seeking to undo the illegal land seizure.

21:15–18 Because Naboth … was dead, the property was confiscated by the throne. Although Ahab apparently was unconcerned about how this took place, he could not escape his guilty conscience (v. 20).

21:19–24 Soon Ahab's blood would be licked by dogs at the pool in Samaria (22:37, 38). Ahab had lost all sense of God's Law, the basic teaching of which was always love for God and for neighbor (Matt. 22:37–40). Ahab's consistent idolatry demonstrated that he had no whole-hearted love for God (18:18). Taking Naboth's vineyard showed he had no love for his neighbor either.

21:25–29 The vacillating nature of Ahab's complex character is seen here. He could all too easily be led into wickedness by his wife. Nevertheless, he could at times display courage (22:34, 35) and even real humility before God (v. 29). Unfortunately, he never really entered into a genuine spiritual relationship with God. The result was that he, like all who despise God’s mercies (2 Pet. 3:5–10), would perish and leave his ill-gotten gain behind him (Ps. 49:5–14).

22:1–3 Faced with the rising threat of Assyria, Ahab had failed to press his advantage of three years before. He had not reoccupied the strategic highlands of Ramoth in Gilead. In the days of Solomon this area served as an administrative center (4:13), but apparently it was lost during the reign of Omri. Now that Aram and Israel as allies had successfully turned back Shalmaneser III of Assyria at Qarqar (853 B.C.), control of Ramoth Gilead was crucial.

22:4 Jehoshaphat was the fourth king of the southern kingdom. He was related to Ahab through the marriage of his son Jehoram to Ahab's daughter Athaliah (2 Kin. 8:18, 27). Jehoshaphat's relation to Ahab now placed him in the precarious position of going to war with Ahab against the Arameans.

22:5–8 Kings in the ancient Middle East commonly sought the will of the gods before entering battle (Judg. 20:27, 28; 1 Sam. 23:1–4). Jehoshaphat did not rely on Ahab's false prophets; he desired a true word of the LORD.

22:9 The prophet Micaiah is not known except in connection with this incident (2 Chr. 18:8–27).

22:10 A threshing floor was often used by the Canaanites for holding court. Threshing floors could also be scenes of spiritual importance (Judg. 6:36–40; 1 Chr. 21:15—22:1).

22:11–16 Zedekiah tried to validate his prophetic pronouncement with symbolic magic. The horns symbolize great strength (Num. 24:8; Ps. 18:2), an idea reinforced by the use of iron. A goring horn is used elsewhere in Scripture to symbolize victorious power (Dan. 8:7).

22:17–22 The imagery of sheep and shepherd was familiar to Micaiah's hearers (Ezek. 34:12; Mark 14:27). Micaiah's words are dramatic, emphasizing the gravity of Ahab's projected venture and counteracting Zedekiah's lies.

22:23–29 lying spirit: These prophets prophesied under the influences of evil, but their false predictions were just what Ahab wanted to hear.

22:30–33 By hiding himself behind a disguise, Ahab hoped he could thwart Micaiah's prophecy of doom. Jehoshaphat's participation in royal regalia in a battle where he did not even belong (2 Chr. 19:1–3) nearly cost him his life. Ben-Hadad tried to shorten the battle by finding and killing Ahab. Jehoshaphat's life was spared not only by his timely cry but by God's direct intervention (2 Chr. 18:31).

22:34–37 The phrase at random indicates that the bowman did not realize that he was aiming at Ahab. The shot itself was well placed, striking the king in the gap between the breastplate and the lower armor. Ahab's wounded body was propped up in his chariot so his soldiers would keep on fighting, and not give up immediately as Ben-Hadad hoped.

22:38 The fulfillment of Elijah's grisly prophecy (21:19–24) concerning the house of Ahab unfolds here as the dogs licked up his blood.

22:39–42 Archaeological excavations at Samaria have illustrated the nature of Ahab's ivory house, a house with luxurious decorations made of ivory. The palace contained objects of ivory, and the walls and furniture were inlaid with pieces of ivory.

(Heb. qatar) (1 Kin. 13:1; 22:43; Num. 16:40; 2 Chr. 13:11) Strong’s #6999: This Hebrew word has the basic meaning “to produce smoke.” It is used only in reference to religious offerings. The offerings are sometimes made to the Lord and sometimes to other gods (9:25; 12:33; 2 Kin. 22:17). In Leviticus, the word is used to speak of true worship that the Lord had ordained. But in the historical books of 1 Kings through 2 Chronicles, the word is primarily used for the rituals of false worship. Even many of the “good” kings of Israel failed to abolish improper burning of incense (22:43; 2 Kin. 12:3; 14:4; 15:4, 35). Jeremiah often used the word to denounce the errors of his people, though he used it once to prophesy of a time when Israel would perpetually worship the true God (Jer. 1:16; 11:13; 33:14–18).

22:43, 44 Jehoshaphat continued in his father Asa’s spiritual footsteps. These high places were often used in the worship of Israel’s God (3:2–4).

22:45 made war: In addition to the campaign at Ramoth Gilead, Jehoshaphat’s military ventures included strengthening his forces and borders (2 Chr. 17:14–19), repelling an invasion (2 Chr. 20:1–30), and conducting an Edomite campaign (2 Kin. 3:6–27).

22:46, 47 perverted persons: See 14:24 for a description of these Canaanite cultic prostitutes, who were a part of the debased religious practices of Baal worship.

22:48–50 The destruction of the merchant ships sponsored by Jehoshaphat and Ahaziah ended the projected commercial enterprise. The prophet pronounces God’s displeasure with the whole project (2 Chr. 20:35–37).

22:51–53 A wicked king of the northern kingdom, Ahaziah followed in the path of his father Ahab, much as Amon of Judah would later follow in the path of his wicked father Manasseh (2 Kin. 21:19–22).

22:52 Ahaziah thus continued in the spiritual course laid out for him by his father. The story does not end here but is continued in 2 Kings. The division of Kings into two books was done for convenience when the Bible was translated into Greek in the second century B.C.

The Second Book of Kings

FROM THE ASCENSION OF THE PROPHET ELIJAH to heaven through the eventual fall of Israel and Judah, Second Kings continues the history begun in 1 Kings, of one people and two kingdoms. The narrative does not merely celebrate the Israelites. Instead, it displays both high and low points in the history of Israel and Judah. While it is true that few of the kings of the northern kingdom of Israel are spoken of highly, the kings of the southern kingdom of Judah do not fare much better. First and Second Kings are more than a recounting of names and facts. The books describe a people without direction, leaders who failed to lead, and a God who was forced to discipline His rebellious people.

Second Kings continues the history of the divided kingdom from the point where First Kings ends, with the reigns of Ahaziah in the northern kingdom (853–852 B.C.) and Jehoshaphat in the southern kingdom (872–847 B.C.) It traces the events in the rest of Israel's third dynasty, together with corresponding details in Judah during the reigns of Jehoram and Ahaziah. In so doing, it describes details especially relevant to the prophetic ministries of Elijah and Elisha (1:1—9:37). During this period, the northern kingdom faced continued pressure from Aram (Syria) under its kings Ben-Hadad II and Hazael, as well as new threats from the rising state of Assyria with its powerful King Shalmaneser III (858–824 B.C.).

The account of the fourth dynasty in Israel begins with a purge of the rampant Baal worship that had plagued the first three dynasties (10:1—15:12). Unfortunately, the founder of this dynasty, Jehu, was an opportunist who used the attack on Baal worship to further his own causes. Rather than keeping the Law completely, he perpetuated the apostate state religion initiated by Jeroboam I—the worship of the calves at Bethel and Dan. His successors in the fourth dynasty proved little better. The corresponding rulers of the southern kingdom ranged from the wicked Athaliah to Josiah and Amaziah, who received mild divine commendation. Externally, the Aramean menace was ended by the military campaign of Adad Nirari III of Assyria. Yet Assyria itself passed into a period of decline that spanned the first half of the eighth century B.C.

With the death of Zechariah in 752 B.C., the northern kingdom entered a time of rapid decline that mirrored its spiritual condition. The combined effects of spiritual apostasy and moral debauchery, together with unwise political entanglements with Assyria, ultimately brought the northern kingdom to its end in 722 B.C. Meanwhile, Jotham and his wicked son Ahaz were ruling the southern kingdom of Judah. Ahaz was so evil that even the godly Isaiah had little effect on the king's spiritual condition. The Scriptures attribute Judah's ultimate demise to the idolatry of this king (2 Chr. 28:23).

The remainder of 2 Kings deals with the varying fortunes and spiritual pilgrimage of the southern kingdom, tracing Judah's history from the righteous Hezekiah (chs. 18—20) to the wicked sons of Josiah, under whom Jerusalem faced three invasions and deportations, the last in 586 B.C. Thus Judah was increasingly caught up in the complex international events that took place from the late eighth to the early sixth century B.C.

Judah's ability to maintain its identity in the midst of its powerful neighbors was due on the one hand to God, who was faithful to His covenant with the house of David, and on the other hand to the spiritual gains made during the reigns of its two faithful kings, Hezekiah (729–699 B.C.) and Josiah (640–609 B.C.). However, the forces of apostasy that had brought about the collapse of the northern kingdom also took their toll in the southern kingdom. Judah was led away captive, and their exile would last seventy years. Second Kings ends on this tragic note. Only the final word of Jehoiachin's release provides a ray of hope in the darkness of captivity (25:27–30). The symbolic message is clear: the Lord would still fulfill His promise to restore His people (1 Kin. 8:46–53).

Like 1 and 2 Samuel, 1 and 2 Kings were originally one book in Hebrew. The book was divided into two parts when the Old Testament was translated into Greek in about 150 B.C.

Hence debate over the authorship of First Kings applies equally to the authorship of 2 Kings. Many evangelical biblical scholars continue to endorse the traditional view that Jeremiah wrote the books of the Kings. They point to Jeremiah's priestly origin, his prophetic activity, his access to governmental authorities at the highest level, and his close personal involvement in the complex religious, social, and political activities that occurred during the collapse and fall of Judah in the early sixth century B.C. Jeremiah was certainly in an ideal position to know the spiritual situation of the day and to have access to state records, historical information, and other source material necessary for writing such a book. Jeremiah could well have written and compiled the book during the period of religious reform led by King Josiah (22:8).

Commentary

1:1—9:37 The first major section of 2 Kings traces the continuing spiritual and moral degeneracy of Israel in the era of the third dynasty of the northern kingdom, despite divine warnings of judgment through the prophet Elisha. Contemporary events in the southern kingdom during the reigns of Jehoshaphat, Jehoram, and Ahaziah interplay in the narrative.

1:1 Moab rebelled: This chronological notice likely relates to the rebellion of Mesha, the well-known king of Moab. Its placement here may serve merely as an indicator of the problems that would soon fall on Israel.

1:2 Ahaziah: The account of his brief, wicked reign begins in 1 Kin. 22:51. The division of the Book of Kings into two parts was for the convenience of the translators, as is indicated by the fact that Ahaziah's reign carries over from one book to the other without a break. lattice of his upper room: Houses in ancient Israel usually had one story. Palaces and grander houses would have had a second level. The upper stories commonly had balconies enclosed with latticework, allowing for the flow of air while maintaining protection from the sun and a certain privacy. Such latticework could easily be broken. Baal-Zebub: While the name "Zebub" is known in the Canaanite texts from Ugarit, here it may reflect a deliberate corruption of an original "zebul" (prince). If so, Hebrew scribes have transformed "Baal-Zebul" (Baal is prince) into "Baal-Zebub" (lord of flies). The scribes also wrote "Baal-Zebel" (lord of dung) at times. This deliberate change of the names of persons or gods associated with Baal worship shows the tremendous contempt with which these ideas were held by the Israelite scribes. See also the deliberate change in the names "Jezebel" (1 Kin. 16:31) and "Rimmon" (2 Kin. 5:18). The name Baal-Zebub would later be applied to Satan (Matt. 10:25; 12:24).

1:3 the angel of the LORD: At times this phrase is used as a way of referring to God. But often, and possibly here, this phrase speaks of one who is the Lord's messenger, but who is somehow distinguished from Him. The dramatic story of Elijah begins in 1 Kin. 17:1. no God in Israel: The contempt of the Lord for the errant behavior of the king is palpable in these words. king of Samaria: A king was identified by his country or by his capital city (1 Kin. 21:1; 2 Chr. 24:23; Jon. 3:6). This is just another title for the king of Israel. god of Ekron: Ahaziah followed the Baal worship of his father. The cult of Baal was strongly identified with Ekron, a city well known for its practice of divination (1 Sam. 6:2; Is. 2:6). Ahaziah sent his messenger to Ekron not only because the city was nearby but probably because he hoped to keep the nature and extent of his injury secret. In ancient times, a king who was seriously injured or ill would be vulnerable to opportunistic attempts on his life and throne. Thus in his own view, and likely through the counsel of his advisors, Ahaziah did the "smart thing." It was not, however, the right thing. Elijah reminded the royal messenger that Israel's God had not abdicated His position and was available for true consultation.

1:4 The determination of God was that the king would die for his sins. The king had sought a divine message from a foreign god, but received the Lord's word nonetheless.

1:5, 6 The messengers of the king were prevented by Elijah from completing their errand. God did not want any sham message coming and encouraging the wicked king. He had already received the word of the living God (v. 4).

1:7, 8 Although hairy may refer to Elijah's garments, the usual translation hairy man is supported by the ancient versions. Ahaziah knew the man was his opponent, Elijah the Tishbite (1 Kin. 17:1).

1:9, 10 fire … from heaven: Heavenly fire could signal divine judgment (Gen. 19:24). Elijah had already called down such fire in his contest with the prophets of Baal (1 Kin. 18:36–38). This fire was likely lightning. Baal was not the god of the storm he was reputed to be. The God of Israel was—and is—the Lord of creation.

1:11–13 Fifty men were a military unit attested elsewhere in the literature of the ancient Middle East. Each captain of fifty approached Elijah with a growing fear of the power of God associated with this great prophet.

1:14–17 So Ahaziah died: The prophetic word was fulfilled as announced. no son: This meant that the dynasty had ended. A king named Jehoram thus ruled in both kingdoms.

1:18 the rest of the acts: This follows the usual pattern for recording the obituaries of the kings of the northern kingdom.

Mentoring in the Old Testament

The relationship between Elijah and Elisha resembles what we today would call mentoring a prospective leader. Eventually, when Elisha literally took up the mantle of Elijah (2 Kin. 2:13), he was taking over Elijah's role as the main prophet of Israel, a role for which Elijah had helped to groom him (1 Kin. 19:16).

Mentoring involves a voluntary investment in others for their growth, development, and success. It is rooted in faith in the value of the other person. The goal is the gain of the one being mentored, whether or not the mentor benefits. Thus mentoring often requires loving sacrifice.

2:1–4 Gilgal … Bethel … and Jericho were probably centers of prophetic activity that looked to Elijah for leadership. Gilgal and Bethel would become centers of pagan idolatry in the following century (Hos. 4:15; 9:15; 12:11; Amos 4:4; 5:5)—places where a true worship of God degenerated into centers of false teaching and apostasy.

2:1 about to take up Elijah into heaven: The story that follows is so extraordinary that the narrator introduces its subject early.

2:2–6 Stay here: The tripling of these incidents is similar to the tripling of the incidents of ch. 1 (the three bands of fifty soldiers who came to seize Elijah). As the LORD lives: Elisha made a solemn promise three times in these same verses; he determined that he would remain by his master Elijah no matter what might occur.

2:3–7 take away: The same Hebrew verb is used for Enoch's entrance to heaven (Gen. 5:24). The work that God was about to do had been divinely revealed to many of God's servants (vv. 3, 5). This widespread knowledge of God's purpose would protect against later denials by cynical persons that the event had ever taken place. keep silent: It is not clear what prompted Elisha's harsh words here (and in v. 5).

2:8 The water was the Jordan River (vv. 7, 13), somewhere near Jericho. Elijah was like Moses in that his life and ministry show many parallels to that of Israel's greatest prophet. As Moses had divided the waters of the Red Sea in the final act of the redemption of Israel from Egypt (Ex. 14), so now Elijah replicated this miracle by dividing the waters of the Jordan. The difference is that Elijah did not use the power of God as a great redeeming miracle as Moses had done, but as an almost casual demonstration of God's wonders as he was walking on his way.

2:9 double portion: Although the narrative reports twice as many miracles for Elisha as Elijah, that was not the point of Elisha's request. His real request was that he would be Elijah's spiritual successor (Deut. 21:17). It was not a double portion of Elijah's goods that Elisha wanted but a double portion of his spirit. In material things, the principal heir received a double portion of his father's goods. Elisha wanted the principle of primary inheritance to apply to spiritual things. Nearby were all sorts of prophets. All of them would be his heirs. Any one of them might become the leading successor of Elijah. We may assume from the life he lived that Elisha's request was not due to pride. He simply wanted to be the man of God who would follow Elijah's model. Far from being a selfish request, Elisha's petition reflects his humble acknowledgment that if Elijah's ministry were to continue through him, it would take specially God-given spiritual power.

2:10 if you see me: We have no answer as to why this was important. Perhaps it spoke of persistence (vv. 2, 4, 6).

2:11 In one of the most dramatic scenes in the Bible, heaven opened, a fiery chariot with fiery horses appeared, a whirlwind blew, and the prophet of God vanished alive into heaven. The fire associated with the chariot and the horses indicate the presence of God, much as the fiery angels do that Isaiah saw stationed around the throne of God (Is. 6:2).

2:12 The term my father underscores Elijah's relationship to Elisha as his spiritual mentor as well as the greatness of Elijah's reputation. The whole phrase is repeated at Elisha's passing (13:14). While these words were a tribute to Elijah on this great occasion, Elisha's accompanying actions indicated his personal sorrow at the loss of his spiritual master and friend.

2:13 took up the mantle: Elijah had once laid this mantle on Elisha as a symbolic action (1 Kin. 19:19); now Elisha took up the prophetic status and ministry that the mantle symbolized.

2:14 The mantle was only a symbol, but in the hands of Elijah it had been an instrument for the power of the living God. The mantle had been for Elijah what the rod had been for Moses and Aaron (Ex. 4:1–9; 7:9). It became the symbol of God's power in the hands of Elisha.

2:15 the spirit of Elijah: The prophets witnessed both the miracle of Elijah (v. 8) and the similar miracle of Elisha. In this way there would be common agreement that Elisha was the successor of Elijah. They bowed, not in worship, but in respect and submission to the will of God.

2:16 fifty strong men: Groups of fifty men were often called upon to perform an arduous task (1:9–15). The men decided they needed a search party. Even though they had received a revelation from God that Elijah would be taken to heaven (v. 3), still they checked things out.

2:17, 18 he was ashamed: Although these words may indicate Elisha's sense of shame on behalf of his disciples for their disbelief, the use of the phrase elsewhere indicates that it means Elisha was worn out, no longer willing to resist (8:11; Judg. 3:25). He came to the point where he gave in to their request.

2:19–22 Elisha's first miracle authenticated his calling as the principal successor to Elijah (v. 14). His second miracle, the cleansing of the waters of Jericho, was purposeful and ameliorative. It also demonstrated the power of God with respect to water, so necessary for life (1 Kin. 17:1).

2:20 Elisha performed a purification ceremony (Lev. 2:13; Num. 18:19). The salt taken from a new bowl and cast into the water symbolized the cleansing of the water for new use.

2:21, 22 The miracle was done in the name of God; Elisha was only His instrument. to this day: That is, at the day of the writing of the account.

“youths”

(Heb. naar) (2 Kin. 2:23; Gen. 22:5; 1 Kin. 20:19) Strong’s #5288: The noun naar always refers to males but can include different ages. It can refer to anyone from an infant (Ex. 2:6) to a young boy (Gen. 22:5) to soldiers (1 Kin. 20:17–20). It sometimes denotes a household servant (1 Sam. 9:3) or a royal official (19:6). The word can have the nuance of “rebellion,” implying that the 42 youths killed by bears should be understood as “ruffians” or “delinquents,” rather than young children.

2:23–25 Elisha’s third miracle was punitive and judgmental. Prophets were instruments both of God’s grace and His wrath.

2:23, 24 Go up, you baldhead: While the severity of the sentence has been questioned, the words of the youths indicated their disbelief of Elijah’s “going up” into heaven (v. 11) and their disrespect for God’s prophet. God did not tolerate blasphemy against Himself by the demeaning of Elijah’s departure, or the abuse of His prophet, whom He had called for an important task at a critical period in Israel’s history.

2:25 Elisha made his home on Mount Carmel (4:25), as well as in Samaria (5:3).

3:1–8:15 Elisha's prophetic ministry during the perilous times of Moabite and Aramean warfare with Israel.

3:1, 2 sacred pillar of Baal: Probably this was a stone pillar or statue erected by Ahab and bearing an inscription and image of the god Baal. Although it was put away temporarily, it apparently was not destroyed, because it later became one of the objects of Jehu's purge (10:26, 27).

3:3, 4 Mesha king of Moab: The existence of this Moabite king is confirmed by an inscription on a pillar known as the Moabite Stone. The inscription indicates that Omri had conquered the plains of Moab north of the Arnon River and that the area remained under Israelite control throughout Ahab's reign. Thus the events of this chapter probably took place after Jehoram's accession and shortly before Jehoshaphat's death in 847 B.C. (1:1). sheepbreeder: This Hebrew word (noqed) is used only of Mesha and of Amos the prophet (Amos 1:1). As for Mesha, his business must have been enormous if he could pay such an exorbitant tribute.

3:5, 6 The rebellion of Moab provoked Jehoram into a punitive war.

3:7, 8 Will you go with me: Because Jehoshaphat was related to the throne of the northern kingdom through the marriage of his son Jehoram to Ahab's daughter Athaliah, it could be presumed that he would be available as an ally. Because Edom had been added to the orbit of Judah as a result of an earlier war, Jehoshaphat proposed that they march through Edom to attack the Moabite territory. This route for their forces would avoid Moabite border fortresses and bring the attack from their rear.

3:9, 10 The route was very difficult. no water: In such a military campaign as this, both men and animals needed more water than they could carry with them.

3:11, 12 prophet of the LORD: A prophet or diviner often traveled with armies on their campaigns. While the account apparently focuses on the military campaign as such, the crucial role of Elisha in the story emphasizes the importance of the prophetic office in ancient Israel.

3:13 prophets of your father: Elisha spoke scathingly about the wicked kings of the north consulting with prophets of Baal (1:2, 3).

3:14 As the LORD of hosts lives … I stand: This is the same language used by Elijah (1 Kin. 17:1). I would not look at you: As a devotee of Baal, Jehoram had no claim on the favor of God. Nevertheless, he would enjoy the benefits of God's grace toward Jehoshaphat.

3:15 Elisha’s call for a musician is an effort to achieve an atmosphere free of war and strife so that he might concentrate on the anticipated divine revelation.

3:16–19 As in connection with many OT miracles, the prophet’s words carry instructions for human participation (4:3, 4, 41; 6:6), in order that man’s faith and the divine provision may each have their proper part.

3:20–22 filled with water: The dry streambeds can easily overflow their banks in downpours of rain. Even distant areas can be flooded by water from faraway mountain streams swelled by heavy rains.

3:23–25 This is blood: The red water looked like blood and the Moabite king assumed falsely that the former enemies had once again fallen out with each other. It was a tragic miscalculation.

3:26 break through: It is uncertain if the Moabite king wished to retaliate against the Edomite king for joining the allied kings from across the Jordan, or if he considered the Edomite army the least formidable, or if he was attempting to establish an escape route. Perhaps all three are true.

3:27 offered him: Such desperate acts are frequently attested to in the literature of the ancient Near East. Scholars are divided as to whether the resultant indignation was God’s, Moab’s, or Israel’s. The withdrawal of the armies may suggest that the disgust here was that of Israel’s army.

4:1–7 The power of God through Elisha multiplies the widow's oil. It is customary to speak of "the miracles of Elisha." In all these cases, the miracle is the Lord's, of course. Hence, we speak of "the power of God through Elisha."

4:1 A certain woman: The fate of widows was perilous in the ancient Middle East. A practical test of biblical piety was to observe how those in power treated widows and orphans (Job 24:21; Ps. 146:9). creditor: Both the Bible (Lev. 25:39–45) and other ancient laws permitted selling one's family members into slavery for payment of debts. God's Law worked toward limiting the abuse and the length of time in such a situation.

The Widow's Oil

In the days immediately following the departure of Elijah, God empowered Elisha to perform a number of miracles. One of them was to increase oil for a poor widow (2 Kin. 4:1–7). This incident confirmed Elisha as a true prophet of God and the successor to Elijah. In fact, the increase of oil recalled the miracle that Elijah performed for the widow of Zarephath (1 Kin. 17:8–16).

In addition to what the miracle revealed about Elisha, it illustrated an important aspect of God's character: His concern for the poor and disadvantaged. Both Elijah and Elisha dealt with kings, commanders, and other powerful leaders. But they also helped the powerless. In this case, the widow was about to lose her sons to pay for a debt left by her late husband. That meant that she would be left with no means of support. God provided for her needs through the intervention of Elisha (compare Ps. 68:5).

James reminds us that true religion involves action, such as caring for "widows in their trouble" (James 1:27). Elisha was a true prophet practicing true religion.

4:2–7 This miracle is similar in some respects to the miracle God did through Elijah in providing for the widow of Zarepath (1 Kin. 17:14–16). In both cases, Yahweh demonstrated that He alone is Lord of Creation (1 Kin. 17:1).

4:2–6 The small flask held olive oil intended for anointing, rather than food or fuel. Such a small flask was not very valuable.

4:7 Elisha is called the man of God throughout this section (vv. 16, 21, 22, 25, 27). The word God in Hebrew is literally "the God," meaning the true or genuine God. sell … pay … live: Elisha met not only her immediate needs but the long-range ones as well.

4:8, 9 The friendship of Elisha with the woman at Shunem is also similar to the friendship of Elijah with the widow of Zarephath (1 Kin. 17:8–16). holy man of God: The adjective describes Elisha, a man she perceived was truly set apart for the ministry of God.

4:10 upper room: Such quarters were commonly on the roof and could be reached from the outside. This accommodated the guest while providing privacy. Recognizing Elisha as one of God's choice servants, the Shunammite woman was especially concerned that the normal measures of hospitality be applied even more fully.

4:11, 12 The term for servant (Heb. naar, frequently "youth," or "attendant") often means a person engaged in a period of training. Rather than looking down upon this role, such a servant could consider the position an opportunity. Often these were responsible duties. The same word was also used of Elisha's own relation to Elijah (1 Kin. 19:21). Unfortunately, Gehazi would not prove as worthy of his master's trust as Elisha had been of Elijah's.

4:13–16 Elisha decided that the best thing he could do for the woman was promise her the birth of a son, despite her years of frustration about this. do not lie: The Shunammite woman felt that even Elisha could not fulfill such a promise.

4:17 The birth of the son to the woman was similar to the fulfillment of the promise of God in the birth of Isaac (Gen. 21).

4:18–21 the bed of the man of God: The Shunammite's action speaks strongly of her faith. Despite her overwhelming sorrow, she placed the fate of her child close to Elisha, through whose word, and by means of God's mercy, she had gained her son in the first place. Placing the body on the bed of the man of God also kept his death a secret until she could reach Elisha, from whom she had once seen the impossible accomplished. Again, compare the story of Elijah and the son of the woman of Zarephath (1 Kin. 17:17–24).

4:22, 23 New Moon … Sabbath: There was no work on these days and so they would be most suitable for seeing the prophet (Ex. 20:9–12; Amos 8:5).

4:24–27 Elisha knew that something was wrong by the furious way she drove (v. 24), but God had not made the particular issue known to the prophet. the LORD has hidden: The prophets did not know everything. They only knew what God made known to them (5:26). caught him by the feet: This action is a mark of humility and reverence (Matt. 28:9).

4:28 Did I ask: Her pain in the death of her child was worse than the emptiness she had felt before he was born. It was the prophet's fault, she charged. Yet it was to the prophet she had come for help.

4:29 Elisha's staff, like Elijah's mantle (2:13, 14), was symbolic of the power of God and the authority of the prophet. Laid upon the body of the child, the staff would signify that the prophet intended to come, and that he had faith that God would restore the boy.

4:30, 31 As the LORD lives: With this oath, the woman asserted her faith in the living God (1 Kin. 17:1). Elisha had used similar language when he refused to leave Elijah (2:2, 4, 6). Now he heard these words from her.

4:32–37 Elisha's actions demonstrate that his faith was in the person and power of God alone, and not in the staff that symbolized his prophetic office. Although he repeated the symbolic actions learned from Elijah his teacher (1 Kin. 17:17–22), his faith transcended mere symbol and ritual. He sought God who alone can grant life and perform the miraculous (Pss. 36:9; 49:7–9). The restoration of the boy's life is a demonstration that life itself is in the hands of God (1 Kin. 17:23).

4:37 bowed to the ground: The action of the Shunammite woman was a mark of humility and gratefulness to God and to His prophet. Although it is not recorded that a word passed between her and Elisha, as had been the case with Elijah and the widow of Zarephath (1 Kin. 17:24), her reverential action spoke strongly of her deep gratitude.

4:38 Gilgal was the first place the Israelites camped after crossing the Jordan into Canaan (Josh. 4:19, 20). Gilgal was probably about one mile northeast of Jericho. sitting before him: Elisha sat at the head of the sons of the prophets.

4:39, 40 The wild gourds were poisonous. death in the pot: The reaction of the hungry men was immediate and frightening.

4:41 The flour had no magical properties, of course. Elisha's faith in the living God effected the miraculous cure.

4:42–44 Baal Shalisha was near Gilgal. The firstfruits were to be presented to God and His priests (Lev. 23:15–17, 20). With an entrenched false priesthood and a debased state religion prevailing in the northern kingdom, the man brought his offering to Elisha. The faithful prophet miraculously multiplied the loaves—with some left over.

5:1–19 The account of Naaman the Aramean is fascinating for several reasons. (1) A foreign national comes to faith in the living God. (2) The story provides aspects of the inter-cultural dimensions of spreading the gospel of Israel's great Savior God. (3) It contrasts the characters of Elisha and his servant Gehazi.

5:1 This Aramean general Naaman was a remarkable figure in biblical history. This verse is filled with phrases describing his character, his honor, and his ability. Surprisingly, we read that his military victories were granted by the LORD. The Hebrew word translated leper refers to any of several serious skin diseases (Lev. 13:1–46; Num. 5:1–4), including certain fungi (Lev. 13:47–56; 14:33–57). The king of Syria was Ben-Hadad II (860–842 B.C.). He was a constant threat to the northern kingdom and would lead an invasion against it later (6:24—7:20).

5:2 captive … young girl: God used the testimony of an Jewish servant girl and brought the commanding general of Israel's greatest military foe to biblical faith.

5:3 the prophet … in Samaria: Although Elisha traveled frequently and may sometimes have lived at Mount Carmel (4:25), he apparently maintained a residence in the capital city of Samaria (vv. 9, 24; 2:25; 6:9—7:20).

5:4, 5 It is a measure of the respect that the Aramean king had for his general that he granted his unusual request. Naaman's gifts are a measure of his wealth—and of his great personal need.

5:6, 7 While such letters of introduction were common in the ancient Middle East, Ben-Hadad's frequent forays against Israel made the king suspicious that the Aramean king was seeking a pretext for yet another invasion of Israelite territory (v. 2).

5:8 torn his clothes: Tearing a robe could be a sign of grief or agitation (11:14), as well as a mark of the sorrow that leads to repentance (Joel 2:13).

5:9 at the door: For some reason Elisha did not meet with the general face to face. Perhaps it was because contact with one with skin disorder would render the prophet unclean and therefore cut off his ministry with others (Num. 5:1–4).

5:10 Elisha's instruction for Naaman to wash seven times in the Jordan emphasizes that the full cure for Naaman's condition could be effected solely by the power of Israel's sovereign God. The proud Aramean needed a lesson in humility and putting his personal trust in God alone (v. 15). The issue was obedience.

The Abana River in downtown Damascus, Syria—known today as the Barada River. Naaman considered this river and the Pharpar River of his native land superior to the Jordan River in Israel (2 Kin. 5:11, 12).

5:11, 12 Understandably, Naaman's initial response was one of disbelief and anger. This seemed a very strange and humiliating command for a general in the army of Aram. What, after all, was the Jordan compared to the greater rivers of Aram?

5:13, 14 Naaman listened to his advisors, did as he was commanded, and was healed. clean: The word suggests that the problem of skin diseases causing uncleanness was an issue in his country as well. The wonderful thing about Naaman is that once he gave it thought, he would have done whatever God commanded him through His prophet.

5:15, 16 stood before him: Now that Naaman was clean, he could stand in the presence of the prophet Elisha (vv. 9, 10). no God in all the earth: Naaman stands as a wonderful example of a foreigner who came to faith in God. take a gift: What Naaman had received could not have been purchased, nor would Elisha take advantage of the situation.

5:17 earth: Although ancient Middle Eastern custom associated the identity of a god with the location where he was worshiped, Elisha might have felt in this instance that Naaman's newly-gained acquaintance with Israel's God might be benefitted with this tangible reminder of the land of his cure. Elisha thus allowed Naaman an accommodation to his faith. He will also grant him such concessions as diplomatic protocol may dictate (vv. 17–19). In the latter case, Naaman might even plan to sprinkle some of Israel's soil under his knees when forced to bow in pagan temples, that in his own heart he may be bowing to the one true God.

5:18, 19 The name Rimmon is an example of a deliberate corruption of a name of a foreign god by the Hebrew scribes. Instead of writing Ramman, meaning "Thunderer," a name for the storm god Hadad (Zech. 12:11), they wrote Rim mon, meaning "Pomegranate."

5:20–22 Gehazi: The sad story of Gehazi's greed serves as a contrast to the principled behavior of his master Elisha (vv. 15, 16).

5:23 talents: A talent was an enormous amount of silver—equal to 3,000 shekels, or about 70 lbs. two of his servants: Each would have been carrying a heavy load.

5:24 the citadel: The Hebrew word can refer to a hill or mound, or a building such as a citadel (2 Chr. 27:3, 4; Mic 4:8). Gehazi dismissed the men before coming to a place where his greedy gain might be observed by people who would know about Naaman and Elisha.

5:25 Since he had lied first to Naaman (v. 22), now he must lie to Elisha.

5:26 Did not my heart go: The use of the term heart suggests not only Elisha's knowledge but also his strong feeling for Gehazi.

5:27 The irony of justice punished Gehazi's sin with the leprosy of Naaman.

6:1 It is unclear whether the place refers to where the prophetic community lived, or to an assembly hall where they gathered, or to the houses in the general area. In any case, the present building situation proved inadequate. Apparently there were several prophetic communities (2:1–5). In some cases the prophets lived in separate houses or quarters (1 Sam. 19:18–22). Elisha had his own house in Samaria (2 Kin. 5:9). The precise arrangement may have varied according to local needs.

6:2–5 The details of this building program set the stage for the loss of the iron ax head. In a time when most tools were still made of bronze, an iron blade was valuable.

6:6, 7 he … took it: The man must have been tremendously impressed with what he saw, but the ax head could be of no use to him until he actually reached out and took it.

6:8–12 This remarkable narrative takes the reader into the tent of Ben-Hadad, the king of Aram, and to the meetings he had with his general staff. It turned out, much to the king's consternation, that his plans were known to the king of Israel and his staff. Ben-Hadad suspected a spy, and he was right. The spy was Elisha, who had never left Israel.

6:13–15 Dothan was in the central highlands of Israel. It is mentioned only here and in Gen. 37, when Joseph was sold to the Midianites (Gen. 37:17).

6:14 Ben-Hadad's great consternation is indicated by the fact that he sent a great army to size just one man.

6:15 the servant of the man of God: Since Gehazi had become a leper (5:27), it is possible that this is another servant. However, Gehazi is mentioned again in 8:4 as one who was still faithfully representing the miracles done through Elisha.

6:16 those who are with us: Elisha knew that God's unseen army was far more powerful than any visible army.

6:17, 18 horses and chariots of fire: In answer to his prayer, Elisha's reassuring words to his servant (v. 16) were validated by letting him see the spiritual realities that lay beyond normal human sight. Such a fiery scene had accompanied Elijah's translation into heaven (2:11).

6:19, 20 I will bring you: Elisha's words are technically true, although he employed tactics common in times of war to lead the Arameans to Samaria rather than Dothan. Such wartime measures are noted elsewhere in the Scriptures (Josh. 2:4–6; 1 Sam. 27:8–12).

6:21–23 The end of this story is even more amazing than the beginning. The blind soldiers were brought within the capital city of Israel where they easily might have been slaughtered. Instead, they were given a banquet and were sent back to Ben-Hadad unharmed.

6:21, 22 The term of deference my father was used earlier by Elisha to Elijah (2:12), and to Naaman by his servants (5:13). Its use here by King Jehoram (3:1) for Elisha is a clear indication that Jehoram knew he was not in charge.

6:23 bands … came no more: That is, for a period of time. The wars between the two nations revived after a period (6:24).

6:24 The siege of Samaria, the capital of Israel, was Ben-Hadad's final attempt to destroy his rival Jehoram of Israel.

6:25–27 The desperate conditions in besieged Samaria had made even once common food and commodities scarce and expensive. The dove droppings may have been used for fuel or even as a substitute for salt.

6:28, 29 eat him: Israel had been warned that national disobedience could reduce the people to such a loathsome deed (Lev. 26:29; Deut. 28:53, 57).

6:30 The king was not unmoved by the plight of his people. He tore his garments and wore sackcloth to attest to his concern.

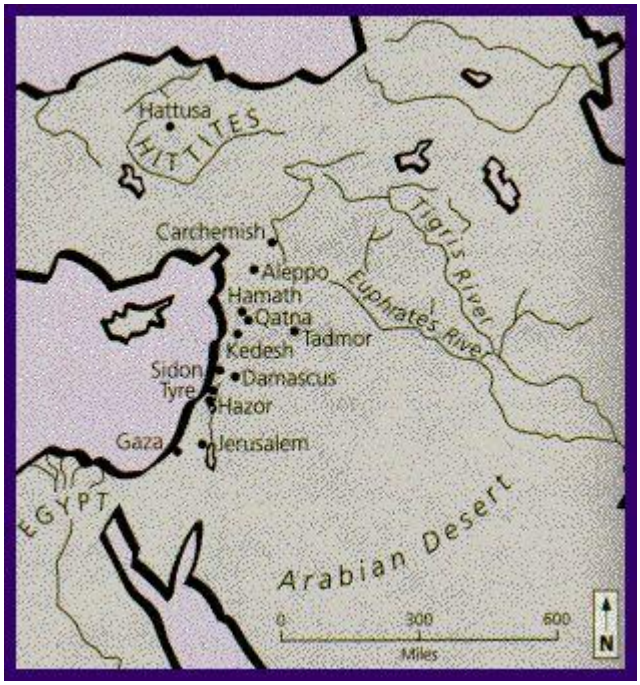
6:31–33 if the head of Elisha: The phrase is an oath expressing the enraged king's will to kill Elisha, whom he blamed for the severe conditions.

Hittites

The Syrian army's fear at the prospect of facing a combined army of Hittites and Egyptians (2 Kin. 7:6) was understandable. Camped outside Damascus, the Syrians would have been pinched between the Hittites from the north and the Egyptians from the south. Panic-stricken, the Syrians fled into the night (7:7).

The Hittites of this period were the remnant of an empire that dominated northern Canaan between 1800 and 1200 B.C. Their ancestors had migrated from Asia Minor, where they were called Hittites from the name Hatti, another name for Anatolia, the capital of which was Hattushash. In northern Syria they populated cities such as Aleppo, Carchemish, and Hamath.

As the Hittites pushed south over the years, they came into conflict with the Egyptians, who tended to use Canaan as a buffer between their country and Mesopotamia. In 1286 B.C., a decisive battle was fought at Kedesh, on the Orontes River. The Hittites waited in hiding until the Egyptians had made camp, then released their chariots on the unsuspecting Egyptians. The northerners would have won the day had Egyptian reinforcements not arrived from the west, eventually forcing a retreat. Still, the Egyptians suffered heavy losses, and soon a treaty was signed designating the Orontes River as a border between the two powers.



Over the next few decades, relentless attacks by enemies from the west slowly brought the Hittite empire to a close. In Syria, seven city-states remained in a coalition. They were friendly with David and Solomon (2 Sam. 8:9, 10; 1 Kin. 10:28—11:1). But they came under the domination of the Assyrians and eventually passed into oblivion when their principal cities of Hamath and Carchemish fell (720 and 717 B.C., respectively; 2 Kin. 18:34; Is. 10:9).

The northern Hittites are not to be confused with another group called the Hittites, who lived in the Judean hills near Hebron. These Hittites were descended from Heth, the son of Canaan, and thus were a tribe of Canaanites. It was from a member of this group of Hittites that Abraham purchased the field of Machpelah as a burial ground for his family (Gen. 23:10–20). Years later, Abraham's grandson Esau married two Hittite women, much to the displeasure of his parents (26:34–35).

The Hittites of Canaan were among the people to be driven out of the land when Israel entered Canaan under Joshua (Ex. 3:8, 17; Deut. 7:1; Judg. 3:5). However, they were not completely done away with. Centuries later, several Hittites were among David's closest associates and most loyal soldiers (1 Sam. 26:6; 2 Sam. 11:6–11).

7:1 Public business was conducted at the city gate (Gen. 19:1; Ruth 4:1). Elisha's words were good news: Although costly, food would once again be available.

7:2 an officer: The Hebrew term for officer originally designated the third man in a chariot, who held a large shield. By this time it meant a high military official serving as adjutant (9:25; 10:25). The officer's doubt brought judgment on him. Although the food did come, this officer ate none of it.

7:3, 4 Because leprous men were excluded from the city (Lev. 13:4–6; Num. 5:2, 3) and avoided by all, they probably were ignored by the invaders and had been left to their fate. If the ordinary people of the city were suffering from hunger, how much more must these men have been suffering. They concluded that they had nothing to lose by going to the other side.

7:5, 6 the noise of a great army: Doubtless, the army was God's (6:16–18). By the kings of the Hittites is meant the descendants of the earlier Hittites of Asia Minor who now inhabited various Aramean states. Assyrian documents routinely mention Palestine as "Hittite Land."

7:7, 8 In their joy, the lepers took advantage of their good fortune.

7:9–11 Good news and good fortune had to be shared (Prov. 15:27; 21:17, 18), and the men feared that failure to do so might merit divine punishment.

7:12 what the Syrians have done: The Israelite king suspected that another military trick was being played on him. He did not connect the good news with Elisha's prophecy of good times.

7:13–16 At last the king sent a scouting party, which confirmed the good news. The prophecy concerning the restoration of food for the city was fulfilled (v. 1).

7:17–20 you shall not eat of it: All of Elisha's prophecy came true. The sudden miraculous flight of the Arameans had provided goods aplenty, but the doubting officer would not enjoy them.

8:1 As had happened in the days of Elijah (1 Kin. 17; 18), God again instituted a famine. Such cases of divinely induced calamities were intended to chastise His people and bring them to repentance (Joel 2:12–14; Zeph. 3:5–7). God in His kindness spared the family of the Shunammite woman to whom Elisha had had such a significant ministry (4:8–37). It appears that she may have become a widow by the time of this incident.

8:2 Her sojourn in Philistia contrasts with the move of Elimelech's family to Moab in Ruth 1. The Shunammite woman went at the command of God for a temporary residence abroad. The family of Elimelech moved out of the covenant land on their own decision, and set about to live abroad permanently. The marriage of the two sons of Elimelech to Moabite women indicates that their family was in the process of becoming a settled Moabite family. Only the deaths of father and sons led Naomi to such a desperate state that she was forced to return to Bethlehem (with Ruth) and into the center of the divine plan for her life.

8:3 to make an appeal: The Shunammite woman had not renounced or sold her property, but merely had left during the previous famine. Moreover, she had returned within seven years (Deut. 15:1–6; Ruth 4:3, 4). Since the property was still legally hers, she pressed her claim to the king himself.

8:4, 5 Just as the Shunammite woman arrived, Gehazi was telling Jehoram about her. At this point, Gehazi was still faithful to the ministry of Elisha.

8:6 Restore all: We get a complex picture of King Jehoram. At times he was so angry at Elisha that he wished him dead (6:31), yet even then he was in mourning for his people. He acknowledged Elisha's spiritual leadership at other times (6:21), but he knew that Elisha did not hold him in high regard (3:14). In this section, his righteous judgment should be contrasted with the wretched behavior of the wicked Ahab with respect to the land of another farmer (1 Kin. 21:1–16).

8:7 Although Ben-Hadad felt that Elisha's arrival was accidental, God's prophet had come to Damascus in fulfillment of the instructions originally given by God to Elijah (1 Kin. 19:15–17). The instructions concerning dynastic change in Israel would soon be carried out (9:1–13).

8:8, 9 Ironically, a sick king of Israel had inquired of a false god concerning the nature of his illness (1:2); here, the pagan king of a foreign nation inquired of the living God concerning the nature of his illness.

8:10 You shall certainly recover: Left to natural circumstances, Ben-Hadad would recover. Yet Elisha knew that Hazael would seize both the opportunity of the king's illness and fulfill Elisha's prophecy by assassinating the king and taking the throne. Hazael chose his own method of carrying out the issue of dynastic succession in Damascus, not God's (v. 15).

8:11, 12 ashamed: He had reached the end of his ability to resist his emotions. the man of God wept: Elisha wept over the suffering that Hazael would bring upon Israel.

8:13, 14 In the ancient Middle East, the dog was despised because it was a scavenger (1 Kin. 14:11; 21:23). Appropriately, Hazael would similarly be held in disdain. Shalmaneser III of Assyria notes Hazael's accession to the throne with the words: "Hazael, son of nobody, seizes the throne." By these contemptuous words, we learn that Hazael was not the son of Ben-Hadad, but an opportunistic usurper.

8:15 Having succeeded Ben-Hadad as king, Hazael reigned for about 40 years (842–802 B.C.). He remained an inveterate foe of God's people (10:32, 33; 13:3, 22). Yet like Elisha and Jehu, Hazael was an instrument of God's judgment on His sinful people (1 Kin. 19:15–17).

8:16–18 Jehoram: With Jehoram's accession to the throne of Judah, kings by the same name now ruled in both kingdoms. The name Jehoram means "The Lord Is Exalted" and can be spelled Joram. eight years: Joram of the northern kingdom ruled from 852–841 B.C.; Jehoram of the southern kingdom from 848–841 B.C. Although he had served alongside his father Jehoshaphat for the previous four years, Jehoram now ruled in his own right. With his father's death, he killed all his brothers and any claimant to the throne (2 Chr. 21:2–4), actions that would be repeated by his wicked wife Athaliah at the time of his death (11:1). A wicked ruler (2 Chr. 21:11), he was greatly influenced by Queen Athaliah (2 Chr. 21:6). Wickedness and spiritual bankruptcy in the royal house would bring about God's judgment on Judah in three separate military engagements with Edom, Libnah, and a combined Philistine-Arabian incursion (2 Chr. 21:16, 17), as well as a severe plague that would eventually take the life of the king (2 Chr. 21:12–15, 18, 19).

8:18 the daughter of Ahab: Most shocking was that the same source of evil that had brought God's judgment against the northern kingdom was now being brought into the southern kingdom. Ahab had been a wicked king, but his wickedness had been greatly accelerated by the actions and attitudes of his pagan wife Jezebel (1 Kin. 16:31). Now their daughter Athaliah (11:1) was established as the queen of Judah and the wife of a descendant of David. From the vantage point of international relations, the marriage of a daughter of the king of Israel to the king of Judah was a strategic event that could ease hostility between the two nations. But from a spiritual standpoint, this marriage was a grim omen of disaster for Judah.

8:19 Despite Jehoram's infidelity and wickedness, God remained faithful to the Davidic covenant (2 Sam. 7:12–16; Ps. 89:30–37). a lamp: This was a figure of the hope of the Davidic promise in the darkest of times, and the fulfillment in Him who is the light of the world (1 Kin. 15:4; John 1:1–13).

8:20–24 Judah's struggles with Edom were often accompanied by trouble with the Philistines (2 Chr. 21:16; Joel 3:4–8). Edom would remain a constant menace with the result that although Amaziah would later defeat Edom (14:22), they would renew armed hostilities against Judah in the days of Ahaz (2 Chr. 28:17, 18). Edom's constant enmity against God's people served as a focus of attention for Israel's prophets, who often predicted Edom's ultimate defeat and destruction (Is. 34:5–15; Jer. 49:7–22).

8:25 Ahaziah means "The Lord Has Grasped."

8:26 twenty-two years old: This figure is correct; compare 2 Chr. 22:2. granddaughter of Omri: The Hebrew word translated granddaughter is literally "daughter." Athaliah, Ahab's daughter, is the person meant (v. 18; 2 Chr. 21:6).

8:27 the way of the house of Ahab: The lowest point of Israel's religious apostasy was reached in the reign of Ahab and his wicked wife Jezebel (1 Kin. 16:31). Most likely due to the role of Athaliah, the evil that had spoiled Ahab affected the house of the king of Judah.

8:28 Here began the troubles with Hazael (v. 12). Ahaziah's grandfather Jehoshaphat had been drawn into war at Ramoth Gilead by Ahab (1 Kin. 22), and now Ahaziah was led by Joram to war in the same area. Ramoth Gilead means "Heights of Gilead." It was about 25 miles east of the Jordan. Hazael had recently been crowned in Damascus, and the year 841 B.C. would witness a change in the royal houses of both Israel and Judah.

8:29 Ahab had one of his palaces at Jezreel, a site between Megiddo and Beth Shan (1 Kin. 18:45). Both the injured Joram and Ahaziah came to Jezreel for a most fateful meeting (ch. 9).

9:1–3 The selection of Jehu as the next king of Israel was by prophetic designation; contrast 1:17. The name Jehu means “The Lord Is He.” The instructions given by Elisha to one of his associates were marked by secrecy and intrigue. The action of the prophet was seditious in the eyes of the current king.

9:4, 5 for you: The servant was obedient to Elisha and was daring in his approach to Jehu.

9:6 poured the oil: As in the case of Hazael (8:7–13), the third part of the Lord’s threefold command to Elijah (1 Kin. 19:15–18) was carried out by another. First, Elijah personally fulfilled the divine directive concerning Elisha (1 Kin. 19:19–21). Then he set in motion the process that would effect the other two commands. Elisha carried out the order with respect to Hazael. Third, one of the sons of the prophets serving under Elisha handled the case of Jehu. In the OT, an anointing was customarily reserved for a king (2 Sam. 2:4) or the high priest (Ex. 40:13).

9:7–10 The prophetic words to Jehu indicate that he would destroy the evil of the house of Ahab. Jezebel: The wicked wife of Ahab is given special attention; her gruesome end is predicted. fled: Once the young prophet gave the Lord’s stern message to Jehu, he fled, just as Elisha had commanded him (v. 3). His life was in danger; at this time only he knew what had transpired with Jehu.

9:11 madman: The derogatory attitude of Jehu’s soldiers toward one of God’ prophets has often been repeated by unbelievers with regard to God’s servants (Jer. 29:24–28; Acts 17:16–18). This verse has frequently been cited as evidence that Israel’s prophets were ecstatics whose excesses mirrored those of heathen diviners. However, it seems best to regard their words as reflective of their contempt for the servants of the Lord.

9:12 A lie: Jehu’s attempt to brush off the questions of his servants was not successful. He finally reported to them the fact of his prophetic sanction and divine anointing.

9:13 Placing a garment under a person is a mark of homage fit for a king (Matt. 21:8). The actions taken here are like those performed at the anointing of King Solomon (1 Kin. 1:34).

9:14, 15 Jehu lost no time in planning the assassination of the king. These verses also remind the reader of the situation at Jezreel (8:28, 29).

9:16–18 The question about peace was a standard step in ancient negotiations. Jehu’s reply indicates that he refused to negotiate.

9:19, 20 The phrase the son of Nimshi actually refers to the grandson of Nimshi. This way of abbreviating genealogies was common in the ancient world (8:26; 10:1).

9:21 Make ready: The two kings rather foolishly prepared to meet Jehu in their chariots. They might have done better to have remained in the city. Joram was still recovering from wounds from his battle with the Arameans (v. 15). the property of Naboth: Ahab's dynasty ended on the very stolen property that occasioned the divine sentence of judgment (1 Kin. 21:17–24). Ahab's unlawful seizure of the land of Naboth was regarded as one of his most heinous crimes.

(Heb. kesheph) (2 Kin. 9:22; Is. 47:12) Strong’s #3785: This Hebrew word usually appears along with other words that denote various forms of magic or divination (2 Chr. 33:6; Jer. 27:9; Mic. 5:12). The word used here seems to have the basic sense of “witchcraft” or “sorcery.” Sorcerers interpreted dreams, prophesied, and performed miracles (Ex. 7:11; Jer. 27:9; Dan. 2:2). They had access to the royal courts of Egypt, Israel, and Babylon (9:22; Ex. 7:11; Dan. 2:2). Sorcery was forbidden in the Law, with capital punishment prescribed for a sorceress (Ex. 22:18; Deut. 18:10, 11). Many of the OT prophets directly linked divine judgment with sorcery, even expressly citing it as the cause (Is. 47:9; Nah. 3:4; Mal. 3:5). The Lord did not want His people to look to such deceptive sorcerers for direction. Instead He promised to raise up a prophet like Moses, which He did: His Son, Jesus (Deut. 18:10–15; Acts 3:22, 23).

9:22 Is it peace … What peace: To his credit, the battle-weakened king came out and faced his possible opponent. Surely Joram knew something was up. He may have feared a military attack from his hotheaded captain. Perhaps the king met Jehu with the thought of making him realize that his plans would be acts of sedition against the legally constituted king. harlotries … of Jezebel: Jezebel’s spiritual adultery had brought heinous demonic practices into the kingdom and sealed its doom (1 Kin. 21:25, 26). As God had threatened, such activities would surely bring about the nation’s demise (Deut. 28:25, 26). Jehu justified his actions as a judgment on Jezebel’s sins.

9:23, 24 The frightened Joram shouted to Ahaziah, Treachery. But it was he and Ahaziah who were the true traitors. And they would be executed by Jehu, a man who served as the “terrible swift sword” of the Lord. between his arms: That is, in the middle of his back, as he was driving his chariot away.

9:25, 26 remember: Jehu rehearsed to Bidkar the gist of the curse against Ahab’s house (1 Kin. 21:21–24). In this way, Jehu cited this curse for justification of his actions. He proclaimed himself God’s avenger.

9:27–29 The wounded Ahaziah apparently made it to Samaria where he at last was apprehended by Jehu’s men (2 Chr. 22:8, 9) and taken to Megiddo where he died. His body finally was buried in the royal tombs in Jerusalem (v. 28).

9:30, 31 Jezebel knew that her end was near; she had heard about the deaths of the kings of Israel and Judah. Yet she brazenly spent time putting on her makeup and adorning herself. Defiant to the end, Jezebel called Jehu a Zimri, a traitor who had killed his master in order to seize the throne (1 Kin. 16:11, 12).

9:32, 33 Jehu had a couple of Jezebel's servants throw her out the window. Her death was particularly gruesome. Eunuchs (Heb. saris) refers to males who have been castrated. Typically they were assigned to the harems of kings in the ancient Middle East. The word can also refer to officers in general.

9:34–37 bury her: After Jehu had Jezebel killed, he entered the palace to eat and drink. But then, because of Jezebel's rank, he ordered that her body be given a proper burial. However, she had become food for dogs. This was the grisly fulfillment of Elijah's prophecy (1 Kin. 21:23). Although Jezebel wanted Elijah dead (1 Kin. 19:1, 2), her own life was taken. as refuse: There was to be no marker, no mourning, no memorial, no sadness for this evil woman.

A Missed Opportunity

While Jehu (10:1) is remembered as one of the great kings of the northern kingdom, he did not entirely follow God's ways. His bloody rise to power fulfilled Elijah's prophecy to Ahab twenty years earlier (1 Kin. 19:16, 17). His killing of Ahab's seventy sons and of his wife Jezebel placed him firmly on Israel's throne.

The northern kingdom from its beginning had been syncretistic in religion (1 Kin. 12). Jeroboam I had combined the worship of the living God with the worship of Baal and other Canaanite deities. Under Ahab, the religion of Israel reached its lowest point, practicing official, state-sponsored Baal worship (1 Kin. 16:31). Jehu's merciless purge of the official Baal priesthood was a major step in eradicating evil from the northern kingdom. However, the purge only brought Israel back to the syncretism established by Jeroboam I and his successors.

God rewarded Jehu with a reign of twenty-eight years, the longest of any northern king so far, and allowed his sons to rule Israel for four more generations, the longest dynasty in Israel's history. Jehu had an opportunity to be one of the greatest kings, but he did not follow God's Law completely or lead God's people completely back to it. He did not stop the worship of the golden calves left at Dan and Bethel. While not as overt as during the time of Ahab, the slide to Baal worship in Israel continued even after Jehu's purge of the worshipers of Baal.

10:1 Ahab's seventy sons included children and probably grandchildren. Jehu wanted to eliminate all rivals to his kingship. The rulers of Jezreel were Samaritan officials, who often visited the royal residence in Jezreel. Such an understanding eliminates the necessity of emending the word Jezreel to Israel, as is often suggested. It is these officials, together with the elders (state officials closely related to the tribes) and those charged with educating and raising the royal children, who replied to Jehu (v. 5).

10:2–5 Jehu's first letter was written in order to determine who might be the greatest risk to his reign. two kings: The deaths of Joram (9:14–26) and Ahaziah (9:27, 28) were fresh in the rulers' minds, so the response of the leaders was a fearful submission to Jehu's power.

10:6–9 killed all these: Jehu pretended that his message was misunderstood and that in any case it was Ahab's wickedness that ultimately had brought about the divine judgment of these men.

10:10 Evaluating Jehu is difficult. His praise for the ministry of the prophets of God and his stated respect for the word of God commend him to us. But he did not balance his judgmental actions on Ahab's family with mercy and justice for the poor and the oppressed. He was God's instrument of judgment, but he himself also stood under God's judgment (10:31).

10:11 Jehu … left him none remaining: In killing the house of Ahab, his supporters, as well as the surviving descendants of Ahaziah (vv. 13, 14), Jehu exceeded God's judgment. But he used the power God had given him for his selfish ends. Accordingly, no contradiction exists between the divine commissioning of Jehu (9:6–10) and the divine condemnation of him (10:31; Hos. 1:4).

10:12–14 Beth Eked means "Binding House," a site near Mount Gilboa. Here Jehu slaughtered forty-two men of the house of Ahaziah.

10:15, 16 Jehonadab means "The Lord Is Noble." He came along with Jehu as an observer. son of Rechab: Jehonadab was an ascetic, nomadic Rechabite. These people were known for their faithfulness to God and to the austere regulations laid down by Jehonadab (Jer. 35:1–16).

10:17 according to the word of the LORD: Jehu's action was by prophetic sanction (v. 10).

10:18–28 The last works of "Jehu the Eradicator" were to mount a frontal attack on overt Baal worship. The northern kingdom from its inception had been syncretistic in its religion (1 Kin. 12). Jeroboam I had combined the worship of Yahweh with many elements of Baal worship and other Canaanite deities, and this continued until the advent of Ahab, when the religion of Israel reached its nadir with official, state-sponsored Baal worship (1 Kin. 16:31). Jehu's purge of the official Baal priests, described in this section, was a major step in eradicating the evil of the northern kingdom. However, the purge only took things back to the level established by Jeroboam I and his successors (v. 31). Thus, while not as overt as under the time of Ahab, the slide to Baal worship in Israel continued even after Jehu's purge.

10:18–20 Finally, Jehu attacked overt Baal worship. With a lie, Jehu gathered all the principals of Baal worship to one place, the temple of Baal in Samaria (v. 21; 1 Kin. 16:32). He pretended that he was an even more ardent champion of Baal than Ahab. He issued a royal decree for a national solemn assembly for Baal.

10:21–23 temple of Baal: The temple that had been constructed by Ahab (1 Kin. 16:32). vestments: By having the Baal worshipers wear distinctive clothing, Jehu marked them for death. no servants of the LORD: Jehu carefully distinguished the enemy, in case some of the Lord's true priests might have gathered with the priests of Baal.

10:25–28 as soon as he: It is not clear whether a Baal priest or Jehu himself was making the offering. If it was Jehu, it would have been the most effective way of keeping the priests from suspecting any danger. kill them: Jehu followed Elijah's example on Mount Carmel (1 Kin. 18:40). Yet Jehu's executions were more thorough, for he had gathered all the priests and prophets of Baal in the nation. to this day: That is, at the time of writing. The suggestion is that even after the fall of Samaria one could see the foul place where the temple to Baal once had been. destroyed Baal: This summary statement refers only to the overt forms of Baal worship.

10:29 Jehu's destruction of Baal worship (vv. 18–28) was a political act. His continuing the state worship policies established by Jeroboam I clearly shows his disregard for true spiritual revival in Israel.

10:30, 31 done well: The evaluation of Jehu is one of limited obedience (v. 31). Nonetheless, he accomplished a great deal and received God's commendation for his work. Most likely, a prophet communicated God's message to Jehu.

10:32, 33 Because Shalmaneser III was occupied with political pressures in the east, Hazael took advantage of the situation, harassing

Israel throughout his long reign. After Jehu's death, Hazael marched freely into Israel and even into Judah (12:17, 18; 13:22). The important point of these verses is that the attacks of Hazael were part of God's judgment on Israel.

10:34–36 The record of Jehoahaz is given in 13:1–9. He was followed by Joash (also called Jehoash; 13:10–13), Jeroboam II (14:23–29), and very briefly by Zechariah (15:8–12). The assassination of Zechariah by Shallum after a reign of only six months ended the line of Jehu in the fourth generation, just as the Lord had said (10:30).

11:1 Athaliah means “The Lord Is Exalted.” Sadly, she did not live up to her name. all the royal heirs: Jehu had executed King Ahaziah of Judah, Athaliah’s son, shortly after he had executed Joram of Israel (9:27–29). Ahaziah’s older brother had been killed in an Arabian raid (2 Chr. 22:1). Further, Jehoram had killed his brothers and other royal relatives when he took the throne (2 Chr. 21:4), while Jehu had slain still more of the royal house (10:14). Therefore, Athaliah’s destruction of all of the royal heirs must have concentrated on her own grandchildren. None of the usual details relative to accession to the crown in Judah are given here; Athaliah clearly usurped the office, setting aside the precepts of the Davidic covenant (2 Sam. 7:12–16; Ps. 89:35–37).

11:2, 3 Josephus says that Jehosheba was Ahaziah’s half sister (Antiq. 9.7.1). As the wife of the high priest Jehoiada, her marriage and her relation to the royal house made it possible for her to rescue and hide the young Joash. Joash (or Jehoash; 12:1) was the son of Ahaziah. He apparently was an infant at this time. Athaliah might not have known of his existence and for this reason have failed to kill him in her purges. Yet Joash was to inherit the promises of the Davidic covenant. His righteous reign (12:2) may be attributed in part to his early years spent in the house of the LORD and to the godly instruction and protection of his aunt Jehosheba and his uncle, the high priest Jehoiada. Meanwhile, the unthinkable was happening: The daughter of Jezebel was now the queen of Judah. A worshiper of Baal was in power in the nation of Godpromise. She built in Jerusalem a temple to Baal (v. 18).

11:4–8 The seventh year, that is, of the reign of Athaliah and the life of Joash (v. 21). Jehoiada: The name of the high priest means “The Lord Knows.” Other details about Jehoiada’s careful preparations are given in 2 Chr. 23:1–11. Jehoiada’s plan included the royal guard: the presentation and crowning of the legitimate royal heir coincided with the changing of the guard on the Sabbath.

11:4 bodyguards: The men of the royal guard are identified as the Cherethites and Pelethites in 2 Sam. 20:23; 1 Kin. 1:38. showed them the king’s son: The revelation of this young prince was the critical moment. A zealous guard might easily have put him to death at once. There must have been a great deal of preparation on Jehoiada’s part—and considerable prayer—for this moment.

11:5–9 The fact that the men of the royal guard followed the commands of Jehoiada the priest was remarkable. It must have been because they were utterly disgusted by the wickedness of Athaliah.

11:10, 11 spears and shields: David had dedicated these weapons to the temple after his campaigns against Hadadezer (2 Sam. 8:11). Since they were not gold or silver, they had apparently been ignored by Shishak when he looted the temple and palace in the days of Rehoboam (1 Kin. 14:26).

11:12 Deuteronomy prescribed the duties of the king with regard to the preservation of God's Law (Deut. 17:18). By putting a copy of the Law in Joash's hand and the crown on his head, Jehoiada presented him as the rightful heir to the throne. The term Testimony recalls the covenant, emphasizing that Joash's coronation was given both its scriptural warrant and its rightful connection to the Davidic covenant.

11:13–16 The execution of Athaliah is described in this section. in the temple of the LORD: The temple was the appropriate place to crown the king of God's appointment. It was also probably a good place to hide from a queen whose god was Baal. there was the king: What a shock this must have been to Athaliah. There stood a little boy that guaranteed the end of her reign. Her words Treason! Treason! were technically correct. But it was she who had committed treason by murdering all the survivors of the Davidic house—except for the one who was now king. killed: The priest would not allow her execution in the temple, but her death was necessary. With her dead, the young Joash was safe.

11:17 Covenant renewal was particularly necessary after the unholy usurpation by the wicked Athaliah.

11:18 As Jezebel had seen her wicked husband Ahab build a temple to Baal in Samaria (1 Kin. 16:32), so her daughter Athaliah was behind the building of a temple to Baal in the holy city of Jerusalem. Mattan the priest of Baal: The very fact that there was a priest of Baal in Jerusalem is astonishing. If Athaliah and her associates had not been stopped, the sins of Samaria would have paled beside the sins of Jerusalem.

11:19–21 The young child was established as king before the nation. rejoiced … quiet: The joy of the people and the peacefulness of the land were marks of God's blessing to the restored Davidic dynasty.

12:1 Jehoash (spelled “Joash” in 11:2) means “Yahweh Is Strong.”

12:2 All the days in which Jehoiada the priest instructed him has an ominous tone. After Jehoiada’s death, the king’s activities would take a different turn, for Jehoash would become dependent upon counsel of a different sort (2 Chr. 24:17–19). Nonetheless, among the kings of Judah, he was one of the few who showed some signs of righteousness.

Called to Give an Account

Jehoash's dealings with the priests concerning temple repairs is a useful lesson in accountability: • Jehoash delegated specific responsibilities to the priests with clear instructions concerning the collection and use of money (2 Kin. 12:4, 5).

• He personally confronted the priests, including their leader, Jehoiada, for their non-performance (12:7).

• He suggested a course of remedial action (12:7, 8) and then saw to it that an alternative solution to the problem would be carried out (12:9–12).

Accountability involves far more than simply telling someone what to do and then coming back later to see if instructions have been carried out. It means that a leader commits to overseeing the worker's performance and making sure that the project is completed.

12:3 Although God Himself might be worshiped in such high places, the setting provided an association with Canaanite religious rites that could too easily lead to spiritual compromise (1 Kin. 3:2–4; 14:23). Apostasy would become a besetting sin later in Jehoash's reign (2 Chr. 24:17–19, 24).

12:4–16 One of Jehoash's significant accomplishments was an ambitious plan to raise funds to repair the temple. This section describes this accomplishment in elaborate detail. A big impetus for this beneficent work was Jehoiada the high priest.

12:5 Money collected from special taxes and voluntary offerings was designated for repairing the temple. Thus, renewed concern for spiritual things was evidenced after the neglect and abuse of the previous seven years (2 Chr. 24:7).

12:6–9 a chest: When the priest failed to do the work (vv. 6, 7), the king took a personal hand in seeing to its accomplishment. The chest he prepared was set against the wall at the entrance facing the right side of the altar. Because the people responded generously (2 Chr. 24:10), the work proceeded and was soon completed (vv. 11, 12; 2 Chr. 24:11–13).

12:10–13 At first no funds were used for fashioning the sacred vessels, but there was money left over at the completion of the building repairs, and with it the sacred vessels could be completed as well (2 Chr. 24:14).

(Heb. keseph) (2 Kin. 12:13; Gen. 24:35; Job 22:25; Mal. 3:3) Strong’s #3701: This word is related to a verb meaning “to become white or pale,” thus silver is called “the pale metal.” Since silver was the common medium of exchange in ancient times, the word is often translated money in the OT (1 Kin. 21:6; Is. 55:1). There is no reference to silver coins in the OT because silver was valued by weight in ancient times (Is. 46:6; Jer. 32:9, 10). Silver was one of the valuable materials collected to build the tabernacle and the temple (Ex. 25:1–9; 2 Chr. 2:7). As a precious metal, its value depended upon the economy; during Solomon’s reign it was not as valuable, but during Ben-Hadad’s siege of Samaria it became more precious (6:25; 1 Kin. 10:21, 27; 2 Chr. 1:15; 9:20, 27). In Ecclesiastes, Solomon gives us a warning about silver: “He who loves silver will not be satisfied” (Eccl. 5:10).

12:14, 15 dealt faithfully: Joash had commissioned such trustworthy men that no accounting of their use of the funds was necessary.

12:17, 18 The Aramean invasion recorded here took place late in Joash’s reign. The king fell into apostasy after the death of his godly counselor, the high priest Jehoiada (2 Chr. 24:17–19, 23, 24), and this invasion came as a judgment of his wickedness.

12:19–21 Joash was severely wounded in Hazael’s invasion (2 Chr. 24:24, 25), then he fell victim shortly afterward to the dissent and unpopularity that culminated in his assassination. Because of Joash’s apostasy and murder of Zechariah, Jehoiada’s son (2 Chr. 24:17–22), the king was not laid to rest in the royal tombs (2 Chr. 24:25).

13:1 The name Jehoahaz means “The Lord Has Grasped.” Two centuries later another Jehoahaz would become king of Judah following the death of his father, the godly Josiah (23:31). The 17–year reign of Jehu’s son Jehoahaz lasted from 814 to 798 B.C.

13:2, 3 evil … sins of Jeroboam: After the end of the house of Ahab in Jehu’s purge (chs. 9; 10), the kings of Israel reverted to the level of syncretism that had been established by Jeroboam I. The mention of Hazael’s son BenHadad III (802–780 B.C.) may refer to his serving as a commander in his father’s army or to his growing prominence in his father’s later years (v. 24).

(Heb. aph) (2 Kin. 13:3; Deut. 6:15; Ps. 18:8; Prov. 11:22; 29:8) Strong’s #639: Depending on the context, this word signifies either “nose,” “nostril,” or “anger” (Gen. 2:7; Prov. 15:1). This term occurs about half of the time with words referring to burning. Thus these figures of speech typically depict anger as the fierce breathing of a person through his nose: “a burning nose” (Ex. 32:10–12). Most of the references describe God’s anger. God is said to be slow to anger, but can be provoked into exercising judgment (Ps. 103:8; Deut. 4:24, 25). He is compassionate, but His wrath is reserved for those who break His covenant (Deut. 13:17; 29:25–27; Josh. 23:16; Judg. 2:20; Ps. 78:38). Although God’s wrath is righteous, human anger is almost always evaluated in negative terms in the OT (Gen. 49:6; Prov. 14:17).

13:4 Although Jehoahaz did not follow the Lord exclusively (v. 6), God graciously heard his genuine plea for help. In His long-suffering mercy, God often deals patiently with people and blesses them despite their failures (1 Kin. 21:25–29; 2 Pet. 3:9).

13:5 Israel’s deliverer (Heb. moshia, also rendered “savior”) has been variously identified. Probably it was the Assyrian king Adad-Nerari III. Referring to an Assyrian king as a divinely commissioned deliverer of Israel is similar to the words of God in Isaiah describing the Persian King Cyrus as “His anointed” (Is. 45:1; compare Is. 44:28).

13:6–9 the wooden image: The Hebrew word for wooden images is a reference to the Canaanite goddess Asherah. The image itself was a sacred tree or pole that was perceived perhaps as some sexually-oriented symbol of the fertility religion of Canaan.

13:10 the thirty-seventh year of Joash: This notice seems to be at variance with 13:1 (the seventeen years of the reign on Jehoahaz began in the twenty-third year of Joash). The apparent discrepancy is resolved by noting that the author here has shifted to using the accession year scheme in the northern kingdom. Under this system, a new king’s first year was assigned in accordance with the beginning of the new year in the fall after his enthronement. With due allowance made for the differences between the systems of reckoning in the northern and southern kingdoms, the year 798 B.C. marks the date when Jehoash became king in Israel. Some manuscripts, however, read “thirty-ninth year” here, suggesting a correction to a scribal slip in the traditional Masoretic text. Some scholars also suggest a two year co-regency between Jehoahaz and Jehoash.

13:11–13 At first, the 16–year reign of Jehoash of Israel appears to be recorded without further elaboration (vv. 10–13). But three stories are added: the death of Elisha during his reign (vv. 14–21), his military victories over the Aramean forces (vv. 24, 25), and his war with Amaziah of Judah (v. 12; 14:8–14).

13:14 O my father: Jehoash’s cry over the aged Elisha repeats the words of Elisha spoken when Elijah was taken up to heaven (2:12). Thus, both at the beginning of his ministry and at its conclusion, Elisha is unmistakably linked to his mentor Elijah. The grief of Jehoash at the impending death of Elisha shows that, like his father Jehoahaz (vv. 4, 5), this Israelite king possessed some genuine spirituality. The line of Jehu had its good moments and received some reward from the Lord (10:30). However, none of this line or any other of the kings of Israel served God with all their heart (10:31).

13:15–19 This section describes a symbolic act that Elisha had Joash perform to ensure victories over his enemies; the king was only partly successful in completing the task. Elisha’s symbolic act of putting his hands on the king’s hands should have alerted the king that the aged prophet was conveying a divine blessing on him. Jehoash’s halfhearted compliance with Elisha’s instructions exposed his weak faith and illustrated God’s unfavorable evaluation of his character (v. 11). God’s dying prophet was rightly disturbed. Although god would allow Israel to defeat the Aramean army three times, their victory would be incomplete.

13:20 Elisha died: The supernatural translation of Elijah (ch. 2) was an unusual example of God’s power; Elisha died a normal death. bands from Moab: This prepares for the miracle in the grave of Elisha (v. 21), but the mention of invasions such as this reminds us of how perilous life was during so much of Israel’s history.

13:21, 22 the man … revived: Even in death the mere presence of Elisha’s body was sufficient for a miracle. There was no magic in Elisha’s bones, but a demonstration of the power of God associated with His servant. This miracle should have reassured Jehoash that God intended to rescue Israel from the deadly grip of Aramean domination (v. 25).

13:23 This verse is one of those dazzling lights that burst from the pages of the Bible, describing the wonderful mercy of the living God (14:26, 27). It draws in part on the imagery of Ex. 34:6. His covenant: God's faithfulness to His own promise is a regular theme of the OT (Ex. 2:23–25).

13:24 This Ben-Hadad is the son of Hazael (v. 3). After his father's death, he reigned as Ben-Hadad III (802–780 B.C.).

13:25 In accordance with Jehoash's striking the ground three times with arrows (v. 18), God gave Jehoash victory over the Arameans only three times. Yet God graciously overruled Jehoash's inadequate faith by granting Israel full victory over the Arameans during the reign of his son Jeroboam II.

14:1–3 The name Amaziah means “The Lord Is Mighty.” did what was right: Amaziah was one of the few godly kings in the kingdom of Judah; the best kings were Hezekiah (18:1) and Josiah (22:1). his father David … his father Joash: Here is a good example of different uses of the Hebrew word for father. It can signify either remote or immediate ancestry.

(Heb. bamah) (2 Kin. 14:4; 23:5; 1 Kin. 11:7; Jer. 19:5) Strong’s #1116: This word often refers to a sacred area, an open-air sanctuary, located on top of a ridge. Before the temple was built, the Israelites could worship the true God at high places (see Solomon’s worship of God at the high place at Gideon, 1 Kin. 3:2–4). But the Israelites soon began worshiping other gods, especially Baal, at these high places, copying the practices of the surrounding nations. The Israelites decorated these hilltops with pagan symbols, sacred pillars and stones, and these places were rallying points for pagan worship. They often were associated with Israel’s religious rebellion and apostasy (1 Kin. 14:23; Jer. 19:5). Thus throughout the OT, the existence of high places and the worship that was practiced there was labeled as an affront to God (Ps. 78:58).

14:4 Like his father Jehoash before him (12:3), Amaziah allowed worship at the high places. This practice would blossom into open idolatry in the reigns of subsequent kings (16:4; 21:3).

14:5, 6 executed his servants: The principals are named in 12:20, 21. These men were guilty of assassinating his father and might have been a threat to his own reign. Book of the Law of Moses: Amaziah followed the Law laid down in Deut. 24:16.

14:7 A more detailed account of Amaziah’s defeat of the Edomites is given in 2 Chr. 25:5–13. Edom had regained its independence during the reign of Jehoram (8:20–22). Amaziah’s conquest of the formidable city of Sela atop the seemingly unapproachable cliffs of the Wadi Musa was a monumental accomplishment. Rather than recognize God’s hand in this feat, Amaziah became proud and fell into spiritual compromise (2 Chr. 25:14–16).

14:8 let us face one another: Amaziah’s pride over his accomplishment (v. 10) and his anger over the looting of Judean cities by Israelite mercenaries dismissed before the Edomite campaign (2 Chr. 25:6–10, 13) clouded his thinking.

14:9, 10 Jehoash replied to Amaziah in the form of a fable—a kind of story designed to teach a moral. By speaking of Amaziah as a thistle in comparison with the cedar of Lebanon, Jehoash tried to help Amaziah put a more realistic construction on his recent victory.

14:11 Beth Shemesh: The name of the city means “House of the Sun,” indicating that there had once been a temple to the sun god there in Canaanite times. Beth Shemesh was in the Valley of Sorek, about 15 miles west of Jerusalem. This was the town where the holy ark was taken (1 Sam. 6:10—7:2) when it came back into Israelite hands after its “wanderings” among the Philistines. The tragedy of the battle between Amaziah and Jehoash was heightened by the fact that the proud Amaziah forced a battle in his own territory, Judah.

14:12 Judah was defeated: Jehoash’s forces were seasoned warriors and had defeated the Arameans (13:25). Amaziah’s pride spelled not only his own downfall (v. 13) but that of his capital city (14:13, 14). fled to his tent: This is an idiom for a complete rout (2 Sam. 18:17).

14:13 The damage to Jerusalem’s northern walls extended from the Corner Gate, at the northwest corner of the city wall, east to the Gate of Ephraim. The northwest corner of Jerusalem had always been the city’s most vulnerable point (18:17). A breach in the wall of four hundred cubits (600 feet) was a huge gap for the invading army to enter the holy city through.

The Grief of Separation

The division in the kingdom that occurred in the days of Rehoboam (1 Kin. 12:19) left lasting scars and occasionally led to civil war between the northern and southern monarchies (2 Kin. 14:11–14). For many Israelites, particularly in the north, this separation from Jerusalem was grievous. Some believe that Pss. 42 and 43 were composed by a Judean in the north who was cut off from the temple at Jerusalem.

14:14–16 gold and silver … articles: The looting of precious objects from the temple, as well as from the palace—the king's house—shows the humiliation that Judah suffered as the result of this disastrous war fueled by Amaziah's pride. hostages: People as well as goods were carried off by the king of Israel. returned: It had not been the intention of Jehoash to occupy foreign territory.

14:17, 18 The notice of fifteen years of life for Amaziah suggests he was released after the death of Jehoash for an additional period (782–767 B.C.). If so, he reigned alongside his son Azariah (or Uzziah), whose 52–year reign began in 792 B.C. (15:2).

14:19, 20 Amaziah not only reproduced his father's spiritual problems (14:3), he also died as his father had, at the hand of an assassin (12:20, 21). Lachish: This was one of the guard cities for Jerusalem, about 30 miles southwest of the capital. Lachish was seized by Sennacherib in 701 B.C., in the days of Hezekiah (18:13–17).

14:21 Young Azariah succeeded Amaziah (15:1–7). This king is also known as Uzziah.

14:22 Elath is the famous seaport on the Gulf of Aqaba. During the reign of Ahaz, Elath was captured by Rezin of Aram and became an Edomite holding (16:6).

14:23 Jeroboam: This is the second king of Israel to have this name. Jeroboam I was the founder of the northern kingdom at the time of the death of Solomon (930 B.C.; 1 Kin. 11; 12). forty-one years: Jeroboam II had a very long reign. His 41 years included ten years as coregent with his father Jehoash (792–782 B.C.).

14:24 did evil: The assessment of his reign is like that of all the kings of Israel, except for the graver assessment given to the house of Ahab (10:29–31).

14:25 restored the territory: The first half of the eighth century B.C. was a period of prosperity and strength for the northern and southern kingdoms. Jeroboam II extended Israel's influence from the entrance of Hamath down the eastern side of the Jordan to the southern end of the Dead Sea. Since Azariah also campaigned in the southern territory, the two kingdoms must have been living in harmony and enjoying mutual cooperation. Jonah: Once again a prophet of God gave direction to a king. The reference to Jonah here provides the historical setting for the famous prophet.

14:26, 27 no helper: The living God saw that His people needed His help, and He became the helper of His people. God used Jeroboam II to bring Israel to a new period of greatness.

Aerial view of the mound of ancient Hamath, a city controlled by Solomon and later conquered by Jeroboam II of Israel (2 Kin. 14:28).

14:28 The Scriptures emphasize Jeroboam's military prowess. Yet Jeroboam's might may have also been economic. The well-known Samarian Ostraca, which may date from this period, record the delivery to Samaria of fine oil and barley produced on the royal estates.

14:29 The brief reign of Zechariah is noted in 15:8–12. He was the fourth in the line of Jehu to reign in Israel, in fulfillment of God's gracious promise to Jehu (10:30).

Azariah

While the account in 2 Kings summarily dismisses Azariah (15:1), the record in Second Chronicles presents a good deal of information about his considerable accomplishments. Known as Uzziah in Chronicles, Azariah is remembered for his domestic policies, his innovative measures for military preparedness (2 Chr. 26:9, 11–15), his attention to political and economic concerns relative to his southern and eastern borders (2 Chr. 26:2, 7, 8, 10–16; Joel 3:19; Amos 1:11, 12), and the settling of the perennial Philistine problem on his western frontier (2 Chr. 26:6, 7; Joel 3:3, 4; Amos 1:6–8). Like Jeroboam II in the north, Azariah led Judah in a time of national recovery and growth. The southern kingdom during his fifty-two year reign achieved a power and prosperity that had been unknown since the days of Solomon.

Although he pleased God during the early days of his reign, Azariah became proud due to his success. Like so many of the other kings of the northern and southern kingdoms, he did not remove many of the symbols of idolatry in the land. However, his ultimate mistake was going into the temple to burn incense on the altar. Only a divinely-appointed priest could perform this function. For this arrogance, God immediately struck Azariah with leprosy for the remainder of his days.

In the blink of an eye, a great and powerful king was transformed into a social outcast. The Lord gave Azariah a hard lesson in humility. No one is so great that he does not have to answer to God.

15:1, 2 Azariah (or Uzziah, 2 Chr. 26:1; Is. 1:1) is credited with 52 years of reign. This figure includes 10 years during which his father Amaziah was held captive (792–782 B.C.), 15 years of coregency with Amaziah upon his release from captivity (782–767 B.C.), and 27 years of sole reign (767–740 B.C.). The latter part of Azariah's reign was tainted by his intrusion into the priestly office (2 Chr. 26:16–19), an act that resulted in his being stricken with leprosy (v. 5). This condition put his son Jotham on the throne to rule with him and handle public matters relative to the royal office. The nature of Jotham's duties (v. 5), the assigning of a full 52 years of reign to Azariah, and Isaiah's dating of his call to the year of Azariah's (or Uzziah's) death (Is. 6:1) may indicate that Azariah retained the power of the throne until the end. His name Azariah means "The Lord Has Helped."

15:3, 4 Azariah was another of the good kings in Judah and received some of the same evaluation that was given to Jehoash in 12:2, 3 and to Amaziah in 14:3, 4.

15:5–7 leper: The events that brought about this affliction are described in 2 Chr. 26:16–21. over the royal house: Jotham assumed the office of senior administrator. While the term over the house is used of the office of royal steward, this office grew in prestige, and the term came to designate a senior official of high standing. Jotham handled the business of state during his father's period of isolation.

15:8–12 The brief reign of Zechariah, the fourth in the line of Jehu, is described here. His name, which means "Yahweh Remembers," is the same as the prophet Zechariah. As in the case of many of the kings of Israel and Judah, he was assassinated (v. 10; 12:20; 14:19; 15:25).

15:12 fourth generation: Jehu had been promised a continuing posterity into the fourth generation as a reward for carrying out his divine commission (10:30). Unfortunately, Jehu and his house proved unworthy of their God-given opportunities so that they repeatedly earned the condemnation of God's prophets (13:18, 19; Hos. 1:4; Amos 7:9). After the death of Zechariah in 752 B.C. and the end of the fourth dynasty, Israel plunged into a period of degeneracy, bloody conspiracies, and international intrigue that would bring about its demise in 722 B.C. So Zechariah, whose name means "The Lord Remembers" (14:26, 27), was the last of the effective kings of Israel.

15:13–16 The short reign of Shallum, only one month, was indicative of the emerging collapse of the nation.

15:15 the rest of the acts: This follows the normal pattern for the obituaries of the kings of the northern kingdom. Even though Shallum was king for only one month, he still received the complete royal obituary.

15:16 Because of its beauty (Song 6:4), Tirzah served as a royal retreat (1 Kin. 14:17). It also was the national capital during Israel's first two dynasties. ripped open: Such inhuman atrocities were all too common in times of warfare in the ancient world (8:12; Amos 1:13). Israel's sin repeatedly placed it in danger of such barbaric acts (Hos. 10:13, 14; 13:16).

15:17, 18 Menahem: This wicked king came to power by assassination and established his authority by brutal acts against humanity (vv. 14, 16). Ironically, his name means "Comforter."

15:19–22 Pul is a second Babylonian name for the Assyrian king Tiglath-Pileser III (745–727 B.C.; v. 29; 1 Chr. 5:26). Although he came to the throne as a usurper from the ranks of the military, he would prove a competent king. Under Tiglath-Pileser III and his successors, Assyria became the dominant power in the Middle East for well over a century (747–612 B.C.). It was a period of repeated Assyrian interference in the affairs of Israel and Judah. The first such instance came quickly. In 743 B.C. Tiglath-Pileser III launched a western invasion that brought a great deal of Syria and Palestine under his control. The annals of this Assyrian king record that Menahem of Israel paid tribute to him, as is also recorded here (vv. 19, 20).

15:23–26 Pekahiah means "The Lord Has Opened the Eyes." After an evil reign of two years, a usurper "closed his eyes" for him.

15:27, 28 Like Shallum and Menahem before him, Pekah sat on the throne through usurpation and bloody deeds. Because Hoshea's nine-year reign (17:1) began in 732 B.C., Pekah's twenty years must have included a time of kingship in his own district during the unsettled days of Shallum, Menahem, and Pekahiah (752–740 B.C.). Apparently Pekah rode the crest of anti-Assyrian sentiment. That same political stance ultimately brought about his downfall, during Tiglath-Pileser III's second western campaign (734–732 B.C.). It is this campaign in Galilee to which Isaiah alluded (Is. 9:1).

15:29, 30 Hoshea … killed him: Tiglath-Pileser III's campaign apparently caused a pro-Assyrian reaction within Israel that brought about both Pekah's death and Hoshea's ascension to the throne. The annals of Tiglath-Pileser III record Hoshea's heavy tribute and the Assyrian king's claim that he himself set the new Israelite king in office.

15:31–33 Jotham means "The Lord Is Perfect." Jotham's reign of sixteen years (752–736 B.C.) includes a 12–year coregency with his father Azariah. Since Jotham is earlier credited with 20 years (v. 30), it may be that he turned over the reigns of government to his son Ahaz in 736 B.C., even though he lived on for four more years.

15:34, 35 Jotham's reign was partly righteous. After the purge of Ahaziah and Athaliah (9:27–29; 11:13–16), the kings of Judah who reigned in relative righteousness were Joash (Jehoash) (12:2, 3), Amaziah (14:3, 4), and Azariah (Uzziah) (15:3, 4). A positive righteousness would be modeled by Hezekiah (18:3–6) and again by Josiah (22:2).

15:36 The author of Chronicles indicates that Jotham did extensive building in Jerusalem and Judah (2 Chr. 27:3, 4) and engaged in a war against the Ammonites (2 Chr. 27:5). Jotham apparently carried out the practices that brought Judah power and prosperity during the years of his father Azariah (Uzziah).

The Lord Warns His People

God used several means to warn Judah of His impending judgment. One way was to send invaders from the outside (2 Kin. 15:37). Another way was to send prophets from within. One of these spokesmen was Micah of Moresheth (Mic. 1:1). He denounced Judah for adopting the idolatrous ways of Israel, and he criticized the leaders of Jerusalem for their oppressive policies toward the country's rural citizens.

15:37, 38 Rezin … Pekah: These two adversaries were even more prominent in the time of Ahaz (ch. 16; Is. 7).

16:1, 2 The name Ahaz means “He Has Grasped.” The seventeenth year of Pekah was 736/5 B.C. Ahaz’s sixteen-year reign apparently ended in 720 B.C. If so, like Jotham before him, Ahaz must have lived on another four years after giving up his rule. Hezekiah’s first year of independent rule began in 715 B.C., 14 years before Sennacherib’s invasion of Judah and his siege of Jerusalem in 701 B.C. (18:13). If Ahaz was 20 years old at his accession in 736 B.C. (v. 2), he would have lived to be around 40. Since Hezekiah was 25 years old at his accession to coregency in 729 B.C., Ahaz was in his early teens when Hezekiah was born.

16:3, 4 After a series of kings in Judah who demonstrated a relative righteousness, Ahaz followed the evil ways of the kings of the northern kingdom. The author of Chronicles reports that the rite of making one’s son pass through the fire was connected with the Baal worship practiced in the Valley of the Son of Hinnom (23:10; 2 Chr. 28:2, 3). Ahaz was an apostate who personally led his people in the religious worship practices of Canaan (v. 4; 2 Chr. 28:2–4).

16:5 Because of Ahaz’s sin God delivered him into the hands of an alliance of the two kings Rezin and Pekah (15:37). A great slaughter followed, and a complete deportation of Judah was averted only by divine intervention (2 Chr. 28:5–15).

16:6 Azariah had recovered Elath for Judah (14:22). Now this major port city (1 Kin. 9:26) was taken from Judah. to this day: That is, the day of the narration of these events.

16:7–9 Ahaz’s request of Tiglath-Pileser III coincides with the Assyrian king’s second western campaign (734–732 B.C.) that eventually brought about the fall of Damascus in 732 B.C. and the replacement of Pekah with Hoshea on the throne of Israel in the same year. Tiglath-Pileser listed the tribute of both Hoshea and Ahaz in connection with his campaigning.

16:10–15 Having been summoned to Damascus by Tiglath-Pileser III, Ahaz saw a pagan altar that suited his tastes. His use of the altar to make sacrifices to God underscored Ahaz’s essential paganism. His paganism was also evident in his many other religious innovations (vv. 14–18; 2 Chr. 28:2–4, 22–25). Ahaz went so far in his apostasy as to shut the doors of the temple (2 Chr. 28:24).

16:16 The participation of the high priest Urijah in the “new ways” of Ahaz is to be viewed as apostasy on his part.

16:17–20 cut off … removed: The exact purpose for dismantling the panels and removing the basins is unclear.

17:1, 2 twelfth year: Hoshea became king in 732 B.C., so the twelve years of Ahaz indicate a period of coregency with his father Jotham, perhaps arranged due to the pressures of Tiglath-Pileser's first western campaign (744–743 B.C.). Hoshea: The name means "Salvation."

17:3 Shalmaneser V succeeded Tiglath-Pileser III as king of Assyria in 727 B.C.

17:4 conspiracy by Hoshea: Several elements of intrigue and international affairs may have entered into the picture here. Transitions in power were often occasions for rebellion or attempted overthrow. Further, a new strong man had appeared in Egypt—Tefnekht, a pharaoh of the twenty-fourth dynasty. The time may have seemed ripe for Hoshea to enter into an anti-Assyrian coalition.

17:5, 6 After a three-year siege, Samaria fell to the Assyrians in 722 B.C. Sargon, the field commander of Shalmaneser V who succeeded him to the throne, would later claim that it was he who took Samaria. It was ancient practice to deport large numbers of influential citizens of a conquered country or city to decrease the possibility of rebellion (25:11, 12; Ezek. 1:2, 3).

17:7–23 This remarkable piece of writing extensively describes the sin of Israel that led to the horrible calamity of 722 B.C. Perhaps the words of 14:26, 27 were on the writer's mind and he felt it necessary to describe what led to this downfall of Samaria and Israel.

17:7–9 Israel had sinned: The reason for the fall of Samaria and the end of the northern kingdom is clearly stated to be its spiritual failure, in turning from the living God to worship other gods that exist only in people's depraved imagination. The rehearsal that follows of Israel's spiritual adultery (vv. 9–17) makes it clear that Israel had grown thoroughly corrupt from the leaders on down (vv. 7–9, 21). Despite repeated warnings (vv. 13, 14, 23), Israel had persisted in every form of idolatry and licentious worship (vv. 10–12, 16, 17).

17:10, 11 pillars … images … high places: The pagan trilogy (18:4; 1 Kin. 14:23).

17:12–21 Jeroboam … made them … sin: Jeroboam I had initiated the state worship that in effect set the standard for all of Israel's idolatrous activities. The worship of the calves at Dan and Bethel, and Israel's fascination with Baal (v. 16; 1 Kin. 12:28, 29; 16:32, 33), are repeatedly cited as the chief causes of Israel's spiritual defeat and political collapse.

Jeroboam I's heresy was a standard of wickedness for the kings who followed him in the northern kingdom.

17:22–24 The king of Assyria was probably Sargon II (722–705 B.C.), although the practice described here was continued by later kings as well. Such a mixing of populations would break down ethnic distinctions and weaken the loyalties that the people had. It would also help create a sense of empire. The list of cities recorded here may indicate the order for a caravan of relocated people. Samaria was the whole region where the repopulation took place; the inhabitants would eventually be called Samaritans.

17:25–28 one of the priests: Although a deported Israelite priest was sent back to instruct the Samaritan population in the worship of the Lord, the end result was a mixture of various forms of paganism with the apostate religion of the northern kingdom (vv. 30–33, 40, 41). In the course of time, both the Samaritans and their religion were rejected by the Jews (John 4:9; 8:48).

17:29–41 A double charge is laid against the Samaritans: They did not worship the Lord, and they did not keep the laws and ordinances laid down by the Lord of the covenant. The author reminds all concerned that only the Lord is Israel's Redeemer.

18:1, 2 The third year of Hoshea is 729 B.C. The 29 years of Hezekiah's reign thus include a period of coregency with his father Ahaz before he ruled independently (715–699 B.C.). The name Hezekiah means "The Lord Has Strengthened."

18:3 The assessment of Hezekiah begins similar to that of his predecessors, but it goes on to transcend the evaluations of "relative righteousness" that are typical of the other kings of Judah (15:34, 35).

The Danger of Relics

Jesus said that God is Spirit, and that those who worship Him must worship in spirit and truth (John 4:24). This means that we worship and serve a God whom we cannot see with our eyes, but must believe with our hearts. As a result, God is a bit of an abstraction for some people. One way that they have tried to make Him more real and present is through artifacts that they have associated with Him.

As understandable as the veneration of relics may be, it is a dangerous practice. It can easily tempt people to worship the object rather than the God whom the object is supposed to point to. In essence, the relic becomes a focus of idolatry.

That happened with a number of items that the Israelites venerated, including the bronze snake that Moses had made during the Exodus journey (2 Kin. 18:4; Num. 21:8, 9). Originally, the serpent on the pole served as a means of healing for snake-bitten people, by causing them to look to the Lord for help. But after the people settled in the Promised Land, they apparently turned this standard into an idol, as if the bronze snake itself had power to heal. They burned incense to it and even gave it a name, Nehushtan.

In a similar way, the Israelites turned a ceremonial robe, or ephod, that Gideon made from the spoils of his victory over the Midianites, into an idol (Judg. 8:25–27). Later they tried to use the ark of covenant as a charm against the Philistines, with disastrous results. And in Jeremiah's day, the citizens of Jerusalem cared more about their temple than they did about the Lord of the temple (Jer. 7:12–15).

These examples show the dangers of making too much of objects and places that have had a close association with the work of God. As human beings, we live in the natural world, but we worship a supernatural God. Therefore, we need to treat shrines and relics merely as means toward that end, never as ends in themselves.

18:4 Consistently, the kings who preceded Hezekiah are criticized by the author for not destroying the high places (15:34, 35). While there were traditions of worship of the true God at these locations, far too often they became sites for the licentious worship of Baal and Asherah. Hezekiah's reforms included not only the destruction of the pagan cult objects introduced in the days of his apostate father Ahaz, but the bronze serpent that had been preserved since the days of Moses (2 Chr. 29—31). Symbols all too easily can be made into objects of veneration. Apparently such had become the case with this precious ancient object.

18:5, 6 none like him: Hezekiah's faith was unparalleled by any other king who had preceded him after the time of David; Josiah's adherence to the Law would be extolled in a similar manner (23:25). The fact of Hezekiah's faith forms the basis for the account that follows. Because Hezekiah trusted the Lord, he could courageously withstand Assyrian tyranny. The northern kingdom fell to King Shalmaneser V in 722 B.C. because it did not keep God's holy standards (vv. 9–12), but Hezekiah's trust and faithfulness would let him face the later invasion of King Sennacherib (701 B.C.) and receive divine help (19:32–36).

18:7, 8 In addition to refusing to serve any longer as a vassal of Assyria, Hezekiah also conquered the Philistines. This helped establish Judah as an independent nation and new power in the region. No longer was Judah under the threat of military incursions from neighboring states simply because of its weakness.

18:9–23 That the siege lasted for three years suggests that the people suffered unspeakable horrors. The reason for the fall of Samaria is not because of a weaker army or its unstable walls. The principal issue was that they had rebelled against God.

18:13 Hezekiah's fourteenth year of sole rule was 701 B.C. The details of the generally rebellious situation that provoked Sennacherib to invade the western portion of his empire are recounted in his annals, where Hezekiah is particularly mentioned for his involvement in the whole affair.

(Heb. c*hata*) (2 Kin. 17:7; 18:14; Lev. 4:27; Judg. 20:16) Strong’s #2398: The meaning of this verb is “to miss (a target)” or “to fall short (of a goal).” The word expresses this basic meaning in Judg. 20:16, where it is translated miss: “every one could sling a stone at a hair’s breadth and not miss.” When applied to ethics, the word implies falling short of a moral requirement. The word is the most common OT expression for sin. Several nouns are derived from the verb, including chet, “sin” or “guilt” (Is. 53:12); chatta, “sinful men” (Num. 32:14); and chattat, “sin offering” (Lev. 4:3). In the NT, Paul also defined sin as “falling short”: “for all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God” (Rom. 3:23). But then Paul offered the perfect remedy for our fallen condition: salvation through Jesus Christ (Rom. 3:24).

18:14 I have done wrong: Literally, “I have sinned.” Hezekiah had refused to be a vassal of Assyria and was now threatened by their army. The annals of Sennacherib report how he made a wide-ranging invasion of Judah. With the Assyrian army already at Lachish, Hezekiah felt an overwhelming sense of doom. One of Sennacherib’s inscriptions describes the siege of Lachish and reports the heavy tribute demanded from Hezekiah. His fulfillment of Sennacherib’s demands (vv. 14–16) doubtless whetted the conqueror’s appetite for additional booty. Therefore Sennacherib placed Jerusalem under siege (18:13—19:36).

18:15, 16 This removal from the temple of immense amounts of silver, gold, and precious objects followed an earlier despoiling in the days of Amaziah (14:14).

18:17 Tartan … Rabsaris … Rabshakeh: These titles suggest persons of high station in Assyria. a great army: The accounts of the Assyrian kings suggest that they had mounted the largest armies known in the ancient Middle East. This huge army was stationed in the land of Judah. Fuller’s Field was in the northwest corner of the city, the area most vulnerable to attack.

18:18 Eliakim was the senior palace administrator (15:5), and Shebna was the royal scribe. This verse indicates that Eliakim had already replaced Shebna in the office of senior palace administrator, as mentioned in Is. 22:15–25.

18:19 In the literature of the ancient Middle East, the term great king was reserved for a king of a major power. Here the Assyrian delegation delivered an ultimatum from the "great king" of Assyria to Jerusalem.

18:20 The Rabshakeh questioned the object of Hezekiah's trust. Perhaps Hezekiah's reputation for trusting in God was already widely known (v. 5). Trusting became the focal point of the Assyrian's psychological warfare (vv. 19–22, 24, 30).

18:21 Because Egypt depended upon the life-giving Nile with its reeds, the figure of a broken reed is most appropriate. Actually Sennacherib's warning against confidence in Egypt was well taken, the point having been made previously by Isaiah (Is. 30:3–5; 31:1–3).

18:22, 23 if you are able: The Assyrian official's taunt is that the Israelites do not have enough men and that the men they have are not trained for the coming conflict.

18:24, 25 The LORD said: The Assyrians may have been aware of prophecies concerning the judgment of Judah and Jerusalem and Assyria's own role as God's avengers (Is. 10:5–11). The remark was intended to introduce stark terror into the hearts of the people of Jerusalem (2 Chr. 32:18) by pointing out that now even their God was against them.

18:26 Since Aramaic was by this time the language of international communication, it might be expected that the Rabshakeh would carry on diplomatic negotiations with officials in Judah and avoid speaking the Hebrew of the common citizens. But the Assyrians loved speaking to people in their native dialect to make the intimidation more effective.

18:27, 28 their own waste: The Rabshakeh portrayed the potential horror of the coming siege by using an obscene expression. The words were drawn from street language.

18:29–32 trust in the LORD: The matter of trust (vv. 19–24) continued as an issue. The Rabshakeh tempted the Israelites to abandon their trust in the Lord and trust in Sennacherib instead. Then the promised covenantal blessings (vv. 31, 32; Deut. 8:8; Mic. 4:4; Zech. 3:10) could all be theirs. The repeated use of the words Do not listen to Hezekiah (vv. 22, 29, 30) was designed to lead the people to rebellion against their king. Moreover, he presented his land as a wonderful place for them to live in.

18:33–37 The Rabshakeh's assertion that none of the gods of the nations who had opposed Assyria had withstood the Assyrian king is both another aspect of the continued psychological warfare and another evidence of the Rabshakeh’s awareness of Isaiah’s prophetic words (v. 25; Is. 10:7–11).

19:1 he tore his clothes: Tearing of clothes was often a sign of grief (6:30) or of sorrowful repentance (Joel 2:12, 13). The humility of the king was evidenced in this action, one already performed by his trusted servants (18:37). In addition to humbling himself, the king went into the house of the LORD. That is, he sought guidance from the living God.

19:2 The ministry of the great prophet Isaiah had begun in the year that Uzziah or Azariah died (Is. 6:1), nearly four decades earlier (740 B.C.). Once Isaiah had sought out Judah's godless King Ahaz to minister to him (Is. 7:3); now the prophet was being sought by the godly Hezekiah. Isaiah participated in the events of Hezekiah's reign, and the details of 18:13—20:19 are also recorded in Is. 36—.

19:3 day of trouble: The Hebrew phrase translated here indicates not only the great danger of the present Assyrian crisis, but the distress that Hezekiah felt. Hezekiah realized that the Lord's corrective chastisement had come upon Judah and Jerusalem. The closing proverb using the imagery of birth (Hos. 13:13) stresses the need for God's intervening strength if Jerusalem were to be delivered.

19:4, 5 hear … reproach: The first verb does not suggest that God might not be aware of the words of the Rabshakeh. Rather, the words describe God as determining to redress the wrong.

19:6, 7 Isaiah's prophecy was one of comfort. Not only would Sennacherib fail to conquer Jerusalem, but he would face a violent death upon his return home. Both points of the prophetic message would come true, although Sennacherib was not assassinated until 20 years later (c. 681 B.C.). In his annals Sennacherib boasts of five more campaigns; however, he makes no mention of any other invasions of Judah.

19:8 returned … departed: The Rabshakeh had been doing everything in his power to persuade Jerusalem to surrender without being attacked. But when he returned with his report, he found that his king was already distracted with another war and had already moved his army away. Still, the Rabshakeh did not give up, as v. 9 describes.

19:9–11 Since Tirhakah did not become king until 690 B.C., there is an apparent problem in the chronology of this verse. However, it is possible that the biblical author merely calls Tirhakah by the title he was best known by at the time of writing.

19:12, 13 This is not the Eden of Genesis, but an area known today as Bit-Adini, south of Haran (Ezek. 27:23; Amos 1:5).

19:14 In a great act of faith, Hezekiah brought Sennacherib's threatening letter before the LORD. Of course, Hezekiah understood that the Lord already knew the contents of the letter. But by this symbolic action, Hezekiah expressed his own utter dependence on God for deliverance.

19:15–19 Hezekiah prayed: Hezekiah knew that there is a greater King than the king of Assyria (18:19). Hezekiah's trust in the Lord was demonstrated in his habit of prayer (20:2), and his prayer was answered favorably (vv. 20–34).

19:20 Isaiah gave him a direct answer from the Lord. This helps explain one of the ways in which the Lord spoke to the kings during the monarchy. Prophets could communicate the message from God to the king. Because you have prayed: The Lord rewarded His king with a promise of deliverance based in large part on his practical faith in God.

19:21–34 Isaiah's words here are also found, with slight variations, in Is. 37:22–35. The addressee of this oracle is not Hezekiah; it was given to him for his encouragement. It is addressed to the Rabshakeh, who had brought a message to Hezekiah from the "great king of Assyria." Now Hezekiah would be able to respond with a message that came from a much higher authority!

19:21 The virgin: Here we sense God's approval of Jerusalem. When God speaks to His people concerning their sin, His speech can be direct, confrontational, and sometimes scathing. But when He speaks to others about His people and His city, He uses favorable language. They are, on the ideal level, like a virgin daughter to Him. the daughter of Zion: As elsewhere in the OT (Zeph. 3:14), this phrase should be written "daughter Zion," without the "of." Zion does not have a daughter; rather, Zion is the daughter. Zion (Jerusalem) is God's daughter whom He will guard and protect as only a father would.

19:22–24 God's answer to Hezekiah's prayer came once again (vv. 6, 7) through Isaiah (vv. 20, 21). Holy One of Israel is characteristic of Isaiah's own manner of referring to God. He uses the phrase 26 times (Is. 6:3). Sennacherib needed to know that his boastful pride blasphemed the sovereign and holy God of all nations. The verses that follow indicate that God knew not only the boasts, but the most inward thoughts of the Assyrian king.

19:25, 26 Did you not hear: Here the Lord answered the sarcasm of the Rabshakeh (18:17–25). In the manner of an ancient insult, God both asserted His own work on behalf of Judah and ridiculed the enemy who seemed completely unaware of reality.

19:27, 28 But I know: The Assyrians had a great gap in their understanding of reality; they did not include the living God in their processes. But they, in turn, were fully known. Hook and bridle are used to restrain animals (Ps. 32:9; Ezek. 19:4). Because the Assyrian kings often treated their prisoners of war in such fashion, Sennacherib would understand the threat only too well.

19:29 God graciously gave Hezekiah a sign (20:9–11) of His good intentions for His people. Despite the fact that the Assyrian invasion had adversely affected the crops for that year and the next, by the third year the fields would again yield a plentiful harvest. Even as a natural growth would remain for the two years preceding the harvest of the third year, so God left in Israel a spiritual remnant that would in a future day swell into a mighty harvest of souls (Joel 2:12–14; Mic. 2:12, 13; Zeph. 3:8–20).

19:30, 31 The promises in these verses were both for the immediate situation, for more remote times of regathering, and ultimately the final regathering of the Jewish people into their land in the time of the coming Messiah. zeal: The authenticating sign for the accomplishment of this promise is the solemn oath of God Himself (Is. 9:7).

19:32–34 The promises concerning the remnant (vv. 30, 31) have several phases in their fulfillment, leading up to and including the coming of the Messiah. In vv. 32–34, however, the message of Yahweh was specific and direct to the current issue, the bragging words of the Rabshakeh. Yahweh stated strongly that the Rabshakeh and the Assyrians would not find it possible to shoot even one arrow against Jerusalem.

19:32, 33 not come into this city: While Sennacherib later boasted of taking some 46 Judean cities, with reference to Jerusalem he could only report that he made Hezekiah “prisoner in Jerusalem, his royal residence, like a bird in a cage.” God’s defense and deliverance of Jerusalem demonstrated his faithfulness to the Davidic covenant (v. 34) in the face of blasphemous insults (vv. 22, 23, 27, 28; 18:34, 35).

19:34, 35 I … My own sake: As in the case of the redemption of Israel from Egypt at the time of the Exodus, so in the deliverance of Israel from the present trouble, God Himself would do it. He would not delegate the work of salvation to a lesser power.

19:36 departed: As God had promised through His prophet Isaiah (vv. 32–34), Sennacherib did not come against the city of Jerusalem.

19:37 The name Nisroch has been identified as the god Nusku or a corrupted form of Marduk, the traditional god of Mesopotamia. The events depicted here took place 20 years after God's deliverance of Jerusalem. When his father was assassinated, Esarhaddon took the throne and ruled from 681 to 668 B.C.

20:1 This phrase in those days simply designates the period of Hezekiah's reign. While some scholars believe that the events of ch. 20 took place after those of 18:13—19:37, the mention of Merodach-Baladan (v. 12) tends to favor an earlier time. The author of Kings often writes thematically rather than by arranging details chronologically. Thus, before talking of other events, and having mentioned the Assyrian invasion that brought the demise of the unfaithful northern kingdom (18:9–12), the author may have chosen to discuss the famous deliverance of the southern kingdom from the Assyrian threat due to Hezekiah's trust (18:13—19:37).

20:2, 3 Contrast the action of the sick Hezekiah with that of Ahaziah in 1:1, 2. Hezekiah was a great man of prayer (19:1, 14, 15). I have walked before you: Hezekiah's prayer recognized that although all of life is in God's hands, God is also a Rewarder of those who faithfully serve Him (Deut. 5:30–33; 30:15, 16). Hezekiah's habit of prayer would once again serve him well (vv. 5, 6; 19:14–19).

20:4–6 The pattern of divine revelation to Hezekiah was through His prophet Isaiah (19:20); compare also the word of God through Jonah to King Jeroboam II (14:25). defend this city: The Lord promised deliverance for Jerusalem.

20:7, 8 The practice of applying figs to an ulcerated sore is well attested in the records of the ancient Middle East, being mentioned as early as the Ras Shamra (Ugaritic) tablets of the second millennium B.C.

20:9–10 Once more the Lord provided a sign of His superintending intervention (19:29–31). Unlike his father Ahaz who cared little about a divine sign (Is. 7:12), Hezekiah welcomed it (vv. 10, 11). Hezekiah's underlying trust in the Lord (18:5) surfaced repeatedly throughout his reign.

20:11, 12 Berodach-Baladan, or more properly Merodach-Baladan, was a Chaldean king who twice ruled in Babylon (721–710, 703 B.C.). A perennial enemy of Assyria, he was twice defeated by them and cast out from Babylon. His search for allies in his resistance to Assyria may have occasioned the embassy to Hezekiah, especially because he had heard of Hezekiah's miraculous deliverance from the Assyrian army (2 Chr. 32:31).

20:12–15 One of the remarkable features of the Bible is that it does not gloss over the faults of its best heroes and heroines. This is a case in point. This account of the foolishness of Hezekiah follows immediately on the narrative of his great trust in the Lord (vv. 1–11).

20:16–18 Isaiah’s messages of judgment were as important as his messages of mercy (ch. 19; 20:1–11). all … shall be carried to Babylon: Hezekiah’s enthusiastic reception of Merodach-Baladan’s ambassadors and disclosure of his wealth to them would be remembered in a future time when Babylon was no longer Judah’s friend. Even before the fall of Jerusalem to Babylon (586 B.C.), Hezekiah’s son Manasseh was carried off to Babylon by an Assyrian king (2 Chr. 33:11). Isaiah pointed out Hezekiah’s foolishness.

20:19 The word … is good: Although Hezekiah recognized that Isaiah’s dire prophecy was for a future day, he humbly acknowledged his folly in putting his people in danger.

20:20, 21 a pool and a tunnel: Hezekiah dug a tunnel between the spring of Gihon and the Pool of Siloam to bring a ready supply of water within the eastern wall of Jerusalem, a deed that would prove especially helpful in time of siege. It was a remarkable feat. The workmen excavated from opposite ends through 1777 feet of rock, following a double-”s” pattern. The engineering, which involved following the seams in the limestone, is still astonishing to modern visitors of the site.

21:1, 2 Manasseh: This wicked king bore the same name as the older son of Joseph (Gen. 41:51). His reign of fifty-five years (697–642 B.C.) was the longest of any of the kings of the divided kingdom. Externally, the period was one of political stability. It is known as the Assyrian Peace, an era in which the kings Esarhaddon (681–668 B.C.) and Ashurbanipal (668–626 B.C.) reigned and brought the Assyrian empire to its zenith. However, the length of Manasseh's reign does not indicate a good rule, but rather God's persevering mercy and faithfulness to the Davidic covenant (2 Chr. 33:10–13).

Bronze likeness of Baal, Canaanite fertility god. King Manasseh of Israel encouraged idolatry by building altars for worship of this pagan deity (2 Kin. 21:3).

21:3 high places … Baal … wooden image: All that Hezekiah had done removing the wickedness of Canaanite religion from Israel was reversed by his son. The wording suggests not simply that he allowed the rebuilding of these obscene images, but that he actively directed their construction. host of heaven: Worship of heavenly bodies was strictly forbidden in the Law of God (Deut. 4:19; 17:2–7) and was condemned strongly by Israel's prophets (Is. 47:13; Amos 5:26). Yet Manasseh paid no attention to either the Law or the prophets (vv. 7, 8; 2 Chr. 33:2–10).

21:4–9 The list of religious outrages of Manasseh seems unbelievably perverse. He even brought objects of pagan worship and obscene symbols of the fertility religion of Canaan into the temple itself (vv. 4, 5, 7). All that had been accomplished by the relatively godly kings following the purge of Jehu (15:34) and by the very godly king Hezekiah (18:4–6) was undone by this reprobate. But wicked as Manasseh was, God heard his prayer when he repented and did good (2 Chr. 33:12–16).

21:10, 11 The author of Chronicles (2 Chr. 33:10, 11) reports that Manasseh's failure to heed the prophets of God led to his being taken prisoner by the Assyrian king. The chronicler also reports Manasseh's repentance, restoration, and subsequent reform efforts (2 Chr. 33:12, 13, 15, 16), all of which came too late to stop Judah's ongoing apostasy. As a result, with the accession of Manasseh's son Amon (642–640 B.C.), Judah's spiritual wickedness surfaced again (vv. 20–22).

21:12 his ears will tingle: The announcement of such a fearsome judgment was designed to bring the king to repentance. If God's purpose were merely to bring judgment, He would have done so without an announcement.

21:13 the measuring line of Samaria: The figures in this verse are marvelously powerful. If the people had any realization of the horrors that had befallen their sister city to the north, they would not want to be "measured" by the same implements that had designed Samaria's destruction. as one wipes a dish: God would soon bring a judgment so terrible that it would never be forgotten.

21:14 God's declaration that He would forsake the remnant does not mean He would abolish the Davidic covenant (Ps. 89:30–37). Rather, the meaning of God's word here is that Judah, the political remnant of God's kingdom (17:18), would also know chastisement for its sin.

“wooden image”

(Heb. asherah) (2 Kin. 17:10; 21:7; 23:6) Strong’s #842: This word is both the name of a Canaanite fertility goddess (Asherah) and the designation of a wooden object representing her. In the OT, the word is rarely used as a proper name (21:7; 23:4; 1 Kin. 15:13; 18:19); far more often it is used for a carved image (21:7; 1 Kin. 14:15). Asherahs were placed on hills. Frequently altars and other images were next to these wooden images (1 Kin. 14:23; 2 Chr. 31:1; 33:19). The Lord warned His people before they entered the Promised Land that this false religion would snare them if they did not banish it from the land (Ex. 34:12–16; Deut. 7:2–6; 12:3; 16:21). Nevertheless, the problem persisted during much of the periods of the judges and kings (Judg. 3:7; 1 Kin. 16:33), although occasional reforms did seek to eliminate these images (18:4; Judg. 6:25–30). The prophets consistently sounded a clarion call to abandon such false worship, for God’s judgment was coming (Is. 17:8; 27:9; Jer. 17:2; Mic. 5:14).

21:15 since the day: The story of the OT is not a record of God’s anger, but of the delay of the exercise of His wrath.

21:16, 17 innocent blood: In times of deep wickedness true believers often lose their lives (Joel 3:19). Innocent blood may also refer to human sacrifice (v. 6; 2 Chr. 33:6).

21:18 garden of Uzza: His burial place apparently was not among the other kings of Judah. Some have suggested that the garden of Uzza was a sacred shrine to an astral deity.

21:19–22 Amon: This wicked king followed in the path of his father Manasseh, much as Ahaziah of Israel followed in the path of his father Ahab (1 Kin. 22:51–53).

21:23–26 conspired against him: No reason is assigned for the conspiracy that brought about Amon’s assassination. While it may have had some connection with the international crisis that precipitated Ashurbanipal’s renewed attention to the west, Amon’s own wickedness may have provided a sufficient cause. The assassins were themselves executed.

22:1 The name Josiah means “The Lord Supports.” Like the name of Cyrus (Is. 44:28; 45:1) and of the city of Bethlehem (Mic. 5:2), the name Josiah was announced by a prophet long before the time of his birth (1 Kin. 13:1, 2).

22:2 what was right: The young Josiah apparently was in the hands of godly advisors, one of whom may have been the prophet Zephaniah. In any case, his own concern for righteousness led to reform early in his reign (2 Chr. 34:3–7).

22:3 In his eighteenth year of reign (c. 622 B.C.), Josiah began extensive repairs on the temple (vv. 4–7; 2 Chr. 34:8–13).

22:4 Hilkiah the high priest: This man was a major figure in the revival of true religion that young Josiah accomplished. The work of restoring the temple was under his direction.

22:5–7 The careful accounting for the money used in the restoration of the temple is akin to that in the time of King Joash of Judah and of the high priest associated with him, Jehoiada (12:9–16).

22:8, 9 By the Book of the Law may be meant either parts or all of the Pentateuch. This book, though placed by the side of the ark of the covenant (Deut. 31:26), may have been lost, set aside, or hidden during the wicked reigns of Manasseh and Amon.

22:10–13 read it before the king: This is the dramatic event that shaped Josiah’s reign. Imagine what it must have been for the young king to hear the Word of God read for the first time. tore his clothes: Once again (19:1) a godly king tore his clothes in genuine remorse. Josiah’s great qualities are seen in his desiring prophetic sanction for his new walk. He did not wish to move on with his own plan without a clear confirmation from the Lord.

22:14 Although Huldah the prophetess is mentioned only here (and in 2 Chr. 34:22–28) in the Scriptures, some have suggested that her husband Shallum was related to Jeremiah (Jer. 32:7–12).

22:15 Huldah takes her place beside several prophetesses recorded in the Scriptures, such as Miriam (Ex. 15:20) and Deborah (Judg. 4:4). This woman was an authoritative agent for the transmission of the word of God to the highest authorities in the land of Judah. She served at the same time as other godly prophets, such as Jeremiah and Zephaniah.

22:16 all the words: The threat of calamity for apostasy that the king heard may have been intended to reinforce the message of the parts of the Book of the Law that were found when the temple was being repaired and were read to the king (Deut. 28:15–68).

22:17–19 First was the bad news, addressed principally to the wicked who had forsaken God. Second was the good news, that Josiah would be delivered from impending judgment, basically due to his piety in a very difficult time.

22:20 in peace: Huldah's good word for Josiah personally was that he would not see the calamity that God was going to bring upon the people. Josiah's subsequent death in battle (23:29, 30) was not at issue in Huldah's prophecy. Like his godly grandfather Hezekiah, the righteous Josiah would not live to see God's future judgment of Judah (20:19).

23:1 all the elders: We may contrast Jehu's great gathering of the priests and prophets of Baal, in anticipation of his great "sacrifice" (10:18–31).

23:2, 3 he read … the Book of the Covenant: Like Moses (Ex. 24:3–8) and Joshua (Josh. 8:34, 35) before him, Josiah followed the ancient standard for godly leadership (Deut. 17:18–20; 31:9–13) and assembled the people to renew the covenant (Josh. 24). The king's own spiritual reaction and the reforms that he enacted (2 Chr. 35:1–19) suggest that the texts dealing with covenant obligations and sanctions (Lev. 26; Deut. 28) were a part of the public reading.

23:4 Articles of pagan worship had been taken to the fields of Kidron in the reforms of Asa (1 Kin. 15:13) and Hezekiah (2 Chr. 29:16; 30:14). to Bethel: Carrying the remaining ashes of burned religious articles to Bethel was a bold condemnation of both the pagan religious rites and the place associated with them (1 Kin. 12:28–30; Amos 4:4, 5). Thus Josiah's reforms spilled over into the northern kingdom as well.

23:5 idolatrous priests: The term used here is also used by Zephaniah, who employs it of those priests who led the rites associated with Baal and with star worship of various kinds (Zeph. 1:4). These priests had been appointed by Judah's past kings but functioned outside the divinely established priesthood. Hosea had condemned the idolatrous priests who officiated in the calf worship at Bethel (Hos. 10:5).

23:6 Although destroyed by Hezekiah (18:4), wooden images associated with the worship of Asherah had been reintroduced by Manasseh (21:7) and also by Amon (21:21; 13:6).

23:7–9 perverted persons: Sacred prostitution was part of the debased practices of Canaanite religion (1 Kin. 14:24; 15:12; 22:46). The horrible thing here is not just that these perverted persons were practicing their trade in Jerusalem, but that they actually had places for their booths in the temple precincts.

23:10 Topheth … Molech: Some scholars equate Molech with a pagan deity such as the Ammonite god Milcom (1 Kin. 11:5) or an individual Canaanite god (Lev. 20:1–5), whose worship was carried on in Jerusalem. Other scholars think that Molech was the name of a type of child sacrifice associated with Baal (Jer. 7:31, 32; 19:5, 6; 32:35). Evidence of child sacrifice has been found in the excavations at the Phoenician city of Carthage. Valley of the Son of Hinnom: The heinous rites carried on in this place, and the later custom of utilizing the area as a dump where refuse was burned, furnished a basis for applying its Hebrew name (gê hinnom) to the site (Gehenna) in the NT, where it refers to the sinful, worthless works of believers who are not walking with the Lord. The context of Matt. 10:28 and Mark 9:43 is the teaching on reward (Matt. 10:41, 42; Mark 9:41). The ideas of Gehenna are latent in James' warning against the misuse of the tongue (James 3:6).

23:11–14 horses … dedicated to the sun: Excavations at Jerusalem have uncovered a sacred shrine used in solar worship and dating from the time of Jehoshaphat. Small horses with solar disks on their foreheads have been found both at Jerusalem and Hazor.

23:15–17 Josiah's actions were prophesied long ago by a prophet who denounced Jeroboam I's altar that was at Bethel (1 Kin. 13:26–32). The literal fulfillment of that prophecy confirms that this earlier man of God was a true prophet (Deut. 18:22).

23:18, 19 the prophet … from Samaria: The prophet from Samaria was the old prophet of Bethel (1 Kin. 13:11). Samaria is the name for an entire area, not just the city that was later the capital of the northern kingdom (1 Kin. 13:32; 16:23, 24). After the death of the man of God who had denounced Jeroboam I's altar at Bethel, the aged prophet of Bethel requested that at his death he should be buried in Bethel beside that prophet of Judah.

23:20 priests of the high places: Because these priests were not Levites, they were executed as God's Law demands (Deut. 17:2–7). True priests of the Lord who officiated at the high places in Judah were spared. The shrines were demolished (vv. 8, 9). Finally, these priests could not officiate at the temple in Jerusalem. They were treated much as priests with bodily defects (Lev. 21:17–23).

23:21, 22 the Passover: The restoration of religious places was part of the revival of spiritual worship. since the days of the judges: Although Hezekiah had held a Passover (2 Chr. 30), he had done so with some modification of the Law (2 Chr. 30:13–20). Accordingly, Josiah's meeting of the strict requirements of the Law (2 Chr. 35:1–19) was truly unparalleled since the days of the judges. Moreover, God's Law was observed by believers from Judah and Israel alike (2 Chr. 35:18). This last notice reminds us that we overstate things when we speak of the "lost tribes of Israel." It is correct that there was never a general return of the people who were depopulated from the northern kingdom as there was of those who returned to Judah from the captivity of the southern kingdom. Nonetheless, there were numerous people from the northern kingdom who drifted down to Judah in the years following the fall of Samaria. Others must also have made their way back to the land of Israel in various ways over a period of time. In the NT period there is evidence of peoples from all of the original twelve tribes.

23:23–25 no king: Josiah's following of the Law was unparalleled among the kings of Israel and Judah. Like his grandfather Hezekiah, who was famed for being without equal in his trust of the Lord (18:5), Josiah was truly a righteous king. Because of their outstanding examples of godliness, the authors of Kings and Chronicles devote considerable space to their reigns (chs. 18—20; 22:1—23:30; 2 Chr. 29—32; 34; 35).

23:26, 27 Despite their efforts, Judah's sin was so entrenched that judgment was inevitable (17:18, 19; 23:26, 27; Lam. 1:5). Even though Manasseh repented, he still reaped the results of his sin.

23:28–30 Pharaoh Necho (609–594 B.C.) was the recently crowned king of Egypt's twenty-sixth dynasty. During the long years of Josiah's reign (640–609 B.C.), Assyrian power had steadily crumbled until, as Nahum had predicted, Nineveh itself had fallen (612 B.C.) to a coalition of Chaldeans, Medes, and others. The surviving Assyrian forces had regrouped at Haran. Because Egypt was a long-standing ally of Assyria, Necho journeyed northward to help the beleaguered Assyrians. Josiah's deployment of his forces in the Valley of Megiddo was an attempt to prevent the Egyptians from aiding the Assyrian forces at Haran. Although Pharaoh Necho would be delayed sufficiently so that Haran would be lost to the Assyrians, Josiah's action ultimately cost him his life (2 Chr. 35:20–25).

23:31–36 Jehoahaz (called Shallum in Jer. 22:11) was Josiah's third son (24:18; 1 Chr. 3:15). The name Jehoahaz means "The Lord Has Grasped." This is the same name as the king of Israel, the son of Jehu (10:35). Johanan, Josiah's first son, apparently had died and Eliakim (or Jehoiakim), the second son, was bypassed. A fourth son, Mattaniah (or Zedekiah), would eventually ascend to the throne and rule as Judah's last king (598–586 B.C.). Jehoahaz's reign of three months came to an end with the return of Pharaoh Necho from Haran. Jehoahaz was summoned to Riblah, Necho's headquarters in Syria. Then he was led away to die in Egypt. His brother Eliakim was installed on the throne with his name changed to Jehoiakim. Judah thus became no more than a vassal of Egypt. The curse for Judah's disobedience was about to fall (Deut. 28:64–68).

23:37 did evil: Jehoiakim's short reign (608–598 B.C.) was noted for its extreme wickedness (2 Chr. 36:5, 8). Jeremiah depicts him as a despicable monster who took advantage of his people (Jer. 22:13, 14, 17), filled the land with every sort of vice and violence (Jer. 18:18–20), and opposed all that was holy (Jer. 25:1–7). Unlike his father Josiah, who led the nation in reformation at the hearing of the Word of God (22:11; 23:1–25), Jehoiakim went so far as to cut up and burn a scroll of Scripture (Jer. 36:21–24) and to kill Urijah, a true prophet of God (Jer. 26:20–23).

24:1 After defeating the Assyrians and Egyptians at the Battle of Carchemish (605 B.C.), Nebuchadnezzar invaded Judah and made the country his vassal. He took Daniel and other notables to Babylon as spoils of war. Nebuchadnezzar, who succeeded his father as king of Babylon in 605 B.C. and reigned until 562 B.C., boasted in his annals of 605 and 604 B.C. of the subjugation and submission of all Syria and Palestine. Jehoiakim served Nebuchadnezzar three years and then rebelled, perhaps finding courage to do so when Pharaoh Necho succeeded in turning back the Babylonians at the Egyptian border in 601 B.C.

24:2 The name Chaldeans originally applied to certain inhabitants of southern Mesopotamia. But by the neo-Babylonian period, the term Chaldean had become identified with Babylonians, and Babylonia was called Chaldea. After the fall of the Chaldean or neo-Babylonian empire, the term Chaldean was used to mean "soothsayer" (Dan. 2:2). In this verse the ethnic sense of the term is meant. Not only Chaldeans but raiding parties from nearby countries harassed Judah.

24:3–7 Because Jehoiakim and Judah had reproduced the sins of Manasseh (21:1–17), God's judgment was inevitable. Jehoiakim himself would die soon, even as Nebuchadnezzar was launching a second campaign into Judah (598 B.C.).

24:8–11 The name Jehoiachin means "The Lord Has Appointed." eighteen years old: Because the scriptural descriptions of Jehoiachin seem to represent him as a mature young man (Jer. 22:24–30; Ezek. 19:6), Jehoiachin's age at accession was probably eighteen rather than eight, as given elsewhere in some manuscripts (2 Chr. 36:9).

24:12, 13 Jehoiakim apparently had died before Nebuchadnezzar arrived at Jerusalem, because it was Jehoiachin who was carried off captive with other leaders of Judah (such as Ezekiel; Ezek. 1:1). He had reigned only three months (v. 8); the year was 598 B.C. Jeremiah called him "Jeconiah" and "Coniah" (Jer. 22:24, 28).

24:14 Ten thousand is probably a round number for deportees of all types from Judah and Jerusalem. The figure probably includes various categories of exiles, such as those mentioned in v. 16.

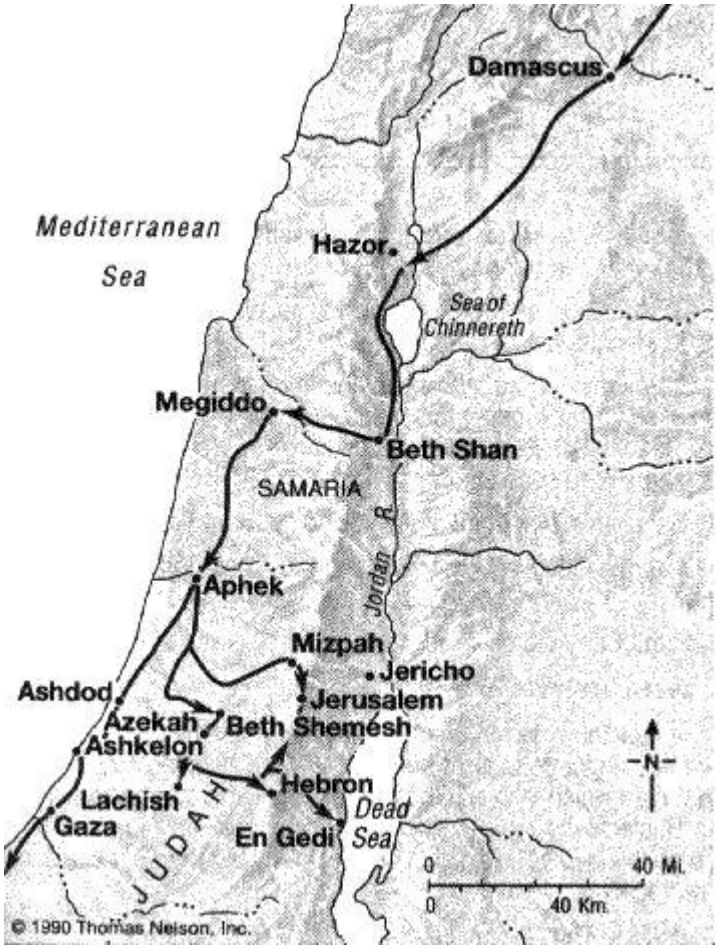
24:15 carried Jehoiachin captive: Jehoiachin's captivity (2 Chr. 36:9, 10) was prophesied in Jer. 22:24–27. Unlike Jehoahaz, who was carried off into Egypt previously (23:33) and disappears from the pages of sacred history, Jehoiachin's eventual release is recorded twice (25:27–30; Jer. 52:31–34).

24:16, 17 Mattaniah is Josiah's youngest son. His name means "The Gift of the Lord." All three of Josiah's sons who succeeded him as king reigned under a throne name: Shallum (1 Chr. 3:15; Jer. 22:11) ruled as Jehoahaz (23:31); Eliakim as Jehoiakim (23:34); and Mattaniah as Zedekiah. Likewise, Jeconiah (1 Chr. 3:16; Jer. 24:1), Jehoiakim's son, ruled as Jehoiachin (24:8).

24:18, 19 Mattaniah, who reigned under the name Zedekiah, came to the throne in 598 B.C. This was the year of Jehoiakim's death and Jehoiachin's captivity. Zedekiah reigned until the fall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C.

24:20 Zedekiah rebelled: The king of Judah foolishly relied on the Egyptians under Pharaoh Apries (or Hophra, Jer. 44:30) for help (Ezek. 17:15–18). Apries had recently succeeded Psamtik II (594–588 B.C.) on the throne. He had great plans for Egypt's renewed glory. Unfortunately, his plans were not realized. Although Apries challenged Nebuchadnezzar by attacking Phoenicia and coming to Zedekiah's assistance (Jer. 37:5), he was not able to deliver Judah (Jer. 37:7, 8). His own reign ended in a coup d'état that ultimately cost him his life.



Nebuchadnezzar's Campaigns Against Judah (605–586 B.C.)

Nebuchadnezzar became king of Babylon in 605 B.C. and conducted several campaigns in Palestine. He squelched Jehoiakim's rebellion in about 602 B.C., deported Jehoiachin in 597 B.C., and destroyed Jerusalem in 586 B.C.

25:1, 2 eleventh year: The siege of Jerusalem lasted for nearly two years (v. 1). A comparison with other OT texts provides the following information concerning the last days of Jerusalem: breaching Jerusalem's walls by the Babylonians and Zedekiah's flight (vv. 3–7; Jer. 39:2–7; 52:6–11); capture of Jerusalem and its citizens (vv. 8–12; Jer. 39:8–10; 52:12–16; 2 Chr. 36:19); looting the city (vv. 13–17; Jer. 52:17–23; 2 Chr. 36:18); executing the officials and deporting the citizenry (vv. 18–21; Jer. 52:24–30; 2 Chr. 36:17, 20, 21), sparing Jeremiah (Jer. 39:11–14).

25:3, 4 Zedekiah's escape route lay between two walls near the royal garden at the southeastern corner of the city.

25:5, 6 After his capture, Zedekiah was taken to Riblah on the Orontes River in Syria, which was the field headquarters for Nebuchadnezzar's western campaigns. Jehoahaz had been summoned there earlier by Pharaoh Necho (23:33).

25:7–9 put out the eyes: The annals of the ancient Middle East often mention putting out the eyes of conquered people. The last thing Zedekiah saw was the reward of his sinful folly—the horrible spectacle of his own loved ones being put to death. He would carry this picture with him until his own death in a Babylonian prison (Jer. 52:11).

25:10–16 The walls of Jerusalem would lie in a ruined condition for a century and a half (Neh. 2:11—6:16).

25:17 Three cubits may be the height of the capitals not including the upper portion of ornamental work, for 1 Kin. 7:16 and Jer. 52:22 record the height of the capitals as five cubits.

25:18–20 Although Seraiah was executed at Riblah (v. 21), his son Jehozadak was simply deported (1 Chr. 6:15). Through Jehozadak's line would come Ezra, the priest and great reformer, who one day would return to Jerusalem and take up Seraiah's work (Ezra 7:1). The second martyred priest Zephaniah may be the priest mentioned by Jeremiah (Jer. 21:1; 29:5). Jerusalem would be less prone to future rebellions with the chief religious and civil officials gone.

25:21 Like Israel before it (17:18), Judah was carried away captive because of its sinful apostasy.

25:22 Gedaliah: Gedaliah's father Ahikam had supported Jeremiah in his struggles with the apostate officials of Judah (Jer. 26:24). Gedaliah's training and his descent from a family noted for its antiestablishment stance doubtless made him acceptable to the Babylonians. The prophet Jeremiah, spared by the Babylonians (Jer. 39:11–14; 40:1–5), was allowed to stay and assist Gedaliah in the process of reconstruction in Judah (Jer. 40:6). There is confirmation of Gedaliah's importance in a seal impression recovered at Lachish mentioning him as "over the house," that is, a senior administrator.

25:23–26 Mizpah had long been a center of spiritual and political prominence (1 Sam. 10:17; 1 Kin. 15:22). It was an ideal location for the provincial government. Jaazaniah: This name appears on a seal impression found in Mizpah. The murderous deeds of Ishmael and the role of Johanan in the events are detailed by Jeremiah (Jer. 40:7—43:7).

Jehoiachin's Special Treatment

One reason Jehoiachin received special treatment from the Babylonians (2 Kin. 25:27–30) was that his captors probably regarded him, not Zedekiah, as the true king of Judah in exile. In addition to the accommodations provided for him in Babylon, Jehoiachin may have been able to retain his lands in Judah through a trustee.

25:27 Evil-Merodach succeeded Nebuchadnezzar and reigned a short time (561–560 B.C.). Tablets from the reign of Nabonidus (555–539 B.C.) record the daily rations of Jehoiachin who is called "Yaukin, king of the land of Yahud (Judah)."

25:28–30 spoke kindly: Evil-Merodach's kindness toward Jehoiachin brings the Book of Kings to an end—on a ray of hope. Exile is the end neither of Israel nor of the Davidic line.

The First Book of Chronicles

———— FIRST CHRONICLES IS AN INSPIRATIONAL HISTORY. Writing after the Exile, the author sought to inspire the remnant of Israelites with their extraordinary spiritual heritage. Appropriately, the book focuses on David. He was not only Israel's great king, but also one of Israel's greatest spiritual leaders. When he became king, one of his first priorities was to establish the worship of God as the center of Israel's national life. Amidst a great celebration, David brought the ark of the covenant to Jerusalem and appointed priests to minister regularly before it (chs. 15; 16). His actions demonstrated his concern that all of Israel would "give to the LORD the glory due His name" (16:29). This was Israel's extraordinary spiritual legacy: true worship of the living God.

It is evident that Chronicles is the result of a compilation process. The chronicler made use of the books of Samuel and Kings for about half the narrative. Also, the genealogies in the beginning of the book are largely derived from the Pentateuch. The compiler even cites some of the sources. Among these are the genealogical records of the various tribes (7:9, 40), the book of the kings of Israel (9:1), and the books of Samuel, Nathan, and Gad (29:29).

A number of accounts in Chronicles parallel parts of Samuel and Kings. The fact that these accounts do not match word for word has led some scholars to assume that the chronicler was not concerned about accuracy in citation, or that the authors of all the books drew upon another common source. In any case, the inspiration and authority of 1 Chronicles is not at stake. Writing about the same events, the compiler of 1 Chronicles simply emphasized a different perspective on them than did the authors of Samuel and Kings. The synoptic Gospels function the same way. Each Gospel presents some of the same stories of Jesus in a different way. Each gives us new details and a new perspective on the event.

This chronicler's different emphases explain many of the differences between the narratives of Chronicles and Samuel. Some of the other apparent contradictions, especially in matters of spelling and numbers, can be explained as inadvertence in copying and text transmission. Numerals appear to have been written in notations that could easily be confused, and most of the deviations between Chronicles and Samuel can be accounted for in this manner. In many instances, the discrepancies are only apparent and suitable ways have been suggested to harmonize them. In any case, none of them threatens the inspiration and inerrancy of the original text.

Writing approximately when the Israelites returned from captivity, the chronicler wanted to emphasize the Israelites' continuity with their past. The remnant was returning to Jerusalem to rebuild the temple because of the promises God had given to David many years before (Ezra 7:10–23). God's promises were still in effect, even though the people had been in exile.

The long genealogical section in First Chronicles emphasizes this continuity with the past (chs. 1—9). The genealogies point out that the promises to David were founded on God's ancient promises to the patriarchs. God had pledged to Abraham that He would make him the father of a great nation, one through which He would bless the whole earth (Gen. 12:1–3). God had also promised that a king would rule over this special nation (Gen. 17:6). It was revealed to Jacob that the king would descend specifically from Jacob's son Judah (Gen. 49:10). Finally, the genealogy in the Book of Ruth explains the link between the promise and the fulfillment by tracing the line of Judah through his son Perez to King David (Ruth 4:18–22). God had faithfully fulfilled His promise.

First Chronicles recounts the lineage of the people of God's promise and emphasizes the connection between Perez and King David (2:5–15). God would establish His reign upon the earth through David's royal line (17:7–15; Gen. 17:7, 8; 2 Sam. 7). The kings God had promised to Abraham would begin with David and culminate in the One who would reign forever, Jesus (17:14; Matt. 9:27; 12:23; Mark 10:47, 48; Luke 18:38). God had given the promise to David, and the faithful remnant inherited that same promise.

Since the chronicler wanted to encourage the returning Israelites, he focused on the glories of David's reign—his conquest of Jerusalem (11:4–9), his heroic soldiers (11:10–47), his victories over the Philistines (18:1–12), and his celebration when bringing the ark to Jerusalem (15:25–29). On the other hand, the author of Samuel told the story of David as an objective, realistic biography that did not overlook David's sins and failures. While it does not depict David as spiritually and morally perfect (13:9–14; 21:1, 8), Chronicles surprisingly omits the stories that reveal David's weakness—his affair with Bathsheba, his murder of Uriah (2 Sam. 11), and his estrangement from his son Absalom (2 Sam. 15). These are not omitted to give a false impression of David's character, for the books of Samuel recount these incidents in detail. Instead, Chronicles was written to inspire the remnant to follow in the spiritual footsteps of David.

At a time when the Israelites were rebuilding the nation and the temple (Ezra 3:7–13), the chronicler painted a picture of David's kingdom as a kingdom founded on the true worship of God. Not the throne but the tabernacle and temple were the focus of David's kingdom. Chronicles extensively describes how David moved the ark of the covenant to a suitable place of worship (13:1—16:3), appointed appropriate religious personnel (16:4–6, 37–43; 23:1—26:32), and made plans for building a permanent temple (chs. 22; 28; 29). The theme of Chronicles is that God Himself established David's kingdom (29:10, 11) in fulfillment of His promises to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Through the Davidic covenant, David's kingdom itself embodies the promise of the future kingdom whose ruler is the great Son of David, Jesus Christ.

Originally both 1 and 2 Chronicles were one book. The overall consistency of style in the book indicates that although several contributors might have worked on it at various stages, one editor shaped the final product.

Jewish tradition identifies the editor as Ezra. This view finds support in the common themes and emphases of Chronicles and the Book of Ezra. Both books focus on the building and dedication of the temple. However, some have argued that the genealogies in 3:17–24 preclude Ezra's authorship because they include as many as eleven generations past Zerubbabel. To include such information, the book would have to have been written as late as the middle of the third century B.C.

On the other hand, it is possible that 3:17–24 may embrace only three generations. If so, a date of approximately 425 B.C. for the completion of Chronicles is quite reasonable. Ezra was active between 460 and 430 B.C. and thus could have incorporated this particular genealogy into the book. In short, the traditional Jewish view that Ezra wrote Chronicles can be accepted if it is remembered that Ezra was a compiler. He used sources and documents that account for the stylistic differences between the Book of Ezra and Chronicles.

1:1–5 Adam, Seth, Enosh: The names of these ancient, pre-Flood characters were included in the genealogical record with people whose historical identities have never been questioned, such as David (2:15) and Zerubbabel (3:19). This indicates that the chronicler had no question as to their historicity.

1:6 Diphath: The genealogy in Gen. 10:3 has “Riphath” here, perhaps resulting from the fact that the Hebrew letters rendered into English as “D” and “R” look virtually the same in the Hebrew script.

1:7, 8 Rodanim referred to the Rhodites, natives of the Greek island of Rhodes. sons of Ham: Great nations were indicated by some of the names here: Cush referred to the Ethiopians, Mizraim to the Egyptians, Canaan to the Canaanites.

1:8, 9 Great nations are indicated in the names of the sons of Ham: Cush is Ethiopia; Mizraim is Egypt; Canaan is the Canaanites.

1:10, 11 Cush begot Nimrod: It seems that the chronicler used the genealogy of Gen. 10 as the primary source for this genealogy. However, he used it selectively. For example, Gen. 10:9–12 was not included. The apparent purpose of this genealogy was to establish the line between Adam and David, and between David and the reigning Davidic monarch.

1:12 Caphtorim: These people lived in Caphtor (Deut. 2:23), known in ancient Akkadian texts as Kaptara and probably to be identified as Crete. The Caphtorim were related to the Philistines, or the two terms might even be interchangeable (Jer. 47:4; Amos 9:7).

1:13–17 Heth founded the nation of the Hittites, a people in what is now central Turkey who achieved great power and prominence in the middle of the second millennium B.C. After the Hittite kingdom fell to the Sea Peoples around 1200 B.C., many Hittites settled in enclaves in Syria and Palestine.

IN COMPARISON

How Chronicles and Kings Differ

In 1 and 2 Chronicles we see repeated much of the information found in 1 and 2 Kings. The following chart shows how the books differ:

	First and Second Kings	First and Second Chronicles
Style	realism	idealism
Viewpoint	civil and political	spiritual and moral
Purpose	indictment; to document the failures of God's people	incitement; to encourage the Jews returning from captivity
Focus	northern and southern kingdoms; all kings whether good or evil	southern kingdom of Judah; King David, King Solomon, and the godly kings of Judah
Discussion of the temple and worship	five chapters (1 Kin. 5—8; 2 Kin. 12)	twenty chapters (1 Chr. 13:15; 16; 22—26; 28; 29;2 Chr. 2—7; 24; 29; 30; 34)

1:18 Eber was the ancestor of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. The name Hebrew, a derivative of Eber's name, was applied to the Israelites. The central place Eber occupies in the genealogies of Abram in Genesis and 1 Chronicles suggests a connection between the names Hebrew and Eber (1:24–27; Gen. 10:21; 11:10–26). Indeed the name Hebrew may simply mean an "Eberite."

1:19–27 the earth was divided: This refers to the division of the earth's population by the scattering of the human race following the judgment of God on the Tower of Babel. Chronologically, Peleg apparently fits about halfway between Shem and Abram (1:24–27), a most suitable place for the Tower of Babel episode.

1:28–31 Isaac was the son of the covenant, so his name occurs first when the names Isaac and Ishmael are mentioned together, even though Ishmael was born first. Moreover, Ishmael was the son of Abraham's concubine Hagar—not of his wife Sarai.

1:32, 33 Both Ishmael and Midian were descendants of Abraham, Ishmael by a concubine and Midian by another wife Abraham married after Sarah's death (Gen. 25:1, 2). The Ishmaelites and Midianites were tribes that lived in the Arabian deserts. They were frequently associated with each other and even mistaken for one another (Gen. 37:25–28).

1:34–36 Timna was Eliphaz's concubine (Gen. 36:12). Timna's son Amalek was the founder of the Amalekites, a people that became one of Israel's most persistent enemies (Ex. 17:8–16; Deut. 25:17–19; 1 Sam. 15:1–3).

1:37, 38 Seir was the patriarchal name of the pre-Edomite population of the region east and south of the Dead Sea (Gen. 36:20–30). Esau's daughter-in-law Timna (vv. 35, 36), was the sister of Lotan and daughter of Seir. Thus the people of Seir and the descendants of Esau were related by marriage, and together these two people groups became the kingdom of Edom (v. 43).

1:39–43 the kings … of Edom: Compare Gen. 36:31–39. These kings were apparently descendants of Esau. The Edomites were ruled by kings several centuries before the Israelites. This fact helps explain Israel's later demand to have "a king to judge us like all the nations" (1 Sam. 8:5). Although the Edomite kings ruled in succession, they were not parts of a dynasty, as the reference to their particular cities makes clear. Apparently Edom did not have a capital, and its kings ruled from whatever place they considered home.

1:44–54 The Hebrew word translated chiefs (allupim) usually referred to military leaders. Compare Gen. 36:40–43. It is not clear if they succeeded the previously mentioned kings, thus suggesting a new and different form of government, or if they served perhaps as military officials along with the kings.

2:1, 2 Compare the order of the sons of Israel with Gen. 35:23–26.

2:3 Though he was the fourth son of Jacob (v. 1), Judah appears first in the detailed genealogy because the messianic promise was to be channeled through him (Gen. 49:10). Thus the chronicler reveals that his genealogy and his presentation of the events are controlled by theological concerns rather than strict chronology.

2:4, 5 Unlike Genesis but true to his theological purposes, the author does not mention the details of Judah's shameful treatment of his daughter-in-law or his subsequent exposure (Gen. 38:12–26). He wants only to establish the lineage between Judah and David. But, of course, he cannot wholly avoid the implication of impropriety, in that he must at least identify who Tamar is.

2:6–9 Though the line to David passed through Zerah's brother Perez, Zerah's descendants are mentioned here because of the prominence of Achar (v. 7), called Achan in the narrative of Josh. 7:10–26. Ethan, Heman, Calcol, and Dara are mentioned because of their role in temple music under King David and their distinction as poets and sages (15:16–19; 1 Kin. 4:29–31).

2:10–14 This genealogy is selective, focusing on only those members important to the lineage. For example, Nahshon was head of the tribe of Judah at the time of the wilderness march from Sinai to Kadesh Barnea (Num. 1:7, 2:3; 7:12). He was more than five generations removed from Judah himself (2:4–10), since the time between Judah and Nahshon was over 450 years.

2:15 Jesse had seven sons, David being the youngest (compare 1 Sam. 16:10, 11 and 17:12 where it appears that Jesse had eight sons).

2:16, 17 Sisters are rarely mentioned in ancient genealogies. However, this genealogy pays particular attention to the family of David and thus to David's sisters.

2:18–24 This Caleb was not the famous companion of Joshua (Num. 13:6; Josh. 14:6, 7), who lived several centuries later, during the conquest of Canaan. In fact, one of this Caleb's descendants Bezalel (v. 20) was a craftsman charged with constructing the wilderness tabernacle (Ex. 31:2).

2:25–41 The sons of Jerahmeel would eventually occupy the Negev, the desert area of southern Judah.

2:42–48 This was the same Caleb as that of vv. 18, 19. Here his genealogy is much longer, apparently transmitted through other wives.

2:49, 50 The Caleb of Joshua's time had a daughter named Achsah, who became the wife of Israel's first judge, Othniel (Judg. 1:12, 13). It might appear that the Caleb here in Chronicles must be the same as the later Caleb, but this is ruled out by the consistent use of Caleb throughout the chronicler's genealogy to refer to an earlier individual by that name. The meaning probably is that Achsah is the "daughter" of the earlier Caleb in the sense that she is his descendant. The later Caleb was doubtless a descendant of the early one, a conclusion supported by the record that both were from the tribe of Judah (2:4, 5, 9, 18, 42; Num. 13:6).

2:51–54 The chronicler recorded Caleb's genealogy because of the significance of Bethlehem, the birthplace of King David. One of Caleb's descendants, Salma, was the founder or father of Bethlehem.

2:55 Since the compiler of Chronicles was obviously a scribe, he was interested in tracing, if only briefly, various families of the scribes. These families are otherwise unknown, as is Jabez, the place they lived. They were Kenites, a people related to Israel through Moses' marriage to a Kenite, sometimes referred to as a Midianite (Judg. 4:11). Naming the Kenite scribes here suggests that they were descended from Judah, since the whole context of the passage is the genealogy of Judah. The genealogy also connects them with Rechab, the saintly founder of a line of pious Israelites who obeyed the commands of their fathers (Jer. 35:1–19).

3:1–5 The fact that David had six sons by six wives in Hebron does not condone polygamy. David had fallen into the ancient custom among kings of marrying the daughters of neighboring kings in order to create allies. Negative results inevitably followed such multiple marriages. David's first son, Amnon, raped his half sister Tamar (2 Sam. 13:14)—a deed for which he paid with his own life at the hands of his half brother Absalom. Later Adonijah tried to usurp the throne from Solomon to whom it had been promised (1 Kin. 1:5–10).

3:5 Bathshua: The spelling is confused for Bathsheba.

3:6–9 Tamar: The fact that only one daughter of David is named does not mean that he had no other daughters. Tamar appears in this genealogy because of her prominence in the story of King David's family (2 Sam. 13:1–39). The chronicler included those people who had particular relevance to the narrative and its theological purpose.

3:10–18 Shenazzar was probably the same man as Sheshbazzar, leader of the first group of Jews to return from Babylonian captivity (Ezra 1:8, 11) and builder of the foundation of the second temple (Ezra 5:15–17).

3:19 Zerubbabel here is designated as a son of Pedaiah, but elsewhere (Ezra 3:2, 8; 5:2; Neh. 12:1; Hag. 1:12, 14; 2:2, 23) as a son of Pedaiah's brother Shealtiel (v. 17). It is likely that Shealtiel had died while Zerubbabel was young and that the youth was reared by his uncle Pedaiah, thus becoming Pedaiah's son. This relationship may explain Luke's statement that Zerubbabel was "the son of Shealtiel" (Luke 3:27), who was in turn a descendant of David through his son Nathan. Thus in the Gospels, the line of Jesus was traced back to David through David's two sons, Solomon and Nathan. These two lines met in the marriage of Jeconiah's daughter to Shealtiel. Luke traced Jesus' line through Zerubbabel and an otherwise unknown son Rhesa (Luke 3:27). Matthew, whose interest is particularly in Joseph, traced Jesus' ancestry back to Zerubbabel through still another son of Zerubbabel, Abiud (Matt. 1:13). Thus Luke reconstructed Mary's genealogy, Matthew did the same with Joseph's, and Chronicles traced yet a third line of David. Yet all of these genealogies passed through Zerubbabel and originated in David.

3:20–24 Pelatiah and Jeshaiah seem to be the only two sons of Hananiah. Rephaiah … Shechaniah: These names were detached from the Zerubbabel genealogy and may be other Davidic families. The sons of Shechaniah: Four generations of Shechaniah, ending in Anani, are listed.

Hence the genealogy of vv. 17–24 presupposes about seven generations. Since Jeconiah reigned around 598 B.C. (v. 17), a date of approximately 425 B.C. for Anani is reasonable. Anani is the latest generation recorded in Chronicles, and any dating of the book should take this into account.

(Heb. ben) (1 Chr. 4:1; 7:14; Ex. 12:37; 1 Kin. 2:1) Strong’s #1121: The Hebrew noun ben is probably related to banah, which means “to build,” as in “to build” a family (Ruth 4:11). The ancient Hebrews considered sons the “builders” of the next generation. Ben can either refer to a literal son as in 1 Kin. 2:1, or to one’s descendants, as in 7:14. The word may also pertain to an attribute of an individual, as in Ben-Oni, meaning “Son of My Sorrow,” and Benjamin, meaning “Son of the Right Hand” (Gen. 35:18). In the plural, the Hebrew word for sons can be translated children regardless of gender, as in the phrase “children of Israel” (Ex. 12:37). Perhaps the most significant use of the Hebrew word is for Israel’s relationship to the Lord. God Himself declared: “Israel is My son, My firstborn” (Ex. 4:22).

4:1–3 Although the genealogy of Judah leading up to David has already been recorded (2:3–17), the chronicler here refers to other persons and events relative to that genealogy. In the list of this verse, only Perez is Judah's own son. Hezron is his grandson, Carmi his nephew (2:5, 6), Hur the grandson of Hezron (2:18, 19), and Shobal the grandson of Hur (2:50).

4:4–8 Ephrathah has already been identified as Ephrath, a wife of the early Caleb (2:19) and mother of Hur. She was therefore the "great grandmother" of Bethlehem, since her son Hur was the "grandfather" of Bethlehem (2:50, 51). Elsewhere the names Bethlehem and Ephrath are closely connected. When Jacob was on the way to Mamre, his wife Rachel died near Ephrath, identified also as Bethlehem (Gen. 35:19). In Ruth 4:11, Ephrathah is synonymous with the town of Bethlehem, and in Mic. 5:2 the birthplace of the anticipated Messiah is called Bethlehem Ephrathah.

4:9–12 Inasmuch as Jabez is mentioned in the context of the Judah genealogy, he was probably of that tribe. However, his precise connection to the tribe is not indicated. It may also refer to the man who founded the place called "Jabez," referred to in 2:55 as the home of a caste of scribes. In the present passage he is honored for his desire to enlarge the territory God had given him (v. 10). Even more noble was his wish not to cause pain to others, even though his name means "he will cause pain." Though his birth was painful to his mother, his life was a source of blessing to others, for "God granted him what he requested" (v. 10).

4:13 Othniel, the first of Israel's judges (Josh. 15:17; Judg. 1:13; 3:9), was son-in-law of the later Caleb—the friend and colleague of Joshua.

4:14, 15 Kenaz was the name of Othniel's father (v. 13) and Caleb's brother (Josh. 15:17), as well as of Caleb's grandson. It is clear that Othniel had married his own first cousin, a practice that was common in the OT (Abraham and Sarah in Gen. 11:29) and one not prohibited in the Law of Moses.

4:16–18 In a remarkable statement, told almost in passing, the chronicler identifies the wife of Mered, son of the otherwise unknown Ezrah (v. 17), as Bithiah the daughter of Pharaoh. It is impossible, however, to determine which king of Egypt is in view or how such an arrangement ever was made.

4:19–21 The fact that Shelah named his son Er indicates that he followed the levirate custom of raising up a child in the name of a deceased brother. Er, son of Judah, had died because of some unspecified sin, but had left no children by his wife Tamar (Gen. 38:6–11). His brother Onan refused to honor the levirate practice on Er's behalf, so Tamar seduced Judah, her father-in-law, and bore the twin sons Perez and Zerah (Gen. 38:27–30). Shelah, the third son of Judah, apparently did honor his oldest brother by taking the widow Tamar as his wife and rearing a son in Er's name.

4:22 The chronicler made the point that his documentation rested on ancient texts. Even in the chronicler's own day, there were skeptics who questioned the accuracy of the genealogies.

4:23, 24 The genealogy of Simeon appears next because the Simeonites were a small tribe (v. 27) and had no land allocated to them (Josh. 19:1–9). They settled in the territory of Judah, and their genealogy is attached to his.

4:25–38 Because the tribe of Simeon was so small and had settled within Judah's territory, the tribe lost its identity and was considered a part of Judah when David became king.

An Overdue Judgment

The defeat of the Amalekite groups living in the pasturelands near Gedor (1 Chr. 4:39–43) fulfilled a promise of judgment that the Lord had made centuries before. King Saul had been told to carry out this sentence (1 Sam. 15:2, 3), but he failed to obey in full. As a result, it was not until the days of Hezekiah that the Simeonites were finally able to rid their land of the Amalekite enemies.

4:39–41 The chronicler describes how the Simeonites lived as shepherds in Gedor. This was an area next to Egypt, possibly the same as Gerar (Gen. 26:17–20). The Hamites, who were Egyptians, had lived there at one time (v. 40), but were replaced by Meunites. The Simeonites expelled these people in the days of Hezekiah.

4:42, 43 The Simeonites pursued the Amalekites into Mount Seir, or Edom. to this day: That is, to the time Chronicles was written. The Simeonites had lived in Edom from Hezekiah's time.

5:1, 2 In this verse, the chronicler explains why he does not trace the genealogies of Jacob's sons in birth order. Usually the oldest son of an ancient family became head of the family upon his father's death and also received a larger share of the inheritance than the other children. But Reuben, the firstborn of Jacob, had slept with his father's concubine—perhaps hoping in this way to guarantee his rights as the firstborn son (Gen. 35:22). Because of this despicable act, he lost the birthright. Instead, Jacob blessed the sons of Joseph, Ephraim and Manasseh (Gen. 48:15–22), thereby transmitting the birthright to Joseph and his sons. The birthright assigned to Joseph did not carry with it the right to rule the tribes and nation; that privilege was granted to Judah. Judah prevailed in the sense that God freely chose them as the tribe through which His messianic Deliverer and King would come (Gen. 49:10). The ruler from Judah was David and his dynasty, a fact well known to the ancient Israelites.

5:3–6 Again a genealogy is brought forward to a later time, to part of the Israelite deportation by the Tiglath-Pileser king of Assyria (745–727 B.C.). Though the tribe of Reuben virtually disappeared from the historical record by the time of the monarchy, there still remained people who identified themselves as Reubenites, as this verse makes clear.

(Heb. toledoth) (1 Chr. 5:7; Gen. 10:1; Ruth 4:18) Strong's #8435: The Hebrew toledoth is derived from the verb yalad, meaning "to give birth." Toledoth usually introduces an extended genealogical list, such as those in Gen. 5:1, 10:1 and 1 Chr. 5:7, 26:31. Ancient Hebrew culture depended on detailed genealogical lists to determine questions of inheritance and land use rights. After the conquest of Canaan, each tribe received its portion of the Promised Land to divide between its clans (Josh. 13—19). Land rights remained in the clans, passed down as part of the inheritance from father to oldest son, or daughter if there was no son (Num. 27). Other matters, such as service in the temple and royal succession, were also determined by genealogy. Old Testament genealogies attest to God's faithfulness in fulfilling His promise to make Israel a "great nation" (Gen. 12:1–3), and the genealogy of Matt. 1 shows Jesus as the legitimate heir to David's throne.

5:7–9 Part of the reason for the absence of Reuben in the historical account was the tribe's need to seek greater pasture lands for their animals. They had pushed east into the wilderness as far as the River Euphrates. For this reason, the Reubenites were the first to be deported by the Assyrians (v. 6).

5:10, 11 Gad lived near Reuben and the half tribe of Manasseh. Gad was one of the tribes that sought permission from Moses to settle east of the Jordan rather than west (Num. 32:1–42). Reuben occupied the area just east of the Dead Sea and the lower Jordan valley; Gad, the land of Bashan due east of the river; and Manasseh, the land to the east and north of the Sea of Galilee.

5:12–17 Once more the chronicler alludes to his sources, this time to genealogical records from the time of Jotham (750–735 B.C.) and Jeroboam II (793–753 B.C.). He wanted to emphasize that the genealogies are based on solid documentary research in texts that preceded his own time by more than 300 years.

5:18, 19 The Hagrites and their allies were probably desert peoples who felt increasing pressure from the expanding Israelite population. Their efforts at resisting the Israelites took place in the days of Saul (v. 10), though the narratives of Saul do not mention them.

5:20 they were helped: The help here came from God Himself in answer to their prayers. The people of Reuben, Gad, and Manasseh fielded an army of more then 44,000 men (v. 18), but ultimately it was God who brought success.

5:21, 22 the war was God's: This confirms the statement about God helping the Israelites in v. 20 and goes beyond it by referring to a practice of OT times known as "The Lord's War." At times, God commanded an offensive war as a means of achieving His purposes of conquest and occupation of the Promised Land (Deut. 20:1–20). At those times, God made it clear that the battle was by His initiative and that He would ensure its success. the captivity: In the light of vv. 6, 26, the captivity must be that of Tiglath-Pileser of Assyria, who carried off a significant portion of the Israelite population (2 Kin. 15:29).

5:23–26 The famous king Tiglath-Pileser, who reigned around 745–727 B.C., has gone down in Assyrian annals as one of the most powerful rulers of the neo-Assyrian period. The chronicler's reference to him as Pul (2 Kin. 15:19), once thought by some to be a sheer invention or a historically unfounded device of the biblical writers, has in recent decades been found in Tiglath's own records as "Pulu," a throne-name used alternatively with his more familiar one. Gozan is Guzanu or Tell Halaf on the Habor River.

6:1 Levi: All religious personnel involved in tabernacle or temple ministry had to be members of the tribe of Levi. Aaron was himself a Levite, and from the beginning of the priesthood his descendants were designated as the only ones who could serve as priests (6:16–25; Ex. 28:1). Later the Levites were especially set apart for service in the tabernacle in a role subsidiary to the priests (Num. 18:1–7). Anyone who wanted to serve in the temple had to establish his Levitical credentials. The present genealogy was designed at least in part to meet that need.

6:2 Kohath: This son of Levi was the one to whom the office of priest became exclusively connected. Hence, every priest had to be a Levite, but not every Levite could become a priest.

6:3, 4 Beginning with Eleazar, the genealogy traces the line of high priests through Jehozadak, the priest who went into Babylonian exile with his people (v. 15). Including Eleazar and Jehozadak, there were at least 22 high priests in unbroken succession. Another line of priests began with Ithamar, including such persons as Eli, Ahimelech, and Abiathar. In the days of David, priestly service was divided between the Eleazar and Ithamar priests, with the Eleazar serving two-thirds of the time and the Ithamar one-third because of the difference in their numbers (24:1–5). Solomon rejected the Ithamar priesthood, reserving the honor of the priesthood exclusively for the priests descended from Eleazar (1 Kin. 2:26, 27).

6:5–8 Zadok: This priest, not the same person as the Zadok of v. 12, was the one selected by David to serve along with Ahimelech the son of Abiathar as high priest (2 Sam. 8:17). Eventually Zadok became sole high priest because of Abiathar's rebellion against Solomon (1 Kin. 2:26, 27).

6:9, 10 The detail that this Azariah ministered in Solomon's temple distinguishes this priest from his grandfather of the same name (v. 9).

6:11–14 Jehozadak: This last priest in the list was carried into exile in Babylon (v. 15). He was the father of Joshua, the priest who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel to rebuild the temple and reestablish the Jewish community (Hag. 1:1, 12, 14).

6:15–17 Gershon: The purpose of the following genealogy was to list the principal offspring of the sons of Levi who were not priests, but regular or "ordinary" Levites.

6:18–21 Amram was the father of Aaron and the whole line of high priests. All other priests had to trace their lineage to Kohath through his other sons Izhar, Hebron, and Uzziel. Descendants of Levi who were not sons of Kohath could not be priests at all.

6:22 Amminadab is another name for Izhar (v. 18), who otherwise appears as the father of Korah (6:37, 38; Ex. 6:21; Num. 16:1).

6:23–27 The Levite Elkanah was the ancestor of Samuel the prophet. His line here, which reads Zophai, Nahath, Eliab, Jeroham, Elkanah, appears in 1 Sam. 1:1 as Zuph, Tohu, Elihu, Jeroham, and Elkanah. A parallel genealogy in 1 Chr. 6:34, 35 reads in reverse order: Elkanah, Zuph, Toah, Eliel, Jeroham, Elkanah. That these names varied in spelling and even in form was an accepted practice and does not make false the historicity of the persons or the lists. Nahath: This ancestor of Samuel is otherwise known as Toah (v. 34) or Tohu (1 Sam. 1:1).

6:28–32 Samuel: Samuel's ancestors were described elsewhere as Ephraimites (1 Sam. 1:1). Although Samuel was an Ephraimite by virtue of his residence in Ramathaim Zophim, a city in the tribal territory of Ephraim, this genealogy makes it clear that he was in fact a Levite. This explains why he could be trained in the tabernacle under Eli the priest (1 Sam. 2:11) and later officiate at public services that included sacrifices (1 Sam. 9:13; 10:8).

6:33–47 The temple musicians also were Levites and were divided up into three groups according to their descent from Levi's three sons. The Kohathites in David's time were led by Heman, grandson of Samuel; the Gershonites by Asaph (vv. 39, 43); and the Merarites by Ethan (vv. 44, 47). Ethan was otherwise known as Jeduthun (25:1). A glance at the genealogies of the three Levitical leaders, all of which trace back to Levi, reveals that the lists are selective with many names, particularly in the lineage of Asaph and Ethan, being omitted.

The Service of the Levites

From the time of the Exodus, the Levites served as custodians of Israel's religious life. At first they were primarily responsible for the tabernacle (1 Chr. 6:48), Israel's mobile worship center (Ex. 27:9). Later they took on additional responsibilities for teaching among the tribes, which they did from certain designated centers known as Levitical cities (Josh. 21:1–3). After Israel became a monarchy and David came to power, the ark was relocated to Jerusalem and the Levites' duties changed (1 Chr. 23:24–32).

6:48, 49 In contrast to the Levites just listed, Aaron and his descendants had the privilege and responsibility of the office of the high priest. What set them apart from the other Levites was their access to the altar of burnt offering and incense and their work of making atonement for Israel. Levites could assist in this ministry and could officiate at local sacrifices. See the actions of the Levite Samuel (1 Sam. 7:9; 9:12, 13; 16:2–5). However, only priests in the line of Aaron could present sacrifices at the tabernacle or temple.

6:50–53 sons of Aaron: The genealogy of vv. 50–53 is the same as that in vv. 4–8, but this list ends with Ahimaaz. This list recites the line of Aaron only until the time of David (v. 31). Zadok and Ahimaaz were the last of the priests in the line of Eleazar under David's administration (2 Sam. 15:35, 36).

6:54 dwelling places: The remainder of the chapter describes the allocation of cities and towns to the priests (vv. 54–60), the rest of the Kohathites (vv. 61, 66–70), the Gershonites (vv. 62, 71–76), and the Merarites (vv. 63, 77–81).

6:55 Because the priests were all Kohathites, the cities of the priests were within the districts assigned to Kohath. Hebron, located in Judah, is the first of these cities. surrounding common-lands: The priests and Levites occupied not only houses within the city walls, but they owned and worked fields immediately adjacent to the cities as well. These common-lands extended out from the perimeters of the city walls for a thousand cubits (about 1,500 ft.) in every direction (Num. 35:4, 5) and could be used for farming and grazing (Num. 35:3). This does not mean that the priests and Levites supported themselves by farming, for the Law is clear that they were to live on the tithes and offerings of the other tribes (Num. 18:21–32). The produce they received from the common-lands was a bonus.

6:56 Hebron had originally been assigned to the faithful spy Caleb as part of his inheritance (Josh. 15:13). However, Caleb's inheritance was further defined as not the city proper, but the nearby fields and villages (Josh. 21:11, 12). Caleb's fields were outside the thousand-cubit circumference that belonged to the priests of Hebron.

6:57–59 The Law specified that in the event of an unintentional killing, the perpetrator could find sanctuary in one of six cities of refuge scattered throughout the land (Num. 35:9–15). He or she could remain there in safety until the case came to trial (Num. 35:16–28). These six cities were included among the 48 Levitical cities, and Hebron was one of them.

6:60 The number thirteen refers to the original allotment of cities in Josh. 21:13–19. The chronicler was listing the priestly cities that existed in his own day, nearly a thousand years after the original distribution. This accounts not only for two missing cities, Juttah and Gibeon, but also for the variation in the spelling of some of the names as well. The priestly cities were concentrated in the areas of Judah and Benjamin, conveniently located near the temple in Jerusalem.

6:61–65 rest of … the Kohathites: These were the Levites who were not priests. Their cities were situated mainly in the half tribe of Manasseh on the west of the Jordan (v. 70), just south of the plain of Jezreel.

6:66 Beginning here, there is a continuation of the description of non-priestly Kohathite cities begun in v. 61. Some of these cities were in Ephraim, with Manasseh to the north and Benjamin to the south.

6:67–70 Like Hebron, Shechem was both a Levitical city and a city of refuge. Shechem was especially significant in Israel. It was the site of Abraham's first altar in Canaan (Gen. 12:6, 7), the place where Jacob bought a piece of land (Gen. 33:19), and the location of the first capital of the northern kingdom (1 Kin. 12:25).

6:71–75 Gershon: The tribal areas containing the cities of the Gershonite Levites were East Manasseh; Issachar, north of West Manasseh (v. 72); Asher, on the Mediterranean coast north of Mount Carmel (v. 74); and Naphtali, west and north of the Sea of Galilee (v. 76). Golan: This city in Bashan east of the Jordan was a city of refuge.

6:76 Kedesh was another of the six cities of refuge. It was the most northern of the three west of the Jordan.

6:77 The third Levitical order, that of Merari, occupied cities in Zebulun. Reuben was east of the Dead Sea (v. 78), and Gad was east of the Jordan from the Dead Sea almost to the Sea of Galilee (v. 80).

6:78–79 Bezer was also a city of refuge, the farthest south of those east of the Jordan.

6:80, 81 Another city of refuge, Ramoth in Gilead, was directly east of the Jordan. In this way the cities of refuge were distributed throughout the land so that any Israelite would be within a few miles of one of them. All six cities of refuge were assigned to the Levites, with Hebron designated for the priests (v. 55). The cities of refuge were assigned this way because the priests and Levites had judicial responsibilities in the cases involving unintentional homicide (Num. 35:25, 28; Deut. 17:8–13; 19:17–21).

7:1, 2 The total here was limited to the sons of Tola. Undoubtedly there were thousands of other tribesmen of Issachar at that time, descendants of the three other sons of Issachar (v. 1).

7:3, 4 thirty-six thousand: These appear to be the offspring of Uzzi (v. 3), the son of Tola (v. 2). Since the figure is much greater than the 22,600 of v. 2, it must reflect the population of a much later time, perhaps as late as the period just before the fall of Samaria in 722 B.C. At that time, Issachar would have had its largest population.

7:5 This is the grand total of all the fighting men of Issachar at some unspecified time. This may also reflect the population at its greatest, some time just prior to 722 B.C.

7:6–12 The chronicler recounted the genealogies of Benjamin in some detail because King Saul was a Benjamite (7:6–12; 8:1–40; 9:35–44). Saul was an important figure even though his reign ended tragically. The complexity of the biblical genealogies can be illustrated by comparing the list of Benjamin's sons here with that in 8:1, 2; Gen. 46:21; Num. 26:38, 39. The differences in these genealogies are most likely due to the listing of principal descendants of different time periods.

7:13 The unusual brevity of the genealogy here may reflect the greatly reduced size and importance of Naphtali following the maraudings of the Assyrians under Tiglath-Pileser III. Naphtali's tribal area was specifically pointed out as the object of the Assyrian campaigns (2 Kin. 15:29). sons of Bilhah: Technically it was Naphtali who was son of Bilhah, Rachel's handmaid (Gen. 30:7, 8). The fact that the sons of Naphtali are here called sons of Bilhah points to the flexibility and latitude of the word "sons" and, indeed, of the genealogies themselves. These offspring of Bilhah were, in fact, her grandsons. This little notation may also account for the location of the Naphtali genealogy here, for Benjamin, the head of the immediately preceding one, was the son of Rachel, mistress of Bilhah.

7:14 Manasseh was the son of Joseph. Machir: Machir's daughter became the wife of Judah's grandson Hezron, thus joining the two tribes of Manasseh and Judah (2:21).

7:15–19 If the Huppim and Shuppim here are the same as in v. 12, the tribe of Manasseh and the tribe of Benjamin were connected through the marriage of Machir and Maachah. Zelophehad: Apparently a grandson of Gilead (Num. 26:30–33), this man had no sons. This situation prompted Moses to announce God's provision for the inheritance rights of daughters in such cases (Num. 36:1–9).

7:20–22 The genealogy of Ephraim follows the genealogy of his brother Manasseh. Tahath: This name and Shuthelah both occur twice, illustrating the custom of sons being named for their grandfathers or more remote ancestors. The men of Gath were probably the pre-conquest Philistines (Gen. 21:32, 34; Ex. 13:17). Since the story involves Ephraim's sons in particular and not just the tribe of Ephraim, this verse establishes that Jacob's family before the Exodus had not completely lost contact with the land of Canaan.

7:23, 24 Lower and Upper Beth Horon: These places were in Ephraim near the border with Benjamin.

7:25–27 The fact that there were nine generations between Joshua, the famous successor to Moses, and Ephraim (vv. 23–27) supports the view that the story in vv. 21, 22 occurred before the Exodus.

7:28, 29 children of Joseph: As this phrase makes clear, vv. 28, 29 include the cities of both Ephraim and Manasseh. The cities of Beth Shean, Taanach, Megiddo, and Dor were located in Manasseh.

7:30–39 Asher: This is the last tribal genealogy in 1 Chronicles. It may be compared with the genealogies of Asher in Gen. 46:17 and Num. 26:44–46.

7:40 twenty-six thousand: This number of fighting men would place the completion of this genealogy in the period of David, as stated in v. 2.

8:1, 2 The reason for this second and much more detailed genealogy of Benjamin was its climactic focus on the genealogy of King Saul (vv. 29–40).

8:3–5 Addar is spelled "Ard" in Num. 26:40 and Gen. 46:21. Comparison with those passages indicates that what appear here to be sons of Benjamin are in fact grandsons and even later generations.

8:6–8 A grandson of Jediael (7:10) or Ashbel (7:6), Ehud apparently was the link between Benjamin and Saul. The sons of Ehud moved the Benjamites from Geba to Manahath. The former town was a Benjamite site on the border of Judah, about six miles northeast of Jerusalem.

8:9–11 There was a well-known Moabite king named Mesha. Both the Scriptures (2 Kin. 3:4) and the Moabite Stone attest to this fact. The reference here to Mesha as a son of Shaharaim and Hodesh, a Moabite wife (v. 8), suggests that the illustrious Moabite king may have had a Benjamite father, but the evidence is not conclusive.

8:12 Ono and Lod were ancient towns about twelve and seven miles southeast of Joppa. The sons of Elpaal probably rebuilt these ancient cities.

8:13–27 Aijalon and Gath were two places in the western lowlands of Israel, about seventeen miles apart.

8:28 These dwelt in Jerusalem: This means that the last generation in the preceding genealogy lived in Jerusalem. This city was not taken by David until approximately 1004 B.C., so the line of Benjamin was traced to at least that time. Moreover, the fact that David succeeded Saul did not mean that all Benjamites were excluded from Jerusalem or for that matter from David's favor. For example, David was careful to attend to Jonathan's survivors (2 Sam. 9:1–13), and he gave other Benjamites positions of responsibility in his new government (11:31; 12:1–7, 29).

8:29 A comparison of this genealogy (vv. 29–40) with that of 9:35–44 shows that the father of Gibeon was Jeiel. The city of Gibeon was a prominent city that existed long before this time, as the conquest narrative makes plain (Josh. 9:1–27).

8:30, 31 Kish was the father of Saul (v. 33; 9:39). In this passage the relationship between Jeiel and Kish is unclear, because Kish is also named as the son of Ner (v. 33). However, in 9:35–39 the lineage is clearly traced from Jeiel to Ner to Kish and finally to Saul.

8:32 Since Saul was not yet born at this point in the genealogy, the Jerusalem here is the city of pre-Davidic times. Jerusalem remained under Jebusite control until David conquered it (2 Sam. 5:6–10). Perhaps at this time the Benjamites lived among the Jebusites.

8:33 Abinadab was eventually killed with his father on the battlefield at Gilboa (10:2; 1 Sam. 31:2). Esh-Baal evidently was Saul's youngest son, since he was not named in the genealogies of the beginning of Saul's reign (1 Sam. 14:49). He succeeded Saul as king of the northern kingdom after the five-year period in which Abner was in charge (2 Sam. 2:10; 5:4, 5). The pagan name Esh-Baal (meaning "fire of Baal") demonstrates the degree to which Saul had succumbed to religious syncretism. The author of 2 Samuel attempted to downplay the pagan connotations of Esh-Baal by calling him Ishbosheth, meaning the "Man of Shame" (2 Sam. 2:8).

8:34–40 The same pagan tendency appears in the name of Jonathan's son. Merib-Baal means something like "Baal Is My Advocate."

9:1 The book or scroll mentioned here was not the canonical books of Kings, because those contain no genealogies. The reference must be to genealogical sources compiled and collected by the scribes of the kings of Israel. carried … to Babylon: This reference to the Babylonian captivity prepares the way for the genealogies and lists that follow (vv. 3, 4). As v. 3 points out, the evacuation of the cities and towns of Judah provided dwelling places for the returnees whose names follow.

IN CONTEXT

Early Temple Servants

The Nethinim (1 Chr. 9:2) were a group of temple servants who assisted the Levites. They performed menial chores such as cleaning the temple, carrying water and wood to the altar, and scrubbing utensils used in the sacrificial ceremonies. The name Nethinim means "those who are given."

Ezra's list of the returnees from the captivity mentions the Nethinim in conjunction with "the sons of Solomon's servants" (Ezra 2:43–58). Because the names used are not Hebrew, some have suggested that both groups were Gentiles, possibly descendants of the Canaanites or some other group that the Israelites had conquered. David and the leaders of Israel had appointed these groups to serve the Levites (8:20).

The Nethinim were not the first group of foreigners to be given servile positions among the Israelites. During the conquest of Canaan, Joshua made peace with the men of Gibeon, and they became woodcutters and water carriers (Josh. 9).

9:2 Israelites: The deportation of Israel by the Assyrians from 734 to 722 B.C. resulted in Israel's dispersion throughout the eastern Mediterranean world. However, it is apparent from this verse that some of them joined their Judean brethren in the return from Babylon after 539 B.C. The word Nethinim, derived from the Hebrew verb "to give" and thus meaning "the ones given," refers to temple slaves. Since the Nethinim were distinct from the priests and Levites, these temple slaves must have been from other tribes (Ezra 2:43; 7:7; Neh. 7:46, 60, 73; 10:28).

9:3 Ephraim and Manasseh: These two tribes descended from Joseph and were especially blessed by the Lord (Gen. 49:22–26; Deut. 33:13–17). However, these two tribes did not belong to the nation of Judah. This is another confirmation that the community included Israelites as well as Judeans.

9:4–10 Uthai and the following names (vv. 4–9) are otherwise unattested, even in the lists of Nehemiah 11:4–24, which seem to allude to the same post-exile restoration. It may be that neither list is exhaustive and that the chronicler and Nehemiah respectively chose names as they did to suit particular purposes that are no longer evident to the modern reader.

9:11–13 Azariah: The list of priests that follows (vv. 11, 12) is greatly abbreviated when compared with the list in 6:3–15.This again indicates that biblical genealogies, while accurate when testable, are not always complete.

9:14–16 The normal pattern of dividing the genealogy of the Levites according to the three sons of Levi is not followed here (6:1). Rather, there are seven families listed in vv. 14–16, six of them living in Jerusalem and the seventh in Netophah. Merari is mentioned, but not Kohath or Gershon. In place of Gershon stands his descendant Asaph (6:39–43). Jeduthun: This is another name for Ethan, descendant of Merari (6:44–47). Both vv. 14 and 16 appear to list Merarites. Elkanah: The presence of this name suggests that this family is Kohathite (6:33–38). Netophathites: This refers to the inhabitants of the village of Netophah, a little over three miles southeast of Bethlehem. The Gershonites and Merarites evidently lived in Jerusalem in the post-exilic period, while the Kohathite or the Korahite Levites lived in Netophah.

9:17, 18 King's Gate on the east: This was the famous gate just east of the temple (Ezek. 46:1, 2). After the days of the wilderness tabernacle (Num. 3:27–31), and since the time of Zechariah and the temple of Solomon (v. 21; 26:1, 2, 14), the Korahites had been responsible for keeping the gates and attending to the place of worship.

9:19–21 As descendants of Kohath (Ex. 6:18, 21), Korah and his line had close connections with the priesthood. However, they could not be priests since they were descended from Izhar rather than Amram. Their close connection explains why these particular Levites ministered within the precincts of the temple.

9:22–24 The gatekeepers had been appointed in the days of David and Samuel (26:1–19). Since Samuel died long before David made his appointments, the chronicler must be saying that David was encouraged and instructed by the prophet from the days of his youth. In a sense, Samuel appointed the gatekeepers through David.

9:25 The gatekeepers lived in villages surrounding Jerusalem (v. 22). They came to Jerusalem on a rotating schedule to attend to their temple duties, serving for periods of seven days.

9:26 chief gatekeepers: Since there were four sides to the city and temple (v. 24) and four main gates, there must also be four Levites responsible for the oversight of these portals. They opened and closed the gates and provided security (v. 27). However, they also oversaw all the various rooms and other facilities of the temple. treasuries: This referred to the places where money was kept and to storage rooms in general.

9:27–29 they lodged: Whereas the Levites who tended the gates lived in surrounding villages, those in charge must have lived in the city, probably near the gates of the temple. They had to be nearby in order to supervise temple affairs, including the opening and closing of the gates.

9:30–32 Although the Levites could handle such matters as the serving vessels (v. 28), furnishings, implements, and even materials for an offering (such as flour, wine, incense, and spices, v. 29), they were not allowed to prepare the ointment of the spices. This was reserved for the priests alone, as Ex. 30:23–25, 33, 37, 38 states.

9:33, 34 The head singers, like the chief gatekeepers (vv. 26, 27), lived in Jerusalem to be constantly on hand to supervise the ministry of the temple musicians. They dwelt at Jerusalem: In fact, it was the general policy that all the heads of the various Levitical classes would live in the capital.

9:35, 36 Ner is rendered “Zechar” in 8:31.

9:37–44 The interest the chronicler has in the genealogy of Jonathan probably springs from Jonathan’s close friendship with David (1 Sam. 18:1).

Mount Gilboa, site of the battle in which King Saul and three of his sons were killed by the Philistines (1 Chr. 10:1–7).

10:1 Some 1,700 feet in elevation, Mount Gilboa lies in the southeastern part of the plain of Jezreel. This was Philistine territory from the time they arrived there in about 1200 B.C. The following account of Saul's final battle closely parallels the account in 1 Sam. 31:1–13.

10:2, 3 Saul's sons: There was a fourth son, Ishbosheth. He survived this battle and became king of Israel five years after Saul's death.

10:4, 5 Most Semites practiced circumcision for either hygienic or religious purposes, but for the Hebrews it was the sign of God's promise through Abraham to them. The uncircumcised were those outside, often their enemies the Philistines. abuse: The Philistines could not only harm Saul personally, but bring shame on the nation that had him as their leader. Saul was driven to an extreme course of action. Suicide was a rare occurrence among the Hebrews of OT times (v. 5; 2 Sam. 17:23; 1 Kin. 16:18).

10:6 all his house died: This statement was written in anticipation of the death of Ishbosheth, the last of Saul's sons. With Ishbosheth's death (2 Sam. 4:5, 7), Saul's dynasty came to an end.

10:7, 8 Though the Philistines had long dominated the Jezreel-Esdraelon Valley, there were Israelite cities in the region for some time. With Saul's death, even these were lost to the Philistines, who took them over when the Israelites abandoned them.

10:9 They stripped him: The parallel passage in 1 Sam. 31:9 adds, "and they cut off his head."

10:10 Dagon was worshiped by the Philistines and other peoples in Syria and northwest Mesopotamia as the god of grain. A hundred years earlier, the Philistines had placed the captured ark of the covenant in the temple of Dagon at Ashdod (1 Sam. 5:2). Later Samson stood between the central pillars of a temple of Dagon, where he was mocked by the assembled Philistines (Judg. 16:23–31). Apparently the Philistines celebrated military victory by bringing a trophy of their success back to their temple, where it could be displayed as a tribute to the might of their god.

10:11 Jabesh Gilead was just east of the Jordan, not far from Beth Shan. The care the people of this town took in retrieving Saul's corpse from Beth Shan was doubtless in memory of Saul's quick response to their cry for help early in his reign (1 Sam. 11:1–11). In the life of Saul, Jabesh Gilead may go back even further, for in the early days of the judges the tribe of Benjamin had been nearly annihilated in a bloody civil war brought about by the murder of the concubine of the Ephraimite Levite (Judg. 19:1–30), a murder in Benjamite territory which the Benjamites refused to punish (Judg. 20:1–48). A result of the intertribal warfare was the depletion of the women of Benjamin to such a degree that the surviving men had no wives by whom they could repopulate the tribe. To provide such wives, women from Shiloh and Jabesh Gilead were forcibly brought to Benjamin for that purpose (Judg. 21:1–25). It is likely that one of these was an ancestress of Saul himself, which could also explain his quick response to their call for aid and their confidence in making their appeal in the first place.

The Value of Fasting

Responding to modern society's obsession with image and appearance, some weight-loss programs prescribe fasting. In ancient Israel, fasting was observed for more purposes than that. For example, the gallant men of Gilead fasted for seven days to express their grief over King Saul's death (1 Chr. 10:12). Rather than hide their sadness and feelings of loss, they openly expressed it by using fasting as a cleansing discipline.

Other purposes for fasting among the Israelites included: • commemorating special occasions of God's deliverance (Zech. 8:19) • repenting of and grieving for disobedience and sin against the Lord (Judg. 20:26; 1 Sam. 7:6) • expressing humility before God (Lev. 16:29; Ps. 69:10) • seeking guidance from the Lord by clearing out the senses and focusing on Him (Ex. 34:28; 2 Chr. 20:3, 4) Today one hears much about "focus," "concentration," and "working the program" in areas such as sports, the workplace, and psychotherapy. Fasting is a means toward spiritual focus by concentrating on God rather than on food and other personal needs.

10:12 This strange turn of events requires attention to 1 Sam. 31:12, which states that the people of Jabesh burned the bodies of Saul and his sons. This, of course, left only bones.

10:13 Saul's untimely death was the result of disobedience to God's word. He had disobeyed God by not waiting for Samuel to perform a sacrifice and by not utterly destroying the Amalekites (1 Sam. 13:1–15; 15:10–23). consulted a medium: Before the battle, Saul had asked for Samuel's advice through the witch of En Dor (1 Sam. 28:3–25).

10:14 He killed him: This statement is shocking in its bluntness. In the final analysis, Saul's death was not by his own hand but by the hand of God. The Lord let Saul pursue a course that led to death. turned the kingdom over: This statement confirmed Samuel's earlier word to Saul, "The LORD has torn the kingdom of Israel from you today, and has given it to a neighbor of yours, who is better than you" (1 Sam. 15:28).

11:1, 2 Made famous because Abraham lived (Gen. 13:18) and was buried there (Gen. 25:9), Hebron was a Levitical city as well (6:54, 55). David made it his capital following Saul's death (2 Sam. 2:3) and reigned there until Ishbosheth's death seven years later (2 Sam. 4:1–12; 5:5). David's legitimacy as successor to Saul was confirmed by the support he received from all the tribes. You shall … be ruler: The crowds were very much aware of the promise God had made to David (1 Sam. 16:12; 24:20; 28:17).

David at Hebron

While First Chronicles describes David's ascension to the throne in three verses, Second Samuel describes it in three chapters. The fundamental difference between the two accounts lies in the purposes of the authors.

The author of 2 Samuel goes to great lengths to describe the rocky course that David had to travel before unifying the entire nation. Although the Judeans anointed David king immediately after Saul's death, the rest of Israel crowned Saul's son Ishbosheth as king. Abner, Saul's cousin and military commander, supported Ishbosheth's kingship vigorously and confronted David's army in battle.

When it became apparent that Ishbosheth had no ability to rule, Abner recognized the inevitability that David would rule over all Israel. Thus Abner set in motion a plan whereby the northern tribes would submit to David, and Abner would be rewarded by becoming the leader of David's armies. The northern tribes submitted, but Joab, jealous about his own role as general, assassinated Abner. Ishbosheth too was murdered by some of his own countrymen. During these tumultuous events, David maintained his integrity. By genuinely mourning for the fallen leaders and by punishing those who had acted treacherously against them, he not only pleased God but also gained the affections of his people (2 Sam. 2:8—5:5). The author of Second Samuel lets us observe David's life up close so that it can become both a model and a warning to us.

The writer of 1 Chronicles emphasizes the unity of all Israel in support of God's anointed, King David. Three short verses in Chronicles stress that all the elders of Israel came to Hebron to covenant with David (11:3), something 2 Samuel only hints at by suggesting that Benjamin as well as Judah recognized David's kingship over the nation (2 Sam. 3:17–21, 37; 5:1–3). Thus the Chronicles narrative gives the impression that the shift of loyalty from Saul to David went without any opposition. For the chronicler's purposes, this was all that was significant about David's accession to the throne. In these events, the chronicler wanted to stress both the unity of the nation and God's choice of David as king.

11:3 The covenant refers to mutual pledges made between a king and his people, ensuring stable and successful government. The Law of Moses made provision for such a covenant (Deut. 17:18–20). Hints of the king's covenant guidelines may be found in the accession of Solomon (29:19; 1 Kin. 2:3) and Joash (2 Kin. 11:4), and in Josiah's promise to obey the statutes of the Book of the Covenant (2 Kin. 23:2, 3). according to … Samuel: Years before, Samuel had anointed David (1 Sam. 16:1, 3, 12, 13). This second anointing confirmed the first one.

11:4 Jebus was another name for Jerusalem. The name was coined by the Israelites because the city belonged to the Jebusites. The name does not occur outside the OT (Josh. 15:8; 18:16, 28).

11:5 Another name for Jerusalem was Zion. The original Canaanite city, surrounded by high, thick walls, was considered a stronghold. After David took the city and made it his capital, it became known as the city of David. When the temple was built on Mount Moriah (2 Chr. 3:1), a hill just north of the city, that area and sometimes the whole city was called Mount Zion.

11:6, 7 The stronghold of Zion (11:5) seemed impregnable until Joab found a means of access. As a result, Joab was rewarded with the command of Israel's army. He already enjoyed a close relationship with David because he was a son of Zeruiah, David's sister (2:15, 16).

11:8, 9 The Hebrew noun Millo derives from a verb meaning "to fill" and therefore suggests "filling," "terracing," or the like. Once David occupied Mount Ophel, the original and very small area of Jerusalem, he greatly enlarged it by building retaining walls along the Kidron valley to the east and south and the Tyropoeon valley (or the Valley of Maktesh) to the west. Between these walls and the top of the hill he built terraces, so that various buildings could be constructed there.

David's Mighty Men

David's rise to power was assured from the outset by the promises of God (1 Chr. 11:10; 1 Sam. 13:14; 15:28; 16:12). Nevertheless, the journey from the pastures near Bethlehem to the palace in Jerusalem was long and difficult. Along the way, David attracted a growing movement of loyal supporters who helped him attain the throne. Some of the most important of these followers were known as "mighty men."

These warriors or champions are celebrated for their military victories (2 Sam. 23; 1 Chr. 11), many of which were won after David was crowned king of Israel. But the nucleus of this group came from humble beginnings. When David was fleeing from Saul, renegades from Israelite society began gathering to the young Bethlehemite. Scripture gives three reasons why they found their way to David: distress, debt, and discontent (1 Sam. 22:2). Apparently having nothing to lose, they sided with David, who was also in trouble with the king.

Saul quickly learned of this band, which at first numbered about 400. Suspicious that his own people might defect, Saul chided his servants, "Will the son of Jesse give every one of you fields and vineyards, and make you all captains?" (22:7). In fact, the answer to this question was yes. Under David and his successor Solomon, the land prospered exceedingly (2 Sam. 6:19; 7:1; 1 Kin. 4:25), and many of David's followers became renowned as "mighty men."

During the days of David's flight from Saul, he and his followers acted as raiders, attacking Israel's enemies (1 Sam. 23:5; 27:8–12). These skirmishes served as training exercises for the days ahead. As soon as Saul was dead, David began his ascent to the throne and his mighty men rose to positions of power along with him. He was crowned king of Judah and his men followed him to Hebron (2 Sam. 2:3). From there they helped him fight a seven-year civil war with the house of Saul (3:1).

Finally, after David had been crowned king over all Israel, his men distinguished themselves by helping him capture Jebus, or Jerusalem, which then became his capital (5:6–10). The mighty men became the nucleus of a powerful army (5:17–25; 8:1–18).

11:10–12 the mighty men: This phrase applied to three persons, Jashobeam, Eleazar (v. 12), and Shammah (2 Sam. 23:11, 12). They were distinguished for their bravery and their service to David. Joab, already singled out as "chief" (v. 6), was above them in rank. Jashobeam: This first of the mighty men, known in 2 Sam. 23:8 as Josheb-Basshebeth, showed his heroism by slaying three hundred of the enemy single-handed. This event is recorded only here.

11:13, 14 If Pasdammin is the same as Ephesdammim, this may be the campaign against the Philistines in which David slew Goliath (1 Sam. 17:1). Eleazar, the second mighty man (v. 12), could then trace his association with David back many years. If this is the same battle, the chronicler adds certain details such as the piece of ground full of barley and the Israelites standing in the middle of that field.

11:15 Another elite group of three, not named in this episode, penetrated the defenses of the Philistines. The cave of Adullam was about 12 miles southwest of Bethlehem and was one of David's favorite hiding places in the days of his flight from Saul (1 Sam. 22:1). The Valley of Rephaim is southwest of Jerusalem in the direction of Adullam.

11:16, 17 It was particularly galling to David that the Philistines had come to occupy his hometown, Bethlehem. The occasion seems to have been David's conflict with the Philistines after he had been anointed king of Israel at Hebron but before he took Jerusalem (2 Sam. 5:17–25; 23:13–17). How the Philistines managed to seize Bethlehem is not clear, though their motive may have been to demoralize David, who, perhaps in a whim of nostalgia or personal frustration, longed for a drink of water from the well of Bethlehem, a place so familiar to him that he describes its location to his men.

11:18, 19 David would not drink it: This was not an act of ingratitude. To the contrary, David expressed the utmost sense of appreciation. His men had risked their lives to bring water to David, and now in the face of their selflessness he felt unworthy to drink it. He poured it out to the LORD as though it were an offering of blood (v. 19).

11:20 Abishai was a brother of Joab and a son of David's sister Zeruiah (2:16). Like Joab, Abishai was chief over other warriors because of his great exploits.

11:21, 22 the first three: This refers to Jashobeam, Eleazar (vv. 11, 12), and Shammah. Chronicles does not mention the third one by name (2 Sam.

23:11, 12) but does acknowledge his existence (v. 12). For reasons not spelled out, Abishai was not qualified to be in the ranks of the first three.

11:23 Five cubits was about seven and a half feet.

11:24 three mighty men: Only Abishai and Benaiah were named as members of this group.

11:25 The next level below Joab, the commander, and the two groups of "three mighty men" was the thirty. Their names appear in vv. 26–47 and also in 2 Sam. 23:24–39. The term thirty may denote an elite military unit that consisted of approximately thirty men. The term does not indicate a literal number, because the list in vv. 26–47 includes more than thirty names.

11:26–38 Asahel was the third son of David's sister Zeruiah (2:16). Apparently he was not one of the "three mighty men," but his position as first in the list of "the thirty" suggests that he had a high rank. He may have failed to achieve greater prominence because of his untimely death at the hand of Abner (2 Sam. 2:18–23).

11:39, 40 Ammonite: Some of David's heroes were not Israelites. They may have been immigrants or mercenaries.

11:41 Uriah the Hittite: The irony of including this warrior in the list is obvious from the story of his death at the hands of David and Joab (2 Sam. 11:6–17). With remarkable candor, both Samuel and Chronicles include Uriah's name among the thirty.

11:42–47 Adina the Reubenite also appears to have led a group of the thirty. Though there are only sixteen names from Zabad through Jaasiel (vv. 41, 47), these sixteen might have formed the nucleus of such a military unit. The others were no longer known, or the list was drawn up before the unit was complete.

12:1 About 25 miles southwest of Gath, Ziklag became David's private possession. He received it after he had crossed over into Philistia to get away from Saul and had placed himself under the lordship of Achish, the ruler of the city-state of Gath (1 Sam. 27:1–7). As an ally and vassal of Achish, David was required to pay tribute and show his loyalty and submission. Therefore, he made raids from Ziklag against various desert tribes, seizing their properties and bringing some of the plunder back to the Philistines. The rest he distributed to his own countrymen without the Philistines' knowledge. Meanwhile, David was joined at Ziklag by many other "outlaws" and refugees from Judah until he had a sizable number of mighty men there (1 Sam. 27:8–12).

12:2, 3 Included among his warriors were ambidextrous Benjamites, some of Saul's own fellow tribesmen. This shows the extent of dissatisfaction with Saul's rule. That these Benjamites could use the right hand as well as the left was ironic, because the name Benjamin means "Son of the Right Hand" (Judg. 20:16).

12:4, 5 This may suggest that the Benjamites listed here formed a unit known technically as the thirty (11:25), although not exactly thirty names are recorded here.

12:6, 7 Since the other heroes such as the Gibeathite in v. 3 were listed by their place of origin, Korah was probably the name of a place in Benjamin. These Korahites should not be confused with the Levites of that name (9:19).

12:8–13 David had attracted a following from all over Israel. The Gadites came from the far northern and central areas east of the Jordan (5:11–17) to join him. The stronghold was the cave of Adullam, David's principal place of refuge in the Judean wilderness (11:15; 1 Sam. 22:1).

12:14 hundred … thousand: These were terms for military units which may or may not have had precisely that many men. The Gadites were so famous for their valor and leadership skills (v. 8) that they rose to high ranks in David's army.

12:15–17 According to the agricultural calendar, the first month was Nisan, corresponding approximately to April. This was the time of the spring rains (Deut. 11:14), when the rivers were often at flood stage (Josh. 3:13; 4:18, 19). Ordinarily a person could not cross the Jordan at such times, but the Gadites were not deterred by such obstacles. As a testimony to their unusual courage, the chronicler states that they crossed the flooded Jordan pursuing their enemies in all directions.

(Heb. shalom) (1 Chr. 12:18; Gen. 43:23; Num. 6:26; Is. 54:13) Strong’s #7965: This word conveys the idea of completeness and well-being—of being a perfect whole. The word denotes an absence of discomfort, whether physical ailments or strife, internal or external (Gen. 43:28; Is. 26:3; Eccl. 3:8). It is used as an ordinary greeting, as a word of assurance, and as a term of blessing (Gen. 43:23; 1 Sam. 25:5, 6; 2 Kin. 5:19). The prophets Jeremiah and Ezekiel spoke out against the false prophets of their day for erroneously prophesying peace (Jer. 6:14; 8:11; Ezek. 13:10, 16). After God’s judgment fell, Jeremiah proclaimed that God’s thoughts toward the captives were for peace and not evil (Jer. 29:11). The word occurs in two important messianic prophecies identifying the Messiah as the Prince of Peace and the One who would assure our peace (Is. 9:6; 53:5).

12:18 Amasai was probably an alternative spelling of Amasa, the son of David’s sister Abigail (2:17). He became David’s army commander after Joab had fallen from favor (2 Sam. 19:13), but he held the post for only a short time before being assassinated by Joab (2 Sam. 20:4–13). The murder was all the more reprehensible because Joab and Amasa were first cousins.

12:19, 20 Manasseh defected: This incident reveals how compromised David’s position was when he, as vassal to Achish of Gath (see v. 1), was pressed into joining the Philistines against Saul at Gilboa (1 Sam. 29:1–11). As it turned out, the other Philistine rulers outvoted Achish and sent David back to Ziklag before he had to go to war against his Israelite countrymen.

12:21 When David returned to Ziklag, he found that Amalekites had attacked the city and carried off his family with other prisoners (1 Sam. 30:1). Those who had abandoned David in his march to Gilboa (v. 19) now joined him in his pursuit of these raiders (1 Sam. 30:2–25).

12:22–27 The army of God refers to the angelic hosts, too vast to count. David attracted so many recruits while he was in the wilderness in flight from Saul and at Ziklag that they were beyond counting.

12:28 This Zadok, apparently an Aaronite (v. 27) and therefore a priest, was probably the same Zadok who was first appointed by David as priest at Gibeon (16:39), and then by Solomon at Jerusalem (1 Kin. 2:26, 27, 35). The office of priest was not incompatible with that of warrior, as Phinehas clearly demonstrated (Num. 25:6–9; Josh. 22:30).

12:29, 30 loyal to … Saul: Here is a subtle hint that the transition from Saul to David was not as smooth as a superficial reading of the account might suggest. There had to be a shifting of loyalties, something that usually is difficult, taking time and diplomacy.

12:31 These names represent delegates only and not the entire populations of the tribes. The support David enjoyed would have been even more enormous than the figures alone suggest.

12:32–37 understanding of the times: What the tribes were doing in appointing David king was not a historical fluke. It was the best and only thing to do in light of the present circumstances. The people of Issachar had some among them who understood clearly that God's time had come for His purposes to be put into effect.

12:38 keep ranks: This qualification (vv. 33, 36) pertains certainly to military formation as a skill or mark of discipline. But in the context of David's inauguration it also speaks of undivided loyalty, of one mind. No one was out of step when it came to recognizing that David was God's man and that the hopes of the nation as a theocratic community lay in loyal support of this.

12:39 eating and drinking: Besides the normal festivity that accompanied such a grand occasion as the installation of a king, this phrase alludes to a covenant meal (Gen. 31:43–55; Ex. 24:11)—a meal that solemnized a covenant between David and the people (11:3).

12:40 Issachar, Zebulun, and Naphtali were geographically the most distant of the tribes. The phrase near to them was a way of speaking of the common identity of God's people.

13:1, 2 David consulted: Though David was king and therefore could have acted independently, he understood the importance of godly counsel. Before he undertook the next major step, he sought the advice of his subordinate leaders.

13:3 This ark was the ark of the covenant that contained a copy of the Ten Commandments (Ex. 25:10–22). In the days of Eli, the ark had been captured by the Philistines, in whose hands it remained for several months (1 Sam. 4:11; 6:1). Next it remained at Beth Shemesh for a short time (1 Sam. 6:13–15) and finally it resided at Kirjath Jearim (1 Sam. 6:20—7:1). since the days of Saul: During Saul's reign, the people of Kirjath Jearim kept the ark in their city for safekeeping. Besides holding the Ten Commandments and serving as a throne for God, the ark represented the presence of the living God among the Israelites. David wanted to unify the Israelites around their God, so he brought the ark to the nation's new political center, Jerusalem. The city was already the seat of David's government (11:4–9); now it would become the dwelling place of God. Israelites from as far away as Beersheba and Dan would come to Jerusalem to worship their living Lord.

13:4 Again the chronicler highlighted the unity of the whole nation by saying that all the people agreed with David's decision to bring the ark to Jerusalem.

13:5 Shihor in Egypt: This was another way of referring to the Wadi el-Arish or "River of Egypt" that marked the boundary between Egypt and Canaan. This was Israel's most southwestern point (Num. 34:5; Josh. 13:3). entrance of Hamath: This was the most northern point of the kingdom under David, about one hundred miles north of the Sea of Galilee. It was also known as Lebo Hamath (Josh. 13:5; Judg. 3:3; 2 Chr. 7:8). Kirjath Jearim, otherwise known as Baalah, was a village about eight miles west of Jerusalem. It became the home of the ark of the covenant for more than 100 years (v. 3). It lay within the territory of Judah, just south of the border with Benjamin (Josh. 15:9, 10). While there it was in the custody of a certain Abinadab, who placed it in the cave of his son Eleazar (1 Sam. 7:1). Kirjath Jearim was not a priestly or Levitical city, so it is not likely that this Abinadab was a priest.

13:6 A major feature of the Most Holy Place in both the tabernacle and temple was the ark. Above and behind the ark of the covenant, cherubim extended their wings over the cover (also called the mercy seat) of the ark

(Ex. 25:17–22). The glory of God was perceived as sitting upon the top of the ark as a king sat on a throne. His name: In Deuteronomy, the presence of God is often spoken of as the presence of His name (Deut. 12:1–14).

13:7, 8 Only the Levites carried the ark. They carried it on their shoulders with poles passing through rings on the ark's corners (Num. 4:1–16).

13:9 Chidon's threshing floor is also called "Nachon's threshing floor" (2 Sam. 6:6). A threshing floor was a flat rocky surface on which grain was crushed by threshing sledges drawn by oxen. The floor was probably in or near Kirjath Jearim, for it is unlikely that the cart had gone far before God exposed to them their error in transporting the ark in a way contrary to His commands.

13:10 God struck Uzza dead because of the sacred inviolability of the ark. It was a holy object, representing the presence of God Himself (Ex. 25:21, 22), so it had to be handled in accord with the strictest regulations (Num. 4:5). Handling the ark in any other way, even with the best intention, invited God's anger (Num. 4:15). The narrative dramatically demonstrates God's holiness. His people had to approach Him with respectful awe.

13:11, 12 The threshing floor of Chidon was renamed Perez Uzza, meaning "Outburst Against Uzza." From that time forward, the name of this place would remind people that violating God's holiness meant inviting His wrath.

13:13, 14 A Gittite means someone from Gath, the name of several cities. Since Obed-Edom was a Levite (15:18, 24), he was probably from the Levitical city of Gath Rimmon in Dan (Josh. 21:25).

14:1, 2 A powerful ruler of the Phoenician city-state of Tyre, Hiram king of Tyre is mentioned in the Scriptures and in other sources. He was a contemporary of both David and Solomon. His work for David, constructing a royal palace, must have begun late in David's reign. Moreover, Hiram supplied material for the temple and other buildings, a project not completed until Solomon's twentieth year (1 Kin. 9:10). All this indicates that the chronicler was not writing in chronological order about the building of David's palace and the arrival of the ark. These did not take place early in his reign, but toward the end. build him a house: Once a king in the ancient Middle Eastern world had firmly established himself, he built a palace to publicize that fact. As v. 2 explicitly states, David built his palace with the understanding that God alone had put him in power and exalted him.

David: The Rest of the Story

The Chronicles were probably written at or just after the return of the Jews from exile. They tend to present King David positively and to pass by his foibles and failings. For example, the report of David's wives and family (1 Chr. 14:3–7) excludes the tragic details of his family life. Some of the other incidents omitted from the Chronicles account of David's life include: • David's conflict with and flight from Saul (1 Sam. 18—30).

• Negotiations with Abner, Saul's general (2 Sam. 3:6–21).

• The murders of Abner and Ishbosheth (3:22—4:12).

• David's immorality with Bathsheba and the murder of Uriah, her husband (2 Sam. 11—12).

• The turmoil in David's family as a result of Amnon's rape of Tamar and Absalom's revenge (2 Sam. 13).

• Absalom's rebellion and death, and his father's grief (2 Sam. 15; 18).

• The disputed transfer of power to Solomon following David's death (1 Kin. 1; 2).

14:3 In addition to the wives he had taken in Hebron (2 Sam. 3:2–5), David married others in Jerusalem. Although the Bible never justifies polygamy, ancient kings frequently undertook multiple marriages for political reasons—a king would marry the daughter of another king in order to create a stronger alliance. The larger a king's harem, the more prestige the king enjoyed (3:1–5).

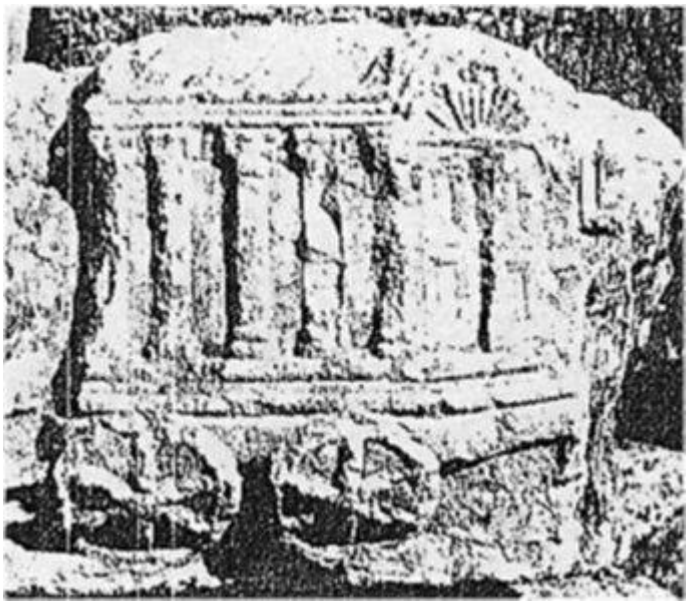
14:4 The four children listed here were all sons of Bathshua (Bathsheba; 3:5).

14:5–9 Extending southwest from Jerusalem and marking the northern border of Judah (Josh. 15:8), the Valley of Rephaim was the scene of many battles between Israel and the Philistines (11:15, 16; 2 Sam. 5:17–22; 23:13–17). The conflict here was a preemptive strike by the Philistines designed to prevent David from taking Jerusalem and making it the capital of Israel (11:4–9). God demonstrated that He was with David by granting him victory over the Philistines.

14:10, 11 Baal Perazim: There may be a reference to this place and event in Is. 28:21.

14:12–15 God has gone out before you: The strategy for this battle was different (vv. 10, 14) because God wanted David to understand that the battle was His, not David's. People often attribute their success to their own intelligence or strength, overlooking the fact that God is the source of all victories.

14:16, 17 Gibeon was about six miles northwest of Jerusalem, and Gezer was about sixteen miles west of Gibeon. The Philistines evidently left the Valley of Rephaim, fled north to Gibeon, and then were pursued all the way to Gezer, a town close to their own territory.



Stone carving of the ark of the covenant. David relocated the ark from Gibeon to Jerusalem soon after he made Jerusalem his capital city (1 Chr. 15:1–28).

15:1 The place for the ark was in the tabernacle in the City of David. The original tabernacle built in Moses' day had been placed at Shiloh, in central Manasseh (Josh. 18:1). It remained there until the capture of the ark by the Philistines (1 Sam. 4:1–11), when it evidently was moved to Nob, just two miles from Jerusalem (1 Sam. 21:1–6). Next, the tabernacle was moved to a high place at Gibeon (2 Chr. 1:3), about two miles north of Saul's city Gibeah. When David became king, he left the Mosaic tabernacle at Gibeon and appointed the priest Zadok to attend to its ministry (16:39). Even after he had built a new tabernacle on Mount Zion and brought the ark into it, the original tabernacle remained at Gibeon. Finally, Solomon brought the ark from Mount Zion and the "tabernacle of meeting" (the tabernacle of Moses) from Gibeon and stored them in the new temple Solomon had built on Mount Moriah (2 Chr. 5:4, 5). In other words, the tent of David was a transitional home for the ark between the wilderness tabernacle and Solomon's temple.

15:2–4 Having learned his lesson from the incident with Uzza (13:10), David commanded that the ark of God be moved this time according to the provisions of the Law. It was to be carried by Levites by means of poles inserted through corner rings (Num. 4:14, 15).

15:5–7 David divided the Levites into divisions according to their genealogies. Uriel was head of the Kohathite clan (6:24), Asaiah was chief of the Merarites (6:30), and Joel was leader of the Gershonites (23:8).

15:8–10 All three of the following families were subclans of the Kohathites. Elizaphan was a grandson of Kohath (Ex. 6:18, 22), Hebron was a son of Kohath (Ex. 6:18), and Uzziel was another son of Kohath (Ex. 6:18).

15:11–16 The transition from the rule of Saul to David involved a transition from the old Mosaic tabernacle to the new place David had established on Mount Zion in preparation for the temple (v. 1). The father of Abiathar, the priest Ahimelech, was in charge of the old tabernacle when it left Shiloh and was moved to Nob (1 Sam. 21:1). Ahimelech (also known as Ahijah; 1 Sam. 14:3; 22:9) was Eli's greatgrandson. Eli must have been a descendant of Aaron's son Ithamar, for the priesthood was taken from his line and given to the line of Eleazar, another son of Aaron (6:3, 4; 1 Sam. 2:22–36). The line of Eleazar produced Zadok (6:8). During David's time, representatives of both the Ithamar and Eleazar high-priestly lineages served concurrently. Zadok, who descended from Eleazar, served at the tabernacle at Gibeon. Abiathar, a descendant of Ithamar, was chief priest at Jerusalem. When Solomon came to power, Abiathar was deposed and Zadok ministered as high priest at the temple (1 Kin. 2:26, 27, 35).

“cymbals”

(Heb. metseleth) (1 Chr. 13:8; 15:16; 16:42; 25:6; Neh. 12:27) Strong’s #4700: The verbal root of this Hebrew word means “to tingle”; thus the noun form indicates some kind of cymbals, described on one occasion as made of bronze (15:19). Cymbals are always listed with other instruments, and they are regularly associated with singing (15:19; 2 Chr. 5:12, 13; Neh. 12:27). On one occasion cymbals accompanied the exercise of prophecy (25:1). David and Nathan established a Levitical order of musicians which included those who played cymbals, stringed instruments, and harps to glorify God (15:16; 2 Chr. 29:25; Ezra 3:10, 11). The Levitical cymbal player led these musicians in the worship of God (16:5). Cymbals were played during joyful celebrations to the Lord at such times as the dedication of Solomon’s temple, Hezekiah’s consecration of the house of the Lord, the laying of the foundation for the second temple, and the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (2 Chr. 5:11–14; 29:25–31; Ezra 3:10, 11; Neh. 12:27).

15:17 The musician Heman was the grandson of the prophet Samuel (6:33), a Kohathite. He is probably the same Heman who appears in the superscription of Ps. 88. Asaph was leader of the Gershonite Levites (6:39, 43). Asaph and his sons ministered primarily as singers (25:1, 2; 2 Chr. 20:14) and composers, as their superscriptions suggest (Pss. 50; 73—83). Ethan was the head of the Merarite division of musicians (6:44). Ethan might be the same as “Ethan the Ezrahite,” composer of Ps. 89 and known as a wise man (1 Kin. 4:31).

15:18, 19 second rank: The musicians apparently occupied a place of higher status than the gatekeepers, who are mentioned next (9:17–27).

15:20 strings according to Alamoth: The musicians listed here are the same as the gatekeepers of v. 18. Since gatekeeping was on a rotating basis and might not have required full-time attention, these two responsibilities could have been combined.

15:21, 22 The word Sheminith might be derived from the Hebrew word for “eighth,” referring to the musical scales.

15:23 The responsibility of the doorkeepers for the ark appears limited to the task of moving the ark from the house of Obed-Edom to the Davidic tabernacle.

15:24–26 It is likely that Obed-Edom in this verse was the same person who had custody of the ark in the months just before it was brought to Jerusalem (13:13, 14). He apparently was a Levite (13:13) and was certainly a righteous man (v. 25; 16:38).

15:27, 28 linen ephod: This garment elsewhere in the OT is part of the attire of the high priest alone (Ex. 28:40) or, in its simpler pattern, of priests in general (1 Sam. 22:18).

15:29 David had married Michal the daughter of Saul at the beginning of his time of service in Saul's court (1 Sam. 18:27). Their relationship had been stormy, perhaps in part because David had spent at least ten years in flight from her father. In fact, Saul had annulled the marriage and had given Michal to another man (1 Sam. 25:44). One of the conditions of David's peace agreement with Abner and the reunification of the nation under David's kingship was that Michal be returned to him (2 Sam. 3:13–16). Michal was one of the few links remaining between David and the dynasty of Saul. For the transfer of government from Saul to David to be complete, it was necessary for Saul's daughter to be transferred back to David—even against her will. When Michal saw David rejoicing at the return of the ark, she despised him out of loyalty to her father and anger that she had been forced to return.

16:1–3 he distributed: David’s distribution of food was in line with the nature of the peace offerings of vv. 1, 2. Such offerings often accompanied occasions of praise and thanksgiving such as this one. They were unique in that they provided a common meal in which all participated—the offerer, his family and friends, the priests, and even God (Lev. 7:11–14, 28–34; Deut. 12:17–19).

(Heb. sharat) (1 Chr. 16:4; Num. 3:31; Ps. 101:6) Strong’s #8334: This Hebrew word means “to serve.” It can denote honorable, high-level service, either secular or sacred. The secular sense of the term refers to the work of personal attendants, usually those who would succeed the office of the one served (Gen. 39:4; Josh. 1:1, 5). The sacred use of the word applies primarily to the work of priests, although occasionally Levites, and once even angels (15:2; Deut. 17:12; Ps. 103:21; Heb. 1:14). Most of the time the ministering is described as to or before the Lord, but the Levites are also said to minister to the priests (Num. 18:2), to the people (Num. 16:9; Ezek. 44:11), and to the tabernacle (Num. 1:50). Ministering before the Lord occasionally involved music and song (6:31, 32; 16:4, 5).

16:4–6 The appointment of Levites described here was of a more permanent nature than that of 15:1–24, which concerned the immediate task of moving the ark into Jerusalem. Some of the same persons were involved, as vv. 5, 6 make clear.

16:7–11 This strongly implies that David himself composed the psalm. David’s musical abilities were well attested (2 Sam. 22:1; see the superscriptions of Pss. 3—9). This psalm consists of three different parts. Each portion correlates with part of another psalm, as follows: 16:8–22 with Ps. 105:1–15; 16:23–33 with Ps. 96:1–13; and 16:34–36 with Ps. 106:1, 47, 48.

16:12 His marvelous works: David appealed to the nation to reflect upon God’s faithfulness as manifested in the nation’s history. The God who had proved Himself in the past was the One upon whom the unified nation could depend in the years to come.

16:13, 14 servant … chosen ones: These words reflect the role of Israel as an elect nation called by God to serve Him as “a kingdom of priests and a holy nation” (Ex. 19:6). David was very much aware of the importance of God’s calling of Israel and of his responsibility as leader of this privileged nation.

16:15 The instrument that bound God and Israel together legally and formally was the covenant. This was an arrangement between two parties —in this case, a superior party and an inferior party—by which the two made solemn pledges of mutual loyalty and commitment. God's promises in the covenant were based on His faithful character.

16:16–18 To Abraham, God promised land (Gen. 12:7) and innumerable descendants (Gen. 15:5; 17:5–8). God designated Abraham's descendants as the people through whom He would bless all nations (Gen. 12:2, 3). In his psalm, David was reflecting on the reliability of God's promise to Abraham—a promise renewed to Isaac and confirmed to Jacob. Having just become king over all Israel, David was very much aware of God's faithfulness in granting the Israelites the land over which he had dominion.

16:19 very few: This refers to the time of the patriarchs. When Jacob went to Egypt, his extended family amounted to only seventy persons (Gen. 46:27).

16:20, 21 one nation to another: In patriarchal times, God's people moved about in Canaan and occasionally dwelt among other peoples such as the Egyptians (Gen. 12:10), Philistines (Gen. 20:1; 21:34; 26:1), and even the Hittites (Gen. 23:4, 17–20). reproved kings: This is a reference to God's judgment on Pharaoh (Gen. 12:17) and particularly his rebuke of Abimelech, the Philistine king of Gerar (Gen. 20:3–7).

16:22–24 Abraham and the patriarchs were not literally anointed with oil as though they were entering the priesthood or kingship. In this context, anointed ones means those set apart for God's service. prophets: Though the office of prophet as a "professional" calling began with Samuel, there were individuals from the earliest days of biblical history who were known as prophets. The reference here is specifically to Abraham, who is called a prophet in Gen. 20:7, the first occurrence of the word in the Bible.

God Above All Gods

Some people object to Christianity's claim that its God is the one true God. But the Bible states emphatically that the Lord is above all other gods, which are idols (1 Chr. 16:23–27). He alone deserves worship, for He is the Creator and Sustainer of life.

Most ancient cultures worshiped many gods, almost all of which were associated with nature. For example, the gods of the Canaanites were part of what was essentially a fertility cult designed to increase their harvests and the birth rate of their women. The Hebrews were virtually unique in their belief in one supreme God.

Today, too, people worship and serve a variety of gods, as well as a variety of often conflicting ideas about God. Meanwhile, the belief that there is one supreme God seems to be less and less popular, especially in an age that holds tolerance and religious pluralism to be among the highest of values. Yet God has not changed. He still invites—indeed, commands—all the families of the world to give Him the glory due His name (1 Chr. 16:28–30). Doing so need not be a statement of intolerance, simply a response to what is true.

16:25 above all gods: This does not admit the real possibility of other gods. Instead it refers to the various "gods" in which the pagans believed. The heathen might fear nonexistent gods, but the living Lord was to be feared more than them all, for He is alive and demands accountability.

16:26–30 idols: The poet here puts things into proper perspective and shows how foolish it is to fear gods who are manufactured products of human creativity.

16:31, 32 The phrase, the LORD reigns, is an appeal for the universal recognition of the sovereignty of the God of Israel. The Lord had called Israel into a special covenant relationship with Himself, but He did not thereby reject the other nations. Indeed, the whole purpose of Israelelection was that Israel might be the light to the nations that would cause them to turn to the one true God (Is. 42:5–7; 43:8–13).

16:33–36 trees … rejoice: This is a figure of speech called "personification," in which inanimate things are spoken of as if they had human characteristics. Because the whole creation was negatively affected by the fall of humanity into sin, it could not be restored to perfection and could not truly rejoice until humanity was redeemed. He is coming: This consummation of the ages will make all creation burst out in praise.

16:37 David appointed Asaph to be overall supervisor of worship before the Lord (v. 5).

16:38 Obed-Edom: There are two men by this name in this verse. The first is the Obed-Edom whose house sheltered the ark for three months (13:14) and who was a chief doorkeeper (15:24). The second, also a gatekeeper, was a son of Jeduthun (perhaps the one known as Ethan; 6:33, 39, 44).

16:39 Until the temple of Solomon was completed, there were two legitimate places for community worship—the Mosaic tabernacle at Gibeon and David's tabernacle on Mount Zion. Zadok, a descendent of Eleazar, served at Gibeon, while Abiathar, a descendant of Aaron, served at Jerusalem (15:11).

16:40 There must have been such an altar on Mount Zion, but the one at Gibeon was apparently considered more "official," no doubt because it had been built under Moses' leadership (2 Chr. 1:3, 5, 6). Zadok and his fellow priests officiated at the regular morning and evening sacrifices in Gibeon. Early in his reign, Solomon also went to the high place at Gibeon to offer sacrifices—an act completely acceptable to God, who blessed him there (1 Kin. 3:4, 5, 10–13; 2 Chr. 1:3, 11, 12).

16:41 Jeduthun: This was probably another name for the musician Ethan, who is usually named together with Asaph and Heman (15:17, 19; 6:33, 39, 44).

16:42, 43 instruments of God: This brief expression refers to instruments that play songs or praises to God. It is difficult to overemphasize the importance of music in OT worship. The Book of Psalms in itself and constant references to choral and orchestral ministry demonstrate the significance of music (9:33; 15:16–24; 16:4–6; 25:1–31). Music was an important way in which the people worshiped their Creator.

17:1–4 Nathan the prophet: This is the first time in this book that a prophet's name appears. Nathan apparently served David and Solomon as a private chaplain or counselor (2 Sam. 7:2, 3; 12:1–15; 1 Kin. 1:8–30, 32–38, 45; 2 Chr. 29:25). One of his written works, "the book of Nathan the prophet," provided a source for the composition of the books of Chronicles (29:29; 2 Chr. 9:29). A house of cedar indicates David's wealth, because cedar paneling was too expensive to be used in ordinary homes.

17:5 from tent to tent: This is a reference to the movement of God from the provisional "tabernacle of meeting" (Ex. 33:7), to the Mosaic tabernacle (Ex. 40:34–38), and then to the tabernacle David erected on Mount Zion (16:1).

17:6 In addition to having "lived" in modest surroundings, God had also "lived" like a nomad, as the house of worship moved from one place to another. In the time of the judges, the tabernacle was at Shiloh (Josh. 18:1) and possibly Nob (1 Sam. 21:1). Before that, it had wandered with Israel through the Sinai desert before being set up at Gilgal (Josh. 4:19; 5:10). At this time it resided at Gibeon.

17:7 In the ancient Middle East generally, as well as in the OT, kings were often compared to shepherds (Is. 44:28; Zech. 10:3; 11:4–17). It was most fitting that David, who had literally shepherded sheep, should be called by God to shepherd His flock, Israel.

17:8 made you a name: David's reputation as a leader had become internationally known. He ranked with the great rulers of other nations.

17:9 appoint a place: This phrase did not suggest that Israel would move to a land other than Palestine, for that was the land of promise from the beginning (Gen. 13:14–17; 15:18–21; 17:8; Ex. 3:16, 17; 6:8; Deut. 1:8; Josh. 1:2–5). sons of wickedness: This was a general term for the Israelites' enemies—those who had persecuted them and taken them from their homeland.

17:10–12 As used here, house meant dynasty. David had said that he would build a house—that is, a temple—for God, but God told David that He would build a house—that is, a dynasty—for David. A human monarchy blessed by God was already apparent in the promise God had made to Abraham (Gen. 17:6). In addition, when Jacob blessed his sons, he asserted that a scepter and lawgiver—that is, a king—would arise out of Judah (Gen. 49:10). Samuel anointed David as king (1 Sam. 16:1, 12, 13) and David received assurances that he would rule over Israel (1 Sam. 23:17; 24:20; 26:25; 28:17). But God’s promise to establish David’s dynasty forever was unprecedented. your seed: This is a reference to Solomon. Here house can only mean temple, because God has no dynasty. The temple was the dwelling place of God among His people (1 Kin. 8:10, 11).

(Heb. kisse) (1 Chr. 17:12; Ps. 103:19; Is. 66:1) Strong’s #3678: The Hebrew word can refer to any kind of seat or chair (Ps. 1:1), but usually it refers to a seat of honor (Is. 22:23), especially a throne (Esth. 5:1). Frequently the word is used to denote royal position or authority (1 Kin. 16:11). To “set up” or “establish” a throne is to establish or confirm a king and his dynasty. David’s throne was particularly important in this respect, for in His covenant with David, God promised that the throne of David’s son would be “established forever” (17:12; Ps. 89:4). Although Solomon and the succeeding kings of Judah sat on David’s throne (1 Kin. 2:12; Jer. 22:2, 4), it is Jesus, the Son of David, who will fulfill this prophecy, reigning “upon the throne of David” forever (Is. 9:7).

17:13 Father … son: This remarkable statement affirmed that the dynasty of David had such an intimate relationship with God that its kings would be considered God’s sons in an extraordinary way. him who was before you: This was a reference to Saul, from whom God had removed His blessing (10:14).

17:14, 15 The focus clearly shifts here from David’s immediate successor, Solomon, to the entire succession of kings in David’s line. It was the kingdom and throne of the dynasty that would endure forever, a promise made possible only by the reign of Jesus Christ, the Son of David (Luke 1:32, 33). Such a shift in reference is common in prophetic texts where the blending between the immediate and remote is so subtle as to be nearly imperceptible. Other clues must therefore be sought, as in this case, where Solomon is in view in v. 12, because he actually did build the temple, but Christ must be in view in v. 14, because only He qualifies to reign forever.

17:16–18 David responded to God’s blessing with praise. house: David asked what made him the object of God’s grace. He did not have any credentials to deserve God’s amazing promises of an eternal kingdom. small thing: David’s lack of pedigree and royal ancestry were of no consequence to God, because He was not impressed by such things. What more can David say: Once the truth of the promise sank into David’s understanding, he found himself speechless.

17:19, 20 any God besides you: This is a clear assertion of the uniqueness of Israel's God. Statements such as "all gods" and "the gods of the peoples" in David's song of thanksgiving (16:25, 26) must be understood in light of this clear confession that there is only one living God.

17:21 David's observation here was not blind nationalism. As David continued to praise God, he expressed like Moses a theology of the election of Israel. God had chosen Israel, His treasured possession, by His will alone. The Israelites had nothing by which they could commend themselves to God. In fact, they were an insignificant and enslaved people (Deut. 7:6–11). Israel's prominent place among the nations was due to the Lord's abundant mercy. David's reference to Israel as the one nation on the earth whom God went to redeem does not preclude the eventual redemption of others. He is speaking here not soteriologically but in terms of servanthood. The redemption of Israel was not to save her so as to make her His people —that was already an accomplished fact (Ex. 3:7, 10; 4:22, 23)—but to deliver her so as to make a covenant of servanthood with her (Ex. 19:6). It also would provide occasion for the nations to marvel at Yahweh's power and thus to magnify His name.

17:22 Your very own people: This expression is clearly based on Ex. 19:5; Deut. 7:6; 14:2, where Israel is described as "a special treasure." The statement lies at the very center of the Mosaic covenant. At Mount Sinai, God had become the God of Israel; and Israel, in turn, had become the people of God.

17:23, 24 the word which You have spoken: David referred here to the covenant God had just made with him concerning his dynasty (17:7–14). David's appeal to God to establish His word came immediately after his reference to the Exodus and the Mosaic covenant. David knew that God's covenant with him was founded on God's previous promises to Abraham.

17:25, 26 Your servant … to pray: David here does not assert that he has now become a man of prayer because of God's promises to him. Rather, he has found the boldness to pray (vv. 16–24) because of the encouragement afforded by the promises.

17:27 blessed forever: David seems to allow no room for a temporary, conditional understanding of his kingship. He is convinced by the plain language of God's promise that he and his descendants will continue forever in the blessing of Yahweh (vv. 9, 12, 14).

Excavations at Ashkelon, one of the five chief cities of the Philistines. King David conquered the Philistines and captured all their cities (1 Chr. 18:1).

18:1 This is the only record of David taking a Philistine city, although he had defeated the Philistines many times in battle. Gath was the Philistine city closest to Israelite territory, so it offered the greatest threat to Israel.

18:2 It must have been with mixed feelings that David undertook a campaign against the Moabites, for he had strong emotional links with Moab. His great-grandmother Ruth came from Moab (Ruth 4:13–17) and David had sent his own family there for protection when he was hiding from Saul (1 Sam. 22:3, 4). The technical expression for the relationship described here, in which the Moabites became David's servants and paid him tribute, is "suzerainty." This means that Moab was not part of the kingdom of Israel and did not have an Israelite governor. Native rulers were allowed to stay in office, but they had to show their submission to David by making a suzerain treaty with him.

18:3, 4 The campaign here may be connected to the Aramean war more fully outlined in 19:1–19, because Hadadezer is mentioned in both places. His kingdom, Zobah, lay immediately north of Damascus. David pursued him as far as Hamath, a hundred miles beyond Damascus, in an effort to extend the Israelite empire all the way to the River Euphrates. David's justification may have been God's promise to Abraham that the land He was giving him would extend "from the river of Egypt to the great river, the River Euphrates" (Gen. 15:18).

18:5 The capital of the Aramean kingdom just north and northeast of Israel was Damascus.

18:6, 7 servants … tribute: These technical terms, as in the case of Moab (v. 2), suggest that Damascus became a vassal state under Israel. Very quickly, Moab and Damascus became client states and Zobah an occupied territory.

18:8, 9 To the two cities Tibhath … Chun, Samuel added a third Berothai (2 Sam. 8:8). All three are referred to in Egyptian texts. They were northeast of Baalbek in central Lebanon.

18:10 greet … bless: This apparently casual language covers a more formal situation in which Tou, king of Hamath, was approaching David in willing submission to him as king. In other words, what Moab and Damascus did involuntarily, Hamath was doing voluntarily, making itself a vassal state under Israel.

18:11 The fact that David dedicated all the spoils of war to God suggests that he viewed the battles as campaigns of holy war. In such war, initiated and led by God, all proceeds of the victory belonged to Him. Such spoils were said to be "doomed to destruction" or "accursed" (Josh. 6:17, 18), meaning that they could not be used for secular purposes but were consecrated to God. When Solomon built the temple, he brought all the dedicated things into the temple treasuries (2 Chr. 5:1). The spoils of Amalek may have included some from Saul's conquest of the Amalekites (1 Sam. 15:9), but more likely the reference is to David's raids against them when he was living at Ziklag as a vassal of Achish of Gath (1 Sam. 27:8, 9).

18:12 One of David's nephews (2:15, 16), Abishai, was included in one of the groups of David's "three mighty men" (11:20). Valley of Salt: This was a few miles east of Beersheba.

18:13, 14 The term servants suggests that Edom became not just a defeated foe, but also a vassal state under Israel's control. This allowed Edom to retain its own leadership, but it was under David's close supervision, as the reference to Israelite garrisons makes clear.

18:15 David awarded his nephew Joab (2:15, 16) the rank of commander of the army for his success in penetrating the walls of Jerusalem (11:4–9). recorder: Jehoshaphat was the keeper of the royal archives or records. The chronicler himself may have had access to such documents when he composed the present work (27:24).

18:16 Zadok descended from Aaron through Eleazar (16:39). Abimelech: Abiathar, a descendant of Aaron's son Ithamar, had served as David's priest in the wilderness (1 Sam. 22:20) and later at Jerusalem (15:11). Bet he was disloyal to Solomon and was removed from office, leaving Zadok alone as high priest (1 Kin. 2:27, 35). It seems that David must have suspended Abiathar as well from service at some earlier point, for in the present passage his son Abimelech was priest with Zadok.

18:17 Cherethites … Pelethites: These were elite companies of soldiers, probably mercenaries. They were commanded by Benaiah, a member of one of the groups of "three mighty men" (11:24). There were Philistines known as Cherethites (Ezek. 25:16; 1 Sam. 30:14), and the connection between Pelethites and Philistines elsewhere (2 Sam. 15:18) leads to the conclusion that they were all from Philistia. chief ministers: These were David's sons who served in his government. They are called by the Hebrew word usually translated "priests" in 2 Sam. 8:18.

19:1 Since Nahash was reigning in Saul's earliest years (1 Sam. 11:1), the present incident must have occurred early in David's reign at Jerusalem. Nahash evidently reigned for over 50 years (40 years of Saul, plus seven of David in Hebron, plus whatever years had passed in Jerusalem).

19:2 I will show kindness: What David has in mind is not apparent. The word translated "kindness" is hesed, a Hebrew term rich in covenant significance. Perhaps David is saying that he will now make a covenant with Hanun inasmuch as Nahash had made a covenant with him. This would be particularly appropriate inasmuch as the death of one of the covenant parties would necessitate that it be renewed with his successor.

19:3 search and … spy: The suspicions of Hanun's advisers may not have been totally unjustified, in light of David's ambitious plans to carve out an empire (11:9; 14:2).

19:4, 5 shaved … cut off: Ancient Semitic men were inordinately proud of their beards and scrupulously modest in their attire. The Ammonites humiliated David's men in the most offensive way possible.

19:6 made themselves repulsive: The Ammonites realized that David would surely retaliate for the way they had offended his delegation. thousand talents of silver: A talent was 75 pounds. Mesopotamia: This was not the great land between the Tigris and the Euphrates inhabited by the Assyrians and Babylonians, but a district on the upper Euphrates known as Aram Naharaim. Syrian Maachah: This was a small kingdom located between Damascus and the Sea of Galilee.

19:7 The parallel account in 2 Sam. 10:6 does not mention chariots but says there was a total of 33,000 men. The chronicler does not mention the number of men, but only of the chariots. Both writers gave different sources of the manpower and material, so clearly they were arriving at their totals from different perspectives or with different purposes in mind. Medeba was 20 miles southwest of Rabbah, the capital of Ammon. It is called Madaba today. Ammon gathered: The Israelites were apparently between the Aramean armies and the city of Rabbah (v. 10), so when the Ammonites attacked from the city, the Israelites were pinned between two forces.

Gates and Fortified Cities

Battles were often fought near the gate of a city (1 Chr. 19:9), which was its most vulnerable defensive feature. City gates were made of wood, so it was easier for enemies to gain access by beating them down or setting them on fire, rather than by storming or undermining a city's stone walls. For this reason a number of improvements were added to make a city's gate(s) more well-fortified (2 Chr. 8:5).

One development was to make the approach to the city a long narrow ramp, which would run parallel to one of the city's walls. These ramps were often built along the walls from the right to the left, that enemy soldiers (most fought right-handed) would be forced to turn nearly backward to defend themselves. The ramp also meant that enemy soldiers had to run the length of a wall to reach the gate, a process exposing them to observation and attack from the wall.

Cites also had more than one gate in the gatehouse or gate complex. The outer gate was built well outside the city and at a right angle to the city. It was placed directly in front of the approach ramp and was the first major obstacle for attackers.

These gatehouses were part of a castlelike building similar to towers. Defenders were stationed on the roofs of these complexes and behind doors. If attackers succeeded in gaining entrance, they would find themselves confined in a narrow passage that made a sharp right turn toward the main gate. Defenders both blocked this passage and were stationed above it on the walls. If attackers survived this gauntlet, they still faced the city's primary gate and its defenses.

The main gate was a multichambered structure resembling an extra large tower. It comprised four separate sets of gates, behind which were chambers for defending soldiers. The roofs of these gate structures were designed for defenders to have clear aim at the attackers.

19:8–10 Completely surrounded, Joab split up his forces so that half faced those before and half faced those behind. Joab led the section that opposed the Syrians, and Abishai commanded the section that opposed the Ammonites (v. 11).

19:11–13 may the LORD do what is good in His sight: This may look like the resigned statement of a fatalist, but it was anything but that. Joab understood enough of the sovereignty and omniscience of God to know that after all human effort and energy had been expended, the battle was still God's.

19:14, 15 The Syrians were mercenaries and had no real commitment to the task at hand. When it appeared that they were in danger of defeat, they fled. Their retreat so demoralized the Ammonites that they withdrew into the safety of their city.

19:16 Syrians … beyond the river: The identity of these trans-Euphratean Arameans cannot be further established. They apparently were either treaty allies of Hadadezer of Zobah (18:3; 2 Sam. 10:16) or his vassals (2 Sam. 10:19). In any case they were under the command of Hadadezer's general Shophach.

19:17, 18 Samuel located the setting of the battle at Helam (2 Sam. 10:17), about 40 miles east of the Sea of Galilee.

19:19 The defeat of Hadadezer and all his vassal kings brought about a shift in allegiance, so that all the Aramean states that had paid tribute to Zobah came under tribute to Israel. In this context, servants did not signify household slaves but national subservience to a greater power, in this case Israel. This effectively eliminated all the Arameans as allies of Ammon and precluded their being a further threat to Israel. With the subjugation of everything from Aram Maachah to the Euphrates, David occupied all the boundaries of the land of promise as outlined in the Abrahamic covenant (Gen. 15:18–21).

20:1 Great military operations were conducted in the spring of the year for two main reasons: (1) the latter rains were over and the dry months of summer, most suitable for military activity, were at hand; and (2) the barley harvests were in and the wheat harvests sufficiently well along to free men of military age for battle. besieged Rabbah: Having defeated the Aramean allies of Ammon at Helam (19:17, 19), Joab led Israel's armies against the main enemy and principal objective, the capital of the Ammonite kingdom, Rabbah. The modern city of Amman, Jordan, occupies the ancient site. David stayed at Jerusalem: This agrees with Samuel's account, but Samuel also related the sordid story of David's adultery with Bathsheba, the plot to kill her husband Uriah, and the birth of David's son —all of which took place while Joab was laying siege to Rabbah. The chronicler was not trying to deceive his readers, since the truth was well known from the books of Samuel, which the chronicler himself cited. The chronicler omitted the material because it was not relevant to his literary and theological purposes. He was showing how the Davidic dynasty was the fulfillment of God's promises. Joab defeated Rabbah: In the chronicler's truncated version, this appears to have happened coincident with the launching of the spring campaign and a brief siege. The version in Samuel, however, makes clear that the campaign lasted several seasons.

IN DEPTH

The Arameans

Some of the forces opposing general Joab were Syrians (1 Chr. 9:10), members of an ethnic group also known as the Arameans. They controlled the region northeast of the Sea of Galilee, from the Lebanon Mountains on the west to the Euphrates River on the east and northward. Their principal city was Damascus.

The Arameans were among the ancient peoples believed to have migrated into the Middle East from the west as early as 2250 B.C. They became fully established as a kingdom during the period of the Israelites' conquest of Canaan (c. 1200 B.C.). During the period of the judges, they overran Israel and oppressed it for eight years (Judg. 3:8–10). However, after David became king of Israel, he extended his nation's boundary north to the Euphrates River (2 Sam. 8:1–13). It was at this time that an Aramean official named Rezon fled to Damascus and founded a strong Aramean city-state there (1 Kin. 11:23, 24). This kingdom remained a bitter foe of Israel for many generations.

One strategy that the Arameans used to advantage was to side with one Israelite state or the other during the divided monarchy (15:18–20; 2 Kin. 16:5). However, when Judah eventually joined with Assyria against Israel and Aram in the eighth century B.C., the result was the downfall of Damascus (c. 732 B.C.; 16:7–18). Many Arameans were exiled to other lands, as was the Assyrian policy, and the kingdom of Aram came to an end.

Nevertheless, through their language the Arameans left behind a legacy that can still be felt today. Aramaic, which had been spoken from at least 2000 B.C., eventually became the language of trade, commerce, and diplomacy throughout the ancient Middle East. As a result, Aramaic (a language closely related to Hebrew) came to have an important influence on the Bible. Portions of the Book of Daniel were written in Aramaic, and it was the language commonly spoken by Jews in Palestine during the time of Jesus.

20:2 David did not participate in the initial attack on Rabbah, but he did join Joab when it fell, because Joab earnestly entreated him to come share the credit for the victory (2 Sam. 12:27, 28). The crown David took was ceremonial and not for wearing, since it weighed a talent (about 75 pounds). set on David's head: This was only for this ceremonial occasion. David put the crown on his head to demonstrate that he had vanquished the Ammonites and now reigned over them as well.

20:3 It was common in OT times for people defeated in war to be consigned to forced labor, particularly if they had been coerced into some kind of vassal relationship (Josh. 9:22–27; 1 Kin. 9:20, 21).

20:4, 5 The city of Gezer was on the frontier between Israel and Philistia and was constantly a bone of contention between them. Sibbechai the Hushathite: He was one of the thirty warriors who formed an elite corps (11:29). the giant: This apparently did not refer to a single individual, but to a giant race indigenous to the country east of the Jordan (Deut. 2:10, 11, 20, 21).

20:6 The same genetic aberration that produced giants may also have led to such mutations as described here.

20:7 Shimea: This was David's older brother, the third son of Jesse (2:13).

20:8 the giant: As in v. 4, this likely referred to a giant race living in and around Gath, though it is possible that a particular giant was in view. The Goliath killed by David was from Gath (1 Sam. 17:4).

21:1 The word Satan means “Adversary.” While at first he was called “the Satan,” this later came to be used as a proper name, Satan (Zech. 3:1, 2). The NT identifies him as the evil one, the devil, and the dragon, thus linking him to the serpent in the Garden of Eden (Gen. 3:1). moved David: Samuel attributed David’s impulse to number the people to God Himself (2 Sam. 24:1). The apparent contradiction can be resolved by recognizing that though Satan is the author of all evil, he cannot exercise his evil intentions apart from the permission of God. Moreover, God could use him to accomplish His own purposes of judgment (1 Kin. 22:19–23) or discipline (as here with David).

21:2 Go, number: David’s plan to take a census was not evil in itself, for the Lord Himself at other times had commanded the Israelites to be counted (Num. 1). What was wrong with David’s census was David’s attitude—his pride. He wanted to know the number of the Israelites so that he could glory in the extent of his reign (2 Sam. 24:1). Beersheba to Dan: This was the traditional way of describing all of Israel from south to north. The distance is about 150 miles.

21:3–5 Joab was concerned that David’s arrogant command for a census would bring punishment, not only on the king but on innocent citizens, whom Joab described as David’s servants. David’s position as king and shepherd of his people implicated them in whatever he did. cause of guilt: In a courageous appeal, Joab pointed out that if David’s decision was put into effect David would be personally accountable for whatever followed.

21:6, 7 The men of Levi, dedicated as they were to priestly service, were ordinarily exempt from military conscription (Num. 1:47–49). Benjamin: The reason this tribe was excluded may be that the judgment of God commenced before the task was completed (27:24). Perhaps Joab simply abandoned the task before he finished, his sense of revulsion growing more and more as he carried it out.

21:8 I have sinned: To his credit, David blamed no one but himself for the judgment of God that fell on the nation. He rightly believed that if God would forgive him, the affliction of the nation would also cease.

21:9 Gad is the second prophet named in the book (17:1). He also produced a composition to which the chronicler refers (29:29). Here the chronicler calls Gad a seer, a person who sees or receives revelations from the Lord. The author of Samuel refers to him by the more familiar term prophet (1 Sam. 22:5).

21:10, 11 I offer … three things: This is the only place in the Bible where God offers someone a choice of punishments.

21:12 The formulaic phrase the angel of the LORD is used elsewhere in the OT to speak of Yahweh in an anthropomorphic if not human form. Thus, when an angel visited Abraham at Mamre, it was Yahweh Himself (Gen. 18:3, 16, 17, 22), as was the angel of the Lord who appeared to Gideon (Judg. 6:11, 15, 22) and to the Samson's parents (Judg. 13:3, 6, 16, 18, 21, 22). The combination of an angel with a plague here is reminiscent of the Passover story.

21:13, 14 David knew that the Lord is merciful—a God who forgives. David's willingness to fall into the hand of the LORD demonstrated his complete trust in the grace of God. Even when God was punishing him, David trusted God rather than man—God's forgiving nature over any leniency people might offer.

21:15 The Lord requires certain conditions people must meet in order for Him to act one way or another. One aspect of this is prayer, for often God chooses to act in specific cases according to whether and how His people pray. This was clearly the case here, since God sent an angel to destroy Jerusalem, but when He saw David's repentance and heard his intercessory prayer (v. 17), He relented. Ornan the Jebsuite was a member of the native population of Jerusalem that remained to share the city with the Israelite conquerors (11:4; Judg. 1:21). That Ornan owned a piece of property, a threshing floor (13:9), suggests that he was wealthy, an interesting fact in light of the generally despised lot of the Jebusites (Ex. 13:5; 23:23; 33:2; 34:11; Deut. 7:1; 20:17; Josh. 3:10).

21:16 Sackcloth was a rough garment usually made of goat's hair (Is. 50:3), worn by mourners to express grief (1 Kin. 21:27; Is. 32:11). David and the elders of Israel were dressed in such a manner because of the terrible calamity brought on the nation by the plague.

21:17 By calling his people sheep, David was acknowledging himself as their shepherd (17:7). Since that designation first arose in the context of God's covenant promises, David's reference to his people as sheep very likely attested to his feelings of covenant unfaithfulness and irresponsibility. He was supposed to be the one who guided the flock to safety and security, but by his arrogance in numbering the people he had brought them harm.

21:18, 19 Building an altar in a time of judgment or impending judgment was for the purpose of offering propitiatory sacrifices. Sin had caused a breach between God and His people. The presentation of appropriate burnt offerings and peace offerings (v. 26) would be the occasion for reconciliation, as the Law explained (Num. 15:1–10). threshing floor: The altar was located precisely where the angel of the Lord stood with sword in hand to destroy Jerusalem (v. 15). This place of judgment would thereby become the place of grace and forgiveness.

21:20, 21 Ornan continued threshing not because he was indifferent to the appearance of the angel but because his sons saw the angel first and hid themselves, whereas Ornan was in the process of threshing when he first became aware of the angel's presence.

21:22, 23 Grant me … this threshing floor: David wanted the altar at precisely this place because this is where the angel stood with drawn sword (v. 15), and as was certainly known to David, this was where Abraham had prepared to offer Isaac as a sacrifice to God (Gen. 22:1, 2; 2 Chr. 3:1). It is fitting that this holy place should be the site of an altar where David could make atonement for his sins and thus effect the withdrawal of the plague.

21:24 David again showed a clear perception of the essence of sacrifice. Until he owned what Ornan had, and until he had expended his own resources for it, he could not use it as an offering to God. which costs me nothing: While David could have rightfully accepted these gifts without paying for them, he felt that this would not suffice as sacrifice. A true sacrifice to God required labor and investment on David's part.

21:25 The chronicler referred to the price for the whole place, probably several acres of valuable property. The fact that the temple was later built here suggests a large area.

21:26, 27 Just as a three-year drought ended in the days of Elijah when the prophet called down fire on a sacrifice at Carmel (1 Kin. 18:38, 41), so the three-day plague God brought on Israel ended with the sacrifice at Ornan's threshing floor.

21:28 he sacrificed there: Once David saw that God had sanctified the spot by setting fire to the sacrifice, he continued to use the altar as a regular place of offering.

21:29 This verse teaches explicitly that the original tabernacle and altar of the burnt offering had not been destroyed when the ark was taken from Shiloh. The OT account does not trace their movement fully after Shiloh, but they did end up at Nob and finally at Gibeon (15:1).

21:30 David could not go before it: It was David's custom to offer burnt offerings on the altar at Gibeon rather than on the one in Jerusalem. He did not dare go to Gibeon this time because of the judgment that God was about to pour out on the land. He understood that his offerings had to be offered where he was—at the threshing floor of Ornan.

22:1 This observation by David marks a significant turning point in the history of the central sanctuary. As long as the ark remained at Kirjath Jearim and the Mosaic tabernacle was at Nob and Gibeon, it was impossible for worship to be carried out in the manner originally intended. David had taken the first steps toward remedying that by bringing the ark to Jerusalem and placing it in a tent that he provided on Mount Zion. At last, and in a way totally unforeseen by anyone, the resolution of the problem was at hand. The house of the LORD God and the altar of burnt offering would be built on the threshing floor of Ornan.

22:2, 3 The fact that David could not build the temple did not prevent him from providing building materials for the use of Solomon's craftsmen.

22:4 Cedar trees came from Lebanon, the principal supplier of timber in the ancient Middle Eastern world. The most expert builders also hailed from Lebanon, and from cities like Sidon and Tyre.

22:5–7 Solomon was born about halfway through David's reign. He reigned with his father for about two years (23:1; 28:1; 29:22). Since David was only beginning to gather building materials for the temple, Solomon could not have been over 18 years old. It was precisely because Solomon was so young and inexperienced that David found it necessary to provide guidance for his son.

22:8, 9 You have shed much blood: The reason that God did not allow David to build the temple comes to light—David was a man of war. Until the enemies of Israel were subdued and an era of peace inaugurated, God determined that He would not "live" in a temple. The sign that a king in the ancient world had truly achieved dominion over his realm was his construction of a magnificent palace for himself. As long as he was at war and was contending for sovereignty it was inappropriate to build such a structure. David's son Solomon would be a man of rest; that is, a king whose reign would be free from constant warfare. At that time of peace, God had resolved that a temple would be built for Himself. God's actions here reflected the practice of many ancient kings: a king would construct a palace only after he had established peace in his land.

22:10–12 Having just observed the youth and inexperience of Solomon (v. 5), David knew that his son needed wisdom more than any other single gift. the law of the LORD: This cannot be limited to only the sections of the Law pertaining to kingship (Deut. 17:14–20), although this is the central focus. David must have had in mind the covenant of kingship to which he himself had subscribed when he became king at Hebron (11:3).

22:13, 14 These are staggering amounts. At $300 per ounce, the gold today would be valued at $36 billion. At $5 per ounce, the silver today would be valued at $80 million.

22:15–18 Rest, or peace, was a precondition for building the temple (22:8, 9). subdued before the LORD: In the final analysis, the conquest of the land begun in Joshua's time and completed under David, was a divine and not a human matter. The land was the Lord's and His people were His tenants. Therefore, only when God Himself brought the land into subjection would He authorize construction of a temple.

22:19 David's dreams and desires are encapsulated in this brief verse. At that time, the sanctuary was divided—at Gibeon and Mount Zion—and the ark was not united with the altar at Zion (v. 1). More than anything else, David wanted the Israelites to worship the Lord as He had instructed them.

23:1, 2 made … Solomon king: The phrasing suggests that this is an official appointment of Solomon to be coregent with David, a choice that had to be accepted and later ratified by the whole nation (29:22). David seems to have been afraid that death was at hand and thus concerned to make the succession of Solomon a foregone conclusion and as smooth a process as possible. The amount of activity that took place between this appointment and the formal ratification presupposes the passing of a year or more, a suggestion supported by other chronological considerations (1 Kin. 1:35, 39; 1 Chr. 23:1; 29:22, 23).

23:3 A Levite normally entered service at age 25 (Num. 8:24, 25). However, exceptions were made (Num. 4:3) to answer the needs of various time periods and ministries. Evidently in David's time enough Levites could be found aged thirty and over that there was no need to call younger Levites into service.

23:4–7 the work of the house of the LORD: The work clearly involved anything around the temple except the work of gatekeepers and musicians, who had their own divisions (v. 5). officers and judges: To provide ready access to the Levites in matters of religious questions and activities, six thousand Levites were distributed throughout the land (26:29–32), presumably in the Levitical cities (6:54–81).

23:8 Jehiel … Zetham … Joel were evidently descendants of Laadan (or Libni, 6:17) who lived in David's time. For some of the genealogical links between Laadan and these three, see 6:20, 21.

23:9 Shimei: This is not the brother of Laadan (v. 10; 6:17) but probably an important descendant. This seems certain in that all the Levites of vv. 8 and 9 are Laadanites, a total of six Gershonite divisions.

23:10 Shimei: This is the brother of Laadan (v. 7; 6:17). His sons constituted the leadership of four more divisions of Gershonites, making ten in all, it seems.

23:11, 12 one father's house: Since two of Shimei's sons had small families they combined to make one division.

23:13 give the blessing: This referred to the priestly benediction of Num. 6:24–26.

23:14 sons of Moses: Because the priesthood was limited to Aaron, brother of Moses, and his descendants, Moses and his sons could not have served as a priests. However, they could assume other responsibilities of Levites (Judg. 18:30).

23:15 Gershon was an immediate son of Moses (Ex. 2:22), as was Eliezer.

23:16 Shebuel cannot be the grandson of Moses but a distant relative, since he is a contemporary with David (24:20; 26:24).

23:17 Rehabiah was the first: This could be Eliezer's actual son, but more likely "first" here means "most important." Moses, then, gave rise to two Kohathite divisions of Levites.

23:18 Izhar was the second son of Kohath (v. 12).

23:19 Hebron was the third son of Kohath (v. 12).

23:20, 21 Uzziel was the fourth son of Kohath (v. 12). There were nine Kohathite divisions of Levites: two from Amram, one from Izhar, four from Hebron, and two from Uzziel.

23:22 Eleazar, son of Mahli, left no sons, so his daughters married their cousins, the sons of Kish. This resulted in a merger of the two lines of Mahli into one, so there was only one Levitical division through this branch of the Merarites.

23:23 The Mushi branch of Merarites produced three Levitical divisions in David's temple organization, making four in all, including the one traced to Mahli.

23:24–26 These were the sons of Levi: All three Levitical lines resulted in a total of twenty-two divisions, nine Gershonite, nine Kohathite, and four Merarite (24:18; 25:31). twenty years and above: At the beginning of the lists of divisions, the minimum age of the Levites was thirty (v. 3). The number twenty here was not a contradiction, for as v. 27 makes clear, the lower age was set by David in his last words. It seems that as time went by even 38,000 Levites were not sufficient, so that within two years or so it was necessary to lower the minimum age requirement.

"Levites"

(Heb. levi) (1 Chr. 23:26; Num. 3:9) Strong's #3881: The Levites were the descendants of Levi, one of the twelve sons of Jacob. The name is related to the verb lavah, meaning "to join," implying that the Levites were "joined" to God (Gen. 29:34). The tribe had three branches, named after the three sons of Levi: the Gershonites, the Kohathites, and the Merarites (Num. 3). At Mount Sinai, God chose Aaron, Moses' brother and a Kohathite, to be the nation's high priest (Ex. 28:1). No one but a descendant of Aaron could serve as a priest, but the other branches of the Levites shared many of their privileges and responsibilities (Num. 18:2). Originally the non-priestly Levites helped care for the tabernacle (Num. 4), but when David began preparations for building the temple, he created new duties for these Levites, making them singers, gatekeepers, treasurers, and royal officials (24:1—26:19).

23:27 by the … words of David: This remarkable statement made David almost a second Moses, in the sense that he was free to change a Mosaic legislation without challenge or reproof.

23:28 That their duty was to help is a clear statement of the role of the Levite with reference to the priest. It was a call to assistance in every aspect of ministry. Specifically it had to do with purifying of all holy things (Num. 3:31) and other tasks appropriate to conducting the services.

23:29 To free the priests for the work of offering sacrifices, the Levites prepared elements for the sacrificial ritual, such as fine flour and unleavened cakes, and in other ways assisted the prescribed services.

23:30 thank and praise: This ministry fell to the Levites engaged in choral and orchestral duties (25:1–31).

23:31 burnt offering: Though Levites outside the priestly line could not officiate at the sacrifices of the central sanctuary, they could assist the priests, for example by helping to skin the animal and cut it up. Sabbaths: The reason for the plural was not only because there were many Saturdays in a year, but other days as well could be called a "Sabbath." For example, the eighth day of the Feast of Tabernacles was considered a Sabbath no matter what day of the week it was (Lev. 23:39). New Moons: This referred to the first day of every month, otherwise known as the Feast of Trumpets (Num. 28:11–15). set feasts: These would be Passover and Unleavened Bread (Lev. 23:4–8), the Feast of Weeks or Pentecost (Lev. 23:9–22), and the Feast of Tabernacles (Lev. 23:33–43).

23:32 tabernacle of meeting: At this point the temple had not yet been built, so David's regulations for the Levites pertained to their service in the intermediate tabernacles at Gibeon and Mount Zion. holy place: This referred to the outer room of the tabernacle as opposed to the Most Holy Place, to which only the high priest had access.

24:1 In order for the priests to serve in rotation and have time off from their duties, they were assigned to shifts or divisions. For this rotation, David divided the priests by their lines of descent from Aaron (v. 3).

24:2 Nadab and Abihu died: This referred to the incident in which these two sons of Aaron incurred the wrath of God by offering up incense kindled with improper fire, that is, fire that did not originate from God (Lev. 9:23—10:2).

24:3 The Ahimelech here was the son of Abiathar (v. 6), the young priest of Nob who had joined David in the wilderness many years before (1 Sam. 22:20). There is not a complete genealogy of Abiathar in the OT, but it is clear from this passage that his ancestry was from Aaron through Ithamar.

24:4, 5 When the descendants of the two lines were identified there were sixteen family divisions from Eleazar and only eight from Ithamar. This complicated the process of dividing the service assignments fairly. The solution was to assign the duties by casting lots. Evidently the priestly lines would each serve in turn, but the order of succession within each was determined by lot.

24:6 Shemaiah … wrote them down: In order to arrange the schedule for the priests' service and to keep it functioning properly, it was necessary that records be kept of all the names of the Levites by family and the shifts they were to fill in their rotation.

24:7–9 first lot: Since Eleazar and Ithamar are mentioned in that order in v. 6, it may be assumed that this list of names gives first someone from Eleazar, next someone from Ithamar, and so on alternately through the list.

24:10–19 This Abijah may be the ancestor of Zacharias, father of John the Baptist, who is named in Luke 1:5.

24:20, 21 sons of Levi: The non-priestly Levites also were divided by clan to determine their service rotation. The first division is Kohath, whose name does not appear but is implied in the mention of his son Amram. Jehdeiah and Isshiah, who were direct descendants of Moses (23:14–17), were omitted from the earlier list of Levites (23:16, 17).

24:22–24 The Izharites were Kohathites (23:12). Hebron was the third of the Kohathite clans (23:12). Uzziel was the last division of the Kohathites (23:12).

24:25, 26 Founder of the entire clan that bears his name (23:6), Merari was the third son of Levi. Jaaziah: This descendant of Merari appears for the first time here.

24:27–31 To assure the fairness of the Levites' assignments, they were selected by their divisions through the casting of the sacred lots (v. 5). fathers … younger brethren: There was no age discrimination in the work and shifts allocated to each. All served equally no matter what their age or status.

The Sons of Asaph

The name Asaph (1 Chr. 25:1) probably would have been as important to worshipers in ancient Israel as the names Bach and Handel have become for many Christian worshipers today. Asaph (1 Chr. 15:17) was one of the principal musicians appointed by King David (16:4, 5). Others mentioned in Scripture included Heman, Jeduthun, Ethan (15:17), and Chenaniah (15:22, 27). But it was Asaph whose name became attached to the guild of temple musicians and singers that led Israel's worship throughout the kingdom period and after the return from exile (Neh. 7:44).

Apparently Asaph was more than a talented musician, though he was particularly known for playing bronze cymbals, as for example on the return of the ark of the covenant to Jerusalem (1 Chr. 15:19; 16:5). He was described as a seer (2 Chr. 29:30) who "prophesied according to the order of the king" (1 Chr. 25:2). In other words, Asaph was gifted and called to proclaim the Lord's message to His people through song.

Scripture contains examples of what that holy anointing produced. Twelve psalms (Pss. 50; 73—83) are ascribed either to him or to his descendants, some of whom also received the prophetic gift (2 Chr. 20:14). It appears that Asaph lived long enough to help dedicate Solomon's temple (5:12). He left a powerful legacy that dominated Israel's worship under Solomon, helped revive Judah's spiritual life under Hezekiah (29:30), and still echoed in the days of the second temple built by Zerubbabel and Ezra (Ezra 2:41; 3:10).

25:1 The involvement of captains of the army in the selection of Levitical musicians may at first appear strange. However in the conduct of God's battles against those who opposed His people, music was frequently an important element. prophesy: The role of a prophet was not limited to prediction or proclamation in words. Any divinely authorized utterance or deed from a prophet was a form of prophesying. Vocal and instrumental music could be a kind of prophetic message, usually in the form of praise (1 Sam. 10:5, 6; 2 Kin. 3:15).

25:2 according to the order of the king: This underscored the leading role David took in the religious life of the nation (23:27). Even as king, David ordered that proper worship be given to the Lord.

25:3, 4 prophesied with a harp: This illustrates the possibility of prophecy apart from a human voice.

25:5 Like Nathan (17:1) and Gad (21:9), Heman enjoyed a close relationship to David. fourteen sons and three daughters: The sons were accounted for in vv. 4, 13, 23–31. The daughters were not named but clearly participated along with their brothers in the public worship of God.

25:6, 7 the authority of the king: Once more the chronicler insisted that even the religious life of the nation was under the king's supervision. Israel was a theocracy in which God was the ultimate King and therefore head over all aspects of national life. As God's son (17:13), the king not only oversaw civil affairs, but also the worship of the Lord, the true King of Israel.

25:8–31 small … great … teacher … student: The equality of all these servants of God is seen in the equal distribution of their assignments, a principle that had determined the nature of the ministry of the priests as well (24:31).

26:1 There were four divisions of the gatekeepers, but they came from only two of the Levitical clans, Kohath and Merari.

26:2, 3 In both 9:21 and here, Zechariah is the son of Meshelemiah. This means that the lists of 9:17–27 and 26:1–19 refer to the same time and circumstances.

26:4, 5 This Obed-Edom was probably not the Obed-Edom of 13:14, but a gatekeeper, the son of Jeduthun (16:38).

26:6–9 The oldest son of Obed-Edom (v. 4), Shemaiah, gave rise to a subclan of gatekeepers whose total number is given in v. 8.

26:10, 11 The only other clan represented is Merari, whose descendant Hosah had four sons and nine other offspring who served as gatekeepers (v. 11). The grand total of all the leaders of the gatekeepers was ninety-three.

26:12, 13 The foregoing list appears to have identified the head gatekeepers only, that is, the chief men. Like their Levitical brethren in music (25:7) and the priests (24:31), these officials served right along with the four thousand others who made up the whole contingent of gatekeepers (23:5). They were not excused from such work because of their leadership positions.

26:14 The East Gate was the most important because it led straight into the main entrance of the temple. It was therefore assigned to Shelemiah (or Meshelemiah, v. 1) himself. North Gate: This was the responsibility of the oldest son of Shelemiah.

26:15 South Gate: Obed-Edom was in charge of the gate itself, and his sons (vv. 4, 5) took charge of the storehouse. This was undoubtedly the same as the treasuries (v. 20). Because these sons were gatekeepers, it is likely that their involvement with the storehouse was limited to its gates or doors. This position required utmost honesty and integrity, for the precious metals and other trophies of war that were dedicated to Yahweh were kept there (18:7, 8, 11).

26:16 Shuppim: This individual is otherwise unknown, but it is reasonable to assume that he, with Hosah, was a Merarite (v. 10). Shalleketh Gate appears to be based on the Hebrew verb meaning “to cast forth,” which may refer to the portal through which the refuse of the temple was carried.

26:17 Two by two probably refers to two on each side of the storehouse gate, or four in all. If so, there were eight on the south side.

26:18 Parbar is usually left untranslated, but it likely refers to a place, perhaps a roadway or an open space, on the west side. The context here favors the view that it was a highway leading from a space adjacent to the temple. There were two gatekeepers at the entrance to the space itself (the Parbar) and four on the roadway leading to it. Depending on how one takes the "two by two" of v. 17, there were either twenty-two or twenty-four gatekeepers all told. These, of course, would be only the head gatekeepers, because there were 4,000 in all (23:5), no doubt several hundred serving in each shift.

26:19 Korah … Merari: This makes explicit the inference from vv. 1–11 that only the descendants of Kohath and Merari served as gatekeepers. The reason for the exclusion of the Gershonites is not stated, but it may be that they simply could not provide the manpower. They were also short in supplying musicians (25:2).

26:20 house of God: This likely referred to the storage area where regular tabernacle or temple paraphernalia were kept at hand for the worship services (9:28, 29). dedicated things: The second storehouse would contain the items taken as spoils of war that were used exclusively for holy purposes. David had already obtained a great amount of these (vv. 26–28).

26:21–24 The Levites listed in vv. 21–23 were in charge of the regular storehouse (v. 22; 23:8). Shebuel seems to have had general oversight of the regular storehouse. The Gershonites and other Kohathites of vv. 21–23 were under his direction.

26:25 The descendants of Eliezer became directors of the second storehouse, that of "the dedicated things" (v. 20). All the Levites who attended to the affairs of the tabernacle and temple treasuries traced their lineage back to Moses.

26:26, 27 The treasuries of the dedicated things fell under Shelomith's jurisdiction. These spoils of war were kept in storage until they could be used in the building and decoration of the temple (22:14; 29:2; 2 Chr. 5:1).

26:28 Showing the long-standing commitment of the nation to build and furnish the house of God, the chronicler listed leaders of the past who had dedicated spoils of war as readily as David had done.

26:29 Kohathites of the clan of Izhar provided officials and judges for conducting legal and religious affairs outside Jerusalem. This probably was restricted to questions pertaining to the Law of Moses and not to normal civil or political cases (23:4). Their leader was Cheraniah, not likely the music master of 15:22.

26:30 This third Kohathite clan was responsible specifically for Israel on the west side of the Jordan.

26:31 Since Hashabiah directed the Hebronites on the west (v. 30), Jerijah took charge of those on the east. He must have been over Hashabiah as well because he is called here head of the Hebronites. fortieth year: David reigned for 40 years (29:27), so these arrangements were completed in his very last year. Jazer of Gilead: This Levitical city (6:81) was located in the tribal territory of Gad, about seven miles west of Rabbah.

26:32 Reubenites … Gadites … half-tribe of Manasseh: These were the tribes of Israel who occupied the east side of the Jordan, often called the Transjordan.

27:1 heads of fathers' houses: This probably referred to tribal units, since the order appears to be in decreasing size through thousands and hundreds. month by month: The view that fathers houses meant tribes is strengthened by the fact that there were twelve divisions, one for each month. Apparently a professional standing army is being described here, one broken up into twelve corps that served a month at a time on a rotating basis. twenty-four thousand: The total available manpower throughout Israel would be 288,000.

27:2, 3 A connection can be made here to the list of David's mighty men, which is also headed by Jashobeam (11:11). He was one of "the three," which meant he was regarded as unusually heroic.

27:4 Dodai's son Eleazar was the second of the mighty men included in the first trio along with Jashobeam (11:12).

27:5, 6 As the son of a priest, Benaiah was from the tribe of Levi. In the earlier list of mighty men he was celebrated for having killed a lion and a gigantic Egyptian (11:22, 23). Because of this kind of courage, he became part of the second group of "the three" (11:24). Later he was named commander of the entire Israelite army (1 Kin. 4:4). His son served with him (v. 6).

27:7 David's nephew Asahel (2:15, 16) was among the thirty mighty men but did not achieve a position among "the three" (11:26). His son also served with him.

27:8 If, as some scholars believe, Izrahite is the same as "Zerahite," then this Shammuth is also a man of Judah. In the list of heroes he is called "Shammoth the Harorite" (11:27), Haror perhaps being the name of his home city (Harod in 2 Sam. 23:25).

27:9 A Tekoite was a person from the village of Tekoa, some five or six miles southeast of Bethlehem. This would make Ira a member of the tribe of Judah. It is clear that even if the military divisions were made up along tribal lines, their commanders were often David's own fellow Judeans. This appears to be so for Jashobeam (v. 2), Asahel (v. 7), Shamhuth (v. 8), and now Ira.

27:10 Helez: The leadership of the army was not limited to Judeans (27:9), since Helez was an Ephraimite in such a position.

27:11 Since Husha was a Judean (4:4), Sibbechai also came from the tribe of Judah. Zarhites likely referred to descendants of Zerah, a son of Judah (2:4; Num. 26:20). The present passage apparently placed the Hushathites in a position subsidiary to the Zarhites. In any case, Sibbechai was one of the thirty heroes, having distinguished himself by killing a Philistine giant (11:29; 2 Sam. 21:18).

27:12 A Benjamite commander, Abiezer came from the Levitical town of Anathoth, just north of Jerusalem. He was also a member of the elite thirty (11:28).

27:13 Since Netophah was a village near Bethlehem, Maharai was still another of David's fellow tribesmen named as commander of a division and member of the valorous thirty (11:30).

27:14 Another Ephraimite, this Benaiah (v. 5) came from Pirathon, five miles south of Samaria. Like the others he was one of the thirty mighty men (11:31).

27:15 Like Maharai (v. 13), this captain came from Netophah. Besides being one of the thirty (11:30), Heldai could claim descent from Israel's first judge, Othniel.

27:16 officer: The list that begins here (vv. 16–22) is clearly nonmilitary and tribal in nature. The description of these officers is much more political than the descriptions of the captains and officers of the military divisions (v. 1).

27:17 Aaronites: This is not a separate tribe but the priestly division of the tribe of Levi. Zadok the priest was naturally the leader of this segment of the tribe. The reason the tribe of Levi is listed here (contrary to many tribal lists) is to make up for two missing tribes and to bring the total to the ideal number of twelve.

27:18, 19 Elihu: This brother of David is usually called Eliab (1 Sam. 16:6).

27:20–22 This Manasseh and the one in v. 21 are counted as separate tribes here to make up for two missing tribes (v. 17). Levi was not normally counted, so with Levi and the other two tribes lacking there would be only nine. When Levi and two Manassehs (rather than one) are added, there are eleven. The twelfth was Simeon (v. 16), usually not counted since it was considered to be a sub-tribe of Judah (4:31; Josh. 19:1–9). The two missing tribes are Asher and Gad. The reason they are not included may be that they were dominated or occupied by the Phoenicians and Ammonites respectively at this particular time (2 Sam. 17:27–29). But this is speculative.

27:23 take the number: This ties in the previous list of tribes and leaders with David's ill-fated census near the end of his reign (v. 24; 21:1–17). So confident was David that his military might would be sufficient for any encounter, he omitted from his census all those twenty years old and under. Even so, the result of this census was over a million men (21:5), a multitude very much like the stars of the heavens—the words of God's promise to Abraham (Gen. 12:2; 15:5).

27:24 Joab's count included all the tribes except for Levi and Benjamin (21:6). Although these two tribes are included in the present list (vv. 17, 21), nothing is said of their being counted. On the other hand, Asher and Gad, missing in this list (v. 16–22), must have been included in Joab's census.

27:25 As opposed to the "treasuries of the house of God" and the "treasuries of the dedicated things" (26:20), the king's treasuries were the royal storehouses. They contained the revenues of the state in the form of precious metals (29:3–5) and other goods and commodities gained through taxation, tribute, and other means (2 Chr. 9:13, 14). storehouses: These were regional collection facilities ranging no doubt from granaries to warehouses to places of safe deposit of valuables. According to the following list, their primary purpose was to store agricultural produce.

27:26 Tilling the ground speaks of the production and storage of field crops such as wheat, barley, and vegetables.

27:27 vineyards: This industry was in two divisions, one to grow the grapes and the other to make wine.

27:28 sycamore: This word refers to a tree that yielded figs. It could also be a kind of mulberry.

27:29 A fertile plain between Israelite and Philistine territory, Sharon was ideal for grazing cattle and sheep. It is appropriate that someone from Sharon, who knew the land and all its seasonal changes, should be in charge of the livestock of that region.

27:30 Inhabitants of the desert were at home with the breeding and use of camels (Gen. 37:25), so naturally an Ishmaelite would be in charge of such animals.

27:31 Since there was no essential difference between the king and his state, the property of the king consisted of the assets of the nation.

27:32 The Hebrew word translated uncle here might be better translated "kinsman."

27:33 The only other Ahithophel mentioned in the Bible is the well-known counselor of Absalom, who advised him to attack his father David at the time of Absalom's rebellion. When his advice was spurned, he took his own life (2 Sam. 15:12; 16:15–23). If the counselor here is that Ahithophel, the list must be describing an office held some years earlier. However, it is entirely possible that the earlier counselor had a son by the same name, who eventually succeeded his father in that role. king's companion: This is likely a technical term signifying the king's closest confidant. It is interesting that he appears in the narrative of Absalom's rebellion as the counselor who contradicted Ahithaphel's advice and who evidently went on to replace him as chief adviser to the king (2 Sam. 17:5–23; 15:37; 16:16–19).

27:34 Jehoiada the son of Benaiah: In the list of military officers there was also a "Benaiah who was a son of Jehoiada" (v. 5). This is probably an example of the custom in which a man is named after his grandfather. The counselor Jehoiada was probably the grandson of Jehoiada the priest and son of the famous warrior Benaiah (v. 5). Joab: From the days of David's conquest of Jerusalem, Joab held the position of commander of the army of Israel (11:6), a post he kept until Solomon became king (1 Kin. 2:28–35).

28:1 These were the individuals of 27:1–34, plus others no doubt, who were the leaders of all the branches and extensions of Israel's government. The occasion was of such significance that a total assembly of dignitaries was essential.

28:2–4 The word footstool is a metaphor describing either the ark of the covenant or the tabernacle as the earthly base of God's activity. He sits on a throne in heaven, and His connection with the earth is focused in his earthly dwelling place, the tent or the ark. Elsewhere, the whole earth is described as God's footstool (Is. 66:1).

28:5 The call to rule was not limited to David, but included his descendants (17:11). Since only one of his sons could reign in his place, a choice ad to be made (14:3, 4), and God chose Solomon to succeed David as the king of Israel (22:9, 10; 2 Sam. 12:24; 1 Kin. 1:13, 30).

28:6 My son … his Father: This remarkable statement not only shows that the Davidic kings enjoyed unparalleled access to the Lord as His adopted sons (17:3; Ps. 2:7), but it anticipates the absolute sonship of the Son of David, Jesus Christ (Acts 13:33; Heb. 1:5).

28:7, 8 The conditional aspect of the covenant with David and his dynasty is real, not hypothetical. Not one of the kings, including David, was able to observe the commandments and judgments perfectly. Therefore they were unable in themselves to reign forever or even set the stage for an everlasting rule. But One would come who would be able to do so and who would fulfill the covenant perfectly. This One was Jesus, the Son of David (Matt. 5:7; 21:9).

28:9, 10 True service of God is more than rational and intellectual. It requires a commitment of the emotions as well. This was precisely where Solomon failed. Even though he had great wisdom (2 Chr. 1:12; 9:3, 22, 23), he allowed his heart to turn aside from God because he loved foreign women (1 Kin. 11:1–4). Loyalty of heart is essential for faithful, effective service.

28:11 The plans for the temple, as v. 12 makes clear, were not from David's own creative imagination but from the Spirit of God. vestibule: This was a porch in front of the temple (2 Chr. 3:4). treasuries: These, also called storehouses (26:15, 17), included "treasuries of the house of God" and "treasuries of the dedicated things" (26:20). upper chambers: Besides the main temple building, there were rooms of all kinds attached to it to accommodate the priests, the Levites, and all the equipment and items they needed to carry out the temple worship (Neh. 13:4, 5). Some of these chambers were built high on the outside of the temple walls (1 Kin. 6:6, 8). the place of the mercy seat: This was the Most Holy Place, the inner room that housed the ark of the covenant, the cover of which was known as the mercy seat (Ex. 25:17).

28:12, 13 by the Spirit: Moses had received the plans for the tabernacle by direct revelation from God (Ex. 25:8, 9). David explained that he received the plans for the temple in the same way. David wanted it to be known that even the assignments he gave to the priests and the Levites (23:1—26:32) were revealed to him by God.

28:14–18 The chariot was a way of referring to the cherubim who hovered over the ark with outstretched wings, symbolizing the holiness of God. Cherubim appear in the story of the expulsion of man and woman from the Garden of Eden (Gen. 3:24) and as guardians of the "throne" of God in the tabernacle (Ex. 25:18–20) and temple (2 Chr. 3:10–13). They overshadowed the mercy seat of the ark of the covenant, enhancing its glory and protecting its holiness.

28:19 David asserted that all the works of these plans existed in written form from the hand of the Lord. David himself may have been the scribe, for he said that God's hand was upon him in the production of the plans. The detailed precision of the temple plans (vv. 11–18) attests to the clarity of the revelation and to its faithful recording by David.

28:20, 21 Be strong and of good courage: David's charge to Solomon is very similar to the charge given to Joshua when Moses handed over the leadership of Israel to him. For Moses' charge to Joshua, read Deut. 31:7, 8; for God's charge to Joshua, read Josh. 1:6–9.

29:1, 2 God Himself had chosen David out of all his brothers (28:4). Now He chose Solomon out of all of his brothers to succeed David on the throne (28:5). the work is great: The project was great not only because of its size and complexity, but because it was for God Himself. Since the very plans and specifications had been revealed to David by God (28:19), David was fully aware of the significance of his charge to Solomon. God's work could not be undertaken lightly. Solomon himself was aware of his limitations in this respect and of his need for supernatural direction (2 Chr. 1:10; 2:2–7).

29:3, 4 Because David loved God, he loved the work of God. my own special treasure: As a testimony to his professed affection for the house of his God, David pledged generous gifts from his own resources.

29:5, 6 This magnanimous gesture by David gave him the boldness to solicit a similar response from those under him. It is important to note that David asked the others to consecrate themselves, not their treasures. David knew that those who first consecrated themselves to God would have no difficulty in being generous to the work of God.

29:7 five thousand talents: About 190 tons. ten thousand darics: About 185 pounds of gold. eighteen thousand talents of bronze: This was equivalent to about 675 tons. one hundred thousand talents of iron: This was approximately 3,750 tons.

29:8 These precious stones provided the adornments worn on the shoulders and breastplate of the high priest (Ex. 28:9–12, 17–21).

29:9 loyal heart: The Hebrew is literally "with a fullness of heart." This parallels the word willingly, and the two words together suggest that coercion played no part in the offering.

29:10 David blessed the LORD: Upon the completion of the offerings, David offered praise, using a song no doubt composed especially for this occasion (vv. 10–12), followed by a prayer of confession and petition.

29:11 The purpose of the temple was to exalt the LORD and to acknowledge the universality of His kingdom. David modeled before the people the worship of the living God. It typically starts with praise for God's eternity, His complete control over the universe, and His great power. He is the glorious Master over all (Ps. 134:3).

29:12–14 David confessed that the riches and honor he enjoyed had come from God's generosity. The offerings he and his people had just made were possible only because God first had given to them. able to offer so willingly: Not only the ability to give, but the willingness to give, is a gift of God (2 Cor. 9:7, 8).

29:15 aliens and strangers: David asserts that life on earth is transitory and even nomadic. Only when a person becomes conscious of his or her place within the care and blessing of a sovereign God does life become more than a shadow. Suddenly the hope of a future with God illuminates that person's journey on this earth (Heb. 11:13–16; 13:14).

29:16 all your own: Once more David reiterates that he has nothing that did not first come to him from Yahweh. Therefore, it is impossible in the strict sense to speak of giving him anything.

29:17 If people truly can give nothing of value to God, why does He ask His people to give? David answers this question. God enjoys a person's uprightness or righteousness. With gifts, offerings, and sacrifices, a person tangibly demonstrates not only gratitude to God, but trust in Him (1 Sam. 15:22). A righteous life always produces a generous spirit. For this reason, David could proclaim that his giving was only out of the uprightness of his heart. Moreover, his joy was heightened all the more when he saw that his people also understood this principle of true giving.

29:18 This formula LORD God of Abraham, Isaac, and Israel was associated with God's covenantal promises to the Israelites (Ex. 3:6, 15; 6:3, 4; Deut. 6:10). With this name of God, David was petitioning God to keep His people always in covenant fellowship with Himself.

29:19 In his prayer, David used the language of the covenant—commandments, testimonies, and statutes (Deut. 6:1, 2, 20; 8:11; 11:1). Unlike v. 18, David uses this language not as much for the nation as a whole as for his son Solomon. God had already made a covenant with David (17:7–14) and promised to renew it with his descendants. As with giving (v. 14), zeal for faithfulness to God's covenant must also come from God Himself (v. 14). Therefore, David prayed that God would give Solomon a loyal heart to be obedient. In Solomon's case, David's particular concern was that his son would keep his pledge to build the temple.

29:20, 21 the LORD and the king: David's special role as covenant son of God and theocratic mediator (17:13) meant that in the eyes of the people there was little practical or functional difference between prostrating themselves before God or the king. This does not mean, of course, that they failed to see the essential difference between the two, for in Israelite thought there was never any confusion about the utter dissimilarity and distance between the Divine and the human (Ps. 8:3–5).

29:22 ate and drank before the LORD: The scene here is one of covenant communion and confirmation as the participation of Yahweh and the people in a common meal here and elsewhere makes clear (Ex. 24:3–11; Gen. 26:26–30; 31:53, 54). the second time: This unusual phrase can only refer to the ratification of Solomon's kingship, not to its original establishment. David had appointed his son to be king at least two years earlier (23:1), an appointment that made Solomon a coregent rather than a true king, since he ruled alongside his father David. Zadok … priest: Zadok had remained loyal to David and Solomon. But Abiathar defected to Adonijah, David's other son who attempted to overthrow Solomon's succession (1 Kin. 1:1–8).

29:23, 24 Once more the chronicler ties the kingship of David and that of God closely together. As God's son (17:13), Solomon would sit on the throne as God's representative. In that sense, the royal throne was also the throne of the LORD (v. 20). Eventually, Jesus as the Son of David and the Son of God would sit on that throne and reign forever (Luke 1:32).

29:25, 26 any king before him: Obviously this included only Saul and David, but it is still a remarkable statement in light of David's widely recognized power and magnificence (11:9; 14:2; 18:1–13; 29:28).

29:27, 28 In comparison to the patriarchs and even to such men as Eli and Samuel, David's 70 years seem short. However, in his time this was a good old age. Moses used it as the standard for reasonable longevity (Ps. 90:10).

29:29, 30 Here the chronicler revealed three sources he used in writing, and the reader interested in more information about the acts of King David is referred to those books. This note shows that the author of Chronicles did not invent the account or depend on oral tradition. Instead the chronicler cited texts available in his day.

The Second Book of Chronicles

———— WHEN IT WAS FIRST WRITTEN, 2 CHRONICLES brought a ray of hope to a people desperately in need of encouragement. The Israelite community, reduced to a tiny minority in exile among the Babylonians, was struggling to understand its place. Had God's promises to Abraham and David been revoked because of the nation's sins? Was there any hope of reviving David's dynasty? Could Judaism survive without the temple? Second Chronicles addressed questions like these. Its answers came in a historical review of God's faithfulness to the Israelites. Although the nation had steadily declined over the centuries, God had always been faithful to those who remained true to Him. The good that God had done in the past would be the pattern for His future acts. God would keep His glorious promises to the Israelites.

The details of the history of Israel and Judah in 2 Chronicles communicate the great message of redemption—particularly God's blessing on David and his successors. First Chronicles focuses on the Davidic covenant during David's time; 2 Chronicles continues that theme in the period after David's death. Even though 2 Chronicles relates the experiences of Solomon and his successors, it continues to emphasize God's promise of an everlasting dynasty to David. Successors to David came and went. Some were true to the requirements of that covenant—they "walked in the former ways of their father David" (17:3)—and others were not. But God's commitment to the household of David continued throughout, even after the exile to Babylon.

Because of this emphasis on covenant, 2 Chronicles makes frequent mention of priests, Levites, the temple, and other elements of Israel's religious life. It tells how Solomon's temple was built and furnished (2:1—8:16) and includes a thorough description of the temple and its ministry (20:5–13, 24–30; 23:12–21; 24:4–14; 29:2—31:21; 34:2—35:19).

The centrality of the Davidic covenant also explains why 2 Chronicles devotes more attention to Judah than to Israel. Ever since the division into southern and northern kingdoms (10:16–19; 1 Kin. 11:9–13), Judah had become the inheritors of God's promises to David. Though David's successors ruled only the smaller kingdom of Judah, God had remained faithful to His unconditional covenant with David. Judah was the nucleus through which God would accomplish His work of redemption.

First and Second Chronicles were at first a single book (see Introduction to 1 Chronicles). The book itself does not state who wrote it, but the overall consistency of viewpoint and style indicates that it was probably the work of one person. Most commentators refer to this person as the "chronicler." One Jewish tradition identifies him as Ezra (c. 460–430 B.C.) because Chronicles and Ezra share common themes like extensive lists, the Levites, and the temple.

The chronicler had access to many official documents, which he often mentions by name. These include (1) the Book of the Kings of Israel and Judah (27:7; 35:27; 36:8); (2) the Book of the Kings of Judah and Israel (16:11; 25:26; 28:26; 32:32); (3) the Book of the Kings of Israel (20:34; 33:18); (4) the annals (commentary) of the Book of the Kings (24:27); (5) the Book of Nathan, the prophecy of Ahijah, and the visions of Iddo (9:29); (6) the history of Shemaiah (12:15); (7) the annals of Iddo (13:22); (8) the writings of the prophet Isaiah (26:22); (9) the sayings of Hozai (33:19); and (10) the Laments (35:25). The chronicler also cites the canonical books of 1 and 2 Kings.

Solomon: Successful But Not Satisfied

Thanks to the Lord's help, Solomon apparently became the wealthiest and wisest man of his era (2 Chr. 1:1). No one, it seems, accumulated or accomplished as much as he did (Eccl. 2:1–9). Yet by his own admission (assuming that Solomon wrote Ecclesiastes), his life was far from satisfying (2:11, 16).

Solomon is a case study in how a person can be successful in terms of power, wealth, and prestige, yet lack the true success that comes from knowing and honoring God the way someone should. Notice how those who came after him remembered his legacy: • Nehemiah (a leader of the returning Babylonian exiles): Presented Solomon as an illustration of disobedience through his intermarriage with foreign—and therefore idolatrous—wives (Neh. 13:26, 27; compare 1 Kin. 11:1–8). In effect, Nehemiah warned that just as God had punished the nation for Solomon's sins, so he would punish His people again if they continued in Solomon's ways rather than God's.

• Jesus: Used Solomon and his splendor as an illustration of how His followers needed to concentrate on trusting, loving, and serving God rather than on material gain or even the problems of day-to-day life (Matt. 6:28–32). Later, Jesus challenged His enemies with the fact that the Queen of Sheba, a Gentile, had shown more faith in coming to Jerusalem to inquire of Solomon than they had shown after seeing His miracles and hearing His teaching (12:42).

• Stephen (a leader in the early church): In detailing the history of Israel, mentioned Solomon as the one who built a house for God, but praised Solomon's father David as the one who "found favor before God" (Acts 7:45–48).

• Paul (also a leader in the early church): In reviewing the history of Israel from the OT, mentioned several of the great leaders of Israel, including Samuel, the judges, Saul, and David—but not Solomon (Acts 13:22).

• The author of Hebrews: Catalogued the great models of faith from Israel's history (Heb. 11), but did not include Solomon.

Solomon wasn't all bad, but his life shows us that great achievements and success—whether in business, government, academia, or any other field—pale in comparison to being faithful to God.

1:1, 2 exalted him exceedingly: The repetition here of the wording 1 Chr. 29:25 shows how 1 and 2 Chronicles were originally one book, even though it is customary to print the two parts separately.

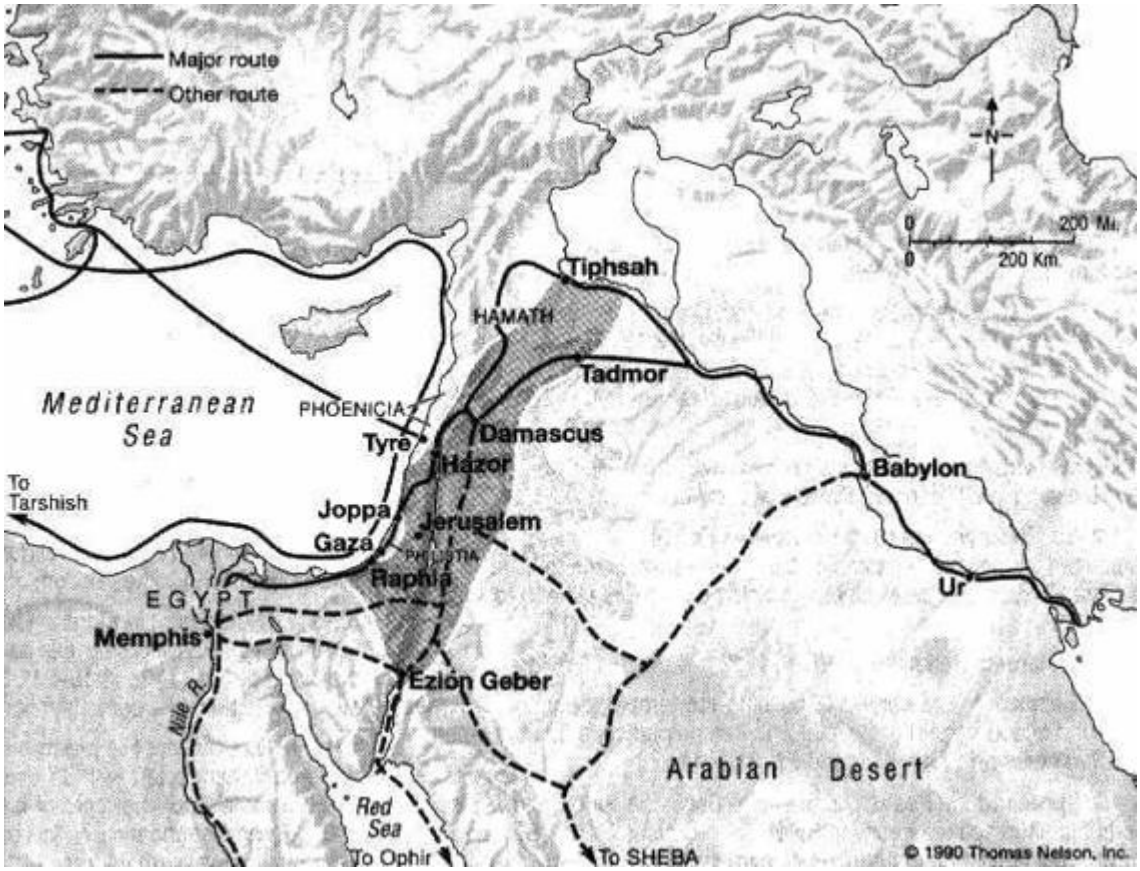
1:3, 4 The term high place comes from the fact that many ancient worshipers used hills for their sacred rites, thinking that such places were good "meeting points" between heaven and earth. Over time, high place came to mean any worship center, whether it was on a hill or not. In the OT, the high places were usually associated with pagan, particularly Canaanite, religion, but there was nothing inherently evil about using a hilltop as a place of worship. Thus the patriarchs (Gen. 12:8; 22:2) and other worshipers of God offered their sacrifices on high places (1 Sam. 9:12; 1 Kin. 18:19, 36–38). The evil was not in the place itself but in the pagan rituals that were usually practiced there. The high place at Gibeon was the location of the Mosaic tabernacle after Saul destroyed Nob (1 Sam. 22:19). It seems that the Israelites moved the tabernacle to Nob after they had stopped using Shiloh as the religious center of Israel (1 Sam. 4:21, 22; Jer. 7:12). The tabernacle remained in Gibeon together with the great bronze altar throughout David's reign.

1:5 Bezalel was one of the two men chosen especially by God to build the tabernacle in the wilderness (Ex. 31:1–11). Aholiab was the other. The text here mentions Bezalel alone apparently because he was the master craftsman, while Aholiab was his assistant. the assembly sought Him there: This phrase is important because Solomon and the people, as a congregation, usually worshiped God at Gibeon.

1:6 went up: Solomon's worship at Gibeon affirmed the covenant that bound God and the Davidic dynasty together (1 Chr. 17:7–14) and showed that Solomon accepted the religious responsibilities of his office (v. 3). Solomon had been appointed vice-regent by his father two years earlier (1 Chr. 23:1). He had been elevated to full kingship ("made king the second time") in a service of anointing and public acclamation (1 Chr. 29:21–23), and now his selection as the Davidic heir was being sanctioned by the community as a whole, in line with already established precedent (1 Sam. 10:1, 24, 25; 11:14, 15; 16:13; 2 Sam. 5:3; 1 Chr. 11:1–3; 12:38–40).

1:7–9 Solomon knew about the Abrahamic covenant and God's promise to make Abraham's descendants like the dust of the earth (Gen. 13:16). Solomon believed that the promise had come to pass, and he was confident that God would fulfill His promise to David as well. This meant that he saw his own succession (1 Chr. 17:11) and the building of the temple as fulfillment of God's promises (1 Chr. 17:12, 13).

1:10 wisdom and knowledge: These words are frequently in parallel and are essentitally synonymous. However, Hebrew hohmah, translated "wisdom," denotes insight, usually of a spiritual kind, whereas madda, "knowledge," pertains to the accumulation of information or facts and their proper use. Solomon knows already of his limitations because of his youth and inexperience (1 Chr. 29:1), but he also knows that "the fear of the LORD is the beginning of knowledge" (Prov. 1:7). go out and come in: This figure of speech refers to the totality of Solomon's life. As king he would lead by example as well as by edict.



The Spread of Solomon's Fame

Solomon's influence in economic and political affairs was enhanced by the transportation and trade routes that intersected his kingdom. That Solomon acquired much through trade is suggested by the response of the queen of Sheba on her visit to Solomon, and by the mention of traders and merchants (9:14) in the account of his wealth. Solomon may have fortified Tadmor (8:4) in order to have a safe and direct trade route from Asia Minor to Damascus.

1:11, 12 Solomon's request for wisdom centered on God's people and how he could best serve them, not on his own gain. Once Solomon had demonstrated this spirit of servanthood, God granted many unsolicited blessings.

1:13, 14 Solomon located his chariots in other cities besides Jerusalem, possibly in Hazor, Megiddo, and Gezer (1 Kin. 9:15, 19). The 1,400 chariots and twelve thousand horsemen here compare to four thousand stalls for horses and chariots and twelve thousand horsemen in 9:25. A chariot force of 1,400 units was a significant achievement for Israel, a nation located primarily in hilly terrain where chariots were of limited value.

1:15, 16 Keveh was probably an ancient name for what later came to be known as Cilicia. This city was on the northeast Mediterranean coast, a region famous for horses. The horses imported from Egypt were larger horses bred in Nubia and used mainly for pulling chariots.

1:17 six hundred shekels of silver: It is often impossible to assign a price in a modern currency to the goods and services of the ancient world. But this verse suggests that a chariot cost as much as four horses. they exported them: Solomon had a thriving business in horses and chariots. Because Israel was on the route between Asia and Africa, such goods would go through Israel and become subject to Solomon's heavy import and export taxes. Hittites were the peoples of the ancient nation of Hatti in central Asia Minor. They reached the height of their power at about 1350–1300 B.C., but were nearly exterminated by the Sea Peoples in about 1200 B.C. There were pockets of Hittites in Solomon's day, mainly north of Israel among the Syrians.

2:1, 2 a royal house for himself: It was customary for a new king to build a palace as a physical and visible sign of his newly won sovereignty, though this usually was done right after a military conquest (1 Chr. 14:1, 2).

2:3 Hiram king of Tyre was the same Phoenician ruler who had provided men and materials for David's palace (1 Chr. 14:1).

2:4 a temple for the name: This is a round about way of saying that he is building the temple for Yahweh. Solomon is very much aware of the holiness and transcendence of God and of the impossibility of imagining that God can be confined to a building or even be said to live in a building (v. 6; 6:18). Therefore, the temple does not house God but only His name, that is, that which represents Him (Deut. 12:5, 11, 21).

2:5 Solomon's statement that our God is greater than all gods means that God is the only true God, not that He is the greatest one among many lesser ones. All pagan "gods" are actually imaginary.

IN DEPTH

Solomon's Temple

Solomon's temple was the first of three temples that Israel built in its long history. David wanted to build it, but as a man of war he was unqualified to build such a holy place. So with the plans that God gave David and which David passed on to him, King Solomon built the house of God. As God had instructed, Solomon built it on Mount Moriah just north of the ancient City of David.

Solomon wanted to build a temple worthy of being the center of worship for the entire nation, so he used only the best craftsmen and materials. The materials included cedar and algum logs, gold and silver, cut stone, and fine linen. Most of the temple's beams, posts, walls, and doors were overlaid with gold, decorated with carvings of palm trees, garlands, and cherubim. The Most Holy Place alone was overlaid with twenty-three tons of fine gold. In this room two giant gold cherubim, with seven-and-a-half-foot wings overshadowed the ark of the covenant. A veil of crimson and fine linen separated the Most Holy Place from the holy place. The temple's furnishings included ten lampstands of gold, ten tables, and one hundred bowls of gold. Only the most skilled craftsmen worked on these details. The temple was sixty cubits long and twenty cubits wide or ninety by thirty feet.

It took seven years for Solomon's workers to complete this grand building, and the finished structure dazzled all who saw it. Yet for all its beauty, Solomon knew that no manmade building could contain God, as heaven itself could not contain Him (6:18). The temple served mainly as a reminder of God's covenant. To all who came and worshiped there, God held out his promised presence. However, the temple was no guarantee of that presence. God had promised to live among the Israelites forever, and the temple was God's so-called "dwelling place," but for the Holy God to live among His people they had to remain faithful to Him. Unfortunately they did not remain faithful, and consequently the temple was looted and destroyed as were the second and third temples after it.

2:6 Solomon could not build a dwelling place for God because God could never be contained within any physical structure. The temple provided a place for God's people to go and offer sacrifices of worship to the Lord.

2:7, 8 The skillful men … with me refers to the ones David had already selected and organized for the purpose of building the temple (1 Chr. 22:15, 16). The chronicler emphasized David's intense interest in the temple and the elaborate steps he took to prepare for its building (1 Chr. 22:1–19). Algum logs probably refers to a kind of exotic tree imported from Ophir—south Arabia, perhaps Yemen.

2:9, 10 The amount of ground wheat here is about 125,000 bushels or 3,750 tons. Twenty thousand baths is approximately 115,000 gallons.

2:11, 12 Blessed be the LORD God of Israel: Most likely a polite salutation to Solomon rather than a sincere recognition of God as the one true God. a wise son: It is clear from his letter that Hiram knew a great deal about Solomon, including: (1) the background of Solomon's request for materials and workmen, (2) Solomon's selection by God to be king (v. 2:11), (3) Solomon's unusual wisdom, and (4) Solomon's call to build the temple. Apparently Hiram, David, and Solomon maintained close contact.

2:13 Huram: This name, spelled alternatively Hiram, is the same as the name of the King of Tyre but obviously refers here to a different man, the one to be sent in response to Solomon's request for a skillful man (v. 7).

2:14 Hiram had an Israelite mother and a Phoenician father. Moses had warned the Israelites not to take spouses committed to pagan religions (Deut. 7:1–5).

2:15, 16 Joppa, now known as Jaffa, was the only seaport on the Israelite Mediterranean coast between Dor on the north and Philistia to the south. Jonah sailed from Joppa to escape God's call to Nineveh (Jon. 1:3). Though Hiram's rafts helped transport the timber from Lebanon to Israel, the route from Joppa to Jerusalem was not so easy—it was a winding, steep ascent of nearly 40 miles.

2:17 Solomon's policy of forced labor drafted aliens first into the hard work of carrying loads and quarrying stone (v. 18). The term suggests any persons living in Israel who were not native Israelites. The census refers to David's ill-advised count in the closing years of his reign (1 Chr. 21:1–5).

IN PLACE

Mount Moriah

Mount Moriah was the name the hill just north of the City of David on which Solomon built the temple (2 Chr. 3:1). The name Moriah is used only one other time in the Bible, in connection with "the land of Moriah," where God told Abraham to take Isaac and sacrifice him as a burnt offering (Gen. 22:2). Presumably the temple was located at that site. David purchased the land that was later used for the temple from Ornan (Araunah in 1 Sam. 24:15–25) following David's sin of numbering Israel (1 Chr. 21). Apparently the purchase, and perhaps the census as well, was part of David's abiding desire to build the temple, which God delayed until Solomon's time (17:1–6; 22:1–10).

3:1 Mount Moriah was sacred and therefore an appropriate place for the temple not only because the threshing floor of Ornan was there (1 Chr. 21:18–30), but also because it was the "land of Moriah" to which Abraham took Isaac for sacrifice (Gen. 22:2). David had received explicit instructions from the Lord that the very site that he had purchased from Ornan, and where he had already built an altar, should be the location of the future temple (1 Chr. 21:18, 26). Mount Moriah is known today as the temple mount and the site of the Muslim Dome of the Rock. It is a hill directly north of Mount Zion, the location of David's tabernacle (1 Chr. 15:1).

3:2 The second day of the second month fell in April of the modern calendar. Making arrangements for the building, amassing building materials, and clearing the site could easily have required four years. This explains why Solomon did not begin the project in his first year. Also, 1 Kings indicates that Solomon was busy in his early reign putting down potential insurrection and dealing with other problems attendant to his succession (1 Kin. 1; 2).

3:3 The Israelites had two standard cubits, one about 17.4 inches long and the other about 20.4 inches. Probably the former measure mentioned here was the 17.4–inch cubit, making the temple foundation about 90 feet long and 30 feet wide. The Mosaic tabernacle was 45 feet long and 15 feet wide (Ex. 26:15–37).

3:4 vestibule: This was a porch in front of the temple building proper. It was thirty feet long, thus stretching across the whole width of the temple, fifteen feet wide (1 Kin. 6:3), and 180 feet high (120 cubits) according to the Hebrew text here. Other ancient versions read twenty cubits (thirty feet) for the height, bringing that measurement more in line with the height of the temple itself as recorded in 1 Kin. 6:2, namely, thirty cubits or forty-five feet.

3:5–7 The larger room was the holy place or "sanctuary" (1 Kin. 6:17). The parallel account in 1 Kin. 6:18 suggests that the chainwork may refer to an interlocking design of buds and flowers. If so, these, with the carved palm trees, call to mind a lush garden scene. Along with reference to carved cherubim (v. 7), this may identify the whole as a stylized representation of the garden of Eden (Gen. 3:24), the place where God originally met with His worshiping people.

3:8 The Most Holy Place was the inner sanctuary, where the ark of the covenant (1 Kin. 6:19) was kept. This room was cubical in shape, twenty cubits (30 ft.) on a side (read 1 Kin. 6:20 for the height). Six hundred talents is approximately 23 tons of gold.

3:9 Gold by itself is too soft to use for nails, so the nails mentioned here must have been decorative or else some other metal plated with gold. The weight fifty shekels (about 1.2 lbs.) implies that they were plated nails.

3:10 The cherubim that Solomon had fashioned for the Most Holy Place were not the ones carved into the walls of the holy place (v. 7), but additional ones carved and plated with gold here in the Most Holy Place.

3:11–13 The cherubim stood side by side with outstretched wings touching in the middle and overshadowing the ark. Since each wing was five cubits long and the room was twenty cubits across, the cherubim's wings spanned the entire width of the room. Facing inward meant that the cherubim were facing the veil and the holy place.

3:14 The veil was a heavy curtain between the holy place and the Most Holy Place. It shielded the ark and cherubim from view (5:9). Cherubim were woven into the fabric of the veil. The materials and colors used here—blue, purple, crimson, and fine linen—are the same as those of the veil of the tabernacle.

3:15 The two pillars in front were free-standing and did not support any part of the temple. Thirty-five cubits was about 53 feet, and with the five cubit capitals on top, the pillars were about 60 feet tall. Because of the aesthetic and architectural problems caused by this, many prefer the measurements of the parallel 1 Kings account, which attributes eighteen cubits to each column plus the capital (1 Kin. 7:15). This yields a total height of thirty-four-and-a-half feet for each, making the pillars about four and a half feet higher than the temple porch but lower than its roof.

3:16 As in v. 5, chainwork appears to be a network of fruits and plants, as the presence of pomegranates indicates. First Kings expands the description (1 Kin. 7:17–20). There were seven wreaths of chainwork on each capital and two rows of pomegranates above the wreaths. The capitals seem to have been in the form of lilies four cubits high with a one-cubit width band at their base. The wreaths and strands of pomegranates were intertwined around the base. The one hundred pomegranates were one of four strands, two to each pillar, or 400 pomegranates in all.

3:17 The names Jachin and Boaz mean "He Establishes" and "In Him Is Strength." Thus the two pillars were constant reminders of the presence and power of God.

4:1 The bronze altar was for burnt offerings in the courtyard of the temple.

4:2 The Sea was a large receptacle for water corresponding to the much smaller bronze laver of the Mosaic tabernacle (Ex. 30:17–21). That laver provided water for the priests to wash their hands and feet in preparation for ministering at the altar. The Sea served the same purpose (v. 6). It was huge —15 feet in diameter and 45 feet in circumference.

4:3 The oxen stood for strength and fertility. Other Bible passages use the ox's horn to signify this (1 Sam. 2:10).

4:4 The twelve oxen were in addition to the ones engraved on the outside of the Sea, and like them they symbolized strength and productivity. Their number corresponds to the twelve tribes of Israel.

4:5 The Sea was very heavy even when empty. When filled with three thousand baths (about 27,000 gallons) of water, it would have weighed about 110 tons more.

4:6 The ten lavers were arranged in two rows of five, on the north and south sides of the Sea. According to 1 Kin. 7:38, each held 40 baths or about 230 gallons. They could accommodate large animals such as oxen. The law of burnt offerings required that certain parts of the animal be washed in water before being placed on the altar (Lev. 1:9, 13).

4:7 Whereas the wilderness tabernacle had only one lampstand, this temple had ten (Ex. 25:31), five on the north side of the holy place and five on the south. They probably had the same form as the one in the tabernacle —a central stand with three branches extending from each side, making a total of seven lamps per unit (Ex. 25:32, 37). They symbolized the light of God's creation (Gen. 1:3–5) and the fact that God Himself is light (John 8:12).

4:8 There had been only one table in the tabernacle (Ex. 25:23), but the temple had ten. They held the loaves of showbread (Ex. 25:30). bowls of gold: The word for bowls here is derived from the Hebrew verb meaning "to sprinkle." The priests used the bowls to hold liquids that were sprinkled.

4:9 There were areas in and about the temple that only the priests could enter. One of these was the area immediately surrounding it and enclosed by a separating wall, the court of the priests. The great court was an outer area where the people in general could go.

4:10–13 The Sea was placed to one side of the entrance to the temple, to the southeast. The temple faced east.

4:14–16 Carts were mobile stands designed as bases for the ten lavers referred to in v. 6. They were four cubits on a side and three cubits high, had four bronze wheels, and were covered on the sides by richly decorated panels (1 Kin 7:27–37).

4:17, 18 Many bronze products were made at a place in the Jordan valley about 35 miles north of the Dead Sea. Archaeologists have uncovered evidence of this work in an area where the clay is suitable for bronze casting.

4:19–21 This is the first mention of the altar of gold in Chronicles (Ex. 30:1–10; 1 Kin. 7:48). This altar was used for offering incense. It was in the holy place just in front of the veil (3:14).

4:22 inner doors: The tabernacle had only a veil between the holy place, here called the sanctuary, and the Most Holy Place (Ex. 26:31–33). Solomon's temple had a set of doors there as well.

The modern city of Jerusalem, showing the Dome of the Rock mosque (upper left) on the site on which Solomon's temple once stood (2 Chr. 5:1).

5:1 The treasuries of the house of God listed here were dedicated by David in the sense that he had allotted them to the building and maintenance of the temple (1 Chr. 18:7, 8; 29:3–5). Solomon put them in the regular temple treasuries.

5:2 Though David had built a tabernacle on Mount Zion to house the ark (1 Chr. 15:1), it was still separate from the original tabernacle at Gibeon and thus was not yet in a permanent location. Completing Solomon's temple made it possible at last to place the ark in its proper setting.

5:3, 4 Since this was in the seventh month (that is, Ethanim or Tishri; 1 Kin. 8:2), the feast was Tabernacles. This feast was an appropriate occasion for moving the ark to a permanent location, because the Feast of Tabernacles commemorated Israel's wandering in the wilderness, when the ark had no permanent place (Lev. 23:39–43).

5:5 The term tabernacle of meeting refers to the Mosaic tabernacle. Solomon ended worship at the high place at Gibeon by dismantling the Mosaic tabernacle located there (1:3) and by bringing it and all its furnishings to Jerusalem.

5:6, 7 Like David before him, Solomon, a priestly king, exercised the privileges of his office by offering sacrifices (1 Chr. 16:1–3).

5:8 According to Moses' instructions (Ex. 25:12–15; Num. 4:6), the ark had rings attached to each corner, through which poles were inserted to carry it. These poles were about 20 cubits (30 feet) long, since those who ministered in the holy place could see them at either end of the veil (v. 9).

5:9 to this day: This statement would be charged with emotion for any Israelite who lived through the Babylonian exile years later, when Nebuchadnezzar's army destroyed Solomon's temple and carried away many of its furnishings.

5:10 The passage in Heb. 9:4, which states that the ark also contained the golden pot of manna and Aaron's rod that budded, seems to contradict the chronicler here. It may that all of these items were in the ark in Moses's time but that everything but the two stone tablets had been removed some time later. The chronicler, then, is relating the situation in Solomon's day.

5:11 On this day of inaugurating the temple all the priests participated in the services regardless of their priestly divisions. From then on they would serve in rotation according to their division (1 Chr. 24:1–19). The Most Holy Place was normally restricted to the high priest only (Lev.

16:15; Heb. 9:7); on this occasion the regular priests had entered it to bring in the ark (v. 7).

5:12 Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun were the heads of the divisions of Levitical musicians (1 Chr. 6:33, 39, 44; 15:17; 16:37, 42; 25:1). The east end of the altar was between the east gate of the inner court and the great bronze altar. Altogether there were far more than one hundred and twenty priests; the ones numbered here were probably a select group of instrumentalists.

5:13, 14 As v. 14 suggests, the cloud was a manifestation of God's glory. In a sense, the cloud both revealed and concealed the glory of God, which is too awesome for human eyes to see (Ex. 19:16, 18; 20:18, 21; 24:16–18; 33:9, 10, 22; 40:34–38).

6:1, 2 The dark cloud which had represented the glory of God now filled the temple (5:14). This was in line with God's own promise to David when He said, in response to David's decision to build a temple, that He had lived in a portable tabernacle (1 Chr. 17:5). Although David's son built a temple for God, the time would come when God would build David an eternal house or dynasty. With David's permanent dynasty would come God's permanent relationship with His people (1 Chr. 17:7–14). Thus Solomon built the "house" in which God could live among them.

“assembly”

(Heb. qahal) (2 Chr. 6:3; Deut. 18:16; Judg. 20:2) Strong’s #6951: The Hebrew term denotes a gathering of people for any type of occasion. It is used in a secular sense to designate civil meetings, war counsels, a gathering of evildoers, and even an assembly of the dead (1 Sam. 17:47; 1 Kin. 12:3; Ps. 26:5; Prov. 21:16). But the word is also used to speak of the gathering of individuals for religious purposes, such as the receiving of the Mosaic law and the celebration of religious festivals before the Lord (30:23; Deut. 5:22). Sometimes the term applies to groups of men only—most frequently with assemblies for war, but once, apparently, for those gathered to hear Joshua’s reading of the Law (Josh. 8:35). During the time of Ezra, women, children, and even servants were specifically included in one religious assembly (Ezra 2:64–65; 10:1). The expression “assembly of the LORD” occurs several times in the OT to indicate a gathering of God’s people for religious or secular purposes—including once to grumble against Moses (Num. 20:4; Deut. 23:1–3; 1 Chr. 28:8; Neh. 13:1).

6:3, 4 fulfilled with His hands: A direct reference to the covenant that God had made with David, when He promised him an everlasting house (1 Chr. 17:11, 12). Solomon, as David’s chosen heir, had lived to see God’s words of promise come true. God had made Solomon king and built the temple. Solomon may have hired Phoenician craftsmen, but he knew that the project’s success lay with God, and that “His hands” really had done the work.

6:5, 6 I have chosen Jerusalem: This refers not so much to Jerusalem as a political capital, as it was for David and Solomon (1 Chr. 11:4–8), but as a place for God’s name. This emphasis is unmistakable in the narrative about Ornan’s threshing floor (1 Chr. 21:18—22:1). Only Jerusalem would be acceptable as a place for God’s earthly dwelling. I have chosen David: In His grace God chose David long before David actually took the throne, as Samuel’s anointing of him in his youth made clear (1 Sam. 16:1, 12, 13).

6:7–11 The covenant of the Lord refers to the stone tablets of the Ten Commandments (5:10).

6:12 Solomon’s presence … before the altar in the inner court, the place barred to any but priests and Levites, shows once more the priestly role and privileges of the Davidic monarchy. As a king-priest “according to the order of Melchizedek" (Ps. 110:4), he was entitled to be there as a theocratic mediator between God and the nation (1 Chr. 15:25–28; 2 Chr. 1:3).

6:13 The bronze platform was not a regular feature of the temple but a stage constructed for Solomon's speech, so the assembly outside the walls of the courtyard could see him. It was seven and a half feet square and four and a half feet high.

6:14 no God … like You: God is different from all other "gods." He alone made and kept a covenant with His people, something unheard of in the religious traditions of the nations. Solomon's acclamation makes sense to every child of God who reflects on God's faithfulness. covenant and mercy: The word for mercy here connotes loyalty; it means that God is faithful to His servants—to those who walk before Him with all their hearts.

6:15, 16 Solomon's very position as king attested to God's having fulfilled His promise (v. 10). But portions of God's promise depended on God's people obeying God's law. Only if David's sons took heed to their way would they enjoy the full benefits of God's favor. So Solomon prayed that his people would stay faithful. God would be faithful to them—would they be faithful to Him? No matter what their choice, however, God would carry out his ultimate plan to send the Messiah (Ps. 89:30–37).

6:17, 18 will God … dwell with men: God is altogether separate from humanity (2:6), but He accommodates Himself to the low position of human beings in order to fellowship with them (Gen. 2:8; 11:5; 18:1, 2; Ex. 23:20–26). He did this in an ultimate sense in the incarnation of Jesus Christ (John 1:14).

6:19, 20 The resolution of the tension between God being high and lifted up above all His creation (transcendence; Is. 6:1–4) and His nearness to each one of us (immanence) lies in such acts of God as localizing His name. Rather than contemplating the actual localizing of God in one place, even the temple, Solomon, along with an ancient preceding tradition (Deut. 12:5, 11; 16:2, 6), speaks of His presence in terms of the objectifying of His name. This is an early stage of the development of such doctrines as the personality of God, the being of God, and the union of God with humanity in the person of Jesus Christ.

6:21 The temple was God's dwelling place in the sense that it gave God's people a place to pray to the living God. Yet God could not be contained within the four walls of a building (v. 18).

6:22 comes and takes an oath: A reference to legal oaths in which people swore their innocence before God (Ex. 22:8–11; Deut. 17:8, 9). Such oaths had to be sworn in the temple and before the altar, symbolic of God's presence among His people.

6:23, 24 Solomon's request that God hear from heaven underscored God's transcendence. Although God had chosen to be present on earth at the temple, He also transcended the temple building.

6:25–28 bring them back: A hint of the future captivity and deportation of God's disobedient people (Deut. 28:29, 30). When the exile to Babylon became a reality, the temple was destroyed and no one could pray at that place as before. But even in those days, God's people directed their prayer toward Jerusalem. This is what Daniel did (Dan. 6:10).

6:29–31 Israel was a community and could pray together as a nation. But each member was also responsible for his or her own sin (Ezek. 18:1–4) and each needed to seek God's forgiveness. Prayer toward the temple could be national or individual.

6:32, 33 God made His covenant exclusively with Israel, the nation descended from Abraham, but He did so for the purpose of attracting the nations to Himself, the Creator of all people. A foreigner who embraced the Lord as God would be numbered among God's people.

6:34–36 there is no one who does not sin: This statement is repeated in the New Testament (Rom. 3:23; 1 John 1:8–10). All people sin and are guilty before God. take them captive: Solomon's speech anticipated the possibility of exile (v. 25), something that had already taken place by the time Chronicles were written.

6:37–40 Let Your eyes be open: God is Spirit (John 4:24) and doesn't have physical eyes and ears, but He is a Person who intimately knows us and hears our prayers. Solomon was praying that God would not ignore His people.

6:41 In light of Ps. 132:8, 9 (the passage quoted by Solomon), the resting place is the temple. Ark is a synonym for the presence of God.

6:42 Your Anointed: A reference to Solomon, which shows that he understood his unique role as one set apart by God for royal service (1 Chr. 22:10, 11). Like David, Solomon, was a messianic figure who anticipated the goal of his royal line, the true Anointed One, Jesus Christ (1 Sam. 2:10; Pss. 2:2; 18:50; 89:38, 51; 132:17).

7:1, 2 God responded positively to Solomon's prayer by igniting the sacrifices with heavenly fire, an act of approval recorded in other parts of the Bible as well (Judg. 6:21; 1 Kin. 18:38). Glory … filled: This was in the form of a thick cloud that filled the temple with darkness. The priests could no longer minister because of their awe and reverence before the glory of the Lord.

7:3–5 The people saw in God's glory His acceptance of the king and the temple, two central elements in His covenant promise to David (1 Chr. 17:11, 12).

7:6, 7 It is not clear as to how the musicians arranged themselves in this service of praise, but the use of the refrain for His mercy endures forever (v. 3; 5:13) may suggest some kind of antiphonal or choral participation by some of the Levites or by the congregation.

7:8 The feast was the Feast of Tabernacles, which began on the fifteenth day of the seventh month and continued through the twenty-second day (Lev. 23:34–36). Hamath and Brook of Egypt specify the extent of Solomon's early kingdom from north to south. The Brook of Egypt is probably the Wadi el-Arish, a seasonal stream about 40 miles southwest of Gaza.

7:9 The Feast of Tabernacles ended with an eighth day assembly, which fell always on the twenty-second day of the seventh month, Tishri. The seven-day dedication of the altar is the one referred to in 5:3.

7:10 he sent them away to their tents: Probably a reference to the huts or booths in which people stayed as part of the Feast of Tabernacles (Lev. 23:42, 43). Few if any Israelites used tents for their housing at this time.

7:11 The king's house refers to Solomon's own palace, a project much more elaborately explained in 1 Kings (1 Kin. 2:1; 7:1, 8). Since it took Solomon 13 years to build his palace and 20 years in all to build it and the temple (8:1), these events too are halfway through Solomon's 40–year reign.

7:12 In the next several verses (vv. 13–15), the Lord reviews and answers the petitions of Solomon (6:14–42). Solomon's prayers had been heard and would be answered, but there were conditions (v. 14).

7:13, 14 If God's people would do three things, God would respond in three ways. The Lord's people needed to become humble, that is, confess; they needed to pray, or repent; and they needed to turn, or come back to Him. If they did, God would hear, forgive, and heal them.

(Heb. palal) (2 Chr. 7:14; Gen. 20:7; Num. 21:7; 1 Kin. 8:44; Is. 16:12; Jer. 7:16) Strong’s #6419: The Hebrew verb translated pray in God’s promise concerning the revival of Israel (7:14) can also mean “to intervene,” “to interpose,” “to arbitrate,” or even “to judge.” The Lord was asking His people to intercede for others in their prayers. During the dedication of the temple, Solomon modeled intercessory prayer (6:3–42). He pleaded with God on behalf of the people and continued to pray with determination until the Lord answered. According to the Lord, this type of prayer would be the catalyst for revival and restoration in the future (Dan. 9:3–19).

7:15–18 if you walk: The Lord challenged Solomon to remain faithful to Him and to the laws of the covenant so that he could enjoy the full benefit of God’s blessing (vv. 17–20). I will establish the throne: The conditions for God’s blessing on David and his line did not extend to the ongoing existence of that dynasty. The covenant promises to David were unqualified. The Lord had told David that if his son—that is, Solomon—sinned he would be disciplined, but mercy shall not depart from him,” and “your house and your kingdom shall be established forever before you” (2 Sam. 7:15, 16; 1 Chr. 17:13, 14). Solomon might sin and be disciplined, but God’s promises would stand—David’s dynasty would go on.

National Renewal

As we struggle with the moral and spiritual chaos that seems to characterize life today, the promise that God will bring healing to the land (2 Chr. 7:14) looks attractive. Is this a verse on which Christians should base efforts at national renewal? In answering that question, it is important to notice that God was speaking to Israel, as indicated by the phrase, "My people who are called by My name" (6:5, 6, 33). Israel enjoyed a special covenant relationship with the Lord that no other nation has ever had. The words of the Lord (7:12–22), of which the promise of healing the land was a part, were essentially a restatement of the covenant (Lev. 26; Deut. 29).

It was not long after Solomon's death that this conditional promise saw its first test. Solomon's successor Rehoboam turned away from the Lord. As a result, God raised up the Egyptians to attack Israel. However, when Rehoboam and the leaders of Israel humbled themselves and turned back to God, the Lord heard their prayers and partially delivered them from the threat of the Egyptians (2 Chr. 12:1–12).

How, then, should Christians today regard this promise of God? It related directly to Israel. Does it relate at least indirectly to believers today? Yes, but only to a certain degree. Unlike Israel, Christians have not been called as a nation. Therefore, God's promise of healing the land cannot be applied universally to all national and international arenas of public life today. Nevertheless, the principle still applies that when believers humble themselves by praying and confessing their individual and corporate sins, God hears them, forgives their sins, and brings a measure of healing (James 4:7–10).

7:19 if you turn: Here the word for you is plural. The Lord was speaking to the nation as a whole. The reference to statutes and commandments places this warning solidly within a covenant framework. Covenant disobedience, especially apostasy from Yahweh and the adoption of false gods, will bring dire consequences. Again, the covenant with David holds firm, but to enjoy its benefits his people must remain true to their God.

7:20, 21 proverb: The nation of Israel would become an object lesson to other nations, who would see the temple lying in ruins and understand the clear message about sin and its cost.

7:22 embraced other gods: Idolatry would be the downfall of the nation (Deut. 28; 29).

8:1, 2 This compressed account of transactions between Solomon and Hiram is more fully spelled out in 1 Kin. 9:10–14. In payment for the timber and gold that Hiram provided for Solomon's construction projects, Solomon gave twenty Galilean cities to Hiram. The Phoenician did not like the cities, but he took them anyway and even paid 120 talents of gold for them. Eventually Solomon took back the cities, rebuilt them, and settled Israelites in them once more.

8:3, 4 Solomon built and fortified cities such as Tadmor because they were on vital caravan routes. These fortified cities provided protection to his own caravans and became the customs points at which Solomon collected taxes. storage cities: Facilities were scattered throughout Solomon's outlying provinces to provide warehouses for his armies and merchantmen, as well as to store produce and other tribute paid by the vassal states (1 Kin. 9:19).

8:5 Upper Beth Horon and Lower Beth Horon were strategically located near the border between Judah and the northern tribal districts, along a major mountain pass to the Mediterranean (Josh. 10:10; 1 Sam. 13:18).

8:6 Baalath: Otherwise known perhaps as Baalah, this may be none other than the village at or near Kirjath Jearim, where the ark of the covenant was kept prior to its later location in Jerusalem (1 Chr. 13:6). This too lay on a major route from Jerusalem to the coastal plain. If not the same as Baalah, it was probably the Baalath listed as one of the cities of Dan (Josh. 19:44).

8:7, 8 The people groups named in this verse were remnants of the population of Canaan who survived the conquest. Israel reduced many of them to forced labor (2:17).

8:9–11 The daughter of Pharaoh is not named here. Solomon had married her early in his reign (1 Kin. 3:1) and had provided her housing near David's palace on Mount Zion. She had been forbidden to live in the palace, presumably because she was neither Hebrew nor God-fearing.

8:12, 13 The daily rate refers to the morning and evening sacrifices of lambs, one on each occasion (Ex. 29:38–42).

8:14, 15 Solomon, like all kings in David's line, had jurisdiction over the priests and Levites, as well as over civil, military, and political affairs.

8:16, 17 Ezion Geber and Elath were cities located close together at the northern end of the east branch of the Red Sea.

8:18 The Phoenicians were world-famous mariners, so when Solomon undertook a merchant marine enterprise he called once more on his good friend Hiram, the King of Tyre. The land of Ophir, located apparently in South Arabia (1 Chr. 29:4), was a source of finest gold.

IN PLACE

The Queen of Sheba and International Trade

The queen of Sheba (2 Chr. 9:1; 1 Kin. 10:1) came to Jerusalem not only because she had heard of the fame of Solomon, but also because she had heard of Solomon's God (1 Kin. 10:6–9). However, even though her ultimate purpose in coming was spiritual, she might also have negotiated political and economic agreements during her visit.

Sheba was probably located in the mountainous region of southwest Arabia (now Yemen). Its strategic placement on the Gulf of Aden at the southern end of the Red Sea enabled it to control much of the trade from India and east Africa with the Middle East. Caravan routes along the coast connected Sheba with trading centers to the north, such as Tyre, Damascus, and Babylon. Solomon's growing shipping industry out of Ezion Geber (1 Kin. 9:26) and his ties to the Phoenicians may have brought the kingdoms of Sheba and Israel into direct competition for business. Thus a visit to Jerusalem would have been a timely trade mission.

9:1–3 Sheba was more than a thousand miles south of Israel, at the southern end of the Arabian peninsula. hard questions: Solomon was known for his great wisdom (1:10–12; 1 Kin. 4:29–34), a trait much prized and admired in the ancient Middle East.

9:4–7 No more spirit may refer to an attitude of pride or arrogance with which the queen had approached Solomon, or, more likely, a way of saying that what she saw and heard was breathtaking.

9:8–12 Blessed be the LORD your God: This was the language of politeness in the ancient world and does not suggest that the queen of Sheba was converted. Visiting dignitaries customarily praised the god of the host nation. Still, the queen's statements about God's love of Israel and election of Solomon were true enough (1 Chr. 17:11–14).

9:13 Solomon's annual income in gold through taxes alone amounted to 25 tons. Since king and state were identified, this figure reflects the annual revenues of the entire nation through taxes.

9:14 The gold and silver that the kings and governors brought to Solomon was tribute—a form of taxation on vassal states, not a voluntary gift.

9:15, 16 The shields of hammered gold were for decorative or ceremonial purposes, not the armory. Gold was too expensive, too heavy, and too soft to use in battle.

9:17–20 Most scholars take this to be a throne inlaid with ivory, since there are no sources of ivory sufficient to yield a block of the material that large. The throne, then, may have been of wood covered with gold plate into which ivory was embedded. Ivory, a product primarily of elephant tusks, certainly was available to Solomon (v. 21).

9:21, 22 To Tarshish is possibly a figure of speech, meaning "a great distance" or "to the ends of the earth."

9:23 In the context of Solomon's own time and place, all kings referred to the kings of the eastern Mediterranean world.

9:24, 25 each man brought his present: Ordinary presents are not given and received at a set rate so these presents were tribute paid to the king by vassals.

9:26, 27 Most of the kings of Israel had continuing trouble with the Philistines, even though they were able to subdue every other surrounding neighbor. David had some success against the Philistines (1 Chr. 18:2), and later Jehoshaphat managed to exact tribute from some of them (17:11).

9:28, 29 Nathan the prophet had rebuked David for his adultery and murder (2 Sam. 12:1) and had become a confidant and counselor to both David and Solomon (1 Kin. 1:8, 11). Ahijah the Shilonite would select Jeroboam as the first king of the northern kingdom of Israel (1 Kin. 11:26–40) and later would announce God's judgment on him (1 Kin. 14:1–16). Iddo the seer was a contemporary of Ahijah who compiled accounts of both Jeroboam and Rehoboam (12:15).

9:30, 31 Rehoboam was a son of Solomon by his wife Naamah of Ammon (12:13). Rehoboam was 41 when he began to rule, so he must have been born during the period when Solomon ruled alongside David (1 Chr. 29:22, 23).

10:1 Why did Rehoboam go to Shechem to be crowned? First, Shechem had a rich history dating back to Abraham's travels in the land (Gen. 12:6, 7; 35:4; Josh. 24:1–28). But more importantly, a rift had begun to develop between the northern and southern tribes (1 Kin. 11:26–40), and Shechem would be a more neutral place than Jerusalem.

10:2, 3 As head of all of Solomon's forced labor in the district of Ephraim, Jeroboam enjoyed great favor with the king. But the prophet Ahijah informed him that he would become ruler of the ten northern tribes because of Solomon's idolatry (1 Kin. 11:26–33). When Solomon heard of this he tried to kill Jeroboam (1 Kin. 11:40), but Jeroboam fled to Egypt.

10:4, 5 Solomon's heavy yoke included taxation and forced labor (1 Sam. 8:11–18; 1 Kin. 4:7; 9:15).

10:6–9 The term elders here should be taken not only to mean Solomon's physically aged counselors but also a technical way of referring to his official cabinet (1 Kin. 4:2–6). Both in the policy decision and the manner of arriving at his decision, Rehoboan clearly lacked the wisdom of his father, Solomon.

10:10, 11 Rehoboam promised that even the lesser evils of his reign—his finger—would be as hard as anything they knew under Solomon. The young men compared Solomon's rule to a whip and Rehoboam's to a scourge, a whip with sharp bits of metal that cut the flesh and caused excruciating pain.

10:12–15 the turn of events was from God: Human foolishness and decisions achieved God's purposes. Solomon's defection from God late in his reign had already disqualified his descendants from ruling over all Israel (1 Kin. 11:9–13). Rehoboam initiated the split with his own foolish actions.

10:16, 17 In the people's poem, Israel referred to the ten northern tribes, David to the southern kingdom of Judah. Tents here can be figurative—the dwelling places of Israel in general, even though few people actually lived in tents in that era—or it may be a reference to literal tents in which the delegates to the Shechem assembly were staying while they were there.

10:18, 19 Hadoram, called Adoniram in 1 Kin. 4:6, was Jeroboam's counterpart in Judah as officer in charge of forced labor.

11:1 Shortly after the kingdom divided, the tribe of Benjamin joined Judah to form the southern kingdom. This is ironic because Saul was a Benjamite. However, Benjamites had shown great loyalty to David many years before (2 Sam. 19:16–20, 40–43). Also, Benjamin was closer geographically to Judah than to the northern tribes.

11:2–4 Like Nathan, Ahijah, and Iddo (9:29), Shemaiah was a prophet who wrote. The writer of Chronicles depended on Shemaiah's writings for some of his information (12:15).

11:5–12 cities for defense: Turning from an offensive strategy, Rehoboam decided to defend the small kingdom he had left by building fortifications throughout his land. They extended from Aijalon in the north (v. 10) to Ziph in the south (v. 8), and from Tekoa in the east (v. 6) to Gath in the west (v. 8).

11:13, 14 all their territories: Though Israel and Judah had split into two kingdoms, the priests and the Levites of Israel sided with Judah. One reason for this was that they knew that Rehoboam was David's offspring, and therefore the heir of God's covenant promise to David. Another reason was that Jeroboam had established his own religious cult which had no need for the true priests of God (1 Kin. 12:25–33).

11:15 The calf idols were the golden calves that Jeroboam had installed at Bethel and Dan.

11:16 Once the legitimate religious leaders had left Israel, the worshipers of God in the northern kingdom could no longer worship in good conscience, so they made pilgrimages to Jerusalem three times a year (1 Kin. 12:27, 32, 33).

11:17 Jeroboam's program of establishing a new religious structure in Israel apparently took at least three years. Meanwhile, the pilgrimage of godly Israelites from the north to Jerusalem strengthened Rehoboam and weakened Jeroboam (1 Kin. 12:27).

11:18, 19 Mahalath may have been David's great-granddaughter. Rehoboam was David's grandson, so in any case this marriage was within the larger royal family.

11:20 Rehoboam's claims to legitimacy took further support from his marriage to Maachah, granddaughter of David's son Absalom. Their son Abijah would eventually succeed Rehoboam (12:16).

11:21, 22 Rehoboam named his son Abijah to be the next king to ensure a smooth succession following his death. Abijah probably served under or alongside Rehoboam, just as Solomon had served under David (1 Chr. 23:1).

11:23 In the context, dealt wisely pertains to how Rehoboam handled his many sons. He had selected one to be king, and to pacify the rest he gave them important assignments throughout the kingdom. The pampering extended even to generous material allowances and large harems.

12:1 the law: The normal Hebrew word for the Mosaic covenant, the Ten Commandments.

(Heb. maal) (2 Chr. 12:2; Lev. 6:2; Ezek. 14:13) Strong’s #4603: The principle sense of this word is “to break a trust,” most often willfully but in some cases unintentionally (Lev. 5:15). The term is used in association with the word sin on several occasions (Lev. 5:15; 6:2; Ezek. 18:22–24). Transgression is almost always against the Lord and may be committed by individuals or communities, especially the covenant community (Num. 31:16; Neh. 1:6, 7; Ezek. 14:13). Also a wife can transgress against her husband, or a king can transgress by not rendering a true judgment (Num. 5:12; Prov. 16:10). The word occurs predominantly in the exilic and postexilic books. There death, military defeat, and exile are all viewed as divine judgments on Israeltransgressions (12:1–9; 1 Chr. 10:13; Ezek. 39:23; Dan. 9:7).

12:2, 3 Egypt was beginning to recover from a long period of decline and wanted to reestablish control over Palestine. God used their ambitions to discipline Rehoboam for abandoning the Lord. The Lubim were the Libyans. The Sukkiim were other desert tribes, perhaps from western Libya. Ethiopians: Sometimes referred to as Cushites, these famous warriors originated in the lands south of Egypt.

12:4–8 In order that the Judeans might understand how privileged they were to serve God, He would allow them to become servants to the Egyptians. Only then would they appreciate again the joy of being God’s servant people.

12:9–11 The treasures of the king’s house that the Egyptians seized had been spoils of war captured by David and dedicated to God (1 Chr. 18:6–8; 22:14). Judah was now a vassal state of Egypt.

12:12, 13 The king’s conduct had inevitable consequences on the nation. When a king obeyed God, the Lord would bless the nation. When the king turned away from the Lord, his subjects would suffer. But when the king repented and humbled himself before God, God’s forgiveness and restoration would cover both him and his kingdom.

12:14, 15 did not prepare his heart to seek the LORD: Note the differences between David, Solomon, Rehoboam, and Abijah (ch. 13). David, a man of God (8:14), died at a very old age with riches and honor. Solomon died wise, rich, and powerful. But Rehoboam did evil. As a result, he fought wars throughout most of his troubled reign. Abijah followed Rehoboam's example of not honoring God (13:8–18).

12:16 Abijah: Apparently Rehoboams eldest son (11:20, 22), who had already been appointed by his father as king-elect. Now he assumed kingship on his own.

13:1–4 Mount Zemaraim was a few miles southwest of Bethel (Josh. 18:22).

13:5 covenant of salt: Salt was a preservative and symbolized durability—an apt description of the eternal Davidic covenant (Lev. 2:13; Num. 18:19). Israel refers to the whole nation, not just the northern kingdom.

13:6 Abijah blamed the division of the kingdom on Jeroboam, not Rehoboam, or even Solomon (10:16). But Jeroboam's rebellion was fueled by Solomon's disobedience to the covenant and his harsh policies. Moreover, Rehoboam's foolish plan to increase the severity of those abuses infuriated the Israelites even more. The blame lay with all three—Jeroboam, Rehoboam, and Solomon.

13:7, 8 Abijah's version of the nation's division put his father in a relatively good light. According to Abijah, if Rehoboam had made any mistakes, it was merely because he was young and inexperienced. Abijah further equated the kingdom of Judah with the kingdom of the LORD, making the victory of Judah over Israel sound like a foregone conclusion. This was a misrepresentation of the truth (v. 6) designed to scare the Israelites.

13:9 Jeroboam's illicit religion filled the priestly ranks with anyone who had the means to purchase the office. Thus Abijah asserted that all a person had to do to consecrate himself was to come with the appropriate sacrifices (1 Kin. 12:31; Lev. 8:2). But Abijah's words were hypocritical, for the same evil deeds were going on in his own kingdom (14:2–5).

13:10, 11 The priests of Judah were true priests, who traced their ancestry to Aaron as the Law required (1 Chr. 6:1–15). Throughout the passage the contrast is between the authorized worship at Jerusalem and the illicit practice of religion at Dan and Bethel. In summary, Abijah argued that Judah had remained true to God while Israel had forsaken Him.

13:12–16 The declaration that God is with them as their head and that the priests are there with trumpets is an assertion that the battle is being fought by God's people on His behalf. As in days of old when Joshua marched his armies out against Jericho in a procession headed by the ark of the covenant and accompanied by trumpets (Josh. 6:8, 9), so, Abijah says, would Yahweh lead the armies of Judah to victory now. In such a war it was useless for the enemy to resist, for the triumph of Yahweh was inevitable. In the shout are overtones of Joshua's hosts surrounding Jericho on the seventh day (Josh. 6:20). That God delivered them is also a way of affirming that the battle was the Lord's and not Judah's. They may have been His agents, but He gave the victory (Josh. 6:16). Yahweh did this for His people Judah in spite of their sin of inconsistency.

13:17–19 Among the Israelite cities that fell to Judah was none other than Bethel, the southern center of the false religious cult that Jeroboam had established (1 Kin. 12:29). Jeshanah may have been some six miles north of Bethel. Ephrain, otherwise known as Ephron, lay four miles northeast of Bethel.

13:20 Though there are no further reference to the details of Jeroboam's death, the verb struck here refers to a violent death either by sickness or by some outward act such as murder or assassination.

13:21, 22 One of the gauges of a king's power and prosperity was the size of his family.

14:1, 2 Abijah's son Asa reigned for 41 years, until 870 B.C. (16:13). ten years: This suggests that during the first ten years of Asa's reign there was peace between Judah and Israel (v. 6).

14:3–5 Sacred pillars were stone posts associated with Canaanite fertility rites. Wooden images were fashioned from live evergreen trees, which were regarded as a fertility symbol, since they retain their leaves throughout the year. Eventually, cut poles took the place of live trees, because they could be erected anywhere, even in places where trees did not grow.

14:6–8 Rehoboam had built fortified cities in his time, but Shishak of Egypt had destroyed them (11:5–12; 12:2–4). It is likely that Asa merely rebuilt them. The phrase in those years refers to the first ten years of Asa's reign, the years of peace (v. 1).

14:9 Since Egypt was strong at this time (12:3) and fully in control of its own territory, it is likely that Zerah and his large army were mercenaries of the Egyptian king Osorkon I (914–874 B.C.), successor to Shishak. Mareshah was one of Asa's important fortified cities, about 25 miles southwest of Jerusalem (11:8). It was near the Via Maris, the coastal highway connecting Egypt and Canaan, making it strategically important.

14:10 The Valley of Zephathah was on the north side of Mareshah.

14:11, 12 it is nothing for You to help: Asa showed great faith in his prayer before the battle against Zerah's huge army. in Your name: Asa believed that God was on his side and that Zerah's attack was aimed at the Lord as well as at God's people (13:8, 12, 14, 15).

14:13–15 Gerar was at the frontier between Egypt and Canaan and might have been in Egyptian territory at this time.

15:1–5 For a long time: Much of what Azariah said to Asa could be said of the era of the judges, a time marked by long years of apostasy, ignorance, and lawlessness (Judg. 18:1; 21:25). in their trouble: These times were difficult. The Israelites were constantly being invaded and harassed. But when circumstances looked most hopeless, the people cried out to God in repentance, and He delivered them (Judg. 2:11–19). no peace: Beside the dangers of war, the continual perils of robbery and crime plagued the nation, a point expressly made in the Song of Deborah (Judg. 5:6, 7).

15:6, 7 City by city probably alludes to the civil strife that existed in Israel in the days of the judges, especially in connection with the abortive kingship of Abimelech (Judg. 9:1–57) and the lack of moral responsibility in Benjamin (20:18–35).

15:8 The altar had either suffered damage from some internal struggle or, more likely, had simply deteriorated from heavy use and lack of maintenance (compare 4:1).

15:9 Along with godly priests and Levites (11:13–17), many of the ordinary citizens of Israel came over to Judah when they saw Asa's zeal for God, and God's blessing upon him.

15:10 The third month quite likely locates this festival at the time of the firstfruits, the Feast of Pentecost (Lev. 23:15–21; Num. 28:26–31).

15:11 Spoil likely refers to the animals taken from the Ethiopians after Asa's victory over Zerah (14:15). If so, the battle of Mareshah (14:9, 10) must have taken place right before this event.

15:12, 13 Asa gathered an assembly to reaffirm Israel's covenant (or promise) to seek the Lord. The nation had assembled before to renew their commitment to God (Deut. 27:9, 10; 29:1; 31:10–13; Josh. 8:30–35; 24:1–28).

15:14 Taking an oath was an essential part of covenant-making (Ex. 24:7, 8; Deut. 27:11–26; 29:12). The people declared their determination to keep the covenant and agreed to accept God's judgment if they broke it.

15:15 The conflict with Zerah the Ethiopian (14:9) had broken the ten-year period of peace at the start of Asa's reign (14:1). After winning the war and renewing the covenant with God, Judah once again had rest all around.

15:16 Maachah is called Asa's mother, a Hebrew word that can also mean grandmother. Maachah was the mother of Asa's father, Abijah (13:2).

Still, Asa demoted her from being queen mother because she had set up pagan idols—a courageous and delicate task for anyone, even a king.

15:17 high places were not removed from Israel: Asa destroyed the high places of Judah, but not those of Israel (14:3, 5).

15:18, 19 silver and gold and utensils: These items were taken as spoils of war and dedicated to the worship of God; they could not then be used for any other purpose (1 Chr. 18:8; 26:20).

16:1–3 The treasuries of the house of the LORD were items of value stored in the temple as ordinary revenue (1 Chr. 26:20). They did not include things dedicated to the Lord (15:18). Asa used these treasuries to secure Ben-Hadad's assistance against Baasha king of Israel.

16:4 Ijon was in the tribal territory of Naphtali, some ten miles north of Dan and thirty-five miles north of the Sea of Galilee. Abel Maim was only three miles west of Dan. Naphtali was the most northern tribal territory of Israel, very close to Damascus.

16:6 Diverted by attacks from the north, Baasha left Ramah unfinished (v. 5). Asa, the king of Judah, took advantage of the situation and built his own fortifications at Geba, just east of Ramah, and at Mizpah, between Ramah and Bethel. Ramah ended up between Asa's fortresses and the Israelites could not rebuild it.

16:7–9 Hanani the seer was probably the father of another prophet Jehu, who once challenged King Jehoshaphat of Judah (19:2; 20:34).

IN CONTEXT

Convicts with Conviction

In an unjust society, it is often the righteous who are imprisoned. A number of leaders in the Bible, such as Hanani the seer (2 Chr. 16:10), spent time behind bars. Their loyalty to God's calling, to biblical convictions, and to genuine faith sometimes made them vulnerable to persecution or required them to resist laws or rulers in ways that landed them in jail.

The Bible shows us many cases where imprisonment has been used to persecute the innocent. Christ Himself, who was without sin, became a prisoner and was executed for our sakes. But even in cases where wrongs have been committed, the fact remains that Christ's good news is for captives and prisoners too. Forgiveness, restoration, and reconciliation are at the heart of the message of the Cross (Luke 4:18; Heb. 13:3).

16:10, 11 This book no doubt includes the biblical Book of Kings but much more besides. The chronicler cites his sources so that the skeptic can check for himself and that further information may be gained.

16:12, 13 diseased in his feet: Asa may have been suffering from gout, a common disease in the ancient world. For his malady Asa did not seek the LORD, but the physicians. The problem was not that Asa used doctors, but that he failed to turn to God during his sickness.

16:14 great burning: This had nothing to do with cremation, but was the burning of spices and perfumes to mourn a king's death (21:19).

17:1, 2 cities of Ephraim: Ephraim is a synonym for Israel. The cities referred to here are mentioned also in 15:8; they could include Ramah, Geba, and Mizpah as well (16:6), depending on fluctuations of the border between Israel and Judah.

17:3–8 Jehoshaphat was the first king since David who walked in the former ways of his father David. He obeyed God's commandments and took delight in the Lord's ways.

17:9 The Book of the Law refers to the five books of Moses, the Pentateuch. When Moses passed the leadership of Israel on to Joshua he instructed him never to let "this Book of the Law" depart from his mouth (Josh. 1:8). Unfortunately, Jehoshaphat's initiative in sending out teachers to instruct the nation in God's laws was not the norm (15:3).

17:10, 11 There is no record of Jehoshaphat conquering Philistia, but he was powerful enough to compel at least some of the Philistines to pay tribute to his sovereignty. Up to this point, only David had obtained such respect (1 Chr. 18:2).

17:12–18 Jehoshaphat's men of war were grouped into three divisions of Judeans with a total number of 780,000 (vv. 14–16), and two divisions of Benjamites numbering 380,000 (vv. 17, 18). The Hebrew word for thousand can also mean "clan" (as in Judg. 6:15; 1 Sam. 10:19) or "village" (as in Mic. 5:2), and possibly "company" in a military context. Thus, 780,000 may refer to 780 companies and 380,000 to 380 companies. The totals would then be nearer to 78,000 and 38,000.

17:19 Jehoshaphat's troops were stationed at Jerusalem. He had additional forces in the fortified cities throughout the countryside.

18:1 Jehoshaphat allied himself with Ahab by arranging for his son Jehoram to marry Ahab's daughter Athaliah (21:5, 6; 22:2).

18:2 Ahab died in battle a few days after Jehoshaphat's visit (v. 34). Ramoth Gilead: This important city some 35 miles east of Beth Shan was controlled by the Arameans. It was also one of the Israelite cities of refuge (Josh. 20:8; 1 Chr. 6:80).

18:3, 4 I am as you are: Jehoshaphat was referring to the intermarriage of their families (v. 1).

18:5 The prophets were probably prophets of Asherah, the Canaanite goddess worshiped by Ahab's wife Jezebel (v. 6; 1 Kin. 18:19).

18:6 There is some humor in Jehoshaphat's remark as he looks over the crowd of 400 prophets and asks if there is not still a prophet of the LORD here. He knows immediately that the prophets of Ahab are charlatans, unable and unwilling to speak the truth. The true prophet stands apart from them in his integrity and is therefore easily distinguished from them.

18:7, 8 he never prophesies good: Ahab means that this prophet of the Lord never says what Ahab wants to hear.

18:9 The entrance of the gate often led to a large open place in Israelite cities. Public assemblies could convene there or in rooms built into the sides of the gateway. The threshing floor was a large, flat area where grain was separated from straw (1 Chr. 21:15). The threshing floor of Ornan was just outside the walls of Jerusalem, where the winds could blow away the chaff. This is probably where the kings had set up their thrones.

18:10 In the OT, horns symbolize strength, so horns of iron would represent great strength (Zech. 1:18–21).

18:11, 12 In this context, prophesied suggests rantings and ravings typical of the demon-possessed false prophets of Canaan (1 Kin. 18:26–29), not true prophecy.

18:13, 14 whatever my God says: The true prophets' prophecies come directly from God. Their words are God's words.

18:15 Ahab knew from experience that his prophets told him what they thought he wanted to hear, not the truth. Because their prophecies agreed with Micaiah's, he knew that Micaiah must have been lying when he prophesied success.

18:16, 17 The Bible often uses sheep and shepherd as metaphors for the people of a nation and their king (1 Chr. 17:6, 7). no master: This is a prediction of Ahab's death (v. 34).

18:18, 19 Micaiah saw the LORD in heaven. Here we see God's sovereignty over all. The spirits who stood before Him were both angels and demons, and none could act without God's permission.

18:20–22 A lying spirit was a demon whom the Lord allowed to deceive the prophets. God cannot lie (Num. 23:19), but He does allow others to do so. In this sense, God put a lying spirit in the mouth of Ahab's prophets.

18:23–26 The term governor in Hebrew is literally "prince" of the city. Amon was probably the chief official of Samaria, a mayor in modern terms. King's son could be taken to mean the actual son of the king but more likely it is a technical expression referring to the king's representative (28:7; Jer. 36:20; 38:6). bread … water of affliction: Micaiah is to be punished for his insubordination by being denied any of the benefits of ordinary life.

18:27, 28 A real prophet's predictions always came true (Deut. 13:1–3; 18:22). Micaiah staked his reputation on the fact that Ahab would not come home in peace—that is, alive.

18:29 Ahab obviously does not want the Arameans to recognize him, so he puts aside his royal dress and goes incognito. put on your robes: The Arameans are not after Jehoshaphat but only Ahab. Therefore the king of Judah would be safer in his distinct royal apparel than he would even in disguise because the enemy would go out of its way to avoid hitting him if they knew who he was. It is not likely that Ahab is only trying to divert attention from himself, for surely Jehoshaphat was not so naive or unselfish as to set himself up as a sacrificial lamb.

18:30–32 What is suspected in light of v. 29 is put beyond doubt here. Jehoshaphat can feel free to openly identify himself, for he is not the target of Aramean hostility. Ahab and Jehoshaphat must have come to know this Aramean strategy by means of their intelligence network.

18:33, 34 at random: This is the human perspective. The wounding of Ahab, disguised as he was, appeared to be an accident. But from God's perspective, chance had no part in it. The arrow reached its true destination. Ahab's disguise could not foil God's plan. Micaiah's prophecy had come true (v. 16).

19:1, 2 The prophet Hanani had once chastised King Asa for depending on the Arameans to defeat Baasha, king of Israel (16:7). Jehu the son of Hanani, also a prophet, now went on a similar mission to Jehoshaphat.

19:3, 4 Originally the land of Israel stretched "from Dan to Beersheba" (Judg. 20:1). Dan refers to the town of Dan just north of the Sea of Galilee, not the tribe of Dan near Judah. But after the division into two kingdoms the mountains of Ephraim became the northern border of Judah. Thus this verse asserts that Jehoshaphat restored the people of Judah to more faithful observance of the covenant. This was admirable, but it was also a basic duty of the Davidic monarch (14:4; 15:9; 17:7–9). Jehoshaphat was only doing his job.

19:5, 6 The role of Jehoshaphat's judges differed from that of the heroic leaders who led Israel before David's time (Judg. 2:16). The judges that Jehoshaphat appointed served as local officials in the fortified cities.

19:7 The secret of success for fulfilling public office is a healthy fear of the LORD, for He is the supreme Judge to whom officials must ultimately give account.

19:8 Matters too difficult for the local judges or those that required appeal went to the high court in Jerusalem where the Levites, priests, and chief fathers sat.

19:9–11 As chief priest, Amariah (mentioned only here) held jurisdiction over all matters of the LORD, that is, religious cases. Zebadiah, the ruler of the house of Judah (1 Kin. 4:7), ruled over all the king's matters—that is, civil cases.

20:1 Moab went to battle against Jehoshaphat under the leadership of Mesha, who had gained Moab's independence from the Omri dynasty of Israel soon after Ahab died (18:34). The battle mentioned here took place when Ahab's son Ahaziah was king of Israel (20:35). The defeat of Jehoshaphat's enemies in Israel only meant the rise of other enemies outside Israel. This situation would test Jehoshaphat's faith.

20:2 Hazazon Tamar is on the western shore of the Dead Sea, a few miles south of Qumran. It was David's hiding place in the days of Saul (1 Sam. 23:29).

20:3, 4 seek the LORD: Jehoshaphat's reforms (19:4) were not hollow religiosity, and they did not break under the strain of sour circumstances. As soon as he heard of bad news from the north, Jehoshaphat sought God and proclaimed a fast. He knew that success required God's favor. And if God was for them, they could not lose (vv. 6–12; 13:5, 12).

20:5–7 Jehoshaphat recalled God's care for His people Israel in the past, when He had led them to victory over their Canaanite foes.

20:8–10 Mount Seir is another, more original, name for Edom (Gen. 32:3). Listing Mount Seir with Ammon and Moab supports the view that Syria in v. 2 is actually Edom. These were all "brother nations" to Israel, and for that reason Moses and the Israelites were forbidden to invade them in the days of Israel's journey to Canaan from Egypt (Num. 20:17–21). Edom was another name for Esau, Jacob's brother (Gen. 25:30); Ammon and Moab were sons of Lot by his two daughters (Gen. 19:36–38).

20:11–14 As a member of the Asaph division of the Levites (1 Chr. 6:39; 15:17, 19; 16:7), Jahaziel was probably a musician. Music was an important part of Israel's religious life (13:12). The people would go into battle praising God with instruments and voices (vv. 19, 21, 22, 28).

20:15–17 The ascent of Ziz was a dry stream bed just north of En Gedi. The Wilderness of Jeruel lay between Hebron and the Dead Sea.

20:18, 19 The Kohathites were members of the Levitical division of Heman (1 Chr. 6:33). The Korahites were a subclan of the Kohathites (1 Chr. 6:37, 39), who were employed as gatekeepers to the temple (1 Chr. 26:1–19). Their positive response to Jahaziel's speech and their praise to God (vv. 15–17) was as important as any military preparation.

20:20 Tekoa was a town about 10 miles south of Jerusalem. The Wilderness of Tekoa was between the town and the Ascent of Ziz (v. 16).

believe … believe: Success in serving God requires complete trust in Him (John 14:1).

20:21, 22 sing … praise: The battle was the Lord's and its outcome was certain. The people celebrated God and His victory (Ex. 15:1, 20, 21; Judg. 7:18–20; Pss. 47; 98).

20:23, 24 Before Judah's armies could even reach the battlefield, the Ammonites and Moabites attacked their Edomite allies and destroyed them, then they turned against each other. As a result, Judah won without even having to fight. God had demonstrated that the battle was His (v. 15) and that He could accomplish His purposes without even using an army.

20:25 Spoils of war like valuables (precious metals) and jewelry became God's property, because God Himself had triumphed and therefore deserved the fruits of war (15:18; Josh. 6:24; 1 Chr. 18:7, 8).

20:26–28 After they experienced God's blessing and protection in the wilderness, the Judeans renamed Ziz (Heb. tsits) the Valley of Berachah, meaning "Blessing," to remind themselves of God's goodness.

20:29–33 the LORD had fought: The spectacle of Jehoshaphat's enemies in defeat, like the battles that Joshua had led years before, struck fear in the hearts of enemy nations (17:10; Josh. 2:9–11; 1 Chr. 14:17) because it involved an obvious miracle. No human army could prevail over God's omnipotence.

(Heb. yashar) (2 Chr. 20:32; Ex. 15:26; Deut. 12:25; Judg. 17:6) Strong’s #3477: The Hebrew word frequently translated right (as when used in Chronicles and Kings to assess the reigns of the kings of Israel and Judah) derives from a Hebrew word meaning “to be level” or “to be upright.” By extension it carries connotations of being just or righteous. The word is not only used to speak of the perfect righteousness of God (Deut. 32:4; Ps. 111:7, 8) but also of the integrity of one’s speech (Job 6:25; Eccl. 12:10) or the righteous quality of a person’s lifestyle (Prov. 11:3, 6). The word even implies pure and faithful motives (as in Deut. 9:5; 1 Kin. 9:4). As Israel’s second king, David exemplified these qualities in his life (1 Kin. 3:6), becoming a standard for assessing all the kings that followed him (2 Chr. 17:3; 34:2).

20:34 For a complete account of Jehoshaphat’s reign the chronicler recommended the book of Jehu, which itself was cited in the book of the kings of Israel. Jehu was the son of the prophet Hanani and was a prophet himself (19:2). He is mentioned in 1 Kings in connection with the kings of Israel (1 Kin. 16:1, 7). He was therefore a good source of information about both the northern and southern kingdoms.

20:35 Ahaziah was the son of Ahab; he succeeded his father and reigned for two years (1 Kin. 22:51). Ahaziah was injured in a fall and turned to the Philistine gods rather than to the Lord for healing (2 Kin. 1:2).

20:36 Tarshish was in the western Mediterranean. The name also came to represent any place far away. Ships of Tarshish were large vessels able to transport heavy cargo over long distances (8:17, 18; 9:21). Ezion Geber was a port on the Gulf of Aqaba (or Elath), the eastern arm of the Red Sea (8:17).

20:37 In the ships were wrecked is the implication that it was a natural disaster, suhc as a typhoon, behind which was the retributive hand of God.

21:1, 2 The names of Jehoram's brothers highlight Jehoram's choice as king emphatically, as if to say, "Not these brothers, but this one." We soon learn how significant for all of them this choice turned out to be (v. 4).

21:3 gifts … fortified cities: Jehoshaphat did what his great-grandfather Rehoboam had done. He gave the kingdom to his firstborn and then distributed extravagant gifts to his other sons (11:23). The purpose evidently was to satisfy each of his sons, since only one of them could succeed him as king.

21:4–6 princes of Israel: Jehoram extended his bloody purge as far as his distant relatives in Israel (18:1). He was so evil that not even blood ties restrained his lust for power.

21:7 Individual kings such as Jehoram committed evil and scorned covenant obligations, but the promise of God to David (Ps. 89:30–37) concerning his house remained intact (1 Chr. 17:7–14). a lamp: This is a figurative way of describing a descendant of David (1 Kin. 11:36).

21:8, 9 Edomites revolted: Jehoram's father Jehoshaphat had conquered Edom (20:22, 36).

21:10 In the western lowlands of Judah, Libnah was close to the border with Philistia.

21:11 commit harlotry: Israel's covenant with God was like a marriage relationship, and to violate it was to commit spiritual unfaithfulness (Ezek. 16:15–43; 23:1–21; Hos. 4:11–19). Like Solomon before him (1 Kin. 11:1–8), Jehoram failed to provide godly leadership. He led Judah astray.

21:12 Though 1 and 2 Kings pay considerable attention to Elijah the prophet (1 Kin. 17:1; 2 Kin. 2:18), the books of the Chronicles mention him only here. He had been taken up into heaven after King Ahaziah's death (2 Kin. 1:17; 2:1).

21:13–16 The Arabians were from the southwestern part of the Arabian peninsula, probably near present-day Yemen. They lived across the Red Sea from the Ethiopians.

21:17–19 no burning: Part of the rituals of death and burial was the lighting of bon fires, the meaning of which is unclear (16:14). Because of his wickedness and the displeasure of his subjects, Jehoram was not honored according to custom.

21:20 The tombs of the kings was a royal cemetery in Jerusalem where most of David's dynasty were buried (Asa was an exception; 16:14). Jehoram was not buried there, but in Jerusalem, the City of David.

22:1–4 Ahaziah of Judah was the namesake of his uncle from Israel. Ahaziah's father Jehoram had married a sister of Ahab's son Ahaziah (1 Kin. 22:40; 2 Kin. 1:17; 8:18).

22:5 Jehoram the son of Ahab succeeded his brother Ahaziah because Ahaziah had no sons of his own (2 Kin. 1:17). He is also called Joram, a short form of Jehoram, to distinguish him from his brother-in-law Jehoram who was king of Judah. Hazael was the king of Damascus who came to power after assassinating Ben-Hadad (2 Kin. 8:7–15). Elijah had prophesied that this would come about and had even commissioned Elisha to anoint Hazael to his new position (1 Kin. 19:15). Ramoth Gilead: Ahab and Jehoshaphat had tried to recover this city from Aramean domination 12 years earlier (18:3, 28–34). Ahab's son Jehoram persuaded Ahaziah king of Judah to join him in a renewed effort to accomplish that objective.

22:6 Jezreel was a royal city located in the Plain of Jezreel and frequented by the kings of Israel. It was about 10 miles west of the Jordan and 25 miles west of Ramoth Gilead (1 Kin. 21:1–4). In this instance Ramah is an abbreviated form of Ramoth Gilead.

22:7, 8 Ahaziah's visit to his dying uncle turned out to be God's occasion for Ahaziah's downfall. Jehu was an officer in Israel's army who participated in the campaign against Ramoth Gilead and who was anointed there as king by a servant of Elisha (2 Kin. 9:1–6). Elijah had prophesied that Jehu would become king of Israel (1 Kin. 19:16). Elisha carried out the commission through his servant, telling Jehu to remove Joram from the throne and to eradicate the entire Omri dynasty (2 Kin. 9:7–10).

22:9 When Ahaziah became aware of the slaughter of the northern dynasty and even some of his own relatives who happened to be in Jezreel (v. 8), he fled to Israel's capital, Samaria. But Jehu found him there and murdered him. In one day, both kingdoms lost their rulers. they buried him: The people honored him in this way only because Ahaziah was the grandson of the godly Jehoshaphat.

22:10 Most of the royal heirs Athaliah murdered were her own grandchildren. She wanted to stamp out the Davidic dynasty and bring Judah back under Israelite control. But this could not happen as long as Jehu was in power in the north.

22:11 It was Ahaziah's own sister Jehoshabeath who rescued her nephew Joash from her mother Athaliah.

22:12 Though Athaliah reigned for six years, she was not a descendant of David and therefore was never listed among the kings of Judah. Meanwhile, her grandson Joash remained the sole survivor in the Davidic line.

23:1, 2 The Levites were the religious leaders of the nation; the chief fathers were the civil leaders. Jehoiada needed support and help from both civil and religious leaders to overthrow Athaliah.

23:3 covenant: This was a solemn pledge to restore the throne to Joash and to submit to him as David's rightful heir (1 Chr. 29:21–24). he said: The speech was given by Jehoiada, not Joash (vv. 3, 8).

23:4 one-third: Jehoiada was referring to the changing of priests and the Levites for the week to come (1 Chr. 24:3). The coming and going of so many men at once would disguise the plot.

23:5 gate of the foundation: This portal, called the Sur Gate in 2 Kin. 11:6, cannot otherwise be identified, but it must have been in or near the temple complex.

23:6–8 Though one division of priests and Levites would normally replace the other, both divisions remained at the temple so they would have enough men to place Joash, the true heir, on David's throne.

23:9, 10 The temple contained spears and shields that David himself had assembled over 150 years before (9:15, 16; 12:10, 11; 2 Sam. 8:10, 11; 1 Chr. 18:7, 10, 11; 29:2). Jehoiada distributed these among the soldiers, who could not have carried their own weapons into the area without arousing suspicion.

23:11, 12 The Testimony was a copy of the Law of Moses, part of which outlined the king's covenant privileges and duties (Deut. 17:18–20; 1 Chr. 29:19). anointed him: An anointing was the sign and seal of the king's appointment by God and a symbol of the Spirit of God upon him (1 Sam. 16:13; 1 Kin. 1:39).

23:13 The pillar was probably one of the two that stood in front of the temple (3:15).

23:14 not … in the house of the LORD: The temple was regarded as a place of sanctuary from violence.

23:15 The Horse Gate in the temple provided access to the royal palace. There was another Horse Gate in the city wall.

23:16 This appears to be only a more public, all-inclusive statement of the same covenant made in the temple area to the nation's leadership (v. 3).

23:17–19 killed Mattan: The Law required that leaders in the worship of false gods be put to death (Deut. 13:6–11). This sort of execution had been carried out before (1 Kin. 18:40; 2 Kin. 10:25–28).

23:20, 21 The Upper Gate joined the temple to the royal palace on the north side of the temple (27:3).

24:1, 2 Joash could not rule alone at the age of seven, so his uncle Jehoiada acted as his guardian and counselor (v. 3). As long as his Jehoiada was alive, Joash did what was right (but see vv. 17, 18).

24:3, 4 Repairing the house of the LORD was necessary because of the neglect it had suffered during the evil reigns of Jehoram, Ahaziah, and Athaliah (v. 7).

24:5, 6 the collection: This was the "atonement money" that the Levites collected for the temple and its services (Ex. 30:11–16).

24:7, 8 The dedicated things included gold, silver, and other valuables collected as tribute from defeated enemies and presented to God as spoils of war (2 Sam. 8:10, 11).

24:9–12 The priests and Levites who supervised various ministries such as music, gatekeeping, and maintenance did the work of the service. They knew best what the needs were, so the king and Jehoiada gave the money to them.

24:13, 14 The people had been so generous (v. 11) that money remained after all the work had been done. This extra money allowed for a complete restocking of the temple with the gold and silver implements needed for its services. The daily burnt offerings were a sign of spiritual vitality and faithfulness to God. As long as Jehoiada remained alive, Judah enjoyed a revival of the true worship of God.

24:15 This lifespan of one hundred and thirty years is so out of keeping with age-span during that period of history that many scholars suggest a corruption in the text or some other way of explaining it. Some have proposed that "one hundred and thirty" may refer to the amount of time that had elapsed since the division of the kingdoms, which had taken place in 931 B.C. One hundred and thirty years later would be 801, the approximate date of this passage. The figure, then, would be marking the era from the last important chronological benchmark to this one, the revival under Joash. While attractive in some respects, this interpretation is not sufficiently attentive to the emphasis that the chronicler is otherwise putting on the great age of the priest.

24:16 Jehoiada was buried among the kings because of his service to God and to Joash.

24:17–19 The extent of Jehoiada's positive influence on Joash became obvious soon after the priest's death. King Joash became a proponent of idolatry and would not listen to God's rebukes. Because of this, God abandoned the Judeans to their evil ways (v. 20).

24:20, 21 Jesus spoke of "Zechariah, son of Berechiah" as one of a series of prophets who was murdered in the temple court (Matt. 23:34, 35). This could be the Zechariah who wrote the Book of Zechariah (Zech. 1:7), which says nothing about his death. Zechariah the son of Jehoiada also died a martyr in the temple court, as described here. Either (1) the chronicler's Zechariah was actually the grandson of Jehoiada and the son of an unmentioned Berechiah, or (2) the prophet who wrote the Book of Zechariah was also slain in the temple precincts, a fact recorded only in the Gospels.

24:22 killed his son: Besides forgetting all the good Jehoiada had done for him, Joash had killed his own cousin (22:11; 24:20). This once-good king had sunk to the level of his evil grandmother Athaliah (22:10), despite decades of past faithfulness to God. The weakness of his own convictions did him in. As long as he received good advice, he did well. But all depended on the quality of that counsel. Once it was gone, he abandoned God.

24:23–27 God arranged for Israel's defeat and Joash's death in fulfillment of Zechariah's dying cry for justice (v. 22). Judgment for evil does not always come so quickly, but it is just as inevitable no matter how long it is delayed. tombs of the kings: Like his grandfather Jehoram, Joash was excluded from the royal cemetery because he fell far short of the Davidic ideal (21:20). Ironically, Jehoiada, who was not a king at all, was buried among the kings because of his faithfulness to God and to God's chosen king (v. 16).

25:1–3 Amaziah had to bide his time until he was well enough established to be able to take such matters in hand as to punish those who had slain his father.

25:4 Amaziah did what was “right in the sight of the Lord” (v. 2) by obeying the Book of Moses with regard to the innocent children of lawbreakers (Deut. 24:16).

25:5, 6 The king of Israel was Jehoash (or Joash; v. 17). The hiring of Israelite mercenaries here, though judged evil (v. 7), implies that good relations existed between the two kingdoms.

25:7 As the breakaway kingdom that no longer stood within the Davidic covenant, Israel had disqualified itself as the people of the Lord. It was therefore improper for Judah to form alliances with the northern kingdom (19:2; 20:36, 37; 22:7). Because Ephraim was the dominant tribe in Israel, the whole kingdom at times was known as Ephraim (Hos. 4:15–19).

25:8, 9 If this war had been sanctioned by the Lord, victory would have been certain. But Amaziah had made his own decision to go to battle (v. 5) and had no assurance of God’s help.

25:10 Amaziah heeded the prophet’s advice and sent the Israelites back without even demanding the return of the hundred talents of silver he had paid them (v. 9). This greatly aroused the Israelite mercenaries because they thought their share of the spoils would have been much more than that.

Following the Lord—but Not Wholeheartedly

Demographers today classify roughly one-seventh of the world's population as Christian. However, church leaders are quick to point out that many adherents of Christianity, particularly in the West, can only be classified as nominal Christians—that is, Christians in name only. They attend church sporadically and show little if any spiritual commitment.

The faith of Amaziah of Judah was nominal. He generally followed the Lord, but not wholeheartedly (2 Chr. 25:2). Apparently he practiced the Law, but probably did so more out of tradition than out of heartfelt commitment to the Lord. So it is not surprising to learn that Amaziah took ethical shortcuts when it was convenient. For example, he spared the lives of Israelite children of murderers, in accordance with the Law (25:3, 4). But then he killed 10,000 innocent Edomites (25:11, 12).

Amaziah's legacy is a sobering reminder that nominal faith is almost as bad as no faith at all. A person can lead a fine, upstanding life, yet have little or no relationship with God. If the main point of life is to know, love, and serve God, then merely following a noble religious tradition is of little value, and dangerously self-deceiving.

25:11, 12 The Valley of Salt probably refers to the desert south of the Dead Sea. The people of Seir were the Edomites (20:10). Amaziah wanted to recover Edom as a Judean province, but he only succeeded in part (21:8, 10; 26:2).

25:13 The soldiers who attacked and sacked cities of Judah were those from Israel whom Amaziah had hired and then released (vv. 6, 10). Having been denied a part in the spoils of Edom, they set out to get them from Judah.

25:14 Amaziah had listened to the prophet of God, but then he turned around and worshiped the gods of the people of Seir. This is why the chronicler said that Amaziah served God, "but not with a loyal heart" (v. 2).

25:15, 16 could not rescue: Apparently it never occurred to Amaziah that it was foolish for him to worship a god who was powerless to defend his own people.

25:17, 18 The thistle here represents Amaziah, and the cedar Joash. The point is that it was arrogant for the weak, insignificant Amaziah to suppose that he could defeat Joash. The wild beast that passes by and tramples the thistle represents the war that Amaziah was so eager to pursue. Such a war would crush him.

25:19, 20 it came from God: As we find several times in 2 Chronicles, what appears to be a purely human decision or action turns out to be part of God's plan of blessing or judgment (22:7).

25:21 Of the three places named Beth Shemesh, this one was 18 miles west of Jerusalem. The ark of the covenant came here when it returned from Philistia (1 Sam. 6:12–14).

25:22, 23 Since Ephraim lay north of Jerusalem, the Gate of Ephraim was probably in the northern wall of the city, perhaps the same as the later Damascus Gate. The Corner Gate was at the east or west end of the north wall. Four hundred cubits was about six hundred feet.

25:24 One reason Joash's forces demolished the north wall was to gain access to the temple and its treasures. Obed-Edom's sons had been put in charge of the storehouse of the temple, probably meaning both the treasuries of the house of the Lord and the treasuries of the dedicated things (1 Chr. 26:15, 20). The treasures of the king's house refers not only to the king's private wealth but also to the state coffers, for there was no difference in principle and practice between the two (9:13; 1 Chr. 29:3). hostages: These might have included Amaziah himself.

25:25–27 They must refer to those who decried the defection of Amaziah from the Lord and who wanted to restore a godly regime. Thus Amaziah, like his father Joash (24:25), was assassinated. The fact that Amaziah reached the city of Lachish on the border with Philistia, some 25 miles from Jerusalem, suggests that he may have been seeking sanctuary among the Philistines.

25:28 City of Judah: This is an unusual way of speaking of the City of David. Since there is no note that he was buried with his fathers in the royal tombs, he probably was not.

26:1, 2 On the eastern arm of the Red Sea, Elath was technically in Edomite territory (8:17) but regularly was under Israel or Judah throughout OT times (20:36; 21:8–10). Some time after Amaziah's death, Uzziah rebuilt Elath.

26:3–5 The Zechariah named here may have been the son of Jehoiada (24:20, 21).

26:6 Also known as Jabneel (Josh. 15:11), Jabneh lay near the Mediterranean coast, less than 10 miles north of Ashdod. The geographical pattern of Uzziah's campaigns suggests that he was trying to gain access to the Mediterranean Sea and neutralize Philistine influence.

26:7 Gur Baal was most likely at present-day Tell Ghurr, about eight miles east of Beersheba. The Meunites were a desert tribe living mainly in Edom, south and west of the Dead Sea (1 Chr. 4:39–41).

26:8 The last recorded contact of Judah with Ammon was almost a hundred years earlier, in the days of Jehoshaphat. The Ammonites and Moabites had defeated the Edomites, but then began to fight each other (20:1, 22, 23). Evidently they still had not recovered sufficiently to prevent Uzziah from dominating them and extracting tribute from them.

26:9 The Corner Gate was at one end of the north wall of Jerusalem (25:23). The Valley Gate was on the west side of the city near the temple mount (Neh. 2:13, 15).

26:10–14 Archaeological research has uncovered many towers in the desert that date from the time of Uzziah. Carmel was a region south of Hebron, not the famous mountain where Elijah confronted the prophets of Baal. David often went to Carmel when he was fleeing from Saul (1 Sam. 25:2, 5, 7).

26:15 devices: This is one of the earliest references to catapults, which seem to have been defensive weapons, since their users were on the towers and the corners.

IN CONTEXT

No King-Priests in Judah

The Law of Moses stipulated that only the priests could perform the ritual sacrifices (Num. 3:5–10). The interior of the temple in Jerusalem was forbidden to all except certain orders of Levitical priests. Unlike the kings of neighboring nations, the king of Judah was not allowed into his own private temple, for he was not a priest, as most kings in the ancient Near East were.

The common ancient Near Eastern belief was that the most significant person in the community, the king, should also be the one representing the people before the god. Egyptian kings were considered embodied gods and had religious responsibilities withing the cult. Mesopotamian and Syro-Phonecian rulers were seen both as vice-regents of their patron deities and as high priests of the deities' cults. Certain public holy days could be carried out only by the king serving as high priest. One of the reasons Nabonidus, king of Bablyonia (556–539 B.C.), was so unpopular was because he did not perform the New Year's rituals for several years but left them to his son, which made the ritual improper and without value to the citizens.

Judah's king Uzziah was trying to act like these other kings by burning incense on the altar of the temple (2 Chr. 26:16–20), and by his action usurped the priest's role. The antagonistic encounter between Uzziah and the 81 priests (26:17, 18) probably reveals one of the many power struggles that went on between the kings and priests in Judah's politics.

26:16 Uzziah, swollen with pride, entered the temple. Uzziah was a descendant of David, but there were strict limits on his role in worship. Evidently Uzziah chafed at the restrictions.

26:17 The Azariah named here may be the same as Azariah the son of Johanan (1 Chr. 6:10).

26:18 the priests, the sons of Aaron: Uzziah sinned when he exercised priestly privileges that were reserved for the Aaronic order (Num. 16:39, 40).

26:19 Leprosy was any kind of serious skin condition (Lev. 13:1—14:32). Today, leprosy refers technically to Hansen's disease, a disease not known in Biblical times.

26:20 The urgency of the priests to thrust him out, as well as Uzziah's own haste to leave, came from the strict requirements of the Law (Lev. 22:2–6; Num. 12:10, 15). The Law viewed leprosy as a breach of God's own holiness; it was a graphic symbol of defilement.

26:21 isolated house: Because of his uncleanness, Uzziah had no access to the temple either as a worshiper or as king. was over the king's house: Control of the temple and the state now passed to Jotham. This implies a coregency. As long as Uzziah lived, Jotham exercised power on his behalf.

26:22 Isaiah was the prophet who wrote the Book of Isaiah (Is. 1:1). He witnessed the last years of Uzziah but wrote virtually nothing about him in his book that has survived.

26:23 reigned: This simply means that Jotham made the transition from coregent (v. 21) to full and independent king.

27:1 Jotham's sixteen years began eleven years before Uzziah died. This suggests that Uzziah had leprosy for more than a decade before he died.

27:2 did not enter the temple: Jotham, who took his father's place as regent because of his father's rashness in offering incense, certainly learned from that experience and did not seek to move outside the priestly limitations inherent in his office.

27:3 The Upper Gate connected the temple and the royal palace (23:20). Jotham repaired or rebuilt it. the wall of Ophel: Ophel was the original Jebusite area of Jerusalem. Its walls dated back hundreds of years and must have required regular maintenance.

27:4 cities … fortresses and towers: From the earliest days, the kings of Judah had built defense works and facilities for storing food and supplies (8:2, 4–6; 11:5–12; 14:6, 7; 17:12; 26:9, 10). In Jotham's time the Assyrians and other potential enemies were becoming a threat, so this building was necessary.

27:5–9 Uzziah had reduced the Ammonite people to tributary status, but evidently they had broken free. Jotham therefore reasserted his control and forced renewed payments. second and third years: After three years the tribute ended, suggesting that Ammon once more regained its independence.

28:1, 2 Ahaz's reign of sixteen years could mean that he came to the throne about four years after the sixteen-year tenure of his father Jotham (27:1).

28:3 The Valley of the Son of Hinnom was just outside the western wall of Jerusalem. It was a dumping ground for all kinds of refuse, much of which was burned. The valley itself became a symbol of impurity. It was used as a site of pagan worship, including human sacrifice (2 Kin. 23:10; Jer. 7:31, 32; 19:2–6; 32:35). the abominations of the nations: Worshipers of the Ammonite god Molech practiced human and child sacrifice (Lev. 18:21; 20:2–5; Deut. 12:31).

28:4 every green tree: Canaanite nature cults focused on evergreens, probably as symbols of perpetual fertility. Whereas other trees grew and shed their leaves, thus speaking of the cycles of life and death, these trees stayed green and spoke therefore of ongoing, uninterrupted life. Ritual prostitution conducted under these trees was thought to enhance the fertility of plant, animal, and human life.

28:5 king of Syria: Rezin (2 Kin. 16:5).

28:6 Pekah, who assassinated Pekahiah son of Menahem so he could become king of Israel (2 Kin. 15:23–25), reigned for 20 years (2 Kin. 15:27). He was murdered in a plot headed by Hoshea, the last king of Israel. because they had forsaken the LORD God: Pekah was not offended by Judah's godlessness and did not himself initiate this purge. Rather, God used Pekah to carry out His judgment.

28:7 The officer over the house was a manager of the palace and all of its staff and activities.

28:8, 9 This prophet Oded is mentioned only here. killed … in a rage: God used the Israelite armies to carry out his judgment on Judah (v. 6), but He never intended for the Israelites to enjoy it. Oded condemned their malicious and self-serving attitude.

28:10–12 The Israelites intended to make the survivors of Judah their slaves, although this was forbidden by the Law of Moses (Lev. 25:39–46).

28:13, 14 offended the LORD: This admission by Israel's leaders applies not only to the outrageous slaughter of their brethren from Judah (v. 6) but also to the whole course of their history until then. The Israelites could see from the rise of the Assyrians and their encroachment on Israel that the end was near. Within ten years, the Assyrians would capture Samaria and deport all of the Israelites. The Israelites brought this judgment on themselves (2 Kin. 17:7, 18).

28:15 anointed them: They applied balms and oils to the wounded.

28:16 The kings of Assyria were Tiglath-Pileser III, Shalmaneser V, and Sargon II.

28:17 The relationship between Judah and the Edomites changed often. Judah usually dominated Edom and was never under its control, but the extent of domination varied from one generation to the next (8:17; 20:2, 22, 36; 21:8–10; 25:11; 26:2). Now Edom was independent once again and powerful enough to invade Judah and take prisoners. Ahaz solicited help from Assyria (v. 16).

28:18, 19 lowland: This region between the hill country of Judah and the coastal plain is commonly called the Shephelah. The South was the Negev. Beth Shemesh was eighteen miles west of Jerusalem near the Philistine border. Aijalon was in the Aijalon valley seven miles north of Beth Shemesh. Gederoth was possibly the same as Gederah, located about three miles west of Aijalon. Sochoh was in the southern lowlands, about ten miles southwest of Hebron. Gimzo was eight miles northwest of Aijalon. All these places were near valleys that led up to central Judah from the surrounding plains. Control of them meant control of Judah itself. Because Ahaz understood this, he appealed to Assyria.

28:20–22 Tiglath-Pileser brought Mesopotamian influence over the countries of the eastern Mediterranean to its highest point. He undertook a campaign against Arpad in Syria and terrorized Menahem of Israel so much that Menahem paid him a huge bribe to be left alone (2 Kin. 15:19). Tiglath returned to the west again, and Ahaz scrambled for protection against Syria and Israel (2 Kin. 16:5–7; Is. 7:1, 2). The Assyrians overran Damascus and replaced the assassinated Pekah of Israel with Hoshea (2 Kin. 15:30), but they did not assist Ahaz. The king of Judah's troubles with the Edomites, Philistines, Arameans, and even Israelites (Is. 7:1) were over for the time being, but at great cost.

28:23 King Ahaz's idolatry and unfaithfulness to God (v. 19) led to God's judgment. Rather than repent, Ahaz sought to appease the gods who had defeated him, the gods of Damascus. Not only was he being idolatrous, he was ignoring the fact that Damascus itself had fallen to the Assyrians.

28:24 The account in 2 Kin. 16:10–18 relates how Ahaz, having seen an altar in Damascus, ordered one like it to be built in Jerusalem. On this altar he offered regular burnt offerings. He used the great bronze altar of Solomon as a means of divination. He dismantled the carts supporting the lavers (4:14) and took the great bronze Sea from its pedestals (4:2, 3). These must have been among the articles that he destroyed. Shut up the doors signifies the absolute repudiation of Yahweh worship and the wholesale adoption of heathen religion.

28:25 If destroying high places is a sign of a godly reign (14:3, 5; 15:16; 16:6), then constructing them is a clear sign of the opposite. The phrase God of his fathers calls attention to God's covenant relationship with both Israel and Judah.

28:26, 27 The term kings of Israel refers not just to the northern kingdom, but to the entire nation under God.

29:1, 2 Hezekiah was the only king of Judah who was as faithful to the Lord as David had been.

29:3 The first year of Hezekiah's independent rule began in 715 B.C. Hezekiah had ruled alongside Ahaz since 729 B.C. The fact that Hezekiah began his work on the restoration of the temple in his first month testifies to his zeal for God's work. Hezekiah opened the doors of the temple as a step toward spiritual renewal. Ahaz had closed the doors as an expression of hostility to God and the covenant (28:24). Hezekiah wasted no time in dealing with the sins of his predecessor.

29:4 The East Square was the courtyard directly in front of the portico of the temple (4:9, 10; 6:13; 7:7).

29:5 carry out the rubbish: It is impossible to know all that this involved, but it may be that Ahaz had used the temple as a sort of warehouse. Clearly more is in view than the temple furnishings themselves, because these were repaired and sanctified and put to use again (v. 19).

29:6–9 captivity: This could refer to the fall of Samaria and deportation of the northern tribes just seven years earlier (2 Kin. 17:6). But under the wicked leadership of Ahaz, many of the people of Judah had been taken captive by Rezin of Damascus and Pekah of Israel (28:5–8). Hezekiah's reference to Judah and Jerusalem (v. 8) suggests that he might have been referring to this.

29:10, 11 Hezekiah's covenant placed him and his people under the authority of God. Hezekiah pledged himself to lead the nation in faithfulness, as the terms of the original Davidic covenant demanded (23:3, 11, 16; Deut. 17:18–20; 31:9–13; 1 Chr. 28:9).

29:12 Kohathites … Merari … Gershonites: Hezekiah summoned the leaders of the three major Levitical clans, two leaders from each clan.

29:13 The family of Elizaphan was part of Kohath (1 Chr. 15:8).

29:14 Asaph was the father of a division of Levitical musicians (1 Chr. 25:1, 2). Heman and Jeduthun were musicians (1 Chr. 25:1, 3–5). Jeduthun was also known as Ethan (1 Chr. 15:17, 19).

29:15 The phrase at the words of the LORD means that Hezekiah undertook his reformation at God's direction. His instructions to the nation in this case had unique authority (see 1 Chr. 28:11–19; 29:23, 24).

29:16 The inner part apparently refers to the Most Holy Place, and the term temple must refer also to the larger chamber, the holy place (3:5–7; 4:7, 8). The court was the inner court just outside the temple, the area restricted to the priests and Levites (4:9). The work of temple repair and restoration began in the Most Holy Place and then continued until it reached the courtyard. The Brook Kidron was the wadi just east of Jerusalem where debris was burned (15:16).

(Heb. taher) (2 Chr. 29:16; Lev. 14:48; Ps. 51:2, 7; Is. 66:17) Strong’s #2891: This Hebrew term means “to make free from blemish,” almost always in a ritual or spiritual sense (although once the word is used for the wind’s cleaning away of clouds and once for the refiner’s purifying of silver; see Job 37:21; Mal. 3:3). Almost half the occurrences are in Leviticus, where ritual cleansing is related to sanctification and is opposed to the moral filthiness of the Israelites (Lev. 16:19). Objects and people involved in the worship of the Lord—such as the temple, the furniture in the temple, and the Levites—needed cleansing because the Lord is a holy God (Num. 8:5–22; 1 Chr. 23:28). The ritual external cleansing of people was a symbol of internal purity (Gen. 35:2; Zech. 3:3–5). Jeremiah and Ezekiel prophesied of the future cleansing of the people from their sins so that they could truly be God’s people, both outside and inside (Jer. 33:8; Ezek. 36:25, 33; 37:23). The idea of cleansing carries through into the NT. The Book of Revelation pictures the Lamb’s bride—the church—in clean linen which symbolizes the righteous acts of believers (2 Cor. 7:1; Eph. 5:26; 1 John 1:9; Rev. 19:8).

29:17, 18 The work began on the first day of the first month of Hezekiah’s reign, not of the calendar month (v. 3). The vestibule was a porch across the front of the temple. Sanctify means to “cleanse or purify” or “to set apart for a holy purpose.”

29:19 articles: Ahaz had destroyed some but not all of the temple implements (28:24).

29:20, 21 bulls … rams … lambs: The Law required the sacrifice of these animals for atonement of sin in general (Lev. 1:3–13). On the other hand, the sacrifice of goats atoned for specific sins (Lev. 4:1—5:13). Here the priests offered seven of each kind to signify the wholeness of their repentance. The kingdom refers to the nation as a political entity, Judah to the people. Both the state and the people needed atonement. The sanctuary refers to the temple itself.

29:22–24 The repetition of all Israel here suggests that Hezekiah meant to include all twelve tribes, including the northern kingdom (30:1–9).

29:25 King David was responsible for religious as well as civil and political matters. He had exercised that responsibility by appointing Levitical musicians and instructing them about their temple ministries (1 Chr. 23:2, 27; 25:1–31). He was guided and advised by two of God's faithful prophets, Gad and Nathan.

29:26 The instruments of David were those deemed appropriate for temple worship (1 Chr. 25:1, 3, 5, 6).

29:27–30 The words of David and of Asaph refers to the psalms of David and Asaph (1 Chr. 6:39; 15:17; 16:5), many of them in the Book of Psalms. The people of Judah used these psalms for community worship and private meditation.

29:31, 32 Sometimes called "peace" or "fellowship" offerings, thank offerings celebrated the relationship gained by the offerings of atonement (vv. 21–24; Lev. 3:1–17; 7:11–36). willing heart: People gave these gifts to God not out of compulsion but as a joyful responses to the grace of God.

29:33 The thank offerings included people, priests, and God Himself. In effect, the consecrated things made up a banquet at which everyone gathered before the Lord for fellowship and communion.

29:34, 35 Under Ahaz the priests and Levites had been stripped of their duties. Now, 20 years later, there were not enough priests. Hezekiah had to reconsecrate the older priests and commission new ones. His reforms took place so quickly (v. 3) that the priests received a special dispensation to assign Levites to areas of ministry otherwise closed to them, such as skinning sacrificial animals (Lev. 1:5, 6).

29:36 so suddenly: This partially explains the unavailability of persons involved in religious worship (v. 34), and it testifies to Hezekiah's zeal in bringing about reformation as soon as it was within his power. One must not overlook the fact, however, that renewal came fundamentally because God had prepared the people.

30:1–3 Though the kingdom of Israel had split more than two centuries before, Hezekiah never lost sight of the fact that God's covenant was made with all twelve tribes and that His promises included them all (Ezek. 37:15–28). The Passover was ordinarily celebrated in the first month of the religious year (Ex. 12:6, 18). But this year the repair and consecration of the temple was still underway (29:1–17). The Law made provision for the Passover to be postponed if a person was absent on an important journey or was ritually defiled (Num. 9:9–12). Hezekiah interpreted this Law to include the priests who, had not yet consecrated themselves to ministry (29:34). All the people of Israel had not had time to gather together at Jerusalem in any case, so they delayed the celebration until the second month.

30:4, 5 The fact that all Israel was included reveals that there were many followers of God left in the northern kingdom, despite more than 200 years of backsliding and the Assyrian conquest (29:24).

30:6, 7 the LORD God of Abraham, Isaac, and Israel: Hezekiah appealed to the nation on the basis of the ancient Abrahamic covenant (29:5). Even though the kingdom was divided and many of its people languished in exile far from home, God's promise could not change, and it bound them all together as God's people. They still had time to return to the Lord. the remnant: In some places the word remnant means the godly elect from among the Israelite people as a whole (Is. 46:3; Mic. 2:12; 5:7, 8). Here it means those Israelites who had survived Assyrian slaughter and deportation.

30:8 People who were not priests were not allowed to enter the temple, so enter His sanctuary is a figure of speech for serving the Lord.

30:9 The brethren and children were Israelites who had been carried away into Assyrian captivity. Hezekiah pleaded with the remnant left behind to repent, promising that this would result in better treatment of those in captivity and would guarantee their return to the land. According to the covenant (Deut. 28—30), obedience would lead to blessing in the land, and disobedience would result in exile.

30:10 Zebulun was probably the northernmost territory of Israel at this time because Naphtali had been taken by Tiglath-Pileser III (2 Kin. 15:29).

30:11, 12 In Judah the reaction to Hezekiah's invitation was totally different from Israel's (vv. 10, 11), because God had put His hand on Judah. God's grace is always a part of a person's efforts to please Him.

30:13 Because the Feast of Unleavened Bread immediately followed the Passover and was connected to it (Lev. 23:4–8), the Feast of Unleavened Bread sometimes referred to the Passover as well (Ezra 6:22). second month: A postponement of the feast from the first month was possible under certain circumstances (v. 2).

30:14 The debris removed from the temple had already been hauled off to the Brook Kidron for burning (29:16), but the burnt offering and incense altars still remained in Jerusalem until the time of the Passover.

30:15 The priests and the Levites were ashamed because they had been derelict in not consecrating themselves to their ministries earlier (29:34; 30:3). The cause for the delay of the Passover, in fact, was this tardiness on their part.

30:16 The Levites killed the animals and then handed the blood over to the priests to apply it. Usually burnt offerings were sacrificed by the individual worshipers who gave the blood to the priests (Lev. 1:4, 5).

30:17 Traditionally the slaughter of the Passover lamb was performed by the head of the family (Ex. 12:3–6). But on this occasion many were not ritually purified, and the Levites acted on their behalf.

30:18–20 not cleansed … yet they ate: Those who came from distant parts of Israel were disqualified from sacrificing and did not do so. Still, they ate the Passover meal, in violation of the Law of Moses (Ex. 12:43–49). They felt it more important to obey the spirit of the Passover than its letter. Hezekiah prayed for them, asking God to observe the desire of their hearts. In response, God healed the people; that is, He healed their relationship with Him. Genuine seeking after God is more important than adherence to ritual (1 Sam. 15:22).

30:21, 22 taught the good knowledge of the LORD: Because of Ahaz's many years of wicked rule (28:23–25), the people of Judah must have become ignorant of the truths of their faith. The people from the north (v. 18) had virtually no preaching of God's revelation for 200 years, apart from the witness of the prophets such as Hosea and Amos. But the Levites' ministry included teaching (17:8–10; Deut. 17:18; 31:9–13; 33:10), and this great Passover was an opportunity to explain the history and purpose of God's covenant with Israel. The people ate throughout the feast because a meal was the central feature of the thank or peace offerings (29:31; Lev. 7:28–36; 9:18).

30:23 Like Solomon before him (7:8–10), Hezekiah found it impossible to limit the festivities to eight days (including the Passover). Their common consent to celebrate another seven days was a sure sign of renewed spiritual vitality.

30:24 Hezekiah … gave: As an extraordinary act of generosity and personal commitment, the king took shared his own resources with the people. Possibly this was somewhat necessary also in light of a second, unanticipated week of sacrifice.

30:25, 26 The sojourners were aliens who lived in Israel and Judah and who could come to the festivals because they adhered to God and the Law (Deut. 16:11; 26:11; 29:11; 31:12).

30:27 blessed the people: This may have been the formal blessing of Num. 6:24–26.

31:1 The phrases all Israel and all the children of Israel refer to the entire nation, north and south, Israel and Judah.

31:2 The long interruption (28:24) of Judah's official worship in the time of Ahaz brought chaos to their religious life. They abandoned the system of priestly and Levitical division. Just as David had originally organized the Levitical system (1 Chr. 23:1—26:28), so now Hezekiah had to reorganize it.

31:3 The New Moon celebrations came at the appearance of the new moon, the beginning of another month (Num. 28:11–15). Though there were many set feasts by the end of the OT period, the ones in view here were the Passover and Feast of Unleavened Bread (Lev. 23:4–8); the Feast of Firstfruits or Pentecost (Lev. 23:15–22); and the Feast of Tabernacles (Lev. 23:33–43).

31:4 The Law stated clearly that the people were to contribute support by their tithes and offerings so the work of the temple could go on (Num. 18:8–24).

“tithe”

(Heb. maaser) (2 Chr. 31:5, 12; Gen. 14:20) Strong’s #4643: The Hebrew word translated tithe is derived from eser, the Hebrew number for ten. In Gen. 14:20, Abraham gave the priest Melchizedek a tenth of his wealth. This set the precedent throughout the OT for what was considered an appropriate portion of one’s wealth to give to the Lord. According to the Law, Israelites were to set aside a tenth of their annual produce for God (Deut. 14:22–28). Whatever was given to the Lord was considered holy (Lev. 27:30–33) and was to be used to support the ministry of the priests and Levites (Num. 18:21). The prophet Malachi proclaimed that the failure to bring a tithe to God was the equivalent of robbing Him (Mal. 3:8).

31:5 The early harvests of grain, particularly barley, were being reaped at this time. The Passover had been held in the second month (30:2) and it was now already the third (v. 7). The firstfruits began appearing at the time of the Feast of Passover and Unleavened Bread—that is, in early April or so, and the harvests were fully gathered in some 50 days later, at the time of the Feast of Weeks or Pentecost (Lev. 23:9–22). the tithe: A tenth of the harvest belonged to the Levites, whose sustenance depended on it (v. 4; Num. 18:21–24). There were three tithes—two every year and one every third year.

31:6 The holy things were likely metals and other nonperishables (24:10, 11; 1 Chr. 29:2, 7, 8) which were consecrated to God for use in worship and service.

31:7–9 The third month was the month after the delayed Passover (30:2) and the time of the early harvest (v. 5). The seventh month was Tishri, the month of the final annual harvest of fruits. The Feast of Tabernacles celebrated the year-end harvest (Lev. 23:39; Deut. 16:13) at this time. There was a continual ingathering from the third to the seventh month, and the people brought their tithes to the temple as an expression of renewed devotion.

31:10 The chief priests from Solomon’s time onward were Zadokites (1 Kin. 2:27, 35).

31:11 prepare rooms: Places already existed in the temple for storing food supplies and other materials (1 Chr. 26:15, 20).

31:12, 13 had charge of them: In order to ensure a fair and efficient distribution to the priests and Levites, certain persons were appointed to the task of supervision. Two persons were in charge of the distribution and ten others worked with them.

31:14 At the front of the temple the East Gate led to the great courtyard and the Kidron valley beyond (1 Chr. 26:14).

31:15 Because most of the priests lived in the cities allotted to them and not in Jerusalem (1 Chr. 6:54–60), Kore and his assistants took provisions to them (v. 14).

31:16 three years old: The boys described here were young apprentice priests dedicated to the office by their parents. Samuel had such a ministry (1 Sam. 1:24, 28; 2:18).

31:17 All religious personnel had to descend from Levi, but the priests as such had to trace their genealogy specifically to Aaron (1 Chr. 6:49–53).

31:18 all who were written in the genealogy: This is an all-inclusive way of designating both priests and Levites. Anyone whose lineage was Levitical could draw upon the tithes and offerings raised for their support.

31:19–21 The preceding arrangements pertained to the maintenance of the priests and Levites who came to Jerusalem to minister when their divisional assignment dictated such a schedule (vv. 15–17). Those back in their own cities would require ongoing provision as well, so there were distributors there for that. Thus, whether “on the job” or not, all of God’s servants could count on the people’s support.

32:1–23 In this significant war, human responsibility blends with divine sovereignty. Hezekiah made careful preparations by stopping external access to the water source, repairing the broken wall and building a second wall, repairing the Millo, making weapons and shields in abundance, and organizing the army. Only after making thorough preparations does Hezekiah say that they could count on the Lord to fight our battles.

32:1, 2 In Hezekiah's fourteenth year, Sennacherib invaded Judah and eventually laid siege to Jerusalem (2 Kin. 18:13–17). One of the most imperialistic of Assyria's kings, Sennacherib undertook many military campaigns to the west. In his own inscriptions he boasts of having taken many of Judah's cities, a claim supported by the parallel account in 2 Kings. The fortified cities that he took had first been built and equipped by Solomon (8:2–6), and then rebuilt and enlarged by Solomon's successors down to the time of Hezekiah (11:5–12; 14:6, 7; 17:12; 26:9, 10; 27:4; 32:29).

32:3 With the help of 2 Kin. 20:20 we learn that Hezekiah managed to stop the water by concealing the springs outside the city and then digging a tunnel to bring them to the Pool of Siloam inside the city walls. Hezekiah hid the source of water and made it unavailable to the enemy. The Siloam Inscription describes how workmen constructed the 1,800–foot tunnel connecting the springs of Gihon to the Pool of Siloam.

32:4 The brook was the Wadi Kidron, east of Jerusalem.

32:5 Millo means landfill and refers to extensive terracing that surrounded the ancient hills of Ophel and Mount Zion. The work of extending the hills of Jerusalem was first undertaken by David (1 Chr. 11:7, 8) and continued by Solomon (1 Kin. 9:15).

32:6 The main city gate was where the population could assemble and where court and other official functions were held (6:12; 29:4).

32:7 more with us: This is not Judah's army; Hezekiah meant the armies of heaven (2 Kin. 6:14–17).

32:8 fight our battles: This terminology speaks of Yahweh as a warrior. Hezekiah sees the present struggle as a battle not just between nations but also between competing religious systems and ideologies (v. 19). Therefore, armies of flesh will be of no avail, for the conflict is spiritual and spiritual hosts will be led by the omnipotent God of Israel.

32:9 Both the OT and Assyrian inscriptions document the siege against Lachish, an important fortified city west of Jerusalem and near the great coastal route (11:9). Its capture by Assyria would cut off access to Jerusalem from the west and would give Assyria control of the coast.

32:10, 11 The siege of Jerusalem had not actually begun, but Sennacherib's envoys spoke of it as already underway. Jerusalem was under siege psychologically.

32:12 What should have been taken as a sign of religious reformation and exclusivity—the removal of pagan religious centers (31:1)—is taken by the Assyrians as evidence that Hezekiah has undermined his own cult.

32:13–16 Sennacherib's messengers tried to destroy the peoples' faith in God by pointing out that the other nations, despite their many gods and many altars, had been powerless to resist the Assyrians. The Assyrians thought the true God was no different than the gods of the nations they had already subjugated.

32:17 Sennacherib also wrote letters because he wanted to avoid a long and costly siege.

32:18, 19 Aramaic had become the language of international communication and diplomacy. The Judean negotiators wanted the matter discussed in Aramaic because they felt that they deserved to be addressed in regular diplomatic language. The Assyrians continued the dialogue in Hebrew to frighten and trouble the people.

32:20 By now the prophet Isaiah had been involved in public ministry to the kings of Judah for nearly 40 years (26:22; Is. 6:1). He had considerable prestige and was especially important as a counselor of young Hezekiah (Is. 37:1–7).

32:21–23 Sennacherib returned shamefaced to his own land, Assyria, and its capital Nineveh. The same Sennacherib who had mocked God's ability to preserve Hezekiah and Judah (vv. 17, 19) now died a violent death while in the very act of worshiping his god. his own offspring: Sennacherib's sons were Adrammelech and Sharezer. His two sons assassinated him 20 years after the siege of Jerusalem and fled for their lives. Then a third son Esarhaddon became king.

32:24 Hezekiah was sick: His sickness struck shortly after Sennacherib's defeat (2 Kin. 20:1, 12) and involved affliction with boils (Is. 38:10–21). a sign: When Isaiah told Hezekiah he would recover, the king wanted confirmation. The sundial moved backward for him ten degrees, adding forty minutes to the day (Is. 38:8).

32:25–29 God had given Hezekiah an extraordinary favor—15 additional years of life (2 Kin. 20:6). But his heart was lifted up: Hezekiah had received Babylonian envoys who had come to congratulate him on his recovery and probably to enlist his support in their struggle against Assyria (2 Kin. 20:12–19). Their visit ignited his desire to show off all the treasures of his kingdom. Because of this indulgence in pride, God's wrath was looming. The account in Kings reveals Isaiah's response to Hezekiah's pride. The time would come, the prophet said, when all the wealth that Hezekiah had used to impress his visitors would be seized by the same Babylonians and taken to their distant land (2 Kin. 20:16–18; Is. 39:6, 7).

32:30 Upper Gihon was a spring in the Kidron valley near the Water Gate. The tunnel meandered from Gihon south and then west for over five hundred yards (vv. 3, 4). It ended at the Pool of Siloam, then on the southwest side of Jerusalem.

32:31 The test was not for God's benefit but for Hezekiah's.

32:32 The vision of Isaiah is the prophetic Book of Isaiah (Is. 1:1).

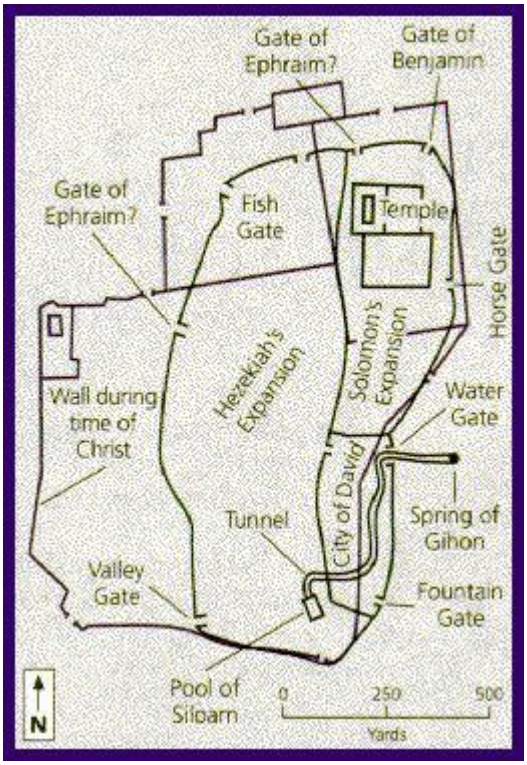
32:33 The term upper tombs probably refers to the royal cemetery where all the godly descendants of David were buried. Others were entombed in the City of David, but not in the same area (28:27). honored: This would include such rites and ceremonies as public lamentation and ritual fires (16:14).

33:1, 2 Manasseh was not the only king who lived according to the abominations of the nations. Ahaz did too (28:3).

33:3 The host of heaven were the gods of the sun, moon, and stars. The Babylonians especially revered these deities (Deut. 4:19; Ezek. 8:16).

33:4 In Jerusalem shall My name be: The point was that God had the exclusive right to inhabit the temple, as opposed to the deities Manasseh introduced (v. 5).

33:5 In addition to altars inside the temple (v. 4), Manasseh erected altars to his astral deities in the two courts—that is, the court of the priests and Levites and the one open to the public (4:9; 1 Kin. 7:9–12).



Hezekiah's Waterworks

In his efforts to fortify Jerusalem against Sennacherib and the Assyrians, King Hezekiah ordered the construction of a tunnel to bring water from the spring of Gihon to inside the city walls (2 Chr. 32:30). The tunnel was excavated through solid rock 60 feet underground for a distance of almost 600 yards. Workers started at opposite ends and dug with hand tools until they met in the middle of the shaft. When it was completed, Hezekiah's tunnel emerged at a spot that later came to be known as the Pool of Siloam.

33:6 Valley of the Son of Hinnom: Like Ahaz, Manasseh practiced human sacrifice, going so far as to offer up his own children (28:3). Soothsaying is divination, an attempt to determine the plans and purposes of the gods so as to avert their hostility or take advantage of their favors. Soothsayers and diviners inspected animal entrails, smoke, oil in water, the flights of birds, and heavenly phenomena (Is. 2:6; Jer. 27:9). Witchcraft and sorcery attempt to bring about desired results by employing magical or mystical rituals. Mediums are those who claim to contact and consult with the dead. The witch of En Dor appears to have done this, for she feared for her life when she realized that Saul had condemned necromancers to death (1 Sam. 28:3, 9). spiritists: These are "knowing ones" whose specialty also is communication with the dead in the hope of acquiring information inaccessible to the living. All such practices were common among Canaanite and other pagan religions and were to be strictly avoided by God's people (Deut. 13:1–6; 18:9–14).

33:7 The nature of this carved image or the god it represented cannot be determined, but that is almost irrelevant in light of the enormous blasphemy associated with it. This exceeded the wickedness of even Ahaz, who closed the temple to any use, placing his altars and idols elsewhere (28:23–25). But now the place reserved exclusively for Yahweh's name (v. 4) had become usurped and prostituted to most abominable purposes.

33:8, 9 God's ancient promise never to remove the people of Israel from the land they had inherited was conditioned on their obedience to all the covenant stipulations—law, statutes, and ordinances—to which they had sworn (Gen. 17:7, 8; Lev. 26:27–35, 46). Manasseh's behavior had greatly jeopardized the presence of the people in the land.

33:10, 11 For some time Babylon had been part of the Assyrian empire, though it had broken free on occasion, especially under the leadership of Berodach-Baladan, Hezekiah's contemporary (2 Kin. 20:12). Ashurbanipal brought Babylon back under Assyrian domination. He was the king who took Manasseh to Babylon as a prisoner.

33:12, 13 then Manasseh knew: The punishment Yahweh inflicted upon Manasseh for his sin was not retributive alone but produced repentance and fresh understanding of the absolute sovereignty of God.

33:14 The term City of David originally referred to Mount Zion alone (1 Chr. 11:5) but eventually designated the entire city including Mount Ophel, the original Jebusite settlement. Gihon was the spring that was the main source of water for Jerusalem (32:3, 4, 30). It was in the Kidron valley near the northeastern brow of Mount Zion. The Fish Gate was in the center of the wall north of the temple. Manasseh's construction began at Gihon and went north past Mount Ophel to the northeast corner of the temple mount. Then it went west to the Fish Gate. This was a total distance of about 750 yards. These fortified cities were the same ones that had been captured by Sennacherib.

33:15, 16 Manasseh took away the old idols—a sign of true conversion and devotion to God (v. 13).

33:17–19 The sin of worshiping at high places was in their association with paganism (Deut. 12:2, 3). The temple represented the dwelling place of God among His people. At this time, God wanted all worship by the people as a community to take place there. This is what is meant by the exclusiveness of the central sanctuary (Deut. 12:5–28).

33:20 in his own house: Manasseh had truly converted (v. 13), but his prior sin had been so heinous that he was denied burial in the royal cemetery (32:33).

33:21, 22 The carved images were in addition to the wooden images he had made (v. 3). The images were representations of deity carved from wood or stone. The carved image to which Amon sacrificed had been set up in the temple as an idol (v. 7). It was later removed from the city (v. 15) but apparently not destroyed, since Amon set it up again.

33:23–25 At this time people of the land was a technical term that indicated a certain level of leadership, perhaps a council of elders. In crises like the assassination of Amon they could assume interim powers until proper government could be restored (22:1; 26:1; 36:1).

34:1–3 The wooden images were poles dedicated to Asherah, the Canaanite fertility goddess (33:3). The molded images were like the carved images except that they were made of molded metal (Ex. 32:4, 8; Is. 42:17; Hos. 13:2).

34:4 Josiah's destruction of the altars and idols built by his grandfather Manasseh and father Amon recall Moses' grinding up the golden calf and scattering its dust upon the waters (Ex. 32:20).

34:5 burned the bones of the priests: This act of Josiah, which took place at Bethel, fulfilled the words of the prophet of Judah in the days of Jeroboam I, king of Israel (1 Kin. 13:1, 2; 2 Kin. 23:15, 16). The prophet had mentioned Josiah by name three hundred years before.

34:6, 7 Josiah's purge of the idolatrous cults was not limited to Judah and Bethel but extended from the south—Simeon—to the north—Naphtali. Israel had been subject to Assyria for a century, and new religious movements such as that of the Samaritans had gained a foothold in the region (2 Kin. 17:24–31; 23:19).

34:8 Shaphan was a scribe or secretary of the king (v. 15). He was responsible for state records that must have included the original temple plans and specifications. The temple was repaired strictly according to its original pattern. The office of governor was like that of the modern mayor (18:25). A recorder kept the royal diaries. Official happenings were duly noted and recorded for posterity. The work of men like Joah provided sources for later historians such as the author of Chronicles (1 Chr. 18:15).

34:9 Hilkiah was probably the high priest of the genealogy of 1 Chr. 6:13 (Ezra 7:1).

34:10, 11 Josiah's work of restoring what was destroyed included not only repairs to the temple and related buildings, but repairs to the fortifications (15:8; 24:5; 28:24; 29:6, 7; 32:5).

34:12 The sons of Merari and the Kohathites were two of the three clans of Levi (1 Chr. 6:1, 16; 23:6).

34:13–16 Shaphan delivered the scroll because he was the king's scribe. He would know how to assess the authenticity of the text and tell the king whether it was important.

IN CONTEXT

The Book of the Law of the Lord

Hilkiah's discovery of "the Book of the Law of the LORD" (2 Chr. 34:14) began a great revival in Israel. King Josiah's response to the book inspired him to initiate a reformation and refocus attention on Jerusalem as the center of worship (2 Kin. 23:4–20). It was one of the nation's greatest moments.

What was this "Book of the Law of the LORD"? The reforms that Josiah introduced reflect many of the themes of Deuteronomy, so it seems clear that Josiah's book must have included at least Deuteronomy. But the Law that was "given by Moses" (34:14) technically includes the whole Pentateuch, the first five books of the Bible (Ex. 24:4), and there seems no reason to doubt that this was the case in Josiah's day.

This copy of the Law somehow survived the long period of religious suppression under Manasseh and Amon. We may never know who put it in the temple or why, but God saw to its preservation and discovery.

Josiah's humble, obedient response to the book was and remains a model of how all people should respond to God's revealed Word. Josiah listened to the Scripture, allowed its words of truth to judge him, and humbly confessed that he had neglected God's commands (34:18, 19). After learning more about its truths (34:21), he shared the Scripture with others and led them in following it. He had the book read before the entire nation and led the Israelites in recommitting their lives to the Lord (34:29–31).

34:17–19 the king … tore his clothes: One gets the impression that this is the first time Josiah had ever seen a copy of the Scriptures and had ever heard it read. This does not mean that he was unaware of the Mosaic writings, for surely their teachings had been preserved through the apostasy, at least in oral form. In a day of mass production of literature, it is difficult for the modern reader to envision a time when any composition, even the Bible, existed in only a few dozen copies at most. This was the case throughout the ancient world, however, and it is entirely possible that an entire literary tradition could be lost. Josiah's reaction must be explained not in terms of the novelty of what he had heard but because he had seen and heard a copy of the Word of God with his own senses. Its impact is shattering because he knows how far his nation has drifted from its principles.

34:20, 21 Josiah knew that the scroll contained the Book of the Law of the Lord, but he did not know what to do about the words of wrath and judgment that it contained. our fathers have not kept … all that is written: Josiah wanted to know what God demanded of him because he fully intended to comply.

34:22 Huldah the prophetess is one of four female prophets named in the OT, the other three being Miriam (Ex. 15:20), Deborah (Judg. 4:4), and Noadiah (Neh. 6:14). Shallum's job was to supervise the storage and distribution of garments worn by the priests and Levites in the course of their duties. The second quarter was probably a suburb of Jerusalem near the Fish Gate north of the city (Zeph. 1:10).

34:23 Thus says the LORD indicates that Huldah's words were a prophecy.

34:24, 25 written in the book: Both Deuteronomy and Leviticus have long lists of blessings and curses attached to the covenant with Israel (Deut. 28; 29).

34:26–28 gather you to your fathers: In the context of the whole message, this was a promise that Josiah would die and be buried among his own people, not in a foreign land. Huldah's promise that Josiah would die in peace meant that he would be spared the calamity by which Judah would be judged. Josiah died in a time of war (35:23, 24), but that war was not the time of calamity. The calamity came later when Babylonian forces captured Jerusalem (36:17–20).

34:29, 30 The term Book of the Covenant refers to the Book of the Law of the Lord (v. 14), the Pentateuch. Josiah was about to lead the community in renewing the covenant. His reading of the scroll was part of his duties as king (Deut. 17:18–20).

34:31 Very few of the kings of Judah promised to follow the LORD as Josiah did. After David, only Joash, Hezekiah, and Josiah made such public commitments (23:3; 29:10; 1 Chr. 17:7–14). They stand head and shoulders above the other kings of Judah and Israel. The terms commandments, testimonies, and statutes were all technical terms referring to the covenant (Deut. 4:40, 45; 5:31; 6:1, 17).

34:32, 33 We know that Josiah's commitment to the Lord was real because he removed all the abominations. This included any and all idols that had been introduced by earlier kings.

35:1–3 Josiah's command to put the holy ark in the house means that the ark of the covenant had been removed from the temple. Who removed it and when is not known, but there were plenty of wicked kings who could have done so. no longer … on your shoulders: The only proper way for transporting the ark was by means of poles thrust through corner rings of the ark and borne on the shoulders of the Levites (Num. 4:5, 6; 1 Chr. 15:2). The fact that they were carrying it about shows that it had no regular place of storage. Manasseh's vehement opposition to God must have kept the ark in constant jeopardy. But once the temple had been cleansed and repaired, the ark could be returned to its place.

35:4 In preparation for the Passover the priests and Levites had to organize themselves by their assignments within divisions. The divisions were determined by the genealogical registers (1 Chr. 6:1–30). David set up the divisions before the temple was built (1 Chr. 23:3—26:32) and Solomon confirmed them (8:14).

35:5 The term holy place here refers to the whole temple area. The lay people could not enter the area where the great bronze altar stood, so the Levites represented them there by tribe, clan, and family units. In former times the heads of families offered their own Passover lambs and thus had access to the altar (Ex. 12:3), but by Josiah's time the responsibility for slaughter rested upon the Levites alone (30:15–20).

35:6 prepare them for your brethren: The Levites were standing in for the people in the sacrifice of the Passover lambs. This became the tradition from that time on, with the result that the priests gained influence and power.

35:7 Normally the people provided the Passover lambs and young goats from their own flocks (Ex. 12:3, 5), but Josiah was being generous (30:24). That Josiah gave thirty thousand of them means that the total number of people must have been 150,000 or more, as each household offered its own lamb or goat. The cattle were for the burnt offerings that went with this particular Passover (v. 12).

35:8 Hilkiah was the chief priest under Josiah (34:9).

35:9–11 The way the priests and Levites prepared the animals was in accord with Moses' instructions (Ex. 12:4, 8, 9, 21, 22).

35:12 This particular Passover included a time of fellowship and praise. The cattle were used for burnt offerings (vv. 7–9) for the celebration of the thank or peace offerings (Lev. 3:1–5). The offerer, his family, and the priests and Levites could all eat any Passover animals and burnt offerings that were sacrificed as thank offerings. The Passover of Josiah was an occasion for recalling the deliverance of Israel from Egypt (Ex. 12:24–27), and a time of great festive celebration of God's goodness in bringing reformation and renewal. The Book of Moses was probably the scroll that Hilkiah found in the temple (34:14, 15); Josiah's desire to conduct the Passover sprang from the discovery and reading of the book.

35:13 The other holy offerings, distinguished from the Passover offerings, were the cattle slaughtered for thank or peace offerings (v. 7).

35:14 Themselves refers to the Levites, who had helped the priests.

35:15 Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun headed up the Levitical musical divisions in the days of David (1 Chr. 15:17; 25:1). The day-long Passover celebration was accompanied by music.

35:16 It was most unusual to have such a combination of festivals and offerings all on the same day.

35:17 The Passover was held on the fourteenth day of the month Nisan (v. 1) and was followed for the next seven days by the Feast of Unleavened Bread, up through the twenty-first day of Nisan (30:21–23; Lev. 23:4–8; Num. 28:16–25; Deut. 16:1–8).

35:18 It had been almost four hundred years since the days of Samuel the prophet (1 Sam. 7:15–17). None of the kings had held so great a Passover in all that time (30:26).

35:19 Josiah was twenty-six years old (34:8) in the eighteenth year of his reign.

35:20 Located on the upper Euphrates River, Carchemish was one of the last strongholds of Assyria to resist the onslaught of the rising neo-Babylonian kingdom. The Babylonians and Medes were on their way to subdue Haran and Carchemish. Necho, more afraid of the Babylonians than the Assyrians, was hoping to get to Carchemish in time to assist his Assyrian allies in their time of peril. Josiah was an ally of Babylon, so he went to Megiddo (v. 22) to intercept the Egyptians and allow for the Babylonians to attack Haran and Carchemish without Egyptian interference.

35:21 The house is a reference to the Babylonians. God commanded me: God sometimes spoke to pagan rulers about a course of action He wanted them to take (36:22; Gen. 20:6; 41:25; Dan. 2:28). Necho did not know that the source of his divine leading was the God of Israel and not one of his own Egyptian deities. But God did direct him, displaying His sovereignty over even the wicked and unbelieving powers of this world (Is. 44:28—45:1).

35:22 The major route from Egypt to the upper Euphrates was the Via Maris or the Way of the Sea. This route went up the coast of Palestine before turning inland through the mountain pass at Megiddo. It crossed the Plains of Jezreel or Esdraelon, crossed the Jordan near the Sea of Galilee, and passed through Damascus where it joined the north-south route to upper Syria. Josiah's objective was to control the pass at Megiddo and dictate the movement of traffic through that vital point.

35:23, 24 As a godly successor of David, Josiah was buried with full honors in the royal tombs of his fathers in the City of David (32:33).

35:25–27 The book of the kings of Israel and Judah may have been the canonical book of 1 and 2 Kings.

(Heb. pesach) (2 Chr. 30:1, 35:1; Ex. 12:11, 43; Ezek. 45:21) Strong’s #6453: The name Passover is derived from the Hebrew word meaning “to pass” or “to leap over.” The festival was named in this way because it commemorated the time when God spared the firstborn of the Israelites, who sprinkled the blood from the Passover lamb on their doorposts. The Lord “passed over” the families so designated, not visiting their households with death (Ex. 12). So that the Israelites would not forget God’s mercy on them, the Law of Moses prescribed in detail the ritual for commemorating the Passover (Lev. 23:5–8; Num. 28:16–25; Deut. 16:1–8). King Hezekiah’s great Passover signaled spiritual renewal in Judah, including the removal of sin and impurity (30:14), joyful praise for God’s pardon (30:21–22), and a prolonged celebration of God’s blessing (30:23–26). Later Jesus celebrated this feast with His disciples (Matt. 26:2, 18), and in His death and resurrection He became its fulfillment, the ultimate Passover Lamb for our sins (John 1:29, 1 Cor. 5:7; 1 Pet. 1:19).

36:1, 2 The people of the land was a technical term that referred to a body of leaders such as a council of elders or a kind of informal parliament (33:25). This group acted in time of crisis, such as the death of Josiah in battle. His loss was made worse by the fact that he had at least four sons who could succeed him. Josiah may not have made his choice of successor clear. Johanan was the oldest son, followed by Jehoiakim, Zedekiah, and Shallum (1 Chr. 3:15). Shallum was the same as Jehoahaz (Jer. 22:11).

36:3 The king of Egypt was Necho (35:20). After Assyria's defeat at Haran and Carchemish, the Egyptian army withdrew south of the Euphrates to dominate Syria and Palestine. Judah became an Egyptian vassal state, which explains why Necho could depose Jehoahaz and require tribute. Judah had become a poor and weak nation, smaller by far than at any other time in its history. Josiah left them richer spiritually, but poorer financially.

36:4 Necho required the change of name in order to display his power over Eliakim.

36:5, 6 Nebuchadnezzar was the son of Nabopolassar, founder of the Neo-Babylonian or Chaldean empire. He was leading a campaign against Carchemish when he succeeded his father. He drove Egypt out of Syria and Palestine and took some Jewish captives, including Daniel, back to Babylon (Dan. 1:1). At the same time, Jehoiakim changed his loyalty from Necho to Nebuchadnezzar and remained a trusted vassal for three years (2 Kin. 24:1). But then Jehoiakim rebelled against Babylon, and in about 602 B.C. Nebuchadnezzar returned to Jerusalem to punish him. Nebuchadnezzar bound Jehoiakim to carry him off to Babylon. He did not actually take him away, since Jehoiakim reigned until about 598 B.C. and died of natural causes in Jerusalem (2 Kin. 24:6; Jer. 22:18, 19).

36:7–9 Nebuchadnezzar … carried off: The Babylonian king looted the temple of much of its treasure, fulfilling the prophecy made to Hezekiah a century earlier (32:31; 2 Kin. 20:17). His temple was the Esagila, the temple of Babylon's patron god Marduk.

36:10, 11 Zedekiah was the youngest of the four sons of Josiah and the third to rule over Judah (see v. 1). He became king by Nebuchadnezzar's appointment, showing Judah's status as a Babylonian vassal (v. 3).

36:12 Jeremiah was the famous prophet who composed the Book of Jeremiah, which includes his words to Zedekiah (Jer. 21:3–7; 32:5).

36:13 By 588 B.C. Zedekiah rebelled against King Nebuchadnezzar and, like his brother and nephew before him, invited swift Babylonian retribution. Nebuchadnezzar captured Jerusalem after a two-year siege (2 Kin. 25:1–3).

The Babylonians

Judah at its weakest was overrun by Babylonia at its strongest, when Nebuchadnezzar's troops captured Jerusalem dragging away Judah's young king in chains (2 Chr. 36:6). This attack, which occurred in about 599–597 B.C., was one of three major invasions of the land by the Babylonians.

Sargon and Hammurabi

Babylonia was an ancient empire located between the Tigris and Euphrates Rivers in southern Mesopotamia. Its capital, Babylon (Gen. 11:9), is said to have been founded by Nimrod, the son of Cush and the grandson of Ham (Gen. 10:8–12). Some believe that this ruler was King Sargon the Great, who united the people of Mesopotamia under his rule about 2300 B.C., establishing an empire that stretched from the Mediterranean coast and Asia Minor to Persia.

Around 2000 B.C., a king named Hammurabi emerged as the ruler of this region. One of his chief achievements was to establish a written system of laws, known today as the Code of Hammurabi. It was about this time that Abraham's family (Gen. 12:1) left Ur, a city in lower Babylon, and moved to Haran, a city in northwestern Mesopotamia. It was from Haran that the patriarch later migrated to Canaan in obedience to God (Gen. 12:4).

Babylonia itself was a long, narrow country, only about 40 miles wide at its widest point, but covering a total area of about 8,000 square miles. It was bordered on the north by Assyria, on the east by Elam, on the south and west by the Arabian desert, and on the southeast by the Persian Gulf.

From Assyria to Babylonia

Assyria's development was closely connected to Babylonia's history. In about 1270 B.C., the Assyrians overpowered their southern neighbors, and for the next 700 years, the Assyrians dominated the ancient world. But in about 626 B.C., a Babylonian leader named Nabopolassar finally won his nation's independence from Assyria, and Babylonia again began to become a great empire. The Babylonians finally overthrew their rivals in 612 B.C. by capturing the Assyrian capital of Nineveh (Jon. 1:2). This opened the way for Nabopolassar's son Nebuchadnezzar to turn Babylon into the world's next great empire, and to expand the capital city of Babylon into one of the world's leading cities.

Nebuchadnezzar ordered the destruction of Jerusalem in 586 B.C., and carried away the leading citizens of Judah to exile. But during this period of captivity, the Persians emerged as a world power, and the Babylonian empire passed from the scene.

36:14 The abominations of the nations refers primarily to idolatry and all the immorality and perversity that went with it. God's covenant with Israel required them to be different from the nations in this key respect (Ex. 23:24; Lev. 26:1; Deut. 4:15–20, 25–28, 18:9–14; 27:14, 15).

36:15 God's messengers were the prophets He had sent from the beginning of Israel's history.

36:16 no remedy: This does not mean that God had run out of options and had exhausted His ability to save. It suggests, rather, that He operates within certain predetermined parameters of response. Within that framework He forgave and restored His people over and over again. Finally they had stepped across the boundaries of His grace in history and had disqualified themselves from any further consideration. The point of no return had been reached. What did remain, however, was a final expression of divine initiative in days yet future, one hinted at in the decree of Cyrus (v. 23) and more fully spelled out in the prophets (Lev. 26:40–45; Isa. 40:1, 2; 49:14–23; Jer. 31:1–40; Ezek. 36:16—39:29; Zech. 14:1–21).

36:17–19 The king of the Chaldeans (Babylonians) was Nebuchadnezzar, who reigned from 605 to 562 B.C. He became an instrument of God's judgment all through Judah's last years and well into the Exile (Dan. 2:37, 38; 5:18, 19).

36:20 until the rule of the kingdom of Persia: Cyrus conquered Babylon in 539 B.C. and allowed the Jews to return to Jerusalem the following year.

36:21 In two places (Jer. 25:12; 29:10), Jeremiah predicted the Exile and its length (Dan 9:2). Sabbaths: According to the Law of Moses the land was to lie fallow every seventh year (Lev. 25:4). This became known as the sabbatical year. Judah's exile in Babylon allowed the land to enjoy the Sabbaths it had missed (Lev. 26:33–35).

36:22 The first year of Cyrus refers to his first year of rule over Babylon, not his first year over Media and Persia. He began to rule Media and Persia in 550 B.C. Twelve years later he brought Babylon under his control and issued his famous decree, known from the OT (here and Ezra 1:2–4) and from the Cylinder of Cyrus. This was his first year of involvement with the Jewish people. Jeremiah's seventy years were from about 609 to 539 B.C. the LORD stirred up: Cyrus was both a mighty monarch and the instrument by whom God delivered His people from exile, returned them to their land, and rebuilt the temple (Is. 44:28—45:1).

36:23 the LORD God … has given me: According to his own account on the Cylinder of Cyrus, the god who called and blessed Cyrus was Marduk, chief deity of the Babylonian pantheon of gods. Since that document was for Babylonian readers, his reference to Marduk is understandable. The Bible attributes his success to the living Lord. It was God Himself who gave Cyrus sovereignty, who commanded him to rebuild the Jerusalem temple, and who had inspired him to release the Jews to their own country. It is not likely that Cyrus was a convert to Judaism. Like Nebuchadnezzar (Dan. 2:47; 3:28, 29; 4:34–37) and Darius the Mede (Dan. 6:26, 27), Cyrus was willing to include Israel's God among the gods he recognized and extolled. The temple and the holy city lay in ruins, but God was not done yet. He was about to bring His people back to the land and to revive His promises to save and restore them.

The Book of Ezra

———— THE BOOK OF EZRA IS A REMARKABLE WITNESS to God's faithfulness to His people. With Nehemiah, Ezra describes the events leading to the Judeans return from captivity in Babylon and the discouraging experiences of that small community in the harsh world of the Promised Land. But through every experience God proved Himself faithful. Through the leadership of Ezra and Zerubbabel, God fulfilled His promises announced by His prophets to restore His people from Babylon, to rebuild the temple at Jerusalem, and to renew their hope that the Davidic kingdom would be restored.

In 539 B.C., Cyrus of Persia defeated the Babylonian empire. Unlike the Babylonian kings before him, Cyrus allowed captive peoples to return to their homelands and live by their traditions and reestablish the worship of their own gods. At the same time, all these peoples remained an integral part of the Persian empire, subject to the emperor.

The Jewish people had been exiled to Babylon in three stages, and they returned with the permission of the Persians in three stages. Zerubbabel led the first group of returning Israelites (538 B.C.) and started to rebuild the temple (chs. 1—6). The priest Ezra led the second group (458 B.C.) and instituted a number of reforms (chs. 7—10). Finally, Nehemiah led the third group (444 B.C.) and rebuilt the wall around Jerusalem (Neh. 1—6).

Work on the restoration of the temple began in the reign of Cyrus (536 B.C.), extended through the time of Cambyses, and was completed in the sixth year of Darius I (515 B.C.). The reforming careers of Ezra and Nehemiah spanned the reigns of Artaxerxes Longimanus (464–424 B.C.) and Darius II (423–405 B.C.).

The books of Ezra and Nehemiah are one work in the Hebrew Bible and should be studied together for a better understanding of the return of the Babylonian exiles to Jerusalem. The combined narrative presents the story of the exiles' return in two time periods, each marked by two prominent leaders: rebuilding the temple under Zerubbabel and Joshua the priest (538–515 B.C.) and restoring the worship of God and rebuilding Jerusalem's walls under Ezra and Nehemiah (458–420 B.C.).

Yet the Book of Ezra is not simply a string of historical facts about the returning exiles, for the narrative shows how God fulfilled His promises announced by the prophets. He brought His people back from Babylon, rebuilt the temple at Jerusalem, restored the patterns of true worship, and even preserved the reassembled community from fresh relapses into heathen customs and idolatrous worship. Through the prophets and leaders He had called, the Lord had preserved and cultivated a small group of returning exiles, the remnant of Israel.

The extraordinary reality of God's promised restoration of His people (Jer. 27:22) is recorded in detail in the Book of Ezra. The remnant did not merely return to the devastated ruins of Jerusalem; they came back with a hope, placed in their hearts by God, to rebuild the nation. With godly determination, they rebuilt the temple. Then the Lord sent Ezra and Nehemiah to exhort them to obey His Law wholeheartedly. While the people were rebuilding Jerusalem's walls, God was rebuilding their hearts so that they would truly obey and worship Him. The restoration of the remnant was a complete restoration. The message for Ezra's day—as well as for our own—is that the God of Israel is faithful to His promises. He will completely restore His people when they come back to Him.

The Book of Ezra does not name its author, but Jewish tradition ascribes the book to Ezra along with the books of Chronicles and Nehemiah. Modern scholars generally agree with this tradition. Despite some dissimilarities, Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah form a connected work. The themes of the temple and the Levites, and the focus on lists, appear in all three books. In the Hebrew Bible, Ezra and Nehemiah are one book. Thus it seems that one author compiled all three books.

The fact that Ezra is the principal character of major sections of Ezra lends some credibility to his authorship of this book. Ezra participates in the events described in the second half of Ezra (chs. 7—10), as well as in events described in a portion of the Book of Nehemiah (chs. 8—10). Both passages are written in the first person and provide detailed descriptions. Such vivid descriptions point to an eyewitness as the author. It is generally agreed that these chapters at least were drawn directly from Ezra's memoirs.

On the other hand, the first half of Ezra records events that occurred nearly sixty years before Ezra returned to Judah. If Ezra compiled the book, he had to consult other sources for those passages. In fact, much of the Book of Ezra consists of information obtained from other official sources: (1) the decree of Cyrus (1:2–4), (2) the list of the articles of the temple (1:9–11), (3) the list of those who returned to Jerusalem (2:2–58), (4) the letter to Artaxerxes (4:11–16), (5) the reply of Artaxerxes (4:17–22), (6) the report of Tattenai (5:7–17), (7) the decree of Cyrus (6:2–5), (8) the reply of Darius (6:6–8), (9) the genealogy of Ezra (7:1–5), (10) the authorization of Artaxerxes (7:12–26), (11) the list of the heads of the clans (8:1–14), and (12) the list of those involved in mixed marriages. Over half of the Book of Ezra consists of official documents and lists.

Moreover, the book is written in two languages. Most of the royal correspondence in the book is written in Aramaic, the international language of the Persian world, while the narrative sections are in Hebrew. In conclusion, the Book of Ezra is the work of a compiler, and that compiler certainly could have been the scribe Ezra.

Cyrus, The King of Persia

One hundred forty years before Cyrus issued the decree allowing the Israelites to return to their homeland, Isaiah prophesied that a man named Cyrus would issue such an order (Is. 44:28; 45:1). More than a century before Cyrus the Great, the founder of the Persian empire and the Achaemenid dynasty, was born, Isaiah called him by name! Indeed, Isaiah reported the word of God to this effect: "I have even called you by your name; I have named you, though you have not known Me" (Is. 45:4). Josephus, a first-century Jewish historian, would later assert that Cyrus was shown the prophecy of Isaiah recorded in Is. 44:28—45:1 and "an earnest desire and ambition seized upon (Cyrus) to fulfill what was written." (Antiq. 11:1.1). If this story is true, it is possible that Daniel was the one who showed Cyrus Isaiah's prophecy (Dan. 6:28; 9:1, 2; 10:1).

Certainly Cyrus's decrees might have been part of a clever military strategy. At this point, he had not yet conquered Egypt. A strong settlement of loyal people between him and the Egyptians would have been wise. This was a novel political policy; for the first time in hundreds of years a king permitted a subjected people to return to their homeland. But the point of Scriptures is to assert that God was at work through this powerful ruler of the ancient world. He spoke to Cyrus through His Word (v. 2) and moved Cyrus in his inner spirit (v. 1). Through Cyrus, God was accomplishing His own will: to graciously deliver His people from captivity.

1:1 The first year of Cyrus is the first year of his rule over Babylon. In 539 B.C. Cyrus the Great, founder of the greater Persian empire, conquered Babylon without a struggle. He ruled as king of Persia from 559–530 B.C. the word of the LORD by … Jeremiah: Jeremiah had prophesied that the Babylonian captivity would last 70 years (Jer. 25:11; 29:10), after which the Lord would judge Babylon (Jer. 25:12–14). Cyrus's proclamation was probably shouted by heralds in the principal towns of the empire and posted in public. put it in writing: The proclamation was also preserved in the official records in Persia (6:1).

1:2 the LORD God of heaven: After the destruction of Jerusalem, God was no longer identified with the temple as the One who dwelt between the cherubim (1 Sam. 4:4; 2 Sam. 6:2). The Persians could understand that there was a particular "God of Israel," but they would have recognized Him as simply one god among others. However, the phrase God of heaven indicates that the Lord is not just another god, but that only He is God. The fact that Cyrus used this title for the Lord suggests that He was prompted by Jewish advisors. He has commanded me to build Him a house at Jerusalem: Over one hundred years before Cyrus issued this decree, Isaiah prophesied that the king would make such an order (Is. 44:28; 45:1).

1:3 He is God: It is likely that Cyrus was speaking as a polytheist who merely recognized that the God of Israel should be worshiped in Jerusalem.

1:4 let the men of his place help him: The assistance that the Israelites were to receive from their non-Jewish neighbors in rebuilding the temple is reminiscent of the help an earlier generation received from the Egyptians before the Exodus (Ex. 12:35, 36). In a sense, the return to Jerusalem to rebuild the temple was a second Exodus (Is. 43:14–21; 48:20, 21).

1:5 Moved here translates the same Hebrew word as stirred in v. 1. The verb means "to rouse" or "to stir up" (Is. 45:13; Hag. 1:14; Zech. 4:1).

1:6 All those who were around included non-Jewish neighbors (v. 3) as well as Jews who wanted to stay in Babylon.

1:7 King Cyrus also brought: The people who returned to Jerusalem were helped not only by their neighbors, but by the king himself. Cyrus ordered the return of the temple articles that had been taken by Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kin. 24:1–7, 11–13; 25:8–17; 2 Chr. 36:5–7, 9, 10, 13–19; Dan. 1:2).

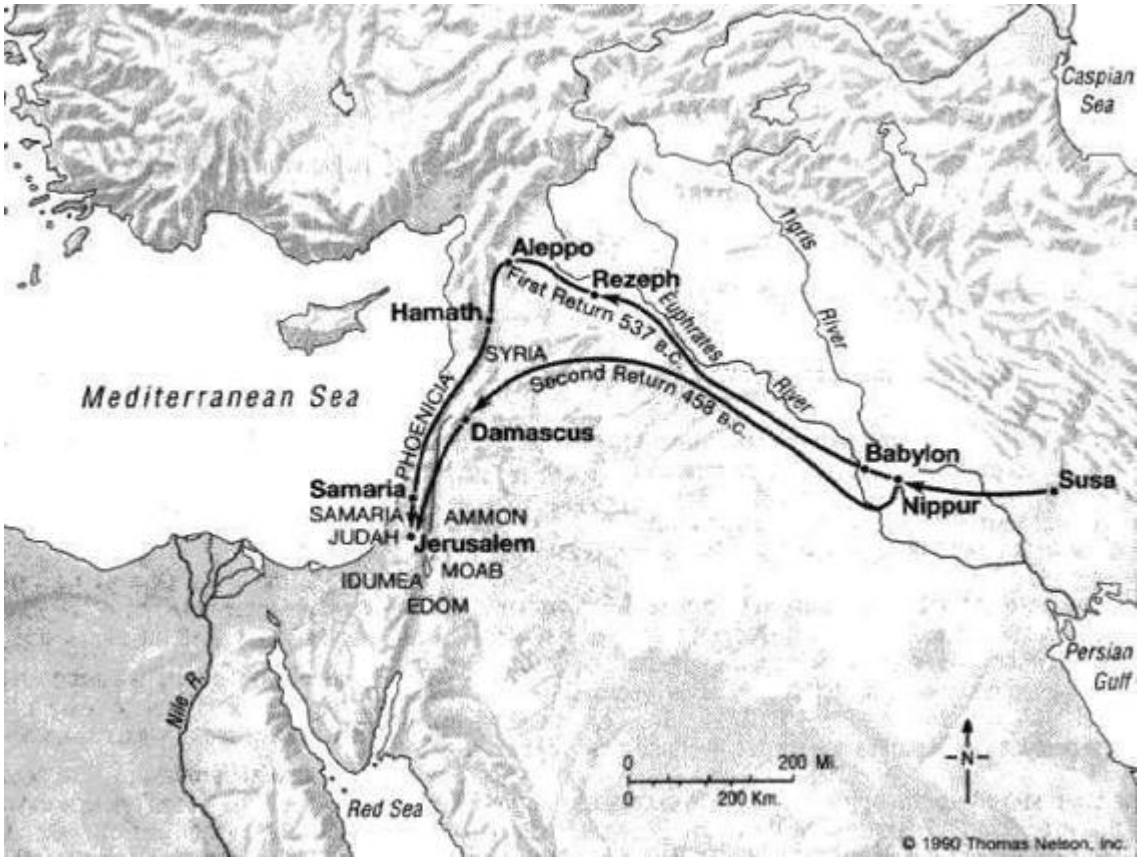
1:8 Mithredath the treasurer: not the same as the Mithredath in 4:7. The name Sheshbazzar occurs only in two passages (vv. 8–11; 5:14–16), both related to official Persian actions. On the other hand, the name Zerubbabel is used in passages related to Jewish activity. Ezra 5:2, 16 appear to identify Sheshbazzar and Zerubbabel. It is possible that Sheshbazzar was a name by which Zerubbabel was known in Persian circles. There are two other possibilities. (1) Some suggest that Sheshbazzar died and his work was continued by Zerubbabel. (2) Others suggest that Sheshbazzar is another name for Shenazzar (1 Chr. 3:18), an uncle of Zerubbabel. The prince of Judah means he was in the Davidic royal line. Zerubbabel was the grandson of King Jehoiakim. In 1 Chr. 3:17–19 he is called the son of Pedaiah instead of Shealtiel. It may be that Shealtiel died childless and his brother Pedaiah married his widow, following the custom of levirate marriage (Deut. 25:5–10; 1 Chr. 3:18).

1:9–11 The separate items listed in vv. 9, 10 total 2,499. However, the total for all the articles given in v. 11 is 5,400. Probably vv. 9, 10 list only the larger and more important items that were transported back to Jerusalem.



The Return from Exile

When Cyrus the Persian captured Babylon in 539 B.C., the way was opened for captive Judah to begin the return to her homeland. The edict of Cyrus in 538 B.C. allowed Jewish exiles not only to return to Judah, but also to rebuild the temple. While there were probably several caravans of returning exiles, two major expeditions are reported. The first led by Sheshbazzar occurred soon after the edict, possibly in 537 B.C. The traditional date of the second return led by Ezra is 458 B.C.

2:1–70 Here are the names and numbers of the Jewish people who decided to return to Jerusalem (vv. 1–67), as well as the offering and occupancy of the returnees (vv. 68–70). Except for a few variations the content of this chapter is reproduced in Neh. 7:6–73 (vv. 1, 2, 64, 69 for differences).

2:1 The people of the province refers to the Jewish people of Judah (5:8; Neh. 1:2, 3; 11:3). The use of this phrase probably indicates that the register of ch. 2 was compiled in Babylon. Nehemiah's list in Neh. 7:4–73 would have been compiled after he arrived in Jerusalem, which could account for some of the differences between the two registers. His own city means the city where a person's family had lived.

2:2 The men listed in this verse were the leaders of the expedition. Jeshua was Joshua the high priest (Hag. 1:1; Zech. 3:1). Nehemiah, listed as a leader here, was not the same man who rebuilt the wall of Jerusalem ninety years later. Mordecai was not the man of the same name who figures so prominently in the Book of Esther. Nehemiah gives a similar list (Neh. 7:7), with some differences of spelling and an extra leader Nahamani on the list. Those who returned to Jerusalem are called the people of Israel and not Judah, because all twelve tribes of Israel were represented.

2:3–20 These verses contain the names and numbers of the families who returned to Jerusalem. It may be that these were the people whose homes were in the city of Jerusalem itself.

2:21–35 These verses list the returnees according to their cities. Note that Jerusalem is not listed. Perhaps the registry dealt first with the inhabitants of Jerusalem (vv. 2–20) and then focused on those outside Jerusalem.

2:36–39 The total number of priests listed is 4,289. This was about ten percent of the returning remnant. As teachers of the Law and as the ones who led worship in the new temple, the priests were indispensable to the reestablishment of the temple services. If God's work was to be restored, there had to be religious instruction and there had to be true worship.

2:40 The Levites assisted the priests in the temple and in teaching the people the Law (Neh. 8:7–9). Compared to the number of priests who returned to Jerusalem (vv. 36–39), it is striking how few Levites were with them (other Levites are included in the special lists of vv. 41, 42). According to 1 Chr. 23:4, 24,000 Levites were involved in the worship of God during the time of David.

2:41 The singers were Levites who had the responsibility of praising God with music (1 Chr. 15:16). Though only 128 singers returned to Jerusalem, at one time there had been as many as four thousand people who "praised the Lord with musical instruments" in Solomon's temple (1 Chr. 23:5).

2:42 The gatekeepers, who were also Levites (1 Chr. 26:1–19), prevented unauthorized people from entering the restricted area of the temple. There were 139 gatekeepers in the return to Jerusalem under Zerubbabel; compare that figure to the four thousand gatekeepers who guarded the temple during the time of Solomon (1 Chr. 23:5).

2:43–50 Nethinim means "Given Ones" or "Dedicated Ones." In 1 Chr. 9:2, the Nethinim are distinguished from the priests and the Levites. Jewish tradition identifies the Nethinim with the Gibeonites who had been assigned by Joshua to assist the Levites in more menial tasks (Josh. 9:27).

2:51–55 The sons of Solomon's servants are linked with the Nethinim (v. 43). The numbers of the two groups are totaled together (v. 58; Neh. 7:60). The sons of Solomon's servants were probably descendants of the inhabitants of Canaan at the time of Solomon—that is, descendants of the Amorites, Hittites, Perizzites, Hivites, and Jebusites whom Solomon had hired to build the temple (1 Kin. 5:13).

2:56–63 Although these people could not prove their Jewish origin, they were permitted to return to Jerusalem. But without genealogies they were excluded from the priesthood, according to the Law of Moses (Num. 16:1–40). The governor Zerubbabel was careful to follow the Law by declaring that the would-be priests should not eat of the most holy things, meaning that they should not participate in priestly functions. The Urim and Thummim were sacred lots that were used to determine God's will (Ex. 28:30).

2:64 forty-two thousand three hundred and sixty: The individual numbers listed in ch. 2 add up to only 29,818. It is possible that the larger total includes women, who are not named in the lists.

2:65 The singers listed here were not the temple choir of v. 41. These were professional singers employed for banquets, feasts, and funerals (2 Chr. 35:25; Eccl. 2:7, 8). Their presence could be an indication of luxury (2 Sam. 19:35). It appears that many of the Jewish people had achieved some prosperity while living in Babylon. The Jews had not been enslaved in exile; they had only been restricted from returning to their land.

2:66 The large number of horses listed here also suggests affluence among those who returned to Jerusalem. Prior to this time, horses in Israel had been used only for war and ceremonies. Only the very rich and well-armed owned horses. The rich also rode mules, for they were scarce in Israel.

2:67 The beasts of burden were camels and donkeys. Camels were expensive; the poorer classes rode donkeys.

2:68 when they came to the house of the LORD: The first thing that many of the returnees did when they reached Jerusalem was to contribute to the rebuilding of the temple. Offerings were brought even before the people settled in their houses (v. 70).

IN CONTEXT

New Reasons for Taking a Census

Census data has been used by governments throughout history for a variety of purposes: for example, to draft soldiers for military service, to collect tax revenue, and to conscript laborers for public works projects. When a census was taken of the Jews who returned to Palestine from Babylon (Ezra 2:1), the results were put to several new and interesting purposes: (1) To return properties to their rightful owners. Generations earlier, Moses had taken a census of the Israelites as they prepared to enter Canaan, to obtain data to be used to divide the land among the tribes of Israel (Num. 26). Later, when the people took possession of the land, they settled in their allotted territories (Josh. 13—19).

From that time forward, each family's land was intended to stay in the family. In fact, an intricate set of laws was established to ensure that no family lost its land permanently. Thus when the exiles returned, it was important that they be able to trace their lineage in order to verify their claims to family lands or, in the case of priests and Levites, to Levitical cities (Ezra 2:3–58). Certain priests who could not prove their heritage were made to wait until a priest could consult God as to their status (2:59–63; Neh. 7:61–65).

(2) To collect resources for rebuilding the temple. Indirectly, the census became an occasion for the returnees to give a freewill offering that was used toward the building of a new temple (Ezra 2:68, 69).

(3) To redevelop and repopulate Jerusalem. Several years after this census was taken, Nehemiah reviewed it when he realized how empty Jerusalem was (Neh. 7:4, 5). Then the people cast lots in such a way that one-tenth of the population of Judah was relocated to the capital city in order to reclaim its public life (11:1, 2).

2:69 Ezra records the amount of gold, silver, and garments given for the rebuilding of the temple, as does Nehemiah (Neh. 7:70–72). However, the two sets of figures do not match. Apparently Ezra's list rounds off the figures, while Nehemiah's list presents them in more precise detail. It is also possible that the two lists give totals from different times of collection —perhaps in Babylon and then later in Jerusalem. Drachmas were Persian gold coins that weighed about two-tenths of an ounce, the weight of a quarter. Five thousand minas were about 6,300 pounds of silver.

2:70 priests … Levites … and all Israel: This indicates that representatives from the whole nation (the twelve tribes) were now back in the land. The process was in motion whereby God's promises could begin to be fulfilled. There is messianic hope in the expression "all Israel."

3:1 The seventh month was sacred to the Jewish people. The first day of the month was the Feast of Trumpets (Num. 29:1–6), the tenth day was the Day of Atonement (Num. 29:7–11), and the fifteenth day was the Feast of Tabernacles (Num. 29:12–38). as one man: The people had come with the common desire of worshiping God (v. 9).

3:2, 3 Jeshua was the same person as the priest Joshua (Hag. 1:1; Zech. 3:1); his father's name Jozadak was also spelled Jehozadak (1 Chr. 6:14; Hag. 1:1).

3:4 In obedience to God's Word, the Israelites observed the Feast of Tabernacles or Booths, which commemorated the earlier generation's wanderings in the wilderness (Num. 29:13–38).

3:5, 6 The regular burnt offerings were the daily burnt offerings, the morning and evening sacrifices (Ex. 29:38–42). The offerings for the New Moons were not a set feast in Lev. 23, but they were part of Israel's worship (2 Kin. 4:23; Amos 8:5). The appointed feasts of Lev. 23 included: (1) the Sabbath (v. 3), (2) the Passover (v. 5) followed by Unleavened Bread (vv. 6–8), (3) the Feast of Firstfruits (vv. 9–14); (4) the Feast of Weeks (vv. 15–22), (5) the Feast of Trumpets (vv. 23–25), (6) the Day of Atonement (vv.26–32), the Feast of Tabernacles (vv. 33–44). According to 2 Chr. 8:13, the appointed feasts were the three great annual Feasts of Unleavened Bread (along with Passover), Weeks, and Tabernacles; likely it is this listing that is what is intended here. The freewill offering was made on the feast days (Deut. 16:10, 16, 17) and whenever any of the Jewish people desired (Num. 15:3).

3:7 When Solomon built the first temple, he purchased materials from Sidon and Tyre, had them shipped to Joppa, and paid for them with grain, wine, and oil (2 Chr. 2:10–16).

3:8, 9 The construction of Solomon's temple had begun in the second month of the year (1 Kin. 6:1). Likewise, construction of the second temple began in the second month. from twenty years old and above: The Law had required that Levites be at least thirty years old before they entered into service (Num. 4:1–3). Later, the minimum age was reduced to twenty-five (Num. 8:24). Finally, David lowered the minimum age to twenty (1 Chr. 23:24, 27). The lower minimum age allowed more Levites to enter into temple service. This provision was vital in view of the small number of Levites who made the trip back to Jerusalem (2:40).

3:10, 11 The returnees to Jerusalem celebrated laying the temple's foundation in almost the same way that the previous generation had celebrated the first temple (2 Chr. 5:13). Two choruses were sung responsively. One group sang For He is good; the other group responded with For His mercy endures forever (Neh. 12:31).

3:12, 13 Solomon's temple had been destroyed in 586 B.C., and this scene took place fifty years later. The old men could remember the grandeur of the first temple, and they wept.

4:1 The adversaries of Judah were the Samaritans. Esarhaddon (v. 2), who ruled Assyria from 681–669 B.C., had transported the conquered people of the northern kingdom to other lands. He then brought people from other lands into Palestine. These foreigners intermarried with the Hebrews who were left in the land. Their offspring became the Samaritans. Judah and Benjamin: The southern kingdom of Judah is called the nation of Judah and Simeon. The southern kingdom also included land from Benjamin, in which Jerusalem was located.

4:2 we seek your God as you do: The Samaritans did not use the proper name for God—that is, Yahweh—perhaps suggesting that their understanding of the Lord was still quite poor. As a result, they presented the threat of syncretism, or mixing true worship of God with the worship of false gods. This was the sin that had led to the deportation of the Israelites in the first place.

4:3 You may do nothing with us is not a rude rebuff; it is a righteous refusal. The people offering help were not friends, but adversaries (v. 1). They may have sacrificed to the Lord, but they were idolatrous at the same time (2 Kin. 17:29–35).

4:4, 5 The people of the land is another way of referring to the Samaritans, who became active enemies of Israel's rebuilding program for the next several years. The Samaritans troubled the Jewish people, perhaps with threats and attempts to cut off their supplies. The Samaritans then hired counselors, or lawyers, probably to represent them against the Jewish community at the Persian court. The Samaritans persisted in these attacks until the reign of Darius as much as fourteen years later.

4:6 When Darius I died (486 B.C.), his son Ahasuerus reigned (485–465 B.C.). Ahasuerus's Greek name was Xerxes. He is the same king who appears in the Book of Esther. At the beginning of his reign, the Samaritans wrote him a letter hoping to stop the Jews from completing work on the temple. Apparently nothing was accomplished by the letter.

4:7, 8 Artaxerxes Longimanus (464–424 B.C.) succeeded his father Xerxes. He too received a letter from the Samaritans against the Jews (v. 6). The letter was written in Aramaic script, and translated, or read aloud in Aramaic. Like the Samaritans' letter to Ahasuerus, this letter evidently was ignored.

4:8—6:18 This passage was written in Aramaic.

4:9, 10 The point of these two verses is that the Samaritan letter reflected the views of the whole province. The beginning of the letter, filled with rhetoric and flourish, was designed to bring political pressure on the Persian king. Osnapper was probably another name for Ashurbanipal, the king of Assyria (669–626 B.C.) who completed the transplanting begun by Esarhaddon (v. 2). The River is the Euphrates.

4:11 Your servants is a technical term for vassals. By including this term in the introduction of the letter, the men were assuring the king of their allegiance and were reporting the rebellion of the Jewish people. And so forth may mean "and now" (v. 10).

4:12, 13 the rebellious and evil city: The rebellion to which the Samaritans referred was the long period of siege the armies of Babylon were compelled to undertake against Israel. finishing its walls: The Jews perhaps had begun construction on the walls but were nowhere near completing them. They were not finished until many years later (Neh. 6).

4:14, 15 The Samaritans suggested that the king search his official records to see if Jerusalem had been destroyed in the past because of rebellion. Indeed it had. Nebuchadnezzar had conquered Jerusalem years before because it had rebelled against him.

4:16 The Samaritan letter concluded with a warning that if the king did not stop the Jews, he would lose not only income, but also dominion over Jerusalem and the region beyond the Euphrates River.

4:17 In this context, the word peace is used of the treaty relationship that existed between the king and his vassals (5:7).

4:18 clearly: Here the Aramaic word meparash is close to the Hebrew word meporash in Neh. 8:8, translated "distinctly." A nuance of this word means "to explain more fully." The letter therefore was read and explained quite fully to the king.

4:19 A search of the king's official records confirmed the Samaritans' allegation of rebellion and sedition on the part of the people of Jerusalem, no doubt referring to the revolts under Jehoiakim, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah (2 Kin. 24:1–20). The fact that these revolts were against the Babylonians and not against the Persians was not important. The Persians had become the heirs of the Babylonian empire, and they would take such a report seriously.

4:20 The Persian king also found out that Jewish kings had ruled over a large region. David and Solomon had both possessed a great sphere of rule.

Subsequent kings had aspired to the former glory of David and Solomon.

4:21, 22 The Persian king Artaxerxes ordered the Jewish people to cease their work on the temple. However, he left open the possibility of a future change in policy. Years later at the request of Nehemiah the decision was reviewed (Neh. 2:1–8).

4:23, 24 By force may suggest that the enforcers of the king's edict demolished the part of the wall that had been repaired. This would have been part of the rubble that Nehemiah discovered when he arrived in Jerusalem (Neh. 2:12–16).

"Jews"

(Heb. yehudi) (Ezra 5:1; 6:7; Dan. 3:8) Strong's #3062: The name "Jew" is popularly associated with the verb yadah (meaning "to praise" or "to give thanks"), on the basis of Jacob's blessing upon his son Judah in Gen. 49:8: "Judah you are he whom your brothers shall praise." Thus a Jew may be a person from the tribe of Judah (Num. 10:14). Later the name Jew was applied directly to those Israelites living in the geographical region known as Judah (Jer 7:30). The use of the name Jew for the Israelites as a people group became prominent during the postexilic period. This use is found in the NT as well: Jesus is called "the King of the Jews" (Matt. 27:29). In his letter to the Romans, Paul states that the true Jew is a person marked by "circumcision of the heart" (Rom 2:28, 29).

5:1 Haggai, who wrote the OT book that bears his name, began his ministry in August, 520 B.C. (Hag. 1:1). Zechariah, a prophet who also wrote an OT book, began his prophetic ministry in October or November of the same year (Zech. 1:1). The Jews had been forced to stop working on the temple (4:24). Now years later, God revived His work. He instructed His prophets to prophesy, and He expected His people to respond in faith and action. The phrase who was over them is a reminder of the sovereignty of God. No king other than the Lord Himself commanded His people.

5:2 Zerubbabel the civil governor and Jeshua (also known as Joshua) the high priest led the people once again in rebuilding the temple. The prophets Haggai and Zechariah joined in this call to action.

5:3 When the temple rebuilding resumed, resistance renewed. Tattenai was a regional governor. Since there were only twenty regional governors called satraps in the Persian empire (8:36), it may be assumed that Tattenai was a very powerful man. Zerubbabel, as governor of the small district of Judah, was under the authority of Tattenai (1:8). The position of Shethar-Boznai is not described, but he was probably an aide or a secretary to Tattenai. The regional governor and his staff personally visited Jerusalem.

5:4 The official delegation of Tattenai asked who had commanded the work on the temple to be done (v. 3). The answer in this verse gives the names of the men who were constructing the temple, but not the name of the one who commanded the work to be done.

5:5 The eye of their God is a way of speaking of the sovereignty and providence of God (v. 1): God was protecting and watching over those who obeyed His command. The governor decided that he would not stop the work on the temple until an answer was returned from the king. In other words, Tattenai checked out the Jewish leaders' version of what was taking place.

5:6 The governor sent his inquiring letter to King Darius (who ruled from 521–486 B.C.). The fact that Tattenai contacted the emperor shows that despite his own considerable power, he still had to proceed under the process of Persian custom and law.

5:7, 8 The walls described in Tattenai's letter were the walls of the temple, not the walls of the city. Timber was used for the beams of the temple floor and roof. Most of the temple construction was done with massive stones, but beams and slats were also used.

5:9, 10 The officials had originally asked two questions (v. 4). They wanted to know who was responsible for the construction, not just the names of the people doing the work.

5:11 In his report to Darius, Tattenai indicated that he had learned a great deal from the Jews about their history and destiny, including a reference to a great king, that is, Solomon.

5:12 Though the Jewish people acknowledged that Nebuchadnezzar destroyed the first temple, they traced the cause not to his power, but to their sin and ultimately to God's judgment. Tattenai's use of the title God of heaven is perhaps an unwitting acknowledgment of the reality and sovereignty of God.

5:13–16 This portion of Tattenai's letter to King Cyrus describes the events that led to the official Persian decree to rebuild the temple (1:1–4). Note that the delay described in ch. 4 is not mentioned here. Sheshbazzar may have been the Persian name for Zerubbabel. Alternatively he may have been the Jewish prince who was first appointed to lead the temple rebuilding efforts, but who did not survive and was replaced by Zerubbabel (1:8).

5:17 Apparently the king's treasure house contained the official records as well as the treasury. Tattenai's request to find the original decree issued by King Cyrus delayed the rebuilding. The trip from Jerusalem to Babylon (7:9) took eight months. The search for official documents also took time. The entire process could have taken as long as a year.

6:1, 2 At the suggestion of Tattenai and his aides (5:17), King Darius ordered his staff to search the official records in the archives, or "house of the books," to see whether Cyrus had authorized the rebuilding of the temple at Jerusalem. Apparently nothing was found in Babylon, and the search moved on to Achmetha, the summer residence of the Persian kings.

INSIGHT

State-Established Religion?

In many countries, Christians are a minority and struggle with how to live under unsympathetic or oppressive governments. By contrast, the Jews of Ezra's day, who were a minority in the Persian empire, enjoyed enough freedom to return to their homeland and rebuild their temple (Ezra 6:3, 6, 7). The Persian state officially sanctioned their religion and contributed resources toward the temple project (6:4, 8–10).There are quite different opinions worldwide on the issue of state-supported religion. But whether or not governments support Christians, Scripture exhorts Christians everywhere to pray for the governments under which they live (1 Tim. 2:1, 2).

6:3–5 King Darius began his reply to Tattenai by quoting from the decree of King Cyrus. Cyrus's public proclamation can be found in 1:2–4. its height sixty cubits and its width sixty cubits: Though the complete dimensions are not given, it is likely that the second temple was built on the foundation stones that were still in place from the time of Solomon (1 Kin. 6:2). The three rows of heavy stones and one row of new timber describes the construction of the wall of the inner court (1 Kin. 6:36). The heavy stones that had aroused Tattenai's suspicion (5:8) were expressly authorized.

6:6, 7 therefore: Based on the discovery of the decrees of Cyrus, King Darius issued an order of his own. He concluded that what the Jewish people were doing was legal and that the regional government should stop opposing them.

6:8–10 Moreover: King Darius endorsed Cyrus' order and added his own decree. taxes on the region beyond the River: Not only could Tattenai not stop reconstruction of the temple, he also had to fund its completion.

Hanged on a Timber

The idea of hanging a violator of Darius' decree on a timber from the person's house (Ezra 6:11) may be a reference not to rope hanging but to something like crucifixion. The Persians were known to use impalement as a means of execution, a cruel practice that they inherited from the Assyrians, who were vicious warriors even for those days.

6:11, 12 Also I issue a decree: To ensure obedience, Darius decreed that violation of his order would be punished by death. Hanged does not mean hanged by the neck from a rope. It refers to impaling the dead body of the condemned on a pole as a public display and a grim warning to others.

6:13 Tattenai diligently carried out the king's orders. There is no indication that Tattenai mistreated the Jews in any way.

6:14 and they prospered: God blessed the people because they listened to the prophets and the preaching of the Word of God. Artaxerxes (464–424 B.C.) did assist the rebuilding of the temple, although it was completed years before Artaxerxes came to power. Artaxerxes contributed to the welfare of the temple by issuing a decree regarding its maintenance (7:15, 21).

6:15 The temple was completed in 515 B.C. in Adar, the month of February-March.

6:16 celebrated … with joy: Some people have suggested that Pss. 145—148 was used to celebrate the completion of the rebuilding of the temple.

6:17 As was the case with the dedication of the first temple, this dedication was celebrated with an abundance of sacrifices. Although there were more than 200 times as many sheep and oxen offered in Solomon's dedication (1 Kin. 8:63), it should be noted there were more people—and more wealthy people—participating in Solomon's dedication.

6:18 The Law laid down the duties of the priests and Levites (Num. 18). Later the divisions of priests and Levites were instituted by David.

6:19 This celebration of the Passover must have been exceptionally memorable; it was the first time since the captivity that the people were able to celebrate according to the Law—with sacrifices offered in the temple (v. 20).

6:20 The priests and the Levites … purified themselves so that they could perform the duties of their office. The Levites slaughtered the Passover lambs for themselves and others. Originally the Passover lamb was killed by the head of each household (Ex. 12:6). In the days of Hezekiah, the Levites killed the Passover lambs for everyone who was not clean (2 Chr. 30:17). In the days of Josiah, the Levites killed all of the Passover lambs for everyone (2 Chr. 35:10–14). Thus, the observance of Passover was slightly modified over the years, though it was still observed on the original day (compare Ex. 12:6 with Ezra 6:19).

6:21 The nations of the land evidently refers to the people who had been transplanted into Palestine by the Assyrians (4:4). Those who had separated themselves were Israelites who had remained in the land during the captivity. The filth from which they separated themselves was the idolatry practiced by the pagans and perhaps their intermarriages with foreigners.

6:22 The Feast of Unleavened Bread immediately followed the Feast of Passover. The king of Assyria is a reference to Darius. Even though he was actually the king of Persia, Darius could be called the king of Assyria because he was the ruler of the former realm of Assyria. The title God of Israel was probably effective in helping the Jewish people recapture a sense of their true heritage and rekindle their true hope.

7:1–5 after these things: The events of ch. 6 took place during the reign of King Darius; more specifically the temple was completed and dedicated in 515 B.C. Chapter 7 jumps forward many years to the reign of Artaxerxes (464–424 B.C.), for Ezra returned around 458 B.C. Thus between chs. 6 and 7 there is a gap of approximately 60 years. During this period, the events of the Book of Esther took place. Ezra, the leader of the second return to Jerusalem, is introduced with a long genealogy, demonstrating that he was from a priestly family—the family of Aaron. Seraiah saw the fall of Jerusalem (2 Kin. 25:18), and his son Jehozadak went into exile (1 Chr. 6:15). The phrase son of Seraiah indicates Ezra's line of descent rather than the name of his father.

INSIGHT

The Skill of a Scribe

The skills that qualified Ezra to be a scribe (Ezra 7:6) were a detailed, technical knowledge of the Law and the ability to teach it (7:10). Officials called scribes had been known during the monarchy, but they were mostly recorders and secretaries. The era of scribes as custodians of the Law began with men like Ezra on the return of the exiles to Palestine.

7:6, 7 Ezra was not only from a priestly family, he was also a skilled scribe—one who copied and studied the Law. After the Exile, the office of scribe came into prominence, in some ways replacing the prophet in importance, and eventually eclipsing even the role of the priest. The Law of Moses actually refers to God's law. Moses may have been the person most closely associated with the Law, but it was the Law that the LORD God of Israel had given. The latter is by far the more significant designation (John 1:17). The phrase according to the hand of the LORD his God upon him is used repeatedly throughout this chapter and the next one (7:9, 28; 8:18, 22, 31; Neh. 2:8, 18). The phrase depicts God's grace working on Ezra's behalf.

7:8, 9 The first month is March-April; the fifth month is July-August. The route traveled by Ezra was dangerous because a rebellion had broken out in Egypt and spring was the time when ancient armies began their campaigns.

7:10 Throughout his life, Ezra had concentrated fully on the study, practice, and communication of the Word of God. Heart indicates the whole of one's being. Ezra diligently searched the Scriptures so that he could live by them and teach them to Israel. Because of this, the gracious hand of God empowered him (v. 9).

7:11 the priest, the scribe, expert: These words describe Ezra with exceptional praise. Ezra is referred to as "the scribe's scribe" or the teacher of scribes.

7:12 Ancient Middle Eastern monarchs commonly took self-aggrandizing titles such as king of kings (Ezek. 26:7; Dan. 2:37). The Persian kings were literally kings over many kings because the Persian empire included many conquered kingdoms. Perfect peace describes a treaty relationship between the Persian emperor and the vassal state of Judah.

7:13–19 Earlier, Ezra had requested permission to return to Jerusalem (7:6). Now the details are given.

7:14 Ezra desired to return to make sure that the Law was being observed. His burden was to teach his people God's Law (7:10). the king and his seven counselors: The authorization for Ezra came in suitable pomp and circumstance; unknown to the king of Persia was the hand of a greater King at work in the affairs.

7:15–19 Three sources of offerings for the temple are listed: (1) the silver and gold of the king and his counselors, (2) the silver and gold of the people of Babylon, and (3) the freewill offering of the Jewish people who remained in Babylon. Note that God accepts the gifts of those who do not know Him, as well as the gifts of those who know and serve Him in truth. The only gifts God rejects are those given by people who appear to know Him but whose hearts are far from Him (Is. 1:10–15). The dwelling of God in Jerusalem is a reference to the temple.

7:20 And whatever more may be needed: Ezra had what amounted to a royal blank check.

7:21–23 The decree of Artaxerxes included an order to the provincial treasurers to allow Ezra to claim extra supplies from them. However, there were limits on the supplies. Ezra could take no more than one hundred talents of silver (nearly four tons), one hundred kors of wheat (about 625 bushels), and one hundred baths each of wine and oil (about six hundred gallons each).

7:24 All temple officials were exempt from every form of tax. Artaxerxes, like Cyrus (1:2–4) and Darius (6:1–10) before him, wanted to win the goodwill and avoid the wrath of the gods that were worshiped throughout the empire.

7:25, 26 Ezra was given authority to set up a judicial system with the power to punish. Although the magistrates and judges had authority over only Jewish people, their authority extended beyond Jerusalem to Syria, Phoenicia, and Palestine. Ezra later used his authority to punish sin in the community (10:8).

7:27, 28 To beautify the house of the LORD is a reference to the reestablishment of moral, spiritual, and religious life. I was encouraged:

With renewed vigor, Ezra gathered leading men of Israel to return to Jerusalem with him.

8:1 These are the heads of their fathers' houses: The list of people who returned to Jerusalem recalls the list of the men for war at the time of the anticipated conquest of the land of Canaan (Num. 1; 26).

8:2–14 In this list, twelve families are represented by their chiefs and the number of males in each family is given. The total number of the heads of families who accompanied Ezra back to Jerusalem was 1,496.

8:15, 16 Ezra discovered that there were no sons of Levi among the returnees who accompanied him back to Jerusalem. Zerubbabel had faced a similar problem. Over four thousand priests returned with him to Jerusalem, but only 74 Levites were among the returnees (2:36–42).

8:17 The location and significance of Casiphia is uncertain. It has been suggested that this is Ctesipon on the Tigris River, near modern Baghdad. The Hebrew word for the place, a synonym for the holy place (Deut. 12:5), may mean that there was a Jewish sanctuary or temple in Casiphia.

8:18 Sherebiah, a particularly outstanding teacher, means "the burning heat of Yahewh."

8:19–21 On the road to Jerusalem, the large Jewish caravan would have been an easy target for robbers. Knowing that the returnees needed the Lord's help, Ezra proclaimed a fast as a symbol of their submission to God.

8:22, 23 To persuade the king to let him return to Jerusalem, Ezra had told him about the power and wrath of God. So when Ezra received the king's permission to return, he was ashamed to ask for an armed escort. Later Nehemiah would accept a military escort for his return to Jerusalem (Neh. 2:7–9).

8:24–30 Before the returnees departed, Ezra entrusted the load of valuables to twelve people. Although v. 24 reads as though Sherebiah, Hashabiah, and their brethren were priests, v. 18 indicates that they were Levites. Verse 30 confirms that the treasure was entrusted to priests and Levites. Ezra followed the Law, which taught that the priests were to handle the sacred objects and the Levites were to carry them (Num. 3:8, 31, 45). the silver, the gold, and the articles: One talent was about 75 pounds (7:22). The 650 talents of silver weighed nearly 25 tons. The one hundred talents of gold weighed over three tons. These figures do not include the numerous other valuable objects of exquisite artistry.

8:31 According to 7:9, the returnees began their journey on the first day of the first month. According to v. 15, the returnees camped at the river for three days. Yet this verse speaks of the departure on the twelfth day of the first month. These time discrepancies may be explained as follows: The people began to assemble at the river on the first day of the first month. During the course of the first three days, Ezra discovered that there were no Levites among the travelers. During the next eight days, Ezra enlisted Levites (vv. 15–20), entreated the Lord (vv. 21–23), and entrusted the travelers' considerable load to the priests and Levites (vv. 24–30). The returnees then departed from the river on the twelfth day. So from their point of view, the journey to Jerusalem began on the first day of the first month, when the people left their homes in Babylon. The group departed from the river on the twelfth day of the first month.

8:32 The returnees arrived in Jerusalem on the first day of the fifth month (7:9). The trip took about three and a half months (compare 7:9 with 8:31).

8:33, 34 After three days rest, the returnees deposited their treasury in the temple (Neh. 2:11). Four men—two priests and two Levites—counted and weighed everything. A written inventory was then put on file.

8:35 The sin offering, which consisted of twelve male goats, one for each tribe of Israel, was for the atonement for sins. The burnt offerings signified the surrender of the entire nation to the service of the Lord.

8:36 The king's orders were the authorization for Ezra to administer the Jewish law among the Jewish people of the province. Satraps, or "protectors of the realm," were highly placed individuals who ruled under the emperor in various regions of his empire (5:3).

9:1 When these things were done: These words seem to imply that the leaders came to Ezra immediately after the events of ch. 8. Actually, over four months passed between the events of ch. 8 and those of ch. 9. Ezra arrived on the first day of the fifth month (7:9) and he deposited the treasure in the temple on the fourth day of the fifth month (8:33). The assembly that took place soon after the leader's report occurred on the twentieth day of the ninth month (10:9). The delivery of the royal orders to the regional governor (8:36) may have taken weeks or even months. Ezra did not just deliver the decree, he secured the support of the king's satraps and governors. It was after Ezra had delivered the decree and returned to Jerusalem that he received the report from the leaders. The people … have not separated themselves from the peoples of the land: Both the leaders and the people of Israel had failed to remain separate from the Gentiles who lived in the land. The same kind of problem existed in Zerubbabel's day (6:21). the abominations of the Canaanites: The language here reflects that of the Law (Gen. 15:16, 19–21; Deut. 18:9–12). The term abominations occurs often in the first five books of the Bible (Deut. 17:1; 18:12; 22:5; 23:18) and in the prophets (Jer. 7:10; 44:22).

9:2 The Jewish returnees were marrying the pagan peoples of the land, a practice that the Law of Moses expressly prohibited (Ex. 34:16; Deut. 7:3).

9:3–4 Ezra's response demonstrated tremendous grief. Using every immediate symbol he had available to him, he represented the anguish he felt: tore … plucked … sat down astonished. Compare Neh. 13:25.

9:5 knees … hands: Physical postures of prayer are often described in the Bible. Kneeling is a sign of humble respect. Raising one's hands is a sign of openness to God and recognizing that all gifts are from the Lord's hand.

9:6 ashamed and humiliated: Ezra felt an overwhelming sense of shame. His prayer was one of confession. Though Ezra had not participated in this sin himself, he identified with the sins of the people.

9:7 Ezra further acknowledged that the people's sinful actions were part of their history. The whole nation—kings and priests, as well as the people—had sinned in the past, and they had suffered for it at the hand of the kings of the lands. This suffering had included the sword, loss of life; captivity, loss of freedom; plunder, loss of property; and humiliation, loss of honor.

(Heb. shaar) (Ezra 9:8, 15) Strong’s #7604: To be a remnant means “to remain” or “to be left over.” A remnant is what survives after a catastrophe. In Ezra, the word frequently refers to those Israelites who survived the Exile and returned to resettle the Promised Land (9:8). The prophets use the word to speak not only of a group of Israelites who survived a particular calamity but to those Israelites who remained faithful to God (Amos 5:14, 15). The concept of the remnant is central to Isaiah, who prophesies that the Root of Jesse, the Messiah, would one day gather the remnant of Israel from all the nations, even attracting some Gentiles to Himself (Is. 11:10, 11, 16). The remnant therefore becomes a powerful OT theme of covenant faithfulness and salvation, for in sparing His people God maintained a nation through whom all the world would be blessed (Gen. 12:3).

9:8, 9 a peg in His holy place: This metaphor refers to a peg in the wall on which a utensil is hung (Eccl. 12:11). God’s mercy had permitted the remnant to be fixed in the place God had chosen. enlighten: God had given the light of His will to those who were in the darkness of sin. bondage: The people were no longer slaves; they were free. repair the house of our God: The temple had been rebuilt. wall: The people had a wall of protection in the form of the king’s decree (7:12–26).

9:10–12 Ezra confessed the sins of the nation by referring to what the prophets had preached. The prophets (Moses is called a prophet in Deut. 18:15; 34:10; Hos. 12:13) prohibited intermarriage with Gentiles (Deut. 7:1–3; 23:7; Mal. 2:10–16).

9:13–15 Ezra ended his prayer not by asking for forgiveness, but by declaring that God was righteous (Deut. 32:4; Ps. 119:137; Zeph. 3:5). Israel was guilty and deserved whatever justice God gave them. God would have been just in consuming them, even to the point that there was no remnant or survivor.

10:1–44 This chapter describes what Ezra did to deal with the sin reported to him (9:1). From this point on, Ezra writes in the third person, putting himself in the background.

10:1, 2 Many people in Israel were concerned about the sin in their midst. So while Ezra wept, prayed, and confessed, these people gathered around him and wept very bitterly.

10:3 Making a covenant with God means binding oneself by an oath to God to do something. It was the most binding form of commitment a person could make.

10:4 Arise: Shechaniah (v. 2) reminded Ezra that it was his responsibility to teach Israel the Law of God (7:25).

10:5, 6 Jehohanan (a common name) is not the person mentioned in Neh. 6:18.

10:7, 8 within three days: This was a reasonable demand because Bethel (2:28), Lod (2:33), and Jericho (2:34) were some of the more distant Jewish cities, and they were all within three days' journey. According to the Law, the money from the sale of confiscated property went into the temple treasury (Lev. 27:28, 29, where devoted means "confiscated").

10:9 The ninth month (Chislev; Neh. 1:1) is November-December.

10:10–12 Ezra simply and briefly confronted them with their sin, indicating that these fresh offenses added to the black, bleak account against the nation. He urged them to confess to the Lord and comply to the Law. By a unanimous proclamation all the people agreed.

10:13, 14 The people faced two problems. (1) There were too many of them for the investigation to be done in a day or even two days. (2) The weather would not permit them to stay in Jerusalem. The people who had traveled from a distance could not stay in the city, living and sleeping in the open air, during the cold, rainy period. Therefore they requested that the investigation be organized by their officials.

10:15–17 Two men, with the support of two Levites, opposed Ezra's plan. The reasons for their opposition are not given. Apparently their objections had no effect (vv. 16–18). Meshullam is likely the same man who was part of the group of learned teachers that Ezra had recruited (8:16); however, he is not the same man who is mentioned among the repentant offenders in v. 29.

10:18–44 The list of those who had taken pagan wives included 113 men: 17 priests, 10 Levites, and 86 others.

10:19–24 They gave their promise may also be translated “they gave their hand.” The symbol of raising a hand to take an oath is still practiced in many cultures. With this sign, the Israelites agreed to put away their unlawful wives and offer a sacrifice according to the requirements of Lev. 5:14–19. Although this promise and sacrifice are mentioned only in connection with the priests, it is likely that everyone on the list fulfilled these requirements.

10:25–44 Others of Israel refers to the people, as opposed to the leaders.

10:44 Even though some had had children with their pagan wives, they still separated themselves from them.

The Book of Nehemiah

TIMES OF TRIAL REQUIRE GODLY LEADERSHIP. This book is principally the story of such gifted leadership in the person of Nehemiah. Facing criticism and opposition, Nehemiah resolutely led the small Israelite community as they rebuilt the walls of Jerusalem for its physical protection.

Whereas Ezra was the religious leader in Jerusalem, Nehemiah became the secular leader, the official governor of the Persian province of Judah (Neh. 5:14). His great concern was the ruined state of the city, left without walls since Artaxerxes I had halted the repairs (Ezra 4:21). Using his position as a trusted servant in the inner court of Artaxerxes, Nehemiah obtained permission to resume the labor and complete Jerusalem's walls. But Nehemiah also did not hesitate to guide the Israelites spiritually. By demanding that the Israelites obey God's Law, Nehemiah pursued their spiritual as well as their physical welfare.

The historical setting of Nehemiah is that of the second half of the Hebrew book of Ezra-Nehemiah (458–420 B.C.). During this period, the Persian emperor Artaxerxes I Longimanus allowed the Jews to return to their land and rebuild Jerusalem. At that time Nehemiah occupied a prominent position in the emperor's court: he was the trusted cupbearer of Artaxerxes I. In Artaxerxes' twentieth year on the throne (444 B.C.), he allowed Nehemiah to go to Jerusalem and rebuild its walls.

Nehemiah stayed in Jerusalem for twelve years and then returned to Persia in Artaxerxes' thirty-second year (432 B.C.). Around 425 B.C., Nehemiah left Persia and returned to Jerusalem for the last time (13:6). Nehemiah's memoirs could not have been completed until after his second visit to Jerusalem. Thus, the earliest that the Book of Nehemiah could have been completed would be around 425 B.C.

There has been considerable discussion about the order of the returns of Ezra and Nehemiah to Jerusalem. The Bible clearly presents the return of Ezra as preceding that of Nehemiah: Ezra returned in the seventh year of the reign of Artaxerxes (Ezra 7:8) and Nehemiah returned in the twentieth year (2:1). However, based on the way the revival of Ezra appears in the middle of the story of Nehemiah (chs. 8—10), many have argued that Nehemiah returned before Ezra.

The arguments for reversing Ezra and Nehemiah in this way are generally not convincing. Nevertheless, the inclusion of part of the Ezra story in the middle of the Nehemiah memoirs still needs explanation. It could be that Nehemiah's rebuilding the walls of the city was only part of the reconstruction needed among God's people. Even more necessary was the reinstitution of the Law. Certainly Ezra had used the Law previously in his dealings with the people, but at this time the great priest and scribe Ezra partnered with Nehemiah in order to thoroughly teach the people God's Law (8:9). Apparently, the compiler of Nehemiah wanted to show that the wall of the city would mean nothing without the wall of the Law surrounding the people.

In His covenant with Israel, God had spoken of a place where He would establish His name. In fact, Moses had told the Israelites to "seek the place where the LORD your God chooses, out of all your tribes, to put His name for His dwelling place" (Deut. 12:5). Later, it was revealed that this place was Jerusalem. When the temple was built during Solomon's reign, Jerusalem was at the height of its glory. Its fame helped to spread the glory of God's name throughout the nations. But God allowed Jerusalem to be destroyed because of the faithlessness of the Israelites. Even though Jerusalem lay in ruins during Nehemiah's time, it was still God's purpose to establish His name there.

The Book of Nehemiah records the restoration of Jerusalem under the leadership of Nehemiah. In the book, the returning Jews showed spiritual lethargy and a coldhearted indifference toward God. This problem continued, for the Book of Malachi denounces the Israelites for the same attitudes. It took a determined, godly leader like Nehemiah to motivate this group to act on God's promises and rebuild Jerusalem's walls.

However, the completion of Jerusalem's walls is only half the story of Nehemiah. The walls are rebuilt by chapter six, but the book has seven more chapters. These last chapters record a revival and describe the repopulation of the city. The subject of the book is not merely the rebuilding of the walls, but the complete restoration of the people of Jerusalem.

The Book of Nehemiah makes it clear that God did not restore His people only one time; rather, He repeatedly and continually restored them. He sent a number of prophets and leaders to teach, motivate, and guide the people into righteousness. Zerubbabel led a group of exiles to Jerusalem and began to rebuild the temple (Ezra 1—6). Then Ezra led a second group of exiles back to Jerusalem and helped restore the people to obedience to the Mosaic law (Ezra 7–10). Then Nehemiah returned and motivated the people to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem (chs. 1–6). Finally, Nehemiah returned a second time and exhorted the people to adhere closely to God's Law (ch. 13).

The pattern is clear: God continually restored His people. In spite of their unfaithfulness, God accomplished His will. The restored walls of Jerusalem, the repopulation of Jerusalem, and the repeated reformation of the Israelites was clearly God's work. In the end, His name would be glorified.

Many readers naturally conclude that the book was written by Nehemiah because of the words of the first verse, "The words of Nehemiah the son of Hachaliah." In fact, it is widely believed that Nehemiah originated the following passages: 1:1—7:5; 12:27–43; 13:4–31. But there are two different views the authorship of the rest of Nehemiah. Some believe that Nehemiah wrote the whole book, relying on his own memories. Others believe that Ezra wrote the book, using Nehemiah's memoirs, for the passages listed above. As evidence for the second view, it is noted that Neh. 7:5–73 and Ezra 2:1–70 are almost identical.

The similarities of Nehemiah and Ezra can be explained partly by the fact that they are only one book in the Hebrew Bible (see the Introduction for Ezra). In fact, many scholars argue that Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah were compiled by the same person. All these books exhibit similar themes, such as a focus on the Levites, the temple, and extensive lists. With such priestly interests, the one who masterminded this long document may well have been a priest—like Ezra (see the Introduction to First Chronicles).

1:1 Nehemiah, whose name means “The Lord Comforts,” was a highly placed statesman associated with Ezra in the work of reestablishing the people of Judah in the Promised Land. The month Chislev corresponds to our November-December (Ezra 10:9). The twentieth year refers to the twentieth year of the rule of Artaxerxes I Longimanus (464–424 B.C.)—that is, 444 B.C. Artaxerxes was the same Persian king who had commissioned Ezra to return to Jerusalem (Ezra 7:1). Shushan the citadel was about 150 miles north of the Persian Gulf, in present-day Iran. The citadel, or the fortified royal palace, was built on an acropolis. The city served as a winter residence for the monarchs of Persia. Shushan is also notable in biblical history as the place where Daniel received his vision of the rams and goats (Dan. 8:2), and as the home of Mordecai and Esther (Esth. 1:2).

1:2 Nehemiah’s brother Hanani (7:2) had visited Jerusalem and returned to Shushan. This journey, which covered nearly a thousand miles one way, would probably have taken at least four months. It had taken Ezra and his caravan four months to make a similar round trip from Babylon to Jerusalem (Ezra 7:9). Nehemiah was concerned about the Jewish people and Jerusalem.

1:3 Life was difficult for the people in Jerusalem. This difficulty was due in large part to the condition of Jerusalem’s wall. In the ancient Middle East, a city wall provided protection for the inhabitants. The condition of a city wall was also seen as an indication of the strength of the people’s gods. The ruined condition of the wall of Jerusalem reflected badly on God’s name.

1:4 wept … mourned: Nehemiah was deeply disturbed. Without a wall, Jerusalem was vulnerable to attack. The riches of the temple treasury (Ezra 8:15–36) would have been quite a temptation for Israel’s enemies. God of heaven: This title for God is used frequently in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah.

Leadership Principles from Nehemiah, Part 1

Leaders Have a Sense of Mission (1:5).

Almost by definition, leaders have an end to which they are headed. This sense of mission helps to guide their decisions and determine their strategy.

Nehemiah's mission grew out of his knowledge of the Law and his awareness that the destruction of Jerusalem had come about through God's judgment of his people's sins (Neh. 1:5–8). At the same time, he knew that God was willing to forgive their sins and restore them to the land (1:9). Therefore Nehemiah determined that he would see to the rebuilding of Jerusalem, in accordance with the Lord's promises, and he began to devise a strategy toward that end (1:10, 11).

Nehemiah did not dream up a sense of mission out of his own agenda or self-interest. He responded to the news of Jerusalem's plight with tears, prayer, fasting, humility, and seeking the Lord's will (1:4). As he prepared to go before the king, he probably did not know exactly what he should say or do, only that he needed to go to Jerusalem. Nor could he have known all that he would encounter once he arrived at the ruined city. Nevertheless, convinced that God wanted the Holy City to be revived, Nehemiah stepped forward as a change agent, and his leadership proved strategic.

1:5 LORD: Nehemiah called on God by using His covenant name (Ex. 6:2–9). Nehemiah's use of this title is similar to our use of the phrase "in Jesus' name" in our prayers. God of heaven: Nehemiah acknowledged God's government of the world, including His sovereignty over the pagan king who was over Nehemiah, the Jewish people, and the city of Jerusalem. covenant and mercy: By using these two words together, Nehemiah was holding God to His promises. The Lord had staked His character on His loyalty to His covenant with His people. According to the terms of the Mosaic covenant (Deut. 28; 29), God made His covenant blessings available to those who kept His commandments.

(Heb. yadah) (Neh. 1:6; Lev. 5:5; Num. 5:7; Pss. 92:1; 106:47) Strong’s #3034: This Hebrew verb conveys two distinct meanings. The first is related to the offering of thanksgiving or praise to God (2 Chr. 5:13; Pss. 92:1; 106:47). The second is that of confession, such as the confession of God’s greatness (1 Kin. 8:33, 35) and the confession of sin before God (Neh. 1:6; 9:2; Dan. 9:4). The basic meaning yadah is “to throw” or “to cast off.” In one sense, confession is the “casting off” of sin by acknowledging our transgressions of God’s commandments for holy living (Ps. 32:5; Prov. 28:13). In another sense, confession of sin is thanksgiving because it recognizes that forgiveness of sin is accomplished only by the grace and goodness of God (2 Chr. 30:22; Dan. 9:4).

1:6 let Your ear be attentive and Your eyes open: Nehemiah asked God to look at him and listen to him as he prayed. These words were designed to encourage the one praying, for God does not turn His ears from or close His eyes to His people (Ex. 2:23–25). the children of Israel: By using this ancient name for the Jewish people, Nehemiah indicated the continuity of the Jewish people of his day with the Israelites of the past: Nehemiah then confessed the sins of his father’s house as well as his own. His confession was national, communal, and personal. His own sin was part of the whole.

1:7 Israel had sinned against the Lord and against His commandments. By using the word we, Nehemiah included himself among the sinful people. commandments … statutes … ordinances: These words describe the totality of God’s Law (9:13, 14).

1:8 Remember: After confessing his sin and the sin of the people, Nehemiah reminded God of what He Himself had said. I will scatter you among the nations: This is an allusion to God’s covenant in Lev. 26:27–45 and Deut. 30:1–5. Nehemiah himself was born in Persia, a distant nation, because of God’s fulfillment of this promise.

1:9 The Lord had promised that if the nation of Israel would return to Him in obedience, He would regather them to their land. Nehemiah addressed the Lord as a covenant-keeping God. He confessed his and the people’s sin because the Law demanded confession (Lev. 16:21). Then he held God to His covenant to return Israel to the land. bring them to the place which I have chosen as a dwelling for My name: The ultimate intent of God's covenant was not just to return the people, but to return them to the place where God had established His name. For that to be accomplished, much needed to be done. So while it was true that some people had returned to the land and that the temple had been rebuilt, the fact remained that Jerusalem's wall was in ruins and the people were under reproach (5:9). In that sense, Jerusalem had not yet been restored.

1:10 Your servants and Your people: By using this phrasing, Nehemiah was suggesting to the Lord that the time was right, the people were right, and the task was right to restore Jerusalem. Your strong hand is one of the phrases associated with God's deliverance of Israel from Egypt (Ex. 6:1; 13:14; 15:6; Deut. 6:21).

1:11 Your servant … Your servants: Nehemiah and the godly people of Israel shared common concerns before God. let Your servant prosper: Nehemiah requested permission to return to Jerusalem, rebuild the wall, and restore the community. He enjoyed the comfort and convenience of a royal palace and a position of honor and responsibility. There were many compelling reasons for him to stay where he was, but he asked for permission to do God's work. As the king's cupbearer, Nehemiah held an honored position. His constant proximity to the king of Persia made him privy to the state secrets and personal affairs of the king.

2:1 Nisan corresponds to March-April. sad in his presence: Four months after hearing the report from his brother concerning Jerusalem, Nehemiah was still grieving over the conditions in Jerusalem.

2:2 The king noticed Nehemiah's sad expression and concluded that it was caused by sorrow of heart rather than physical illness. I became dreadfully afraid: Persian monarchs believed that just being in their presence would make any person happy. Yet, Nehemiah was about to request the emperor's permission to go to Jerusalem, suggesting that he would rather be somewhere other than in the emperor's presence. On top of that, it was Artaxerxes himself who had ordered the work on the wall to be stopped (Ezra 4:21–23). Nehemiah had reason to be afraid.

2:3 live forever: Addressing the king with proper respect, Nehemiah related the burden of his heart. the place of my fathers' tombs: It is possible that this phrase was designed to catch the king's attention. In many Asian cultures, a connection with the burial places of one's ancestors was a matter of great importance.

2:4 I prayed: Even though Nehemiah had come into the presence of the king, he had never left the presence of the true King of kings.

2:5 After his silent prayer (v. 4), Nehemiah spoke boldly, asking for permission to leave the king's palace to travel to Jerusalem to rebuild the wall. Again Nehemiah spoke of his fathers' tombs (v. 3). Though this was not his principal concern, it must have been something he thought would be important to the king.

2:6 the queen: It is possible that Nehemiah implied by this parenthetical phrase that her presence influenced the king's decision. She may have looked on Nehemiah with a special grace. It is also possible that he had waited for a time when she would be present (v. 1). How long will your journey be … when will you return: In responding to Nehemiah's request (v. 5), the king might have had Nehemiah executed on the spot; or he might have dismissed Nehemiah with a laugh. However, his questions implied that the request was already granted. I set him a time: The fact that Nehemiah responded quickly to the king's request for specific details indicates that he had been planning the trip. it pleased the king to send me: The king not only sent Nehemiah to Jerusalem, he made him governor (5:14). With the possibility of unrest in Egypt and in Cyprus, the king might have decided that Jerusalem needed a wall after all (Ezra 4:21).

2:7 Nehemiah knew that he needed safe passage for his journey to Judah, so he requested letters from the king to show to the governors of the region beyond the Euphrates River.

2:8 Nehemiah's plans were detailed. He asked the king for permission to go to Jerusalem (v. 5), for letters to ensure safe passage (v. 7), and also for provisions. Nehemiah requested a letter addressed to Asaph, the man in charge of the king's forest, to enable him to obtain supplies of lumber for three projects: (1) the gates of the citadel, (2) the city wall, and (3) his personal house. Jerusalem had plenty of limestone for building projects. But timber, necessary for making roofs and other parts of large building projects, was scarce. The citadel was a fortress situated just northwest of the temple. It overlooked and protected the temple area. according to the good hand of my God: The king graciously granted Nehemiah all that he had requested, but Nehemiah knew that the ultimate source of his provisions was God.

2:9 captains of the army and horsemen: Nehemiah had a military escort to Jerusalem. In 458 B.C. Ezra had journeyed to Jerusalem with 1,800 people carrying valuable treasures, and had refused a military escort (Ezra 8:22). Fourteen years later, Nehemiah made the same trip with a smaller company and no valuables, but the king sent an escort with him.

2:10, 11 Some have suggested that since he traveled lighter than Ezra had, Nehemiah may have taken the shorter route from Shushan to Tadmor through Damascus, thus following the Jordan Valley to Jericho. He and his party would therefore avoid the Samaritan community and arrive in Jerusalem with no opposition. If that was their intention, it did not work. Sanballat was the governor of Samaria. Horonite refers to Sanballat's city Beth-Horon. Tobiah was probably Sanballat's secretary and confidential advisor. Ammonite: At the time of Nehemiah, the Ammonites (Gen. 19:38) had pushed west into the land vacated by Judah. The prospect of a strong Jewish community in newly fortified Jerusalem would have seemed threatening to the Ammonite power.

2:12–15 Since Nehemiah had arrived in Jerusalem from the north, he would have seen that side of the wall as he approached the city. If he lived in the southwestern part of the city, he would have had ample time for viewing the western wall. Nehemiah seems to have been concerned with inspecting the southern and eastern walls of Jerusalem. With a few servants, he passed through the Valley Gate into the Valley of Hinnom. He then traveled along the south wall. When the piles of stone and heaps of rubble obstructed his passage, he dismounted his animal and continued on foot up the Kidron valley in order to view the eastern wall.

2:16 the officials did not know: The only people who knew Nehemiah's plans were the few men who had made the secret night ride with him (v. 12).

2:17 we: Nehemiah encouraged all of the people to assist in rebuilding the city's walls.

2:18 Nehemiah emphasized that it was not just his idea to rebuild the wall of Jerusalem. Rather, the idea had come to him from the Lord (vv. 8, 12). In response to Nehemiah's challenge, the people replied, Let us rise up and build.

Leadership Principles from Nehemiah, Part 2

Leaders Leverage Their Power (2:5)

Management has been defined as the ability to get things done through other people. However, that can happen only if the people involved are in a position to get things done. Thus leaders must use their influence to get people of means participating in their efforts.

Nehemiah followed this principle in his plan to rebuild Jerusalem. He was in a key position of influence as the cupbearer to Artaxerxes (Neh. 2:1). He had the king's ear, and he leveraged his proximity to power for the advantage of his people. He requested and was granted a leave of absence (2:5, 6), letters of reference (2:7), and a government grant for building materials (2:8).

Today, the ability to leverage power is an indispensable requirement of leadership, especially for those who work in community development and urban ministry. There are plenty of resources to help the poor, for example, but it takes wise and disciplined leaders to align themselves with the powerful on behalf of the powerless. Tasks such as grant-writing, resource development, and asset distribution require careful cultivation of relationships with those in the networks of power.

Leaders Conduct Research (2:12)

A missile without a guidance system is a dangerous thing—all power and no direction. In the same way, leaders who don't know where they are going can wreak havoc. That's why it pays for people in leadership positions to gather the right kind of information, so that they can make wise choices about which path to pursue.

Before he launched his plan to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem, Nehemiah conducted careful research about the task at hand. He quietly walked around the city by night, without fanfare, surveying the extent of the problem and perhaps formulating some tentative strategies (2:11–15). Nehemiah's low profile was especially appropriate given that he was a new member of the community. As a representative of the king, he could have come in with trumpets blaring and declared what his expectations were.

Instead, he kept his thoughts to himself and avoided attracting attention until he had formulated a plan.

Leaders Build Community (2:17, 18)

In many Western countries of the twentieth century, the labor force often has been sharply divided between management and labor. One problem of this rigid distinction is that it tends to create a mentality of "us" versus "them." History shows that most of the greatest achievements of humanity have been accomplished by teams and communities of people working together toward common ends.

Nehemiah understood the power of community as he undertook the task of rebuilding Jerusalem's walls. After surveying the situation, he gathered the people and gave a speech in which he mobilized the community around the rebuilding project. First he raised their awareness that something should be done, then he instilled confidence in them that something could be done —by them (2:17, 18).

It is interesting to notice that Nehemiah spoke in terms of "we" and "us," even though in his written account he used "they" and "them." Clearly he saw himself as a participant in the dire circumstances, even though he had just arrived from the royal palace. In fact, he bridged the class division between himself and his people by sharing the discussion he had had with the king, thereby showing that the people had a friend in the emperor's court.

2:19 In v. 10, Nehemiah here mentioned two men who were unhappy about his coming—Sanballat and Tobiah. Here the opposition grows to three. Geshem was the leader of a company of Arab troops maintained by Sanballat. In v. 10, Nehemiah's opponents were grieved; here they laughed. They accused Nehemiah of false motives, of plotting rebellion against the king. The same charge had been directed against the Jewish people in Zerubbabel's time (Ezra 4).

2:20 Nehemiah ignored his opponents' accusation that he was rebelling against the king. He asserted that God was involved in what he was doing. Nehemiah's motive was not rebellion against the king, but submission to God. you have no heritage: Nehemiah indicated that Samaritans and foreign people had no place in Jerusalem (Ezra 4:3).

3:1–32 The people work to rebuild Jerusalem's wall. This chapter has four parts: (1) rebuilding the northern portion (vv.1–7); (2) rebuilding the western portion (vv. 8–13); (3) rebuilding the southern portion (v. 14); (4) rebuilding the eastern portion (vv. 15–). Approaches to studying this chapter vary. Some readers move through it quickly. Others use it for a detailed study of the topography of Jerusalem, for this chapter gives the most detailed specifications of the wall to be found in the Bible. Others approach this chapter by spiritualizing the gates. For example, the Sheep Gate is said to represent the Cross, where Christ the Lamb of God died for the sins of the world; the Fish Gate reminds allegorists of Christ's statement, "I will make you fishers of men," suggestive of soul winning. And so on. Nevertheless, one chief point of this chapter, which must not be missed, is simply that the people rolled up their sleeves and went to work. Nehemiah is not mentioned one time in the whole chapter, but the people are named. The Hebrew word translated build occurs seven times and repair thirty-four times. Many other words and phrases for construction are also used. The point being that the people built the wall, and they worked as hard as they said they would (2:18).

3:1 Eliashib the high priest and the other priests were the first people to start rebuilding Jerusalem's walls. At this point in Israel's history, the priests were the leaders. There were no kings or judges, so the people looked to the priests for leadership. It is significant that the high priest and the priests built the Sheep Gate. The Sheep Gate was on Jerusalem's northeast side, just north of the temple and was used for bringing sheep to the temple for sacrifice. they consecrated it: The priests dedicated the repaired gate, wall, and tower to the Lord. They knew that unless God blessed the city with His presence, no walls and gates would keep the people safe (Ps. 127:1).

3:2–4 Next to: The idea here is that the people worked together—not just in the same place, but in cooperation.

3:5–7 God also took notice of those who did not work.

3:8–13 These verses detail the rebuilding of the western portion of Jerusalem's wall.

3:8 The Broad Wall was probably built in the seventh century B.C. by Hezekiah to accommodate the influx of refugees from the fall of Samaria in 722 B.C. (2 Chr. 32:5).

3:9–14 These verses describe the rebuilding of the southern portion of Jerusalem's wall.

3:15–32 These verses detail the rebuilding of the eastern portion of Jerusalem's wall.

3:15 The Fountain Gate probably faced the En Rogel spring. The Pool of Shelah is also known as the Pool of Siloam or Shiloah.

3:16–20 Carefully prepared translates the Hebrew verb hehera, meaning "to burn." In other words, Baruch had a burning zeal for the work. He is the only person of whom this is said.

(Heb. charah) (Neh. 3:20; Ex. 32:10; Jon. 4:1) Strong’s #2734: The Hebrew verb translated carefully here usually means “to burn with anger” (Gen. 39:19; Jon. 4:1) and depicts anger as a burning fire. This is the type of intense anger the Lord displayed when the Israelites worshiped a worthless idol of a calf instead of their Deliverer (the word is translated burn hot in Ex. 32:10). In the present passage, the word denotes burning with zeal, not anger. In other words, Baruch earnestly wanted to repair the walls of Jerusalem because he knew it was God’s city and God’s work. His repairs were for the glory of the living Lord.

3:21–28 In the easternmost part of the city, the Horse Gate was the gate leading to the Kidron valley.

3:29–32 Goldsmiths and merchants also labored on the wall. They were not bricklayers, but they worked just the same.

4:1 furious … indignant: These two words together mean "burning with rage."

4:2 Sanballat gathered men from the army of Samaria, his local militia, and then mocked the Jewish people with sarcastic questions. these feeble Jews: The verb from which the adjective feeble is derived is used of a woman who is no longer able to bear children (1 Sam. 2:5), of a fisherman whose trade fails (Is. 19:8), and of the inhabitants of a defeated land (Hos. 4:3). fortify … offer sacrifices … complete it in a day … revive the stones: Sanballat poured contempt on the Jewish people and on their God. The reference to reviving the stones came from the fact that the stones of the former wall had been burned. When limestone is subjected to intense heat, it becomes unsuitable for building.

4:3 Tobiah, the aide of Sanballat (2:10, 19), carried Sanballat's jest (v. 2) even further. Tobiah declared that if a small creature like a fox jumped on the wall, the wall would collapse because of its flimsy construction.

4:4, 5 Nehemiah did not respond to his opponents (vv. 2, 3). Instead, he prayed that the Lord would not forgive them. Nehemiah believed that when the people of God were involved in the work of God, any assault on them was an assault on God. In this case, to despise the Jewish workers was to despise God Himself.

4:6 Nehemiah went back to work immediately, and the people followed because they had a mind to work.

4:7, 8 When their ridicule did not stop the work on the wall, Nehemiah's opponents tried a threat of attack. The opposition against Nehemiah had started with two people (2:10) and had grown to three (2:19). Here it had become a multitude, one which surrounded Jerusalem. Sanballat was a Samaritan; Samaria was north of Jerusalem. The Arabs were to the south, the Ammonites to the east and the Ashdodites to the west.

4:9 Prior to this verse the prayers recorded in the Book of Nehemiah are individual prayers. This one was a group prayer. Nehemiah's spirit had affected the entire group of workers. They not only prayed, but they set a watch and did what was humanly possible to protect themselves from attack.

Leadership Principles from Nehemiah, Part 3

Leaders Adapt to Adversity (4:8, 9)

Many people run from adversity; wise leaders expect it to happen occasionally. Wherever change and progress are underway, competing interests inevitably rise to challenge them. At that point, leaders must decide whether they will accept the challenge and meet it, or turn tail and let their opponents set the agenda.

Nehemiah's adversaries were a group of Jews from racially mixed backgrounds and Gentiles who had a vested interest in seeing that Jerusalem remained unprotected (Neh. 4:7). During the seventy years of Judah's exile, they had established dominance over those left behind. Therefore, Nehemiah's plan to rebuild the walls and revitalize the city threatened to end their monopoly on control.

Nehemiah responded to their opposition with resolute faith and prayer and measured resistance. Rather than escalate a touchy situation, he defended against attack and kept on working. Thus he adapted to adversity rather than run from it or overreact to it. God eventually rewarded Nehemiah's perseverance with the completion of the wall (6:15).

4:10 Under the circumstances, some of the workers became discouraged. The wall was half finished (v. 6), but the task was taking its toll. The words of the fatigued laborers appear as a song or poem in the Hebrew text.

4:11, 12 While the Jewish workers became discouraged (v. 10), the opposition intensified. The adversaries began a whispering campaign among the Jewish people to stop the building of the wall. These enemies used fear as a weapon, and they used the Jewish people to do their dirty work.

4:13 I positioned men: Because there was no Jewish army, the people had to defend themselves. Nehemiah placed men strategically on the wall. From the high places on the wall, men could see the approaching enemy. Other men defended the low places of the wall.

(Heb. yare) (Neh. 1:5; 4:14; Gen. 32:11) Strong’s #3372: The Hebrew word translated awesome is derived from the Hebrew verb meaning “to fear.” In this context, the word does not mean “frightening.” Rather it suggests the quality that inspires reverence or godly fear. In some Bible passages, “fearing” and godly living are so closely related that they are almost synonymous (Lev. 19:14; 25:17; Deut. 17:19; 2 Kin. 17:34). Thus while ordinary fear paralyzes a person, godly fear leads to submission and obedience to God. The person who properly fears God avoids evil (Job 1:1) and walks in God’s ways (Ps. 128:1).

4:14, 15 nobles … leaders … rest of the people: Nehemiah’s strategy was to address both leaders and laypeople. In this way, all the community would have “ownership” of the same ideals. fight for your brethren: Nehemiah reminded the Jewish people that they were not mercenary soldiers earning a salary or hoping for loot. Not only were their own lives at stake, but so were the lives of their loved ones. God answered Nehemiah’s prayers. The people were inspired by his wise words and returned to their tasks.

4:16–18 Nehemiah armed the workers and divided his own servants into two groups. Half of them worked on the wall and half of them stood guard. Since the builders needed both hands to work, their swords were hung on their sides. Those who carried baskets of debris on their heads held their weapons in one hand and supported the load with the other.

4:19, 20 Nehemiah instituted an alarm system for those who worked on the wall. Apparently the workers were scattered all over the wall and separated so far from each other that some were beyond the reach of the human voice. For that reason, a trumpeter with a ramhorn stood near Nehemiah wherever he went. If the wall was attacked, the alarm would gather all of the people quickly to the danger spot. Our God will fight for us: These words evoked the spirit of the Exodus (Num. 10:1–10). God had fought for their ancestors, and now God would fight for them.

4:21–23 Nehemiah instituted a twenty-four hour work and watch program. The people worked during the day and stood guard at night. Workers living out of town were asked to remain in the city rather than return home. Except for washing, Nehemiah and his men never took off their clothes. They worked day and night. Chapter four illustrates three types of opposition to Nehemiah and the people of Jerusalem: opposition by ridicule, opposition by threat of attack, opposition by fear. Nehemiah ignored the ridicule; he prayed and he persisted. He met the threat with prayer and by putting up a watch. He handled the fear by pointing to the Lord and by preparing the people for battle. His approach might be stated in two words: prayer and persistence, bound together.

5:1–5 The prolonged period of working, watching, fear, and weariness inevitably led to trouble among the people in Jerusalem. There were three groups of complainers, each introduced with the phrase there were those who said. The first group had large families, and did not have enough food to eat. The second group had large mortgages to pay and could not buy food. The third group had large taxes to pay and had been forced to mortgage their land and even to sell their children. While hunger, shortages, taxes, and money were the immediate results of the people's circumstances, they were not the heart of the problem. The people's basic problem is pinpointed in the words against their Jewish brethren. The people were not complaining merely about poverty and high taxes; they were grumbling about each other. In v. 1 the people refers to the poor; the brethren refers to the rich rulers (v. 7). In short, this was a class conflict. The poor people had mortgaged their lands and vineyards and houses. They had borrowed money and even had sold their sons and daughters into slavery. From the perspective of the Law, there were two problems here: (1) usury, lending money and charging interest, and (2) slavery. It was not wrong for a Jewish person to lend money with interest to a non-Jewish person (Deut. 23:19, 20), nor was it wrong for a Jewish person to lend money to a fellow Jew. However, the Law did prohibit usury (Ex. 22:25). Interest rates were exorbitant and could easily lead a person into poverty and enslavement. This leads to the second problem. According to the Law of Moses, a Jewish person could hire himself out to someone, but not as a slave (Lev. 25:35–40).

5:6 I became very angry: Nehemiah's first response to the sins of the Jewish people was anger. Deliberate disobedience to the Word of God ought to make a person indignant toward the sin—but not toward the sinner.

5:7–10 After getting angry at the sins of the Jewish people (v. 6), Nehemiah spent some time in serious thought. He then confronted the guilty people. rebuked: This term is used often by the prophets to speak of legal cases brought against guilty persons (13:11). After rebuking the guilty parties privately, Nehemiah confronted them in public with the same charges. not good: Two issues were at stake here—fear of God (1:5) and the reproach of the nations. When Israel, a nation called by the Lord, stopped honoring and obeying Him, it became a scandal because God's name was being dishonored.

5:11, 12 Nehemiah challenged the lenders to restore what they had taken with interest. The hundredth of the money is probably a reference to the interest they had been charging.

5:13 Nehemiah shook his garment as if he were getting rid of what he was carrying. In doing so, he dramatized what God would do if the people broke their promise. God would shake them loose from their houses and their possessions.

5:14–19 This section summarizes Nehemiah's time as governor. What he did, as recorded here, contrasts to what the nobles had done (vv. 1–13). They had been selfish; he was unselfish. They were out for what they could get; he was there for what he could give. They were thinking of themselves; he was thinking of God and God's people. Nehemiah contrasts his own fear of God (v. 15) with their lack of this fear (v. 9). He contrasts his behavior with that of governors who had preceded him (v. 15). He had not come for self-serving reasons (v. 16) but to serve others (v. 17). His table was heavily loaded with wonderful foods and wine (v. 18) but not at the expense of others. Indeed, he managed not to use the provisions he might have exacted from the people as their governor (vv. 14, 18) because he knew their troubles were already many. And, in all, he desired the sense of God's pleasure (v. 19).

5:14 During his twelve-year administration (444–432 B.C.), Nehemiah did not collect taxes from the people, although as governor he had that right.

5:15 Several former governors had paid their own expenses with the people's taxes. laid burdens: The former governors had made life difficult for the people. Rule here indicates an arbitrary, oppressive rule—the abuse of power through extortion.

5:16–18 Nehemiah had not acquired mortgages on land. As governor, he could easily have acquired real estate and sold it at great profit. But instead of making money for themselves, Nehemiah and his servants worked on the wall of Jerusalem for the protection of the people and the glory of God.

5:19 Nehemiah's motives were pure. He was not doing good for the praise of men, but to please God. His prayer is repeated at the end of the book (13:31).

6:1, 2 Nehemiah's enemies, realizing that open opposition had not worked and that the wall was close to being finished, suggested a conference. The plain of Ono was about twenty miles northwest of Jerusalem. Somehow, perhaps by a word from the Lord, Nehemiah was warned of his enemy's intent.

6:3–6 an open letter: In those days, a letter to a leader might be folded in a silk bag and sealed, and only opened by the person to whom it had been sent. The letter here, however, was for public display. In it, the Jewish people were accused of wanting to rebel.

6:7 The evidence that was used to accuse Nehemiah of rebellion was the assertion that prophets were proclaiming Nehemiah to be king. Zechariah had prophesied that a king was coming (Zech. 9:9). With all the activity of rebuilding of the wall, people were probably talking about what Zechariah had said. Nehemiah's enemies threatened to take the matter to the king of Persia. They used this threat as leverage to force Nehemiah to attend their proposed meeting. Although they had no real intention of going to the king (v. 9), they hoped their threats would ruin Nehemiah's reputation so that the workers would lose their resolve.

6:8, 9 Nehemiah would not allow himself to get sidetracked. Instead, he committed his enemy's accusations to the Lord (Ps. 31:13, 14). His enemies wanted to weaken his hands, so he prayed for the Lord to strengthen him.

6:10 Evidently Shemaiah was a priest. When Nehemiah visited him, Shemaiah proposed that they enter the holy place to be safe from assassins. Shemaiah's suggestion was for Nehemiah to flee into the sanctuary. It was lawful for an Israelite to seek refuge at the altar outside the temple (Ex. 21:13, 14), but only a priest could enter the holy place. Nehemiah's enemies were subtly tempting him. If they could trap him in sin, this would discredit him and the work. Then the people would cease to follow him, and the work on the wall would stop.

Leadership Principles from Nehemiah, Part 4

Leaders Resist Underhanded Politics (6:5–9)

Having failed to intimidate Nehemiah into stopping the work, Sanballat and his followers tried smear tactics to shut the project down (Neh. 6:5–7). Frustrated opponents often resort to that approach when other methods have proven useless.

The Bible does not explain why Nehemiah so easily dismissed their accusations (6:8) and apparently took no steps to prevent their letters from reaching the king. However, it seems plausible that he was relying on his years of trustworthy service as the king's cupbearer. He might have known that he had the full trust of King Artaxerxes, who would quickly see through the deception of anyone who accused Nehemiah of sedition. He also knew the process by which letters such as those Sanballat had written would be read and evaluated.

In short, Nehemiah had a clear conscience and an impeccable reputation. Therefore, no amount of "mud"could cause him to lose heart. He knew that none of it would stick. Further, Nehemiah did not resort to slinging mud himself. He probably could have come up with plenty of counter-accusations against his adversaries. But rather than waste time on a verbal exchange that would have distracted him from the wall, he prayed and ignored the politics swirling outside the city.

Leaders Serve People (7:1)

Some people regard leadership primarily as the art of getting results. Great leaders, they say, are those who get the job done. It matters very little how they operate, as long as they achieve their goals. But when we examine the great leaders of Scripture, we find that they not only accomplished much, but served people in the process.

Nehemiah illustrates the point rather well. His project of rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem was never an end in itself. The ultimate objective was to revitalize the people of Israel and return them to their covenant with God. To that end, after the wall was completed, Nehemiah turned the city's management over to local government leaders (7:1, 2). He did not create dependency on his own skills, nor did he use the project to gain wealth or fame for himself (5:18). Instead, right from the start, Nehemiah began the process of turning over management of Jerusalem to others.

Nehemiah also helped the people trace their roots by reviewing the census taken twenty-five years earlier in Ezra's time (7:5). That set the stage for repopulating the city (Neh. 11:1, 2) and continuing the initiative of urban revitalization.

6:11–16 God gave Nehemiah the wisdom to discern the error in Shemaiah's counsel. Tobiah and Sanballat were the principal instigators behind Shemaiah. Nehemiah indignantly rejected Shemaiah's counsel for two reasons. First, a man such as himself should not flee. Nehemiah was the governor, a leader of the people. He was responsible to the king and ultimately to the King of kings. A man in his position should not run and hide out of fear. Second, Nehemiah refused to go to the temple to save his life. The Law prohibited him from entering the Most Holy Place under penalty of death (Num. 18:7).

Excavated section of the defensive wall built under Nehemiah's supervision around the city of Jerusalem (Neh. 4:6; 6:15).

6:17–19 Here is a postscript. It turns out that during the building of the wall, a number of personal letters had been exchanged between some of the nobles of Judah and Tobiah. Tobiah and his son Jehohanan had married Jewish women. Some of the nobles sang Tobiah's praises to Nehemiah and then reported back to Tobiah everything they learned from the governor. With these letters, they hoped either to entrap Nehemiah in his own words or to intimidate him.

7:1 The Levites were assistants to the priests (Num. 18:1–4) and guarded and cleaned the sanctuary. Nehemiah appointed the Levites to their duties in the temple. The gatekeepers and singers were numbered among the Levites. The gatekeepers kept watch over the house of God and opened and closed the gates of the temple court (1 Chr. 9:17–19; 26:12–19). The singers led the people in their musical worship of God. The number of Levites, gatekeepers, and singers is given in vv. 43–45.

7:2 Nehemiah appointed two guards over the city as municipal officers in charge of security, each guard responsible for half of Jerusalem (3:9–12). One of the guards was Nehemiah's brother Hanani, who had visited Jerusalem and brought back a bleak report to Nehemiah in Shushan (1:2). The other guard was Hananiah. Nehemiah put him over the citadel because he was faithful and because he feared God. "Faithful" (Heb., literally, "a man of truth"), means "firm," "reliable." Hananiah was a God-fearing man, which means that he knew the Lord and walked with Him. The fear of God dreads God's displeasure, desires His favor, reveres His holiness, submits cheerfully to His will, is grateful for His benefits, sincerely worships Him, and conscientiously obeys His commands.

7:3 Nehemiah not only established guards over Jerusalem (v. 2), he also established guidelines for protecting the city. The gates of a city normally opened at sunrise, but Nehemiah ordered Jerusalem's gates to be kept closed until the sun was high. This extra precaution would have discouraged enemies from mounting a surprise attack at sunrise. Gates were critical to the defense of an ancient city. Nehemiah also ordered the citizens of Jerusalem to organize a civil defense, with people taking turns standing guard at night outside their own houses. This was a clever strategy. The people would have been more alert in guarding their own homes than they would have been in guarding a general part of the city.

7:4 For the size of the city, Jerusalem was underpopulated. Even though it was 90 years since people had returned under Zerubbabel to live there, there was still much undeveloped space within the walls renewed by Nehemiah.

7:5 my God put it into my heart: Nehemiah attributed to the Lord the idea of a census that would show the distribution of the population. If he knew the population pattern in the capital and the countryside, he could then determine which districts could best afford to lose a portion of their inhabitants to Jerusalem.

7:6–73 Nehemiah discovered a list, recorded by families, of the names of the Jewish people who came from Persia to Judah in 536 B.C. under Zerubbabel. This long list consisted of the names of leaders (v. 7), people by families (vv. 8–25), people by cities (vv. 26–38), priests (vv. 39–42), Levites (vv. 43–45), Nethinim or temple servants (vv. 46–56), Solomon's servants (vv. 57–60), returnees without a genealogy (vv. 61–65), the total number of people (vv. 66, 67), their animals (vv. 68, 69), and the gifts given for the support of the work (vv. 70–72). This same list is found in Ezra 2 with some minor variations.

7:70–73 One thousand gold drachmas would weigh about nine pounds.

8:1 The phrase all the people indicates that people gathered together from the cities and the countryside of Judah. The open square was presumably located between the southeast part of the temple and the eastern wall. The leader—in this case, the reader—was Ezra. This is the first time Ezra is mentioned in the Book of Nehemiah. The people instructed Ezra to get the Book of the Law, which Ezra had brought to Jerusalem as much as 13 years before. What had been confined to private study among learned men was made public to everyone.

Leaders Celebrate Often (8:1)

Effective leaders appreciate the value of celebrating the great things that God has done in and through their organizations. When the task is completed, when results have been achieved, when people have been served, then it is appropriate to take time to celebrate.

That is what Nehemiah did when the people completed the rebuilding of the wall (Neh. 8:1, 10). First he had Ezra read from the Law—the motivation for Nehemiah's mission in the first place. The words kindled not only a godly sorrow (9:1–3) but also genuine joy (8:10–12). Thus with heartfelt praise, choice food, and even an "amen" chorus (8:6), the community rejoiced in the Lord for the work it had accomplished.

One interesting sidelight to the celebration was Nehemiah's instruction to "send portions to those for whom nothing is prepared" (8:10). In other words, bring the poor to the party! Share the wealth. No one should be deprived of the joy.

8:2 In Scripture, women are often presumed to be present in group gatherings; here they are mentioned explicitly. Everyone who could hear with understanding—that is, older children as well as adults—gathered on the first day of the seventh month. The wall had been completed on the twenty-fifth day of the sixth month (6:15) so this event took place just a few days after the completion of the wall.

8:3 morning until midday: This would have been a period of about six hours.

8:4 Apparently these men stood alongside Ezra to assist in the long time that it took for the reading.

8:5 As Ezra unrolled the scroll, the people stood, signifying their reverence for the Word. This gesture later became characteristic of the Jewish people in synagogue services.

8:6, 7 Before reading the Book of the Law, Ezra led the people in prayer. Blessed here indicates identifying God as the source of the blessing of the people (Ps. 103:1). The people answered Amen and lifted their hands, indicating their participation with Ezra in prayer. Then they bowed their heads and worshiped the Lord with their faces to the ground, indicating their willing submission to their Lord and Creator.

8:8 they read distinctly: The Levites explained fully the meaning of the Law of God. they gave the sense: The Levites explained the Law so that the people got the sense and insight of what was being read.

8:9–11 Once the people understood the Word of God, they wept. They had heard the high standard of the Law and recognized their low standing before the Lord, and were convicted. Nehemiah, Ezra, and the Levites were undoubtedly glad to see the people's conviction. However, they urged the people to stop crying and reminded them that this day was holy to the LORD. The first day of the seventh month (v. 2) was the Feast of Trumpets. It was not a time to weep, but to celebrate. The people were instructed to celebrate the feast with eating, drinking, and sharing. The joy of the LORD could refer to the joy that God has, but the context indicates that this is something the people also experienced. The joy of the Lord is the joy that springs up in our hearts because of our relationship to the Lord. It is a God-given gladness found when we are in communion with God. When our goal is to know more about the Lord, the byproduct is His joy. Strength here means "place of safety," a "refuge," or "protection." The people's refuge was God. They had built a wall and they carried spears and swords, but He was their protection.

8:12 The people went to their houses to eat and drink, to share and rejoice, because they took to heart the words of Nehemiah, Ezra, and the Levites (vv. 1–9). They obeyed the Word of the Lord and celebrated the Feast of Trumpets.

8:13 The heads of families, the priests, and the Levites came back the next day to hear more teaching from God's Word. understand: Even the leaders gathered to gain the sense of the Scriptures and how they should act.

8:14, 15 By this time, the reading of the Law had advanced to Lev. 23. The listeners discovered that they were to observe the Feast of Tabernacles from the fifteenth to the twenty-second day of the seventh month. During this time, the people were to live in booths made of fresh branches of fruit and palm trees. The booths would be set up in courts, streets, public squares, and housetops. No secular work was to be done during this festival. This feast was observed in memory of the their ancestors' living in booths —that is, tents—after the Exodus (Lev. 23:40). The booth was not a symbol of misery, but of protection, preservation, and shelter.

8:16 The people observed the Feast of Tabernacles according to the Law. Those who lived in cities built their booths on the flat tops of their houses or in their courtyards. The priests and Levites built their booths in the courts of the temple. The people from the country constructed huts in the street before the Water Gate and the Gate of Ephraim.

8:17 since the days of Joshua … the children of Israel had not done so: The reference here is to the construction of booths. The people of Israel had certainly celebrated the Feast of Tabernacles since the days of Joshua. In fact, those who had returned with Ezra kept the feast the first year of their return (1 Kin. 8:65; 2 Chr. 7:9; especially Ezra 3:4).

8:18 The reading of the Law was required during the celebration of the Feast of Tabernacles, which occurred on the Sabbath year (Deut. 31:10, 11).

9:1–38 This chapter is arguably one of the most significant in the whole of Hebrew Scripture. It presents a compelling recital of the basic OT story line, with a glorious focus on the work of Yahweh in the lives of His people. The passage does not end with history but with response. Any true understanding of the person and work of God leads to actions of righteousness and attitudes of worship. Most of the chapter (vv. 5–38) is often regarded as a prayer to God. If it is a prayer, it may be the longest prayer recorded in the Bible. But in its form and content, it appears more like a psalm, showing affinities particularly with Pss. 105 and 106. The text does not record who wrote these words, but we may cite the tradition that Ezra wrote them, and call this "Ezra's Grand Psalm."

9:1 the twenty-fourth day of this month: The people's public worship had begun on the first day of the seventh month (8:2). More than three weeks later, the people were still engaged in public worship. Fasting, sackcloth, and dust were traditional signs of mourning; here these signs were preparation for the confession of the people's sin (v. 2).

9:2 Of Israelite lineage means "the seed of Israel." The separation from all foreigners was a sacred separation from foreign persons who worshiped other gods and whose practices might have brought harm to the integrity of the Lord's worship by His people. their sins and the iniquities of their fathers: The confession of the people's own sins was for personal and corporate forgiveness; the confession of their father's sins was for remembrance, that they might not continue in past evil actions and attitudes.

9:3, 4 As in 8:5, the people stood in reverence at hearing the reading of the Scriptures. one-fourth of the day: Approximately three hours (compare 8:3) were spent in public reading and three hours were spent in corporate worship. confessed: When this word is used with God as its object, as in this verse, it refers to the praise of God.

9:5 Stand up and bless the LORD your God: These words were shouted by the Levites. Forever and ever: The Lord of Hosts will be praised through all eternity. Your glorious name: The importance of the name of God can scarcely be overestimated. This psalm is solidly based on the theology of the Law (the Books of Moses) as would be expected following the three-week reading of the Scriptures (8:1, 2). Thus this poem's exaltation of the Lord's name is based on God's own revelation of His name recorded in the Book of Exodus (Ex. 3:14). The prophet Isaiah also praised the Lord's "glorious name" (Is. 63:14).

9:6 One of the fundamental teachings of Scripture is that God is not one among many; He alone is the living God (Deut. 6:4). heaven … earth … seas: God alone has made all things, and He alone preserves all things. Therefore, worship is due Him. The first section of this psalm (vv. 5, 6) establishes the mood for the whole poem: God is incomparable (Num. 23:8, 9; Deut. 4:32–40; Ps. 113:4–6).

9:7–31 Here is a recital of Yahweh's faithfulness to His people despite their checkered history. This lengthy section is the heart of the Psalm. The poet dramatically contrasts the faithfulness of Yahweh to the sorry record of Israel's disobedience to His commands, disregard for His wonder, and disdain for His chastening actions. Yet He remains faithful.

9:7, 8 You are the LORD God: The word order of the Hebrew text is striking: "You are He, Yahweh (the) God." The use of the definite article on the word God marks Him as "the true God." Abraham: The story of the election of Abraham begins in Gen. 12:1–3. The point here is to emphasize God's grace. Abraham did not seek out the Lord. Instead God sought him. You found his heart faithful: None of the people of biblical history was without sin except Jesus. Still, there were some whose faithfulness to God was constant. Among were Abraham and Sarah (Heb. 11). The subsequent history of the people of Israel was not marked by the steady faithfulness seen in Abraham, much to the displeasure of the Lord. The Promised Land, the land of the Canaanites, was populated by diverse groups of people who had all lost their right to the land because of their sinfulness (Gen. 15:18–21; Ex. 3:8, 17; 23:23; 33:2; Deut. 7:1; Josh. 3:10). You have performed Your words: This is the essence of the psalm. God's faithfulness to His people cannot be challenged. You are righteous: One of the greatest reasons to celebrate the character of God is His conformity to His own standard of perfection (v. 33).

9:9 The Book of Exodus tells about the plight of the Israelites in Egypt and their complaint to the Lord for deliverance. It then speaks of God's mercy in His response to the people's need. This verse suggests that before the people expressed their hurt, the Lord was already aware of their troubles.

9:10 The signs and wonders were the ten plagues of Ex. 7—12. These great acts of God were directed primarily against Pharaoh. acted proudly: In Ex. 18:11, Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses, used this same phrase to describe the presumptuous actions of the Egyptians. It was the proud actions of the Egyptians that brought God's judgment on them.

9:11, 12 You divided the sea refers to God's acts of deliverance at the Red Sea (Ex. 14; 15). Note the simile of Pharaoh's troops sinking as a stone (Ex. 15:5). cloudy pillar … pillar of fire: The continued presence of God in the lives of His people was indicated by these symbols (Ex. 13:21, 22; Num. 10:11, 34; Deut. 1:33).

9:13, 14 The significance of the Sabbath in God's Law for Israel is celebrated here (Ex. 20:8–11; 23:10–13; 31:12–18). By the hand of Moses: The Law came from the Lord, but it was given by the agency of Moses (John 1:17).

9:15 The gifts of bread, or manna (Ex. 16:9–35), and water (Ex. 17:1–7) demonstrated God's care for His people in their journey to the Promised Land.

9:16, 17 But they: These words stand in shocking contrast to the description of God's actions in vv. 9–15. The sin of the Israelites was that they acted proudly—that is, they behaved toward God in the same way that the people of Egypt had behaved toward them. The primary reference here is to the rebellion of Israel against the Lord at Kadesh (Num. 13; 14). The people's rebellion went so far that they appointed a leader to take them back to Egypt. But You: These words contrast the words "But they" at the beginning of v. 16 (Ex. 34:6). Ready to pardon means abounding in forgiveness. Slow to anger: This phrase translates a Hebrew idiom ("long of nose") that has the same meaning as the English expression "to have a long fuse." Kindness, from a word that means "loyal love," is used often in the Book of Psalms (Ps. 13:5). Because of the God's loyalty and steadfastness, He did not forsake His people.

9:18–21 In these verses, the poet describes the faithfulness of God to the Israelites in the wilderness despite their wretched behavior. Molded calf is a reference to the act of rebellion described in Ex. 32. Manifold mercies describes deep feelings like those of a mother for her child. You did not forsake them is repeated from v. 17. God would have been justified in abandoning His people because of their extreme sinfulness and wicked rebellion; yet He was compelled by His character not to do so. You also gave Your good Spirit: God not only gave gifts to His people, He made Himself known in their midst. Forty years: The wilderness experience (Deut. 2:7) is viewed in two ways in the Bible: (1) as a period of prolonged punishment because of rebellion; and (2) as a period of continued mercy because of God's unchanging character. clothes … feet: God's provisions were daily experiences of divine miracles (Deut. 8:4; 29:5).

9:22–25 The poet describes the mercies of God in Israel's conquest of the Promised Land and in God's continuing provision for them. kingdoms and nations: The Bible celebrates the conquest of the land east of the Jordan, as well as the conquest of Canaan itself. as the stars: The miraculous growth of the people is described in this familiar hyperbole (Gen. 15:5; 22:17). the people went in: The conquest of the land as described in the Book of Joshua is indicated here. strong cities … rich land … houses: With few exceptions, the people of Israel conquered the inhabitants of Canaan in such a way that they were able to move into the Canaanites' undamaged homes and cities. The Israelites were also able to enjoy crops and wells for which they did not have to work. All of this is testimony to God's great goodness.

9:26–29 The rebellion of the people was expressed during the period of the judges and throughout the period of the kings. Cast Your law behind their backs is a graphic metaphor for rebellion. killed Your prophets: Jesus also directed this charge against the rebellious people (Matt. 23:31). You delivered them into the hands of their enemies refers to the experiences of the Israelites during the period described by the Book of Judges. he shall live by them: Salvation in any period is only by grace through faith (Eph. 2:8, 9). Keeping the Law was never a means of salvation, but a guide for living a life that pleases the Lord.

9:30, 31 God continued to be faithful to His disobedient people. For many years refers to the history of the people of Israel from Saul to the last of the kings. Your spirit in Your prophets speaks of God's work in inspiring the words of the prophets of Israel (Jer. 1:9). You gave them into the hand of the peoples of the lands refers to the captivity of Israel. nor forsake them: For the third time in this psalm (vv. 17, 19), this reality is affirmed.

9:32–35 On the basis of the Lord's continuing mercy through the centuries, the poet now turns to the present situation and asks that God's faithfulness will continue to be experienced by His people. This is a marvelous demonstration of the manner of biblical prayer. On the basis of God's past actions, the beleaguered believer requests in faith God's continuing mercy.

9:32 Now refers to the time of the great revival under Ezra (8:1, 2). covenant and mercy: God's covenant loyalty is unbreakable (Heb. 6:17, 18). Do not let all the trouble seem small: In view of the unspeakable wonder of God, the hardship of His people might seem too small a matter to be noticed. kings … people: The effects of Israel's trouble were all-inclusive. From the days of the kings of Assyria: The incursions of the Assyrians, beginning with Tiglath-Pileser III, began a period of oppression for the Jewish people.

9:33–35 You are just: The poet affirms the righteousness of God. You have dealt faithfully … we have done wickedly: This is the basic reality not only of this chapter, but of the history of God and His people.

9:36, 37 Servants is used as a term of irony here. The people of Israel had been called to be the servants of God (Lev. 25:55), but here they were servants of foreign rulers. The produce of the land did not belong to them; it went to kings. The people were taxed by Persians for the produce of the land that was God's gift to them.

9:38 The psalm ends in action, not just sentiment. The intent was changed behavior. The pledge was to mirror God's faithfulness. The new covenant community desired to demonstrate the faithfulness of Abraham and Sarah.

10:1 The way someone "signed" a document in the ancient world was similar to the use of a wax seal in more recent times. A distinctive seal was pressed into soft clay. The pattern of the seal showed what authority issued that document.

10:2–8 The priests who sealed the covenant are listed here. Some of these names appear in a later list as heads of priestly houses (12:11–20). Twenty-one priests who were heads of households signed the agreement in the name of the houses and families of their respective classes. Ezra's name does not appear, perhaps indicating that he was not the head of a household.

10:9–13 The Levites also signed the covenant. Some of these names appear later as heads of the orders of Levites (12:8).

10:14–27 Forty-four leaders also signed the covenant. In contrast to the religious leaders, these were the political leaders of the Jewish community (compare 7:4–63; Ezra 2).

10:28 Not only leaders, but laypeople signed the covenant. The Nethinim were temple servants who did menial work in the sanctuary (Ezra 2:43). Those who had separated themselves from the peoples of the lands were the descendants of those Israelites who had been left in the land and who joined the returning remnant. Men, women, and children of sufficient age signed the covenant.

10:29 entered into a curse: The phrase points to the penalties for failure to comply with the covenant. The people took an oath to live by the Word of God. God's Law: The Law was a gift of God, given by Moses. The Israelites swore that they would observe the Law of God. commandments … ordinances … statutes: This is a way of speaking of the whole Law of God (1:7).

10:30 The Israelites' decision to obey the Word of God in every area of their lives (v. 29) was not just a general statement. The people specifically vowed to obey the Word of God in their marriage relationships. Marriage with non-Jewish people was clearly forbidden in the Scriptures (Ex. 34:12–16; Deut. 7:3; Josh. 23:12; Judg. 3:6). We would not give our daughters … nor take their daughters: The parents of Israel decided that they would not permit their children to marry non-Jews. In the ancient world, marriages usually were arranged by the parents.

10:31 Other areas of life were included in the people's dedication to God's Law. This verse deals with Sabbath observance. Three particulars regarding the Sabbath are mentioned. First, the people promised to stop all buying and selling from foreigners on the Sabbath. Second, they pledged to observe the Sabbatical year—that is, to leave their fields uncultivated during every seventh year (Lev. 25:1–7). Third, they decided not to collect debts during the Sabbatical year (Deut. 15:1–6). The people were dedicating themselves to observe the Word of God in their business life.

10:32–39 The remainder of the chapter covers the people's promise to obey the Word of God concerning the temple. In this area, the people made four promises. (1) They promised to pay a temple tax to defray the expenses of the worship services in God's sanctuary. Verse 33 lists the objects that the tax would supply. (2) They promised to provide a wood offering. The Law prescribed that wood should be constantly burning on the altar (Lev. 6:12, 13). Nehemiah made this the business of the congregation. (3) They promised to offer their firstfruits at the temple. The firstfruits of the ground were given to the Lord as an acknowledgment of His status as landowner (Ex. 23:19; 34:26; Deut. 26:2). The people promised the firstfruits of all trees, which means that they were going beyond the requirements of the Law. The firstborn of the animals also belonged to the Lord (Num. 18:15, 17–19). (4) They promised to pay the priests.

The Ten Percent Solution

Nehemiah came up with a novel solution to revitalize a dying urban area, Jerusalem: let the outlying suburbs donate one-tenth of their people to move into the city (Neh. 11:1, 2). In effect, the districts surrounding Jerusalem tithed people for the purpose of community redevelopment. Nehemiah's recruitment for the repopulation program involved casting lots to determine who would relocate (11:1; compare Josh. 18:8–10). Those who were selected were "blessed" (Heb. barak, Neh. 11:2), or ordained, to the task by their fellow citizens. This suggests a formal commissioning of these families to carry out the redevelopment of Jerusalem.

11:1–3 Nehemiah cast lots to repopulate Jerusalem. We do not know for certain the nature of casting lots in the Bible. The most common suggestion is that stones were marked and put into a vase or urn, or into the lap or the fold of a garment. Then they would be mixed and one stone drawn out. Numerous uses for drawing lots are recorded in the Bible: (1) to determine which goat should be sacrificed on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16:7–19); (2) to divide the land among the tribes (Num. 26:55); (3) to detect who had committed a crime (Josh. 7:14–18; Jon. 1:7); (4) to decide who should go to war (Judg. 20:9); (5) to determine who should be the first king of Israel (1 Sam. 10:20, 21); (6) who had offended God (1 Sam. 14:41, 42; (7) who would serve in the temple (1 Chr. 24:5); (8) who should burn the wood (Neh. 10:34; (9) who should replace Judas (Acts 1:26). Here in Nehemiah, lots were cast to determine God's will. Solomon wrote, "The lot is cast into the lap, but its every decision is from the Lord" (Prov. 16:33). one out of ten: This was the proportion demanded in order to bring the population of Jerusalem to the level deemed necessary for its strength and viability.

11:4–1 Four hundred and sixty-eight men from the tribe of Judah lived in Jerusalem; nine hundred and twenty-eight men from the tribe of Benjamin also lived there. According to 1 Chr. 9:3, descendants of Ephraim and Manasseh also made their home in Jerusalem.

11:12, 13 The work of the house refers to the work of the temple—specifically, attending the sacrifices of the temple.

11:14, 15 Mighty men of valor refers to the men who guarded the city of Jerusalem.

11:16–18 The oversight of the business outside of the house of God refers to the maintenance of the temple, including repairs.

11:19 The gatekeepers were also defenders of the city.

11:20–22 the overseer of the Levites: Uzzi was a principal administrator of the temple.

11:23, 24 The king's deputy was the representative of the people. This individual may have received and forwarded petitions and complaints to the king.

11:25–36 These verses record the residents outside Jerusalem—namely the tribes of Judah (vv. 25–30) and Benjamin (vv. 31–36). The people of Judah lived in 17 towns and their surrounding villages. The descendants of Benjamin occupied 15 sites.

11:25 Kirjath Arba is another name for Hebron.

12:1–8 The return of Zerubbabel is recorded in Ezra 1—6. Jeshua is Joshua the priest. Ezra: This is not the priest who wrote the book of the same name (Ezra 7:1).

12:9 stood across from them: The singing was conducted with two choirs standing opposite each other.

12:10, 11 The listing of the descendants of Eliashib all the way to Jaddua may indicate that someone who lived after Ezra and Nehemiah added some of these names.

12:12–21 In vv. 1–7, the names of twenty-two priests are listed. Here only twenty names are recorded. Hattush (v. 2) and Maadiah (v. 5) are not mentioned in this list.

12:22 Darius refers to Darius II (Nothus), who ruled Persia from 423 to 405 B.C.

12:23–26 The book of the chronicles was not the biblical book, but an official record of the heads of the fathers' houses.

12:27–29 After the completion of Jerusalem's wall (ch. 6), a revival of the people broke out (chs. 8–10). After the revival, Nehemiah took steps to repopulate the city (7:4, 5; 11:1, 2). These two factors explain why the dedication of the wall was delayed. The word "dedication" (Heb. hanukka) is transliterated in English as "Hanukkah." The festival of Hanukkah developed from the experience of the Jewish people in rededicating the temple after its desecration by the Syrians and the subsequent revolt of the Maccabees in the second century B.C. The people celebrated with gladness, referring not only to their festivity but also to the worship of God. Thanksgivings, a term commonly found in the Book of Psalms (Ps. 147:7), means "public acknowledgment," "to declare aloud, in public, to another." This word, along with singing and instruments, suggests the use of the Psalms in musical settings with words of praise and instrumental accompaniment.

12:30–35 The method of purification is not stated, but the order is—the priests and Levites, followed by the people, the gates, and wall. Those who bore the vessels of the Lord had to be cleansed first.

12:36–42 The association of the name David with musical instruments was a reference to Israel's glorious past.

12:43 The sacrifices offered at the dedication of the wall probably were not burnt offerings but peace offerings, in which the people shared a common meal. The dedication was an occasion for great rejoicing. Everyone, including wives and children, took part.

12:44–47 After the dedication of the wall, the people took steps to provide for the priests, Levites, singers, and gatekeepers who served in the temple. The joy of the Lord should produce service for the Lord. In this case, the people's joy overflowed into providing for the temple. Men were appointed as custodians of the firstfruits and tithes. the days of David and Asaph: The times of the great music of Israel were never forgotten; they served as a model for the days still to come.

13:1–31 This chapter is a sort of “surprise ending” to the book. To understand it, one must know that between chapters twelve and thirteen Nehemiah returned to Persia. At first sight, the phrase On that day (v. 1) may seem to refer to the day of dedication just pictured. But 13:6 and 7 make that impossible, as does v. 10, which states that on the “day” of chapter thirteen, the Levites were not being given their portion, whereas that had just been done at the time of dedication (12:47). So, Nehemiah returned to Persia between chapters twelve and thirteen and on the day after his return, he discovered what became the surprise ending of his book; namely, that those devoted and dedicated people had tripped over temptation, fallen into sin, and lain down in disobedience. This chapter deals with five issues: foreigners (vv. 1–3), the temple (vv. 4–9), the Levites (vv. 10–14), the Sabbath (vv.15–22), and marriage (vv. 23–31). More specifically, the chapter records separation from foreigners, the cleansing of the temple, the restoration of the Levites, the enforcement of the Sabbath, and the condemnation of mixed marriages.

13:1–3 The first area of backsliding for the people was their relationship with foreigners. Even though 9:2 states that “those of Israelite lineage separated themselves from all foreigners,” the people once again allowed foreigners into the congregation. Relationships between the Jewish people and the foreigners in the land had caused them to violate God’s command (1 Cor. 15:33).

13:4–9 The second major area of backsliding dealt with in this chapter (vv. 1–3) was that the high priest was allowing God’s enemy to live in God’s house. Eliashib was the high priest (vv. 4, 28). Tobiah was one of the men who had tried to stop the building of the wall (2:10, 19; 4:3; 6:10–12, 17, 19). Eliashib allowed Tobiah to stay in the large room of the temple that had previously been used for storing grain and the like. In fact, Tobiah had been given access to several rooms of the temple.

13:6, 7 Nehemiah returns to Jerusalem.

13:8, 9 When Nehemiah returned to Jerusalem, he immediately initiated reforms. He removed Tobiah’s furniture from the chamber and then ordered that the room be cleansed. When the washing, scouring, and sprinkling with blood were completed, the chamber was once again filled with grain and the other items that had been there before.

Nehemiah's Religious Reforms

Although Nehemiah is usually remembered for what is considered his greatest accomplishment, rebuilding Jerusalem's wall, he was also a religious reformer. Like Ezra, Nehemiah was a purist in religious matters. True worship was only possible to the undefiled, and to Nehemiah that disqualified all of the people who had remained in the land during the Exile. Only the returned exiles, who had kept the faith pure while in captivity, were acceptable. When Nehemiah found that Tobiah, one of his enemies and an Ammonite official (Neh. 2:19), had been given rooms in the temple itself, he was aghast and removed Tobiah promptly (13:7–9). Nehemiah also restored official support of the Levitical ministers (13:10–14) and resumed enforcement of the Sabbath laws (13:15–22).

13:10, 11 Contended is a term used often in the prophets to refer to God bringing a legal case against His errant people (Jer. 2:9). Nehemiah was acting like a prophet, bringing a legal case against an apostate person. He contended for what was right. Note the pointed question he asked: Why is the house of God forsaken?

13:12, 13 Then all Judah brought the tithe: The gifts that should have been brought earlier were finally being brought by the people. treasurers: Nehemiah chose faithful men (7:2; 1 Cor. 4:2; 2 Tim. 2:2) to make sure the gifts were distributed properly.

13:14 Normally prayer is offered to the Lord before or during an event. In this case, Nehemiah's prayer followed his good deeds. Nehemiah was saying, "What I did, I did in accordance with Your will; now preserve it and protect me."

13:15–22 Another difficulty that Nehemiah faced concerned the Sabbath. The Jewish people in Judah were working on Saturday. People were buying and selling produce in Jerusalem. Men of Tyre brought fish and other things to be sold both in Judah and Jerusalem. These were all violations of Ex. 20:8–11 and of the people's own oath (10:31). The people had put their business ahead of obedience to God's command concerning their day of rest.

13:19–22 I commanded the gates to be shut: Nehemiah took charge, ordering the gates to be closed from Friday evening to Saturday evening and even posting his own servants as guards. When the merchants set up outside the wall, Nehemiah warned them that if they stayed around again on the Sabbath, he would himself attack them. Awed by the threat of the one-man army, the merchants left.

Ashdod and Its Implications

The name “Ashdod” (Neh. 13:23) was notorious among the Israelites as it indicated a group that had long been their enemies, the Philistines. Ashdod, located near the Mediterranean Sea, was one of five principal cities of the Philistines. It was an important military and commercial center because of its strategic location on the Via Maris, the main highway between Egypt and Syria.

13:23, 24 The problem of Jews marrying foreigners had been dealt with thirty years before by Ezra (Ezra 9:1–4). The people had then made a covenant, vowing that they would not do this (10:30). In this case Nehemiah found children of the mixed marriages who could not speak Hebrew, the language of Scripture. Without knowing Hebrew, these children could not learn the Law in their homes or worship in the holy temple. The Jews were raising children who did not know or worship the living God.

13:25–27 Nehemiah’s attack on the Jews who had married non-Jews was confrontational, direct, and even brutal. contended … cursed … struck … pulled out their hair: It is unnerving to read this list of verbs and imagine the scene. These were not the dispassionate remarks of someone giving a seminar. Nehemiah used everything he could, including his hands, to enforce obedience to the Law. made them swear: Nehemiah forced them to comply to the will of God in this matter. After all, this was the principal issue that had led to Israel’s captivity in the beginning. Nehemiah simply could not allow such a disaster to happen again. Solomon: Despite his greatness and God’s love for him, even Solomon had sinned greatly in this regard (1 Kin. 11:4–8). How then, with the great lessons of the past so clearly before them, could the people repeat these sins?

13:28, 29 I drove him from me: This action was taken against the most prominent offender, the grandson of the high priest Eliashib. This young man had married the daughter of Sanballat (2:10), the governor of Samaria and the archenemy of the Jewish people. The marriage was particularly offensive because it formed a treasonable alliance with Israel’s enemies and compromised the purity of the high priesthood (ch. 12). Because of the seriousness of this offense, Nehemiah took dramatic action. He expelled the young man from the community, praying that God would remember those who had defiled the priesthood.

13:30, 31 I cleansed them of everything pagan: Nehemiah's testimony was that he had done everything he knew how to bring about righteousness in the priesthood and among the Levites, including their offerings and service. Nehemiah's last recorded words (5:19), remember me, O my God, for good, would serve well as the last words of any person of faith.

The Book of Esther

THE BOOK OF ESTHER HAS ALL THE ELEMENTS of a great novel: a beautiful young orphan girl rises from obscurity to become queen. She even hides a secret that could bring about her demise. There is also the ambitious villain, whose passion is to destroy the innocent. Finally the story line involves a power struggle, romantic love, and a startling exposé. But in the end, the point of this true story is clear: once again the Israelites' God had miraculously saved His people from certain destruction.

The events of Esther span a decade during the reign of Ahasuerus, or Xerxes, who succeeded his father Darius as ruler of the Persian empire in 486 B.C. During his reign (486–465 B.C.), Xerxes continued his father's campaign against Greece for its role in the Ionian revolt. After suffering defeat, he retired to Shushan, one of the four capitals of the Persian empire. Around 483 B.C. he threw an extravagant feast in Shushan to celebrate his achievements. Ten years later he executed Haman for his evil schemes (1:3; 7:9).

Some critical scholars question the historical accuracy of Esther on various counts. One difficulty is the passage that describes the royal feast (1:3–5). The passage appears to indicate that the feast lasted a particularly long time: "one hundred and eighty days in all" (1:4). However, a better interpretation is that this long period of time was the period of preparation for the military campaign in Greece, during which Xerxes displayed his power and wealth to his officials. The feast itself lasted seven days—a lengthy time for a feast but not an incredible period (1:5).

Another difficulty is that neither Vashti nor Esther is mentioned outside the Bible. However, historians do note that following his unsuccessful campaign against Greece (482–479 B.C.), Xerxes sought refuge in his harem. This coincides with the elevation of Esther (2:17). Furthermore, the word translated queen (1:9; 2:22) may refer merely to a principal wife rather than to a woman who ruled beside the king. Thus the obscurity of Esther and Vashti would be understandable. Even so, some still balk at the idea that a Persian ruler would marry a Jewish woman rather than choosing someone from the aristocratic Persian families. However, the Book of Esther makes it clear that Esther initially hid her Jewish identity. She used her Persian name Ishtar or Esther instead of her Hebrew name Hadassah. The climax of the story involves her surprising revelation that she was a Jew.

The Book of Esther has held an important place in the canon due to its strong testimony to God's providence and protection of His people. However, the book has been challenged by some. One of the main points in the dispute is the remarkable fact that neither the word God nor God's name Yahweh is found in the book. There are two explanations that may account for this. First, it may be a result of the author's chosen point of view. The author might have viewed the Jewish people who remained in Persia and did not return to the land of Israel (Ezra 1:1) as a people cut off from the principal blessings of God. Thus, the absence of God's name in the book might be a way of expressing God's distance from the exiles. At the same time, the book clearly reveals God's surprising protection of them.

Second, the author may have written the book in the form of a Persian state chronicle in order to explain to the Persians the Jewish celebration of Purim. In accordance with this style, the author emphasizes the king's name, titles, and lists, but he writes about the Jewish people in a detached tone. This could help explain why the Book of Esther is the only book in the Bible that does not directly mention God.

Through the twists and turns of the story line, the author weaves an underlying story about God's character. The narrative demonstrates God's providence and sovereignty in a situation that seemed hopeless. The Israelites were living among foreigners who did not fear God and who did not care about them. An implacable enemy of the Israelites had gained power at court and was laying a plan to destroy the Jews. But at a time when God seemed so distant, He was actually preparing to deliver His people. God was in control of every event, even the sleeplessness of a foreign king (6:1).

Thus in the Persian capital, God demonstrated His covenant loyalty to the Israelites. Long ago, God had promised Abraham that He would curse any individual who cursed the Israelites (Gen. 12:2, 3). The downfall of Haman dramatically illustrated God's faithfulness to His promise. Even to the Israelites who remained in a foreign land, God remained true to His word, for they were still His people. Thus, the author of Esther clearly illustrates what the Israelites were celebrating at the Feast of Purim: God's faithful protection of His people.

The identity of the author of Esther is unknown. However the writer was probably Jewish and lived in Persia. A strong Jewish spirit pervades the book, particularly evident in the account of the establishment of the Jewish festival Purim. Moreover, the author was acquainted with Persian culture, as the extensive descriptions of the palace complex at Shushan (also called Susa) and the domestic details about the reign of King Ahasuerus indicate. For these reasons, some Jewish rabbis have ascribed the authorship of the book to Mordecai, one of its principal characters.

Whoever the author was, Esther was probably written shortly after the reign of Ahasuerus, no earlier than 465 B.C. The author writes of the rule of Ahasuerus and the deeds of Mordecai (10:2) in the past tense, indicating the book was not composed during Ahasuerus's reign. Yet the fact that Greek words do not appear in the book rules out a date after about 300 B.C., when the Greek language became more prominent in the ancient Middle East. On the other hand, the numerous words of Persian origin in the book point to its being composed during the latter half of the fifth century B.C. For example, the book calls Xerxes by the Hebrew name Ahasuerus, a spelling derived from the Persian Khshayarsha. If it had been written after 300 B.C. a spelling closer to the Greek form Xerxes would be expected.

Commentary

1:1 Ahasuerus: This capricious Persian king, also known by the Greek name Xerxes, reigned 486–465 B.C. (Ezra 4:6). His kingdom extended from India (the region drained by the Indus River, now modern Pakistan), to Ethiopia (or Cush), referring to a section of what is now Northern Sudan. The Persian people were Aryans, Indo-Europeans who had entered what is now Iran toward the end of the second millennium B.C. They came from the regions of what is now southern Russia, east and south of the Caspian Sea and had established their dynasty about 700 B.C. province: The Persian kingdom under Ahasuerus was divided into smaller geographical areas called provinces and larger divisions called satrapies.

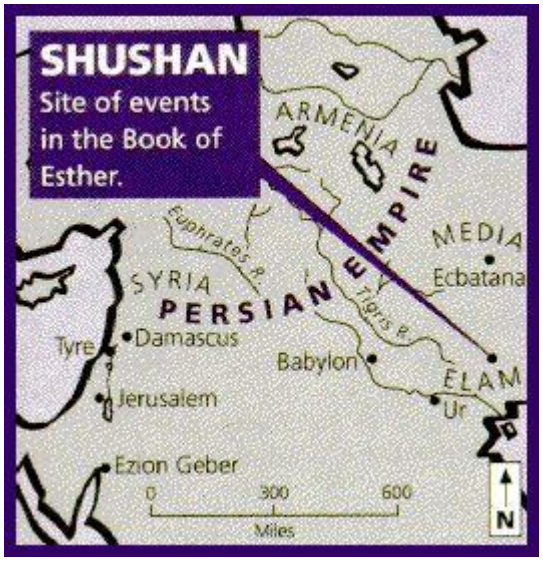
Clilffside tomb of the Persian king Xerxes I, the ruler generally identified as King Ahasuerus of the Book of Esther (Esth. 1:1).

1:2 The capital of ancient Elam, Shushan (or Susa) was one of four royal residences for the Persian emperors. Shushan was 150 miles north of the Persian Gulf. It was the location of one of Daniel's visions (Dan. 8:2), and it was where Nehemiah served as cupbearer to King Artaxerxes I (Neh. 1:1, 2). citadel: The capital city had a palace fortress on the highest point of the city, the acropolis.

1:3–5 In the third year of his reign, Ahasuerus displayed the riches of his kingdom for six months. made a feast: There is some uncertainty about whether the king gave one feast or two. It is possible that v. 3 introduces the idea of the grand banquet and v. 5 records the specifics of what turned out to be a seven-day festival. It is not likely that the feasting itself extended for 180 days. Persia and Media: Previously the Medes had been the stronger of the two nations. Beginning with the reign of Cyrus, the Persians dominated the kingdom. Together they established a powerful empire (Dan. 5:28).

1:6, 7 white and blue: These were the royal colors of the Persians. The Persian custom was to recline on couches at the table.



The City of Shushan (Susa)

Shusan was the ancient capital and center of culture for Elam, about 150 miles north of the Persian Gulf in modern-day Iran. It was the home of Ahasuerus (probably Xerxes I, 486–465 B.C.), who made Esther his queen. This is the site at which numerous Mesopotamian artifacts have been found, including the code of Hammurabi.

1:8 The monarch ordered that guests could drink as much or as little as they pleased. This differed from the usual Persian custom by which people at a banquet were required to drink each time the king raised his cup.

1:9 Vashti: The queen gave a separate banquet for the women guests. This verse serves to introduce the scene in vv. 10–12 and to establishes for readers the important distinctions between the status of women and men in the Persian court.

1:10–12 Castrated men, or eunuchs, were assigned to act as harem attendants and as agents of communication between the king and his harem (6:14). Because of the level of trust these men could attain, they might also function as administrators in the kingdom as well. Harbona plays a significant role later in the story (7:9).

1:13 men who understood the times: Court astrologers and magicians gave advice and predicted the future on the basis of what they pretended to know about the supernatural. The prophets often looked upon such charlatans with derisive scorn (Is. 44:24, 25).

1:14, 15 The seven counselors of Ezra 7:14 were probably the same group of men. These men enjoyed the unusual privilege of speaking personally with the king.

1:16–18 Acting as spokesman for the others, Memucan responded shrewdly by enlarging the offense beyond a personal affront to the king.

1:18 contempt: The Hebrew word used occurs only here in the OT. It is related to the verb translated despise in v. 17.

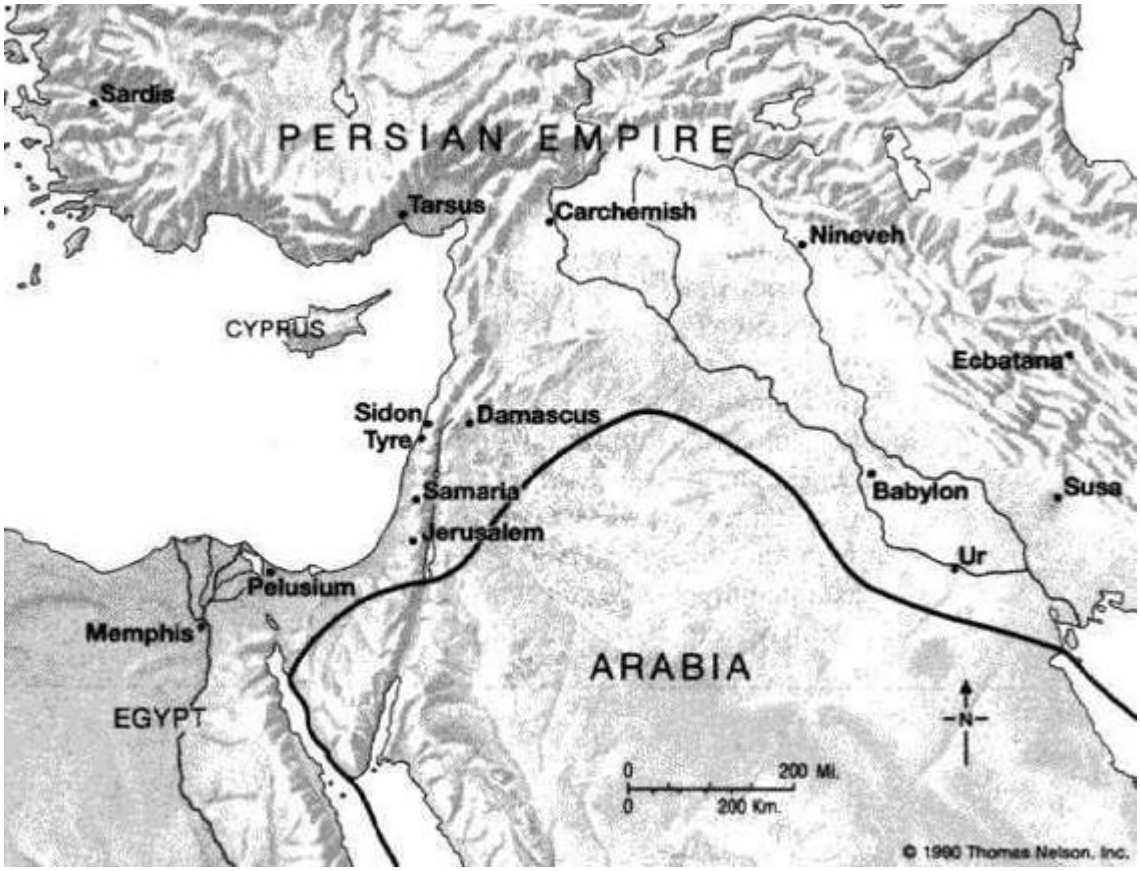
1:19–21 royal decree: Memucan urged the king to take immediate action against Vashti. The queen would be given what amounted to a divorce. This would have the effect of demoting her from her privileged position as the chief wife of the king.

1:22 sent letters: The Persians were known for their excellent postal system. speak in the language of his own people: This suggests the respect that was held for local languages and dialects in the Persian empire.

2:1–3 It was customary for the virgins of the king's harem to spend a year in beauty treatments and purification rites before going to see the king (v. 12). Again we see the exaggerated sense of power of the king contrasted with the fragile status of women. Beautiful young virgins were seen to exist merely to bring pleasure to the king.

2:4, 5 The name Mordecai is related to the name of Marduk, the principal Babylonian deity. The phrase a certain Jew, along with the genealogy and the tribal name Benjamite, prepares us for the upcoming conflict with Haman in ch. 3. Shimei may refer to the man from the family of Saul who cursed David (2 Sam. 16:5–13). Kish may be the father of Saul (1 Sam. 9:1, 2). If these figures are the ones intended, they are Mordecai's remote ancestors from the tribe of Benjamin.

2:6 This verse is difficult to interpret, as the Hebrew text does not indicate the subject of the verb had been carried away. The subject could not be Mordecai. If he had been among those carried away into captivity, he would not likely have lived until the time of Ahasuerus. The subject might be Mordecai's ancestor Kish, understood to be a different person than the father of Saul. It is also possible that the original phrasing merely means that Mordecai and his family were among those descended from the captives who were taken to Babylon in the days of Nebuchadnezzar. In this case, the person who was brought to Babylon is not specifically mentioned; only the more well-known ancestors are noted.



The Persian Empire (500 B.C.)

By Esther's time the Persian empire stretched from India in the east through Asia Minor to Greece in the west and included Egypt and some of coastal Africa to the south.

2:7 Hadassah is a Hebrew name that means "Myrtle." Esther is a Persian name meaning "Star." Like the name of her cousin Mordecai, the name Esther was related to that of a local deity, the goddess Ishtar. Jewish people in antiquity customarily had two names when they lived in regions distant from Israel. One would be their secular name, a name understandable in their adopted culture, and the other would be their sacred name given in Hebrew. lovely and beautiful: The two words complement each other to mean "supremely lovely" or "exceedingly beautiful."

2:8 We cannot determine whether Esther went willingly or reluctantly to the king's palace. She was brought into the palace complex, but not yet into the living quarters of the king. As custodian of the king's harem, Hegai was a eunuch (2:3).

2:9 obtained his favor: This phrase characterizes Esther's relationships with all who knew her, including the king (v. 17). Esther found favor with many, as is demonstrated throughout the chapter. The Hebrew word for favor is a term used regularly in the Bible to describe the character of God. This word may be translated "loyal love." The frequency of this concept with regard to Esther in this book may be a subtle way of suggesting the presence of the Lord without actually mentioning His name. her allowance: Hegai made certain that Esther received choice food in liberal portions. He also gave her seven personal attendants and the most desirable place to live within the quarters of the harem.

2:10–13 Many reasons have been suggested concerning Esther's hesitation to reveal her national origin. The time does come when Esther would identify herself and her people (ch. 8). In fact, her self-disclosure would come at the point when the danger to her person was highest.

Concubines

It was common in the ancient world for powerful rulers to have sizeable harems of concubines (Esth. 2:14; 1 Kin. 11:3). These women were often the captured wives of conquered rulers and their nobles. Kept as virtual slaves, they were used as wives to bear children, especially sons.

2:14 concubines: These women lived unfortunate, though highly pampered, lives. If the king never called for them again, they were destined to live as though they were widows for the remainder of their years (2 Sam. 20:3). The point made here emphasizes how courageous Esther was when she later made her appearance before Ahasuerus (4:11; 5:1).

2:15 Again we see the providence of God at work. Esther found favor with everyone she encountered. Here we learn her father's name, Abihail (2:7).

2:16 Esther became the principal wife of the king four years after Vashti was divorced. This period harmonizes with what we know from other historical accounts of the period. The account suggests that Ahasuerus (Xerxes) sought solace in his harem after his military trouncing in his disastrous campaign in Greece, a story is told by the Greek historian Herodotus. The month Tebeth corresponds to our December-January.

2:17 The king apparently was so delighted with Esther that he made her queen right away. The nouns grace and favor together mean "abundant favor."

2:18, 19 sat within the king's gate: This phrase has a special significance; it means that Mordecai had an official position. Shortly after Esther became queen, she gave Mordecai a position within the king's gate where official business took place (Deut. 22:13–15). In this strategic position, Mordecai was well placed not only in terms of his personal status but also to discern the various winds of power and intrigue that might endanger his cousin Esther. This is the kind work of God's providence. Mordecai was also able to use his position to discover the plot of the doorkeepers to kill the king (2:21). Mordecai's motivation was principally one of loyalty to the king, not a selfish desire to gain information that would be personally helpful in instances of palace intrigue.

2:20–23 Mordecai learned of a plot by two angry eunuchs to take the king’s life. Mordecai not only used this information to save the king, but eventually his own people.

3:1 Some believe Agagite as a reference to the historical district of Agag within the Persian empire. Others believe this term more likely linked Haman's descent with the Amalekites. These people, descendants of Esau (Gen. 36:12), were ancient enemies of the Hebrews (Ex. 17:8). Agag, a king of the Amalekites, was captured by King Saul (1 Sam. 15:8). If Mordecai descended from Saul, and Haman from the Amalekites (as many rabbis believe), then what follows is the continuation of a long-standing hostility between their families.

3:2–4 All the officials of the king were on duty within the king's gate. Mordecai would not bow or pay homage: To comprehend the force of this verse, we need to look at v. 4. There Mordecai reportedly told the king's servants that he was a Jew. It is not known whether the bowing was required as an act of worship to the king's man or merely as an overt sign of deep respect. The Hebrew verbs in this passage usually describe the worship of God. There were occasions when Hebrews bowed before kings or high officials (1 Sam. 24:8) without any violation of the prohibitions of false worship. It may be that in Mordecai's case also, the bow was not to be a religious act, but one of honor. As a Jew, Mordecai may have not been able to bring himself to show this sign of respect to one who was an ancestral enemy.

3:5, 6 Mordecai's daily refusal to bow down to Haman filled the official with such rage that he sought to kill all Jewish people in the Persian empire. Haman's Amalekite ancestry would account for his deep hatred.

3:7 Nisan: This, the first month of the ancient lunar calendar, corresponds to March-April. The twelfth year of the king's reign was 474 B.C. they cast pur: The word pur was the basis for the name of the Feast of Purim in ch. 9. The casting of lots was common in ancient times. The fact that the lot was cast at the beginning of the year to determine the best time to destroy the Jewish people fits with the culture of the day. The Babylonian religion maintained that the gods gathered at the beginning of each year to establish the destiny of human beings.

3:8, 9 Haman did not identify the people at first. He may have played on the Persian emperor's native sense of superiority to other peoples. Haman acted as if his motive were no more than proper concern for the welfare of the king. He implied that this unnamed group was rebellious, a present danger to the king.

3:10 The king's signet ring symbolized his authority. When he gave this ring to Haman, he was passing to him a symbol of his own royal person. This meant that Haman could proceed with his plan.

3:11 It might seem that the king was refusing to accept the money. However, this is difficult to harmonize with Mordecai's words to Esther in 4:7 and her comments about being "sold" in 7:4. More likely, the king was engaging in the common method of bargaining (Gen. 23:7–18).

3:12 scribes: The king had secretaries who put into writing the official documents. This verse gives us a picture of the comprehensiveness of the decree. It was given to officials in the provinces, making sure it was distributed everywhere. It was also written in the language of each people group within the realm. The mark of a signet ring was similar to an official signature in our own day (1 Kin. 21:8).

3:13, 14 The couriers were royal messengers stationed at various spots along the main roads who would carry messages on horseback. The plot to kill the Jewish people included the slaughter of those of all age groups and both sexes. The month Adar: This corresponds to February-March (3:7; 8:12).

3:15 The contempt of the king and Haman who sat down to drink while this message was being delivered cannot help but strike a responsive chord of empathy for the Jewish people among the readers of this book. The text notes that even the people in the city of Shushan were perplexed. The severe brutality of the decree is emphasized by the utter unconcern for human life expressed in this line. On the other hand, God's providence is certainly seen in the allowance of eleven months' time before the decree will go into effect.

4:1, 2 In the ancient Middle East sackcloth and ashes were used as a visible sign of mourning, indicating a sense of desolation.

4:3 In this book fasting connotes a strong but veiled appeal to God to intervene in a time of severe crisis. In v. 16 Esther commanded a three-day fast among Shushan's Jews. The queen herself, along with her maids, undertook a fast at this time before she approached the king. Even the Feast of Purim, which was established to commemorate the Jewish people's deliverance, incorporated fasting (9:31).

4:4 The verb distressed is strong, suggesting the idea of writhing in severe pain or anguish. Certainly Esther was deeply disturbed by Mordecai's appearance and agony, though she did not as yet understand what had happened (v. 5).

4:5, 6 city square: Many events took place in the plaza of a city, including gatherings, proclamations, and public lamentation.

4:7 If Mordecai had not been appointed as a high official at the king's gate, it is unlikely that he would have known about Haman's bribe to the king. He was providentially placed by God in an exalted position in a foreign government, as were Joseph (Gen. 41), Daniel (Dan. 2:48), and Nehemiah (Neh. 1:11). This is one of the many ways God used the descendants of Abraham to be a blessing to the nations (Gen. 12:2).

4:8, 9 Mordecai recognized the decree as a threat to the very existence of his people, so he boldly commanded Esther to intercede for her people before the king, knowing that this could only be at the risk of her life (v. 11). If she was not identified as a Hebrew woman, she might possibly escape the fate of her people—but only if her association with Mordecai (2:7, 15) was not remembered by their enemies. In any event, she would be in a most risky position. make supplication: The word means to ask for a gracious response. It is a term that often is used of coming to the Lord for deliverance; here it is used of coming to a king for mercy.

4:10, 11 Esther understood that Mordecai was asking her to risk her life. She was understandably fearful. Her fear was compounded by the fact that the king had not summoned her for thirty days, implying that she had not been enjoying the king's favor recently. Who knew if he would still have regard for her at all?

4:12–14 This verse constitutes the classic reference to the providence of God in the book. Mordecai, by his confidence that relief and deliverance would come from another place, was strongly asserting his faith in God and His promised protection of the Jewish people. God controls all that happens in His world and would intervene with or without Esther. If she refused to help, she would perish, along with her father's house. Mordecai may be referring to divine judgment here. In the closing appeal, Mordecai suggested a providential reason for her becoming queen at this precise time in history; that is, Esther was acting as God's agent in delivering the Jewish people. who knows: Since Yahweh is in control of human history, and since He regularly uses His people to work out of His purposes, these wonderful, well-known words can extend to the lives of God's people everywhere.

(Heb. tsum) (Esth. 4:16; 2 Sam. 12:23) Strong’s #6684: The Hebrew root word simply means “to abstain from food.” At times fasting meant abstaining from drinking, bathing, anointing with oil, or sexual intercourse. In essence, fasting acknowledges human frailty before God and appeals to His mercy. Fasting was a common practice in the ancient world, associated with mourning for the dead (2 Sam. 12:21, 22), intercessory prayer (4:3, 16), repentance and contrition for sin (Jer. 36:9; Jon. 3:5), and times of distress (Judg. 20:26; Neh. 1:4). Fasting was required for the Day of Atonement (“afflict your souls”; Lev. 16:31). There were also four fast days that commemorated the destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians (Zech. 8:19). Fasts varied in length from one day (1 Sam. 14:24; Dan. 6:18) to seven days (1 Sam. 31:13) and could even last up to forty days on extraordinary occasions (Ex. 34:28). The strict fasts lasted from sunset to sunset, whereas the more lenient fasts lasted from sunrise to sunset. But no matter what type of fasting was performed, the prophet Isaiah admonished His people to participate in acts of righteousness and social justice with their fasting (Is. 58:3–9).

4:15–17 Esther agreed to intervene with the king on behalf of her people. The fasting for three days implies a period of earnestly seeking God in prayer at this critical juncture. But even at this point, the narrator did not use the name of God—something that is most remarkable. Esther was also looking for the support of the Jewish community by asking them to join in this fast. Esther understood fully that she was breaking the law of the land and that she might have to suffer the ultimate consequence; she might perish.

5:1 A part of a day in Hebrew culture was counted as a whole day (read 4:16, where Esther speaks of three days and three nights). Apparently from the inner court, the king could see Esther from his throne room (5:2).

5:2 she found favor in his sight: Again we are struck by the providence of God, demonstrated by the king's response to Esther. To indicate his approval, the king held out the golden scepter to her.

5:3 The king, knowing that Esther must have had an unusual reason for daring to approach him, asked her what she wanted. He promised her up to half his kingdom. A similar promise was given to the daughter of Herodias by King Herod in Mark 6:23. Perhaps the phrase was a common form of exaggeration among royalty. Although it probably was exaggerated, the statement certainly showed the king's favorable attitude toward her.

5:4, 5 If it pleases the king: This expression is found frequently throughout the book. It was a formula of polite address. Esther made her initial request; she invited the king and Haman to come to her banquet that same day.

5:6–8 The king continued examining Esther for the real request. She delayed and asked the two back for a second banquet the following day. One may ask why Esther waited instead of disclosing what was on her mind. The delay providentially allowed time for the king's sleepless night and the events that followed (ch. 6).

5:6 The Persian feasts incorporated considerable consumption of wine (note at 1:8). Even the origin of the noun translated "banquet" is derived from the verb meaning "to drink." The author pointedly observes the wanton lifestyle of the Persian kings.

5:7–9 Haman's good spirits on the way home from the banquet were from the wine he had drunk and from the honor of being invited along with the king to the feast at Esther's table. However, his mood changed quickly when he encountered Esther's cousin. This time Mordecai did not even rise in his presence. Further, Mordecai showed no sign of fear before him, despite the death decree against the Jewish people.

5:10–12 Haman's vanity matched that of the king he served. He bragged to his wife and friends about his wealth, his sons, and his status in the kingdom. It was considered a great blessing among ancient Semitic peoples to have many sons. In Persia, the man with the most sons would receive presents from the king himself.

5:13, 14 gallows: This word is the usual word for wood, the material the gallows were made of (2:23). Its height, fifty cubits, was about 75 feet.

6:1 This verse marks the turning point of the book. Within this chapter we observe a series of events that unmistakably point to God's sovereign hand controlling all events. Only because of his sleepless night did the king learn of Mordecai's past bravery on his behalf. the book of the records of the chronicles: This would be the official record of the events of the Persian empire. It is referred to in 2:23 and again in 10:2. Ezra 4:15 also mentions such a work. Apparently the chronicles were read before the king for an extended period.

6:2, 3 The king might have been aware to some extent of Mordecai's deed when it originally occurred. In 2:23 the author says that the events were written down "in the presence of the king." Now the Lord led the king to this very text. It was customary for the Persian kings to reward promptly those who performed some noteworthy act of service. There are records of Darius and Ahasuerus bestowing such honors on deserving recipients. The two nouns honor and dignity mean "great honor."

6:4, 5 Again we see the hand of God sovereignly at work on behalf of his people. No sooner had Mordecai's reward been discussed than Haman appeared in the king's court. Ironically, Haman, who knew nothing of the recent discussion, was coming to recommend that Mordecai be hanged.

6:6–11 One cannot miss the irony and humor of this turn of events. In his arrogance, Haman presumed that the king desired to honor him. He suggested a course of action that he would most enjoy, a royal parade through the city plaza so that everyone could see and hear about the king's delight in him. The king obliged, but was planning the reward for a man Haman regarded as his enemy. Worst of all, it was Haman who had to lead Mordecai through the square and proclaim the king's pleasure in Mordecai.

6:8, 9 The royal crest on the head of the horse was a crown that formed from the forelock of the horse. Stone carvings of horses with this type of crest have been found at Persepolis, another Persian capital (1:2).

6:10 The term Jew, derived from Judah, came into use during the exile because the people were principally from the southern kingdom of Judah.

6:11, 12 That Mordecai was elevated instead of Haman, who had plotted his destruction, is an example of several dramatic reversals in the Book of Esther. For instance, Haman is hanged on the very gallows which he had built for Mordecai (7:10), and on the very day the enemies of the Jewish people hoped to overpower them, they were overpowered by the Jewish people (9:1). The hand of God in may bring about many such reversals for His people (compare 9:20–25).

6:13 The issue of the ongoing survival of the Jewish people is the point of this verse. Haman's wife and friends told Haman that he would not prevail, for the very reason of Mordecai's Jewish descent. The Hebrew wording is quite strong: the meaning is that he will most certainly fall.

6:14 The role of eunuchs as royal messengers is portrayed again in this verse (1:10). They were the ones who came to take Haman briskly to Esther's second banquet.

7:1, 2 This is an introductory element for the events to follow.

7:3, 4 Esther repeated her address of 5:8 and now added her request. let my life be given: Esther asked the king to spare her life and the lives of her people. This latter appeal was an impassioned plea to the king in which she also disclosed her true identity to him for the first time. Esther told the king that she and her fellow Jewish people have been sold, referring to Haman's bribe to the king in 3:9.

7:5 Esther's speech had a dramatic effect on the king. She had aroused more than his curiosity. He was angry. The life of his own queen was in danger because of a plot by one of his trusted men. The phrase dare presume in his heart reflects the depths of the king's passion here.

7:6 Esther finally exposed the culprit. It was none other than Haman, the adversary and enemy, "the fierce enemy." It is no wonder that Haman was terrified before Esther and the king. In his evil plan to kill his enemy, he had unwittingly threatened the queen's life.

7:7 The king was astonished and furious. He left the room and went out to the palace garden. This must have been a very unusual act for an autocrat. Usually, he would be expected to respond immediately and rashly. However, this time he was so taken aback by the turn of events that he needed time to think. The king's enraged response alerted Haman to the precariousness of his situation.

7:8 Haman was draped over the queen's couch in a compromising position. Presumably, he was grasping at her with a desire to implore her favor. The king, on discovering this outrageous situation, wondered aloud if Haman intended to ravage the queen. The Persians had strict rules about contact with the harem by any male other than the king. The eunuchs were the only persons who had access to the rooms of these women. Haman was in danger merely by being near her. This sight enraged the king. As he spoke, they covered Haman's face. It is likely that it was the eunuchs who came and did this. The covering of his face signified that he was condemned to death.

7:9, 10 Harbonah: This eunuch, first mentioned in 1:10, spoke at a critical moment to the ruler. He disclosed the story of the gallows which Haman had prepared for Mordecai and told the king where it was located. He reminded the monarch of Mordecai's bravery on behalf of the king. Ahasuerus took Harbonah's cue and commanded his servants to hang Haman on those very gallows.

8:1 On the same day as Haman's execution, the king gave his queen the house of Haman. The term house here refers to his estate. This was in keeping with Persian law, which put the estate of a traitor into the custody of the crown.

8:2 Mordecai was given Haman's position as the prime minister. He received the full authority of the king, as evidenced by the transfer of the signet ring to him. Esther also put Mordecai in charge of Haman's estate, which gave him great wealth.

8:3–6 Esther, knowing that danger still lurked ahead for her people, pleaded passionately for their lives before the king. The queen continued to receive the blessing of the monarch as he again extended the golden scepter to her. Courageously Esther implored the king to revoke Haman's hateful decree against all the Jews in the empire. The parallel statements in v. 6 reinforce Esther's poignant and personal plea to her king. The queen, by speaking in the first person, demonstrated her deep attachment to her people.

8:7 Mordecai had heard Esther's entire presentation to the king. Ahasuerus, by reiterating what he already had done, communicated his support for Esther and her people.

8:8 In the Persian empire, a royal decree could not be altered, but a second one could invalidate it. Thus, the king instructed Mordecai and Esther to write a second decree. The second decree would carry all the weight of the former one—but would reverse the expected results.

8:9, 10 Sivan: This would be May to June. The date would give the Jewish people approximately eight months of preparation for any attack (3:13).

8:11–14 These verses have occasioned controversy about whether the Jewish people were unethical toward their enemies. Some commentators understand these verses to mean that the Jewish people were given permission to slaughter even the wives and children of any people that would attack them. Another view is that the Jewish people may not have carried out what was permitted, but killed only the men who attacked them (9:6). There is another possibility, that these verses refer to the women and children of the Jews. That is, the assault mentioned here was expected to be directed against the men, women, children, and possessions of the Jews. Against such assault, the Jews were to arm themselves and make proper defenses (9:5, 6). plunder their possessions: This phrase could be a citation of Haman's decree (3:13). If so, it would explain why the Jewish people did not take any plunder (9:10), but simply defended themselves against their enemies.

8:15, 16 Mordecai, dressed in royal attire, received a joyful welcome from the city of Shushan, which included both Gentiles and Jews. The residents of this city rejoiced that Mordecai had been appointed as prime minister. The word light conveys the sense of happiness.

8:17 Note the marked contrast of the reaction of the Jewish people to this second decree as compared to the first one (4:3). The reality of their deliverance influenced the Gentiles in the empire as well. became: This is the only place in the OT that this Hebrew word is used of conversion to Judaism. The unexpected turn of events in favor of the Jewish people greatly moved their neighbors.

The power of the God of Israel is implied here in the triumph of Mordecai over Haman, in the reversal of Haman's decree, and in the response of these pagan peoples. If the people truly became Jewish people, then they would share with the Jewish people faith in Yahweh, participation in the community as proselytes, and partake of Israel's blessing. What an amazing outcome of Haman's hate—the evangelization of many Persians!

9:1, 2 The Jewish people assembled throughout the kingdom to lay hands on or kill (2:21) their foes. The enemies of the Jewish people could not succeed in their assault against them due to a fear of them. This may have included a fear of the God of the Jewish people.

9:3, 4 In addition to a fear of the Jewish people, there was also a fear of Mordecai among the leaders, which caused them to assist the Jewish people. Their motive may have been to protect themselves politically in light of Mordecai's power and popularity.

9:5, 6 The defense of the Jewish people against their enemies was strong and certain. They killed five hundred of their enemies in Shushan alone.

9:7–10 The author returns to the conflict with Haman by recording the death of his ten sons. The patterns of reprisal and vengeance were so deeply ingrained in the cultures of the ancient Middle East that the survival of even one of these sons might mean trouble for the next generation of Jewish people. By listing each of the vanquished sons of their mortal enemy, the Jewish people celebrated the fact that the victory was complete.

9:11–14 Esther renewed her original request (8:11) for the Jews to have the authority to protect themselves against attack. The king assented. He also ordered Haman's ten sons to be exposed on the gallows. The men were already dead (v. 10). Their bodies were displayed as a warning to anyone who planned evil toward the Jews.

9:15, 16 In Deut. 25:17–19, Moses linked the people's continued rest from their enemies with the command to "blot out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven." In this chapter, the blessing of rest for the Jewish people is associated with the destruction of their enemies (vv. 18, 22). This similarity with Deuteronomy reinforces the argument that Haman was a descendant of the Amalekites. This group may have been quite large by the time of King Ahasuerus.

9:17–19 These verses summarize the days of deliverance for the Jewish people. In Shushan, they had two days of fighting, then they rested and celebrated on the fifteenth day of Adar (February to March; 3:7, 12). The Jewish people in the remainder of the Persian provinces fought for one day and fasted on the fourteenth day of that month.

9:20–25 In light of the difference of timing between the Jews in Shushan and Jews in the rest of the kingdom, Mordecai told the people by letter that they should designate both the fourteenth and the fifteenth of Adar as annual holidays. These verses summarize the events of the book.

9:25 The subject of the verb came is not clear in the Hebrew. It is possible that the subject is some reference to the wicked plot. If so, the word “it” makes sense as a substitute for the word Esther here.

“pur”

(Heb. pur) (Esth. 3:7; 9:24, 26) Strong’s #6332: Pur, originally a Babylonian word meaning “lot” or “fate,” is used in Esther as a synonym for the normal Hebrew word for “lot.” Lot casting, similar to rolling dice, was a common way to make a random selection (Neh. 11:1) or to discern the will of a god (Jon. 1:7). Believing that his gods controlled the fall of the pur, Haman cast lots to determine the right day to destroy the Jews (3:7). What he failed to realize was that God is sovereign and cannot be manipulated by superstition (Prov. 16:33). By casting lots, Haman inadvertently chose the day of the Jews’ deliverance, a day that is still celebrated in the festival of Purim (9:28).

9:26–32 Purim: These verses explain the name of the two-day festival. The name is derived form the word pur, meaning “lot,” the lot that was cast to determine the day of the Jewish people’s death. Purim reminds the Jews of God’s deliverance from their day of destruction. The feast was established as an annual festival.

10:1 tribute: This word may refer both to taxation and forced labor that the king imposed on all his territory.

10:2, 3 The Book of Esther concludes with high praise of Mordecai, whose deeds were recorded in the official chronicles of the Persian empire. Mordecai held the second highest rank in the land, a note that recalls Joseph's ascendancy in Egypt (Gen. 41:37–45).

The Book of Job

———— AT ONE TIME OR ANOTHER, ALMOST EVERYONE HAS felt like Job. While going through trials and times of suffering, we are often overwhelmed by self-pity. We want an explanation for why God allows trials to happen to us. The Book of Job records the troubling questions, the terrifying doubts, and the very real anguish of a sufferer. The Book of Job can help us in the time when we are surrounded with troubles by giving us a glimpse of God's perspective on our suffering.

Numerous details in the Book of Job indicate a patriarchal setting for its events: (1) Job's wealth is measured in livestock (1:3; 42:12), the same way Abraham and Jacob's wealth is measured (Gen. 12:16; 13:2; 30:43; 32:5). (2) The Sabeans and Chaldeans are portrayed as nomadic marauders (1:15, 17), indicating an early date. (3) The Hebrew word for piece of silver in Job (42:11) is otherwise found only in conjunction with the patriarch Jacob (Gen. 33:19; Josh. 24:32). (4) Without a priesthood or a sanctuary, Job offered sacrifices to God in a patriarchal fashion (1:5). (5) Job's longevity is consistent with the life spans of the patriarchs (42:16). (6) The preference in the poetic sections of the book for the divine name Shaddai over the divine name Yahweh may indicate a period before the Exodus (Ex. 3:14, 15).

The text indicates that the events of Job occurred in the land of Uz (1:1), but the location of Uz is unknown. That Job was the greatest among the people of the East (1:3) indicates that Job lived east of the Jordan River. Some have concluded that Uz was located in Syria or northwest Mesopotamia. However, most writers think Uz was located near Edom, because many of the proper names in the Book of Job occur in the genealogy of Esau, the father of the Edomites (Gen. 36).

The basic structure of the Book of Job consists of a prose framework in the prologue (chs. 1; 2) and epilogue (42:7–17) enclosing the poetic body of the book (3:1—42:6). There are significant differences between the poetic body and the prologue and epilogue. The prologue and epilogue present Job as a patient "saint" who righteously endured suffering. On the other hand, the poetic body presents Job as despairing of fair treatment by God (9:1–3, 13–21). According to some critics, these differences indicate that the two sections are separate works by different authors. According to this view, the compiler of Job simply failed to reconcile the “two Jobs.”

The apparent contradictions within Job should not be considered an indication of poor editing but the deliberate work of an accomplished author. The tension between the “patient” Job and the “impatient” Job contributes to the overall message of the book. It shows Job as a real person. He was no “plaster saint” who suffered stoically. Instead, he struggled with his emotions and feelings as we do today. The Book of Job teaches that it is not wrong for a person to ask the question why, as Job did repeatedly (ch. 3). But these questions must not grow into accusations against the sovereign Lord.

The Book of Job explores all the traditional Middle Eastern explanations of the problem of the “righteous sufferer.” These include: (1) the inherent sinfulness of the human race (5:6, 7; 15:14, 16); (2) the accusation that God is unjust (9:22–24); and (3) the limitations of human understanding (11:7–9). But the main difference between the Book of Job and other ancient texts that address this same problem is God’s direct intervention in Job’s life. Thus the uniqueness of the Book of Job is not in its approach to the problem of suffering but in its revelation of the sovereign God to whom everyone must properly relate. Sufferer and nonsufferer alike must humbly trust in God’s sovereign grace. Because Job and his friends were ignorant of Satan’s challenge to God, the Book of Job contains much bad theology and misapplied truth. It is important to read passages in the Book of Job in light of the message and purpose of the entire book. The only proper response to the omnipotent God is submission and faith.

The Book of Job repeatedly emphasizes the sovereignty and omnipotence of God. For instance, the Hebrew divine name Shaddai, usually translated as “Almighty,” is employed by all characters in the book. Eliphaz describes the Almighty as controlling the destiny of everyone (5:17–20) and as independent of humanity (22:2, 3). Bildad argues that the Almighty is just (8:3, 4) and sovereign in His rule over the universe (25:2, 3). Finally Zophar describes the ways of the Almighty as beyond human comprehension (11:7–10). Hence, Job’s friends use the name Shaddai to speak of God’s transcendence as well as His sovereign power.

This emphasis on the sovereignty of God refutes a simplistic understanding of divine retribution, which assumes that there is an automatic connection between one's spirituality and prosperity on earth. Such was the basis of Satan's accusation in the prologue that Job served God only for his own profit (1:9–11). Moreover, it is the basis for Eliphaz and Bildad's advice to Job. Both claimed that Job's suffering pointed to a hidden sin in Job's life, because God certainly would not punish an upright person (4:7–11; 8:11–22; 18:5–21). But God's answer to Job refuted this false belief (38:1—39:30). The Lord declared Himself completely sovereign. He is not obligated to bless those who obey Him. All His actions are based on His gracious nature and His own free will. In this way, the Book of Job is an extended refutation of Satan's challenge that prosperity is connected to people's goodness, and consequently that people's suffering is connected to their sin.

In this way, the Book of Job teaches that the Lord is not bound to anyone's preconceived theological system. Elihu's speech on God's greatness and His sovereign majesty over nature (36:1—37:24) serve as a prelude to the climax of the book: the Lord's answer to Job (38:1—42:6). In His speech, God lowers Himself to Job's level in order to answer Job's questions. In the process, He reveals to all people that He is completely free but also truly good. He is the sovereign and benevolent Creator who continues to determine the course of the universe according to His own hidden plan. Just like Job, we must learn to submit to the Almighty God and accept by faith that He has a good plan for us.

There is no consensus about who wrote the Book of Job or when it was written. Suggestions for an author include Job, Elihu, Solomon, and even Moses.

As for the time of writing, there is strong literary evidence that the Book of Job was compiled and written during the time of Solomon, when wisdom literature flourished. The mention of iron tools and weapons (19:24; 20:24; 40:18) and even mining (28:2) implies a date during the Iron Age (after 1200 B.C.). Moreover, the description of a horse in a military context (39:19–25) may indicate the mounted war-horse, which was used at the earliest around the tenth century B.C. Furthermore, at least two passages in Job may allude to biblical passages from the Solomonic era (compare 7:17, 18 with Ps. 8:4; compare 28:28 with Prov. 3:7; 9:10). These various strands of evidence may indicate that Job was written around the time of Solomon's reign.

Commentary

1:1 The dramatic events of the prologue of the Book of Job set the stage for the intricate dialogues of the main body (3:1—42:6). Uz: The precise location is unknown but may have been near Edom. Two aspects of Job's character and actions are highlighted. Blameless and upright, meaning "straightforward" and "ethically straight," emphasize his spotless character. Like Daniel (Dan. 6:4), Job was blameless before his human critics, but not completely sinless before God. He later testified of his personal integrity (31:5, 6). Job feared God and shunned evil, an indication that his right relationship with God motivated him to turn away from evil. This descriptive phrase indicates that Job was the epitome of wisdom (28:28; Prov. 3:7; 14:16; also Prov. 1:7; 9:10).

1:2, 3 Job had an ideal family consisting of seven sons and three daughters. The number seven was the biblical number of completeness. In the ancient Middle East, having many children was generally considered a sign of God's blessing (Ps. 127:3–5).

1:4 Each of Job's sons would participate in a feast with his siblings on his appointed day. The term could refer to a birthday celebration. However, the context of v. 5 may indicate a regular, perhaps weekly or seasonal, cycle of celebration and feasting.

1:5 When Job undertook to sanctify his children through burnt offerings, he performed an intercessory role that corresponds to what he did when he prayed for his friends in the epilogue (42:10). cursed God: The Hebrew text has "blessed God," which is probably a euphemism—a reverent substitution of a milder word by a Hebrew scribe because he could not bear to have the word cursed next to the divine name.

1:6 The sons of God are celestial beings or angels who were created by Him and who serve Him (4:18; Ps. 103:20, 21) as his "holy ones" (5:1). Compare the expression "sons of God" in Gen. 6:1, where the phrase is used of angels who were enemies of the Lord. The imagery seemingly indicates a heavenly council over which the Lord sits as Supreme King (Ps. 89:5–7; Dan. 7:9, 10). Strictly speaking, Satan may be a title rather than the personal name of the leader of all evil forces. The Hebrew word was not clearly used as a proper name until 1 Chr. 21:1, chronologically one of the last OT books written. Nevertheless, the characteristics of the "Adversary" in the Book of Job imply that he was in fact Satan. He answered God's questions in an antagonistic manner and accused Job of ulterior motives. That Satan came among the hosts of heaven at this time suggests that Satan still had access to God's court, and that his final banishment was still in the future.

1:7 The Hebrew word Yahweh, usually translated the LORD, is the personal name of the true God of the OT (Ex. 3:14, 15). It is the particular name of God in covenantal relations with His people Israel (Ex. 6:1–6; 19:3–8). This indicates that though Job was not an Israelite, he had a relationship with the true God (read v. 21 where the Lord's name is employed). From where do you come: God's inquiry does not imply an ignorance of Satan's behavior but was part of the conversation with Satan. See the similar function of the question posed to Adam after the Fall (Gen. 3:9).

(Heb. tam) (1:1, 8; 8:20; 9:21; Ps. 37:37; Prov. 29:10) Strong’s #8535 The verbal root of this Hebrew word means “to be complete.” Thus, this word signifies an individual’s integrity—a wholeness and wholesomeness. The word is used as a term of endearment for the Shulamite bride in the Song of Solomon (“perfect” in Song 5:2; 6:9). In the OT, the blameless are frequently associated with the upright (1:1, 8; 2:3; Ps. 37:37; Prov. 29:10) and contrasted with the wicked (9:22; Ps. 64:2–4). Job’s claim to be blameless agrees with God’s assessment of him, but it is not a claim to absolute perfection (1:8; 9:21; 14:16, 17). The Psalmist writes that the future of the blameless man is peace—as was the case for Job (42:10–12; Ps. 37:37).

1:8 My servant refers to the proper relationship every person should have with God—that is, a joyful and reverent trust in God. Job was a model of this type of relationship with the Lord in the prologue and the epilogue (2:3; 42:7).

1:9 Satan, always “the adversary,” questioned Job’s motives for fearing and serving God. The expression for nothing is emphatic in the Hebrew text. The question may be paraphrased, “Is Job really free of ulterior motives?”

1:10 God had placed a hedge of protection around Job and his household. No harm could come to him unless the Lord permitted it (vv. 12; 2:4–6). Believers today should take great comfort from the biblical teaching that the Lord protects His people—whether by a cloud (Ex. 14:19, 20) or by a wall of fiery hosts (2 Kin. 6:17) or through guardian angels (Heb. 1:14).

1:11 Satan ignored customary court etiquette that would not permit him to address God directly as You, or use the personal references Your hand or Your face. Such irreverence was part of his constant strategy to demean God. curse: The sin of cursing God is a pivotal issue for the Book of Job. Job feared that his children might think or speak irreverently of God (v. 5). But Satan asserted that Job would surely curse God if his prosperity and blessings were removed. Even Job’s wife would urge him to “curse God and die” (2:9).

1:12 That Satan must receive permission from the Lord to lay a hand on Job (v. 11) indicates that God limits Satan's power. Believers can find strength and assurance from the fact that Satan's actions are limited by God's sovereign control. After the prologue, Satan is never mentioned directly again in the Book of Job; he is only a minor character compared to the Lord of the universe.

The Adversary

While the Book of Job teaches us much about human suffering, we also learn a great deal about Satan and his relationship to God. The first two chapters of Job demonstrate that although Satan is in rebellion, he is still accountable to God.

Originally an angel of God, Satan became corrupt through his own pride (2 Pet. 2:4; Jude 6). Ever since his rebellion against God, Satan has been God's enemy as well as ours. In fact, the Hebrew word for Satan means "Adversary." In the story of Job, Satan remained true to his name by accusing Job and afflicting him with all kinds of suffering. However, Satan's power is not equal to God's. Although Satan attempts to hamper God's work, he is limited by God. As much as he may wish to be a god, Satan still remains answerable to God.

In addition to being accountable to God (1:6), Satan, as a created being, is finite. He is not all-powerful, and he can be in only one place at one time (1:7). Therefore, his fellow fallen angels must aid him in his evil work. Of course, Satan can tempt us, but he cannot know what is in our minds or foretell our future (1:9–11). Most important, he can do nothing without God's permission (1:6–12). Because God actively restrains Satan (1:12; 2:6) and promises that He will not allow us to be tempted beyond what we can bear (1 Cor. 10:13), we can be confident that with God's power we can overcome Satan. Although we live in a fallen world, Satan does not have free reign to do whatever evil he wishes. God is still, and always will be, sovereign.

It was Satan who planned and implemented Job's suffering. God may have allowed Satan to test Job for a time. But in His time God Himself delivered Job from suffering, restored him, and blessed him even more than before (42:10). Even through Satan's evil plan, God had accomplished His good purposes. The relationship between Job and God was tested, and it withstood the test. God's love had won; Satan's accusations were answered. It was finally clear to all that God was both sovereign and compassionate. Through the experience, Job learned to appreciate God's gifts to him even more (42:1–6).

1:13–19 In one day Job plummeted from the pinnacle of prosperity to the pit of poverty. He must have felt that all heaven and earth had turned against him. The four rapid disasters that struck him came alternately from earth and heaven. First was the raiding of his livestock and servants; then from heaven, the fire of God; then again from earth, the loss of his camels and servants; and then the climactic blow again from heaven, a great wind that demolished his house and killed his children.

1:14–16 The Sabeans were nomadic raiders from Sheba. They were probably the people of the queen of Sheba (1 Kin. 10:1–13). Her homeland was probably southwestern Arabia, present-day Yemen.

1:17–19 The Chaldeans were part of various west Semitic marauding tribes active in the middle Euphrates from the twelfth to the ninth century B.C. They migrated eastward into Assyria and then into Babylonia, and were the forerunners of the Chaldean or neo-Babylonian dynasty established by Nebuchadnezzar's father.

1:20 Finally the spotlight focuses on Job's reaction to his trials. Did he serve God for profit as Satan had alleged (1:9)? Job passed the first test with a model response. He showed intense grief according to the accepted custom of his day (v. 20). Then he humbly accepted God's will without complaining or blaming God for his tragedies. Job acknowledged God's sovereign control over all circumstances when he fell to the ground and worshiped. The context indicates that Job's fall was not an involuntary reflex of despair but a deliberate act of humility before God. Job's initial response was an ideal example of how to respond in time of crisis. Job is not only an ancient biblical hero but also an example for us when we face trials that test the mettle of each person's faith (1 Pet. 1:6, 7).

1:21 Having fallen on the ground, Job uttered words that were consistent with his posture. First, he gave a realistic appraisal of his status: just as he came into the world naked, so would he leave it naked. Then he repeatedly acknowledged the control of the LORD over all circumstances. The name Yahweh is used three times in this verse to emphasize Job's dependence on the true God. Except for 12:9, this is the only place where Job mentions the covenantal name of God. Though Job was not an Israelite, having lived in Uz centuries before the nation of Israel came out of Egypt, he worshiped the God of Israel.

1:22 Job had passed the test. He did not lash out at God, accusing him of doing wrong by permitting the tragedies.

IN CONTEXT

About the “Sons of God”

The term “sons of God” (Job 2:1; compare 1:6; 38:7) refers here to the angels, heavenly beings who are superior to humans in power and intelligence. According to the Book of Job, these beings would periodically present themselves before God, though we know little about the gatherings.

It may seem odd to find Satan mentioned as one of the “sons of God.” Elsewhere Scripture describes him as an angel who was cast out of heaven for rebelling against God. Now he seeks to undermine the cause of righteousness in the world. In fact, the name Satan means “Adversary.” So in what sense is Satan a “son of God”?

The Hebrew word for “son” (bar), can refer not only to an immediate male offspring but to a member of an entire class or category. For example, the OT speaks of the “sons of Israel” (Ex. 28:9) to refer to the descendants of Israel (Jacob), the Israelites. Likewise, the “sons of Asaph” (1 Chr. 25:1) refers to the temple musicians descended from Asaph, King David’s principal musician.

In Job, the term “sons of God” is a descriptive term meaning “from or made by God,” in the sense that angels, fallen or not, are spirits and inhabit the supernatural realm.

2:1–3 The first sentence of this verse repeats 1:8 verbatim, emphasizing that Job's character had remained flawless despite Satan's assaults. In the second sentence the Lord affirms that Job had maintained his integrity (the same Hebrew root as blameless in 1:1, 8), although Satan had incited Him to destroy Job without cause. "Without cause" translates the same Hebrew word Satan had used in insinuating that Job did not serve God "for nothing" (1:9). Now the Lord throws it back in his face.

2:4 The origin of the proverb skin for skin utilized by Satan is disputed. Some think it may have originated from the practice of bartering animal skins. Others believe that the phrase is similar to the proverb "life for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth" (Ex. 21:23–25). In the last half of the verse Satan charges that Job would be willing to lose his possessions or even his family, as long as his life was spared.

2:5 bone … flesh: Satan sought to afflict Job's entire body with a debilitating disease.

2:6 When the Lord placed Job into Satan's hand, it is extraordinary that He commanded Satan to spare his life. Ironically, the word spare normally refers to God's role in His providential care of people (29:2).

2:7 The disease that inflicted Job with painful boils from head to toe is difficult to identify. The term for boils was used to describe the plague of boils in Egypt (Ex. 9:9–11). The same phrase painful boils, as one of the covenant curses for the disobedient (Deut. 28:35), denoted an incurable illness.

2:8 Again Job expressed his grief in the customary way (Jer. 6:26). potsherd: A piece of broken pottery. ashes: The town's trash heap.

2:9 The words of Job's wife—curse God and die—were probably Job's most severe trial. Ironically, her question do you still hold fast to your integrity employs almost exactly the same wording the Lord had used (v. 3). The wording emphasizes Job's perseverance, which his wife misconstrued as religious fanaticism—she thought he was blindly refusing to face the reality of his desperate situation.

2:10 Job's response to the second test, the loss of his health and alienation from his wife, was once again commendable. His rhetorical question, urging the acceptance of both good and adversity from God, anticipates one of the central messages of the Book of Job: the person of faith will trust in God through prosperity or adversity, even while unable to understand why bad things happen.

2:11 Eliphaz the Temanite was apparently an Edomite from Teman in northern Edom (Gen. 36:11). The term Shuhite may refer to Bildad's ancestry, or more likely to his geographical origin, since the other two friends seem to be identified by their home towns. Zophar the Naamathite may have come from Naameh, a mountainous area in northwestern Arabia.

2:12–13 These friends truly cared for Job because they wept and stayed close by him for seven days and seven nights. Yet later they would fail Job miserably by not listening to him (8:4–6; 13:5–13).

3:1, 2 When Job cursed the day of his birth, he came close to blasphemy. The Hebrew word for cursed, meaning "to hold in contempt," is elsewhere employed of cursing God (Ex. 22:28; Lev. 24:15) or cursing one's parents (Ex. 21:17). Job's pain had driven him to express a very strong malediction against the day of his birth and the night of his conception, which were personified as those responsible for his existence (vv. 3–6). However, Job did not commit blasphemy. He did not curse the Chaldeans or Sabeans, much less God. Neither did he express thoughts of suicide.

3:3–10 Job's wish that he had never been born because his life was full of sorrow (vv. 3, 10) reflects a serious misunderstanding about the basic meaning of human existence. The Bible teaches that the purpose of life is not happiness but the praise of God's glory (Eph. 1:3–14).

3:8–19 Job employed two separate Hebrew words translated curse, different from the Hebrew term in v. 1. He wished that the popular magicians who cast spells on the day for their clients could have cast a spell on his day so that he would never have been born. Job's belief in one God (31:26–28) indicates that he was speaking poetically and dramatically. He was not endorsing any kind of pagan magic but employing vivid and forceful language to express the intensity of his agony and despair.

3:20–22 Even though Job longed for death, he was not considering suicide. The context of other passages indicates that Job merely wished that the Lord would let him die (7:15–21; 10:18–22).

Insecurity in Job's World

Job doesn't explain what "the thing I greatly feared" was (Job 3:25). But there was little security in the world in which he lived. The dangers were many: • diseases that struck livestock and people; • famine, drought, and crop failure; • destructive pests such as locusts and worms, and predators such as lions and wolves; • weather-related calamities such as thunderstorms and lightning, floods, hail, windstorms, and tornadoes; • bandits, raiders, and foreign invaders; and • stillbirths and death to women due to complications in labor.

Job had lost his wealth, family, and health due to a number of these perils. The suddenness and enormity of his fall is a reminder that the people of the ancient world lived on the edge, never far from complete ruin. There was little they could do to protect themselves.

For example, the catastrophic loss of Job's wealth points to the fact that there were no banks. Most of Job's riches were on the hoof in the fields, extremely vulnerable to danger and loss.

3:23–26 Job bemoaned that God had hedged him in so that he could not die. The irony is that Job perceived God's protective hedge around him as keeping him from a desirable death. This is a typical feeling of those who suffer.

4:1 Since Eliphaz the Temanite spoke first, he was probably the oldest and therefore presumably the wisest of the three. Eliphaz was a little more courteous to Job than were his other two friends. However, his observations were distorted. Eliphaz firmly believed that God would never punish the righteous and would not preserve the sinner. He concluded that since Job was suffering, he must be a sinner (22:4–11, 21–30).

4:2–6 Though Eliphaz seems surprised at Job's response (ch. 3), his initial remarks are complimentary and courteous. The content of vv. 7–11 suggests that v. 6 probably contains at least a mild rebuke.

4:5, 6 The phrase you are weary translates one word in the original Hebrew and repeats the same root word found in the phrase "will you become weary" in v. 2. This repetition indicates that Eliphaz had already recognized the apparent contradiction between the patient Job of the prologue and the impatient Job of the dialogue.

4:7–9 Eliphaz highlights the retribution doctrine—that is, God supports the righteous but abandons the wicked—with two rhetorical questions. He supports his belief by an appeal to his experience; that is, "you reap what you sow." Because the word trouble is the same word used by Job to describe his own plight as full of "sorrow" (3:10) and "misery" (3:20), Eliphaz may be equating Job with the wicked who plow iniquity.

4:10, 11 To the reader it may seem that Eliphaz suddenly adds illustrations of God's retribution on animals. But probably these are proverbial sayings with a double meaning. Eliphaz may have been implying that Job's "groanings" or "roaring" made him comparable to the old lion, symbolizing the wicked, whose sins were now being repaid with suffering.

4:12–18 Eliphaz appeals to a vision to authenticate his theology. He claims that he heard a voice that told him that no one was righteous compared to God, implying that Job was not righteous. But contrast the Lord's unqualified commendation of Job in the prologue (1:1, 8; 2:3).

4:19, 20 The description of people as living in houses of clay with their foundation in the dust emphasizes the mortality and fragility of human existence. Like the temporary houses they live in, people can perish without anyone knowing. Elsewhere Job uses the same two Hebrew words in parallel to describe the fragility of the human body. Since the body is fashioned from clay, God the potter who fashioned it can easily turn it back to dust (10:8, 9; 33:6).

4:21 The Hebrew word for the phrase their own excellence may mean “tent cord.” Thus the text may be stating that humanity’s existence is as precarious as a tent in the midst of a windstorm.

5:1 Eliphaz's warning against appealing to holy ones, or angels, anticipates Job's later desire for a "mediator" (9:33).

5:2 foolish man: An arrogant person seeking his own purpose regardless of God.

5:3–7 Eliphaz begins another appeal to personal observation and experience. Eliphaz uses a play on the words ground and man, along with the repetition of the word trouble, to aid his argument that Job's trouble did not come out of nowhere—that is, spring from the ground.

5:7 The word sparks may allude to the Ugaritic god of the underworld who was supposedly responsible for plagues and lightning. A reference like this to mythology does not imply or endorse a belief in other gods. Eliphaz is saying, "Just as a plague springs up from the demonic forces of hell, so does trouble come from person's nature."

5:8–16 Eliphaz suggests that Job commit his cause to God rather than arguing it himself. This is the wise course because God is absolutely good and fair.

5:17 Eliphaz insinuates that since Job's suffering was a result of God's chastening for his sin, he should not despise or reject what God was trying to teach him. Though it is true that God sometimes disciplines people for their sin through pain and suffering (32:1–37:24; Prov. 3:11; Heb. 12:7), Eliphaz was wrong to suggest that this was necessarily so in Job's case. The divine title Shaddai, translated Almighty, is used in Job thirty-one times, but only seventeen times in all the rest of the OT.

5:18–22 Eliphaz states that God is the author of both pain and healing. God would heal the wounds he inflicted for discipline. When God does allow pain to come into our lives, it is not to harm us but to make us better.

5:23, 24 The presence of stones in a field could make land impossible to farm (2 Kin. 3:19, 25). Thus the expression covenant with the stones of the field would mean being at peace and harmony with even the destructive forces of nature—including the beasts of the field (vv. 22).

5:25–27 your descendants shall be many (v. 25); you shall come to the grave at a full age (v. 26): These are the most highly regarded blessings in Job's day, a numerous and fine family and good health until finally one dies in full age with his loved ones gathered around. Job was to be blessed by God with just such a later life and death (42:10–17) because of his faithfulness and eventual humility (42:1–6).

6:1 When Job answered, he did not respond directly to Eliphaz. This may be the reason the text does not specify a name here. Job usually responded to all three of his friends, not to one individually (6:24–30). His friends in turn did not respond point by point to what Job said. Consequently the dialogue is not so much a conversation between friends as it is a speech contest in which one speaker tries to win a debate and impress his audience with his rhetoric.

6:2, 3 Job may be utilizing a proverbial expression in his belief that if his grief and calamity were fully weighed (by being placed on one side of a giant scale balance) his grief would outweigh all the sand of the sea. (The last word, plural in Hebrew, emphasizes the massive weight.) When he stresses his burdensome grief (Heb. kaas, "vexation," "grief"), he employs the same term used in Prov. 27:3 ("sand is weighty but a fool's wrath is heavier"), and by Eliphaz in 5:2 when he argues that "wrath (Heb. kaas) kills a foolish man." Though he admits that his grief is oppressive, he implicitly denies that he is a fool because his words have not been rash without cause (vv. 4, 5).

6:4 Job's suffering was so intense that he portrayed it as caused by arrows of the Almighty that were dipped in poison. The arrows of the Lord are generally symbolic of His judgment (Deut. 32:23, 42) or wrath (Ps. 38:1, 2). Job also assumed that God was required to reward the obedient and punish the guilty in this life, and he may have presumed that the Lord was punishing him unjustly.

6:5–7 Job refuses (v. 7) Eliphaz's "tasteless counsel" by two rhetorical questions that point out the absurdity of his overreaction to Job's words. In v. 5 he suggests that his loud cries of complaint are not without cause (like the braying of a donkey or the bellowing of an ox). In v. 6 the phrase in the white of an egg reflects a Hebrew clause of uncertain meaning that may be part of a proverbial expression. Some think it refers to the slimy juice of a plant.

6:8–10 Though the exact translation is disputed, the overall context of this verse seems to indicate that Job was more concerned to preserve his relationship to the Holy One than to have God remove his pain and anguish through death (vv. 8, 9).

6:11, 12 is my flesh bronze? In his misery, Job forgot a great truth: "He knows our frame; He remembers that we are dust" (Ps. 103:14).

6:13 The discouraged person feels there is no way out for him; all his resources are gone—he has no help.

6:14 The exact meaning of the Hebrew word translated afflicted is disputed. It may mean “to melt”; thus the idea could be “failing” or “despairing.” Verse 14 seems to be transitional, linking Job’s despair of vv. 8–13 with his disappointment of vv. 15–21.

6:15–17 Since the friends are called my brothers, Job apparently at one time had a close relationship with them. This only intensified his feelings of disappointment. He compares them to the streams of the brooks, the torrents of water that fill the ravines during the rainy season and pass away in the summer.

6:18 The word paths in this verse concludes the imagery of empty ravines left by the seasonal streams called “wadis” (vv. 15–18) and links this section to the next (v. 19).

6:19, 20 Job compares his intense disappointment with his friends to the thirsty caravans of Tema and the travelers of Sheba, whose hopes for water were dashed by reaching the dry stream beds. Tema was located in northern Arabia and Sheba in southwestern Arabia. These caravans and travelers would have been familiar to his friends, since the story of Job most likely occurred near Edom in northern Arabia.

IN CONTEXT

A Disappointing Oasis

Water was the lifeblood of ancient caravans. That made the oasis of Tema (Job 6:19) a popular and indispensable rest stop for Sabean traders traversing the major north-south highway across the Arabian Desert. Their camels could travel up to a week without water, but sooner or later they had to have refreshment. If a caravan came to the watering hole and for some reason found it dry, disaster loomed.

Job was probably quite familiar with the caravans of Sheba. As the wealthiest man in the Middle East (1:3), he probably had traded with them on numerous occasions. Perhaps he had even arranged caravans himself. Likewise, he may have visited Tema; the site was only about 300 miles to the southeast from Edom, where some believe he lived.

In any case, Job described his disappointment over the lack of kindness shown by his friends (6:14) as like a caravan arriving at a dried-up oasis. Not only expecting but desperately needing water, the weary travelers find only dust. Their hopes dashed and their situation perilous, they face the terrorizing prospect of dying of thirst (6:21).

In a similar way, Job turned to his friends in his hour of need, expecting to find much-needed comfort. To his shock, they responded with rebuke and criticism.

6:21 When Job hoped to receive help from his three friends, they offered nothing. This was like a desert wadi, a seasonal stream that vanishes in the time of greatest need.

6:22, 23 The answer to each question is no. Job had asked his friends only for understanding and concern, but they had disappointed him.

6:24–26 Job pleads with his would-be counselors to have understanding rather than an argumentative spirit. The friends' demeanor degenerates into arguments and reproofs as they overreact to Job's words, which even Job admits belonged to the wind. A counselor must be willing to make allowances for overreaction in someone who suffers and not respond with similar emotion. The sufferer often needs someone to be a friend who will listen with understanding, rather than a judge who simply wishes to give reproof.

6:27, 28 The Hebrew verbs are difficult to translate in this verse. The point seems clear, however. Job perceives his friends are attacking him when he is down, much like those who would take advantage of orphans. An alternative translation, with the same idea: “Oh, how you cast lots for the fatherless, / And how you barter for your friend.”

6:29, 30 The repeated word injustice in these verses is the same term used by Eliphaz in 5:16. Eliphaz argued that God “saves the needy” from the unscrupulous tactics of the wicked (5:12–15), so “that the poor have hope and injustice shuts her mouth.” Job responds by implying that the words of Eliphaz deal injustice to him in his time of need (6:14–21) by assuming that he is not righteous.

7:1, 2 Job argues that his own lot is worse than the hard service of the hired laborer or the common slave. Job's use of the word servant is an ironic indicator that his life as God's servant (the same Hebrew term in 1:8) has now become full of drudgery and slavery rather than joyous trust in the Lord.

7:3, 4 Although the Book of Job does not record how long Job suffered, the phrase months of futility implies that it was a considerable time.

7:5 Worms bred in Job's sores. The scabs on his ulcers broke and seeped.

7:6–8 Job's choice of the word hope in the context of the weaver's shuttle may convey a double meaning (11:18). The Hebrew word for hope sounds like the Hebrew word that means "thread" or "cord" (Josh. 2:18, 21). Not only did Job believe his days were without hope but that he had not even a thread of hope left. As if he were regarding a thread in a weaver's shuttle, Job could not see the design that God had for his life through the suffering that he was experiencing. Though sometimes we may question the Lord as Job did, we must realize that the great Weaver has a design that we may not be able to see until He is finished with our lives.

7:9, 10 Job describes the grave (sometimes rendered Sheol) as a place from which one shall never return (10:21). The focus here is on death. Though the dead person would never return to his house on earth, there was a belief in a meeting "house" in the underworld for those who had been on earth (30:23).

7:11 Job speaks frankly with God as he begins to pour out his anguish and to complain in bitterness. He had no fear that the Lord would misinterpret him as his human counselors had. The Lord did not reprimand Job for this but instead commended Job for speaking "what is right" (42:7).

7:12–14 The sea and its terrifying inhabitant the sea serpent symbolized chaos and the forces of evil and were even considered gods in the pagan religions of the ancient world. Once again Job employs mythological imagery to express his frustration and deep anguish. Although Job interprets the Lord's guard as an invasion of privacy (vv. 13, 14, 17–20), God has designed it for a benevolent purpose (3:23).

7:15, 16 Job is not considering suicide when he states that he would choose strangling and death rather than to live in his body (3:20–22). Strangling may refer to the symptoms of his disease, such as coughing or choking, that he wishes God would use to kill him.

7:17–19 These verses sound similar to Ps. 8:4. Whereas the psalmist marvels that God should “visit him,” Job uses the same word in a negative sense to complain that He should visit him all the time.

7:20, 21 Job appeals to God to show him what he has done to deserve being made a target for God’s persecution. When Job calls God the watcher of men, he employs a participle that normally describes God in a positive role as one who preserves His people (Ps. 31:23).

8:1, 2 Bildad twists Job's words of 6:26. Job had acknowledged that he had overreacted with words that belonged to the wind. To paraphrase Bildad's sarcastic response: "Yes, you're right, Job! All your words are like a mighty wind; you are full of hot air!"

8:3 Bildad argues that God could never pervert justice. The only possible conclusion was that Job and his children received what they deserved as sinners (vv. 4–7, 20).

8:4–6 The repetition of the word if in these three successive verses illustrates the presumptive nature of Bildad's statements (vv. 8–22). In his zeal to defend orthodox doctrine, he fails to listen to Job's pain.

8:5, 6 Bildad admonishes Job to seek God now so that God will restore Job's prosperity, rather than talking about how God will seek him unsuccessfully once he is dead (7:21). Bildad uses the words pure and upright, the same words the Lord has already employed in affirming Job's blameless character (1:8; 2:3).

8:7, 8 The advice that Job's latter end would increase abundantly anticipates Job's restoration in the epilogue (42:10–17), though it came about in a way quite different from what Bildad envisioned.

8:9, 10 When Bildad states that "we know nothing" compared to the wisdom of the past generations, the reader can laugh with the author of Job, since we know how very little Bildad really knows in light of the whole story. One purpose of the Book of Job is to challenge the traditional dogmas of the pastthe retribution dogma.

8:11–19 Bildad uses illustrations from nature to support his belief that God punishes only the wicked and always rewards the righteous in this life. He falsely deduces that one can always determine the cause by looking at the effect. Oversimplification resulting in pat, inadequate answers is a common error of Job's counselors.

8:14, 15 The metaphor of the spider's web implies that Job had trusted in his house and riches, which were no more permanent than the web.

8:16–22 Bildad's dogmatic statement about how God will not cast away the blameless is undermined by the fact that he uses the word blameless in the same way the Lord used it in the prologue (1:1, 8; 2:3) to describe Job.

9:1, 2 Job apparently agrees that Bildad has made some valid points (such as the dogma of retribution, which Job accepts). Then he rephrases a question Eliphaz had initiated in 4:17 concerning whether a man could be righteous before God.

9:3–7 The verb to contend indicates that Job was considering the idea of entering a legal case against God. The prophets often used this word when speaking of God bringing a legal case against Israel (Is. 1:2; Mic. 6:1). The Hebrew for contend is almost always used metaphorically in Job, referring to a "lawsuit" between Job and God. Job's legal dilemma before the Lord, who served simultaneously as Job's judge and legal adversary (13:20–28), underscores the urgency and hopelessness of Job's call for a mediator to hear his case (v. 33). Job calculates that the chances of answering God's interrogation are very slim, one in a thousand—something God later verifies (38:1—42:6). The legal term answer means to respond to an accusation in court, particularly under cross-examination.

9:8 spreads out the heavens: Job attributes this phenomenon to God alone. The fact that the Lord treads on the waves of the sea shows his unique control over the alleged forces of evil (38:8–12). The word waves emphasizes that the Lord treads the supposed sea god Yamm under his feet (v. 13). This verse emphasizes that the sea is merely a natural force under the control of the omnipotent God.

9:9, 10 the Bear, Orion … the Pleiades: God's creation of the wonders of the heavens is also celebrated by Amos (Amos 5:8). Indeed, these words come back on Job's head (38:31–33). great things … wonders: The works of God are so amazing and numerous that the human mind simply cannot comprehend them.

9:11, 12 God's presence may not be perceivable by the human eye (v. 11), but His works may not be resisted by the human will (v. 12).

(Heb. rahab) (9:13; 26:12; Is. 30:7) Strong’s #7293 The verbal root of this word means “to act stormily” or “to behave tempestuously.” The derived proper noun designates a mythological, primeval sea monster. Later it became a designation for Egypt. Isaiah reports the Lord Himself calling Egypt by this name (Is. 30:7); elsewhere Isaiah uses the word in a context that suggests a double reference—to both the sea monster and Egypt (Is. 51:9). When referring to the sea monster, this word is always couched in language depicting God’s cosmic power (9:1–13; 26:12–13; Ps. 89:8–12; Is. 51:6–11). The ancient Middle East had many mythological tales of powerful primeval sea monsters. The Bible uses this image of Rahab, not to endorse mythology but to demonstrate the Lord’s supremacy over all powers—even the ones in people’s imagination.

9:13–16 the proud (Heb. rahab; 26:12) should be rendered by a proper noun, Rahab, another name for the mythical sea monster, and an equivalent of Leviathan, the cosmic sea monster (compare Ps. 87:3).

9:17–20 This verse teems with possible ironic innuendoes. Job’s statement that God crushes him with a tempest anticipates the appearance of the Lord “out of the whirlwind” in 38:1, but with a different result. Job blames God for crushing and wounding him without cause, when actually it was Satan who had sought to destroy him without cause (2:3). The Hebrew word translated crushes in this verse is translated bruise in Gen. 3:15 and describes the conflict between Satan and humanity.

9:21 The phrase I do not know myself means “I do not care for myself” according to the clarification given in the rest of the verse.

9:22–24 Job contradicts Bildad’s claims of 8:3, 20 by accusing God of unjustly destroying both the blameless and the wicked (8:20, 21). Thus Job accuses God of being an unjust Judge who blindfolds earthly judges (v. 24).

9:25–28 Job desires to stand before God as an innocent man—not absolutely sinless but innocent of any sin comparable to his suffering.

9:29–31 Even if Job cleansed himself to his own satisfaction, God could plunge him into the pit (literally, “corruption”)—a filth so vile that his clothes would refuse to cover him.

9:32–35 Job complains that God is not a man who would go to court with Him (9:3). Neither does Job have an impartial mediator between God and himself—a mediator who can present his case before God. The desire for a mediator between God and humanity is a key theme in Job (16:19; 19:25), and it anticipates the NT emphasis on Jesus as the true Mediator between God and all of humanity (1 Tim. 2:5).

10:1, 2 Show me: Job dares to speak to God as an equal. Again using legal language (9:3), Job demands that God give him a fair trial through proper court protocol. Here Job comes close to unjustified indignation at God's sovereign will for his life.

10:3–7 This verse serves as a transition from Job's complaint (vv. 1–6) to his brief description of how God had lovingly created him (vv. 8–12). Job knows that he is not wicked, and he thinks that God is unjust in oppressing him. Yet Job also realizes that there is no one who can deliver him from God's hand.

10:8–17 In these verses, Job paints a portrait of the apparently contradictory nature of God, contrasting His loving character with His judgment. Job wonders how the God who had so carefully fashioned him in the womb can turn against him like a fierce lion. This is the desperate cry of a sufferer blind to the fact that God is working good out of all the tragic events of his life (42:12).

10:15, 16 Not being able to lift up his head expresses Job's shame and disgrace (Judg. 8:28; Lam. 2:10). Job's misery was so deep that although he believed he was innocent, he felt like a criminal with no self-esteem or dignity.

10:17 The phrase you renew your witnesses against me is a legal metaphor that may refer to each new aspect of Job's illness. In the equivalent war metaphor, the Lord was sending changes or troop reinforcements against him.

10:18–22 Job asks why he was ever born (vv. 18, 19; 3:3–10). Then he wishes the Lord would leave him alone to die (vv. 20–22; 3:20–26; 7:16–21). In contrast to 3:17–19, where the grave is described as a place of rest and freedom, the grave here is the land of darkness lacking any order. Job amplifies his wish that he could have gone straight from the womb to the tomb by linking the darkness of the grave with the dark day of his birth (3:3–9). Four different words for darkness in vv. 21, 22 stress the gloom and dreariness of the grave.

11:1–20 Zophar the Naamathite (2:11) was even more rude than Bildad (vv. 2–6; 8:1–13). He was a brash dogmatist who based his arguments on misapplied theology coupled with simplistic reasoning.

11:2–6 Zophar exaggerates what Job has said about his innocence (9:14–21) to make Job look foolish. Job never stated that his doctrine was pure.

11:7–9 When Zophar interrogates Job about the impossibility of comprehending the deep things of God, he employs for search out the same term Job used to describe God's wonders as beyond "finding out" (9:10). Thus Zophar may be trying to turn Job's words against him by saying that Job's actions are inconsistent with his theology. Since these verses anticipate portions of the Lord's speeches (38:16–18, 34–38), Zophar's doctrine is correct but the application is wrong. Biblical truth misapplied perverts the intent of the Scriptures and misleads. Sound doctrine without love does not please the Lord (Rev. 2:2–5).

11:10–12 Zophar's rhetorical question about God, who can hinder Him, echoes Job's sentiments in 9:12 verbatim. However, Zophar denies Job's allegation that God does not know the difference between the righteous and the wicked (v. 11; 9:22). As a retort to Job's rhetorical question (6:5) in which he compared his own cries to the braying of the "wild donkey," Zophar employs what may be a proverbial statement about the wild donkey. He could be implying that Job's "empty talk" indicates that he is empty-headed (vv. 3, 12).

11:13, 14 stretch out your hands: Stretching out the hands was a posture of prayer as well as of praise (Ps. 134:2). Assuming that Job is suffering because of his iniquity, Zophar rudely repudiates Job's assertion that he has no "injustice" on his tongue (6:30) by alleging that, in fact, it is Job's tents that are full of wickedness or injustice. The implication may be that Job had acquired his wealth by wrong means or had tolerated evil in his household.

11:15, 16 as waters … passed away: This is similar to our expression "water under the bridge."

11:17–20 The phrase dig around you is a literal rendition of a Hebrew root that may mean "to look carefully about" with "eagle eye" scrutiny (the usage of the same Hebrew term in 39:29).

12:1, 2 Wisdom will die with you! What bold, delicious sarcasm this is! The two personal pronouns you are plural in Hebrew, indicating that Job responds to all three friends who concur that he is guilty and needs to confess his sin.

12:3 Using the word understanding (Heb. lebab, "heart" or "mind," the noun from which the verb translated "will be wise" in 11:12 is derived), Job states that his mental capacity is not inferior to his friends (13:2).

12:4 mocked by his friends: The verb Job uses is also found in a similar negative context in Ps. 2:4. In those contexts the verb indicates ridicule. But in other passages this word expresses joy and laughter (Gen. 21:6).

12:5 The translation lamp is a basically literal translation of the Hebrew term (Heb. lappid, "torch"). However, since this yields little sense, perhaps the word should be understood as the preposition (Heb. le "to/for") plus the noun (pid, "ruin, disaster," 30:24; 31:29) as the NKJV footnote implies.

12:6 The phrase in what God provides by His hand may be the proper rendition of a difficult Hebrew phrase. However, it could also be translated "those who bring their god { i.e. idols or a sword} in their hands."

12:7–9 The pronoun you (v. 7) is singular that may indicate that Job now addresses Zophar (who had compared him to a "wild donkey") to emphasize that even the dumb animals instinctively understand that the hand of the Lord (Heb. Yahweh) is responsible for calamities. A few Hebrew mss. read Eloah, "God" instead of "Yahweh."

12:10–12 Job responds to Bildad's assertion of 8:8 (most likely in sarcastic fashion). It is nonetheless true that wisdom comes with age, a truth widely accepted in the ancient East.

12:13–25 It is possible that this is stated somewhat "tongue in cheek," but this section may also be read as a splendid confession of the unsurpassable wisdom of Yahweh. The words wisdom and strength and counsel and understanding (v. 13) form a double hendiadys (a hendiadys is where two words are used to express one idea; Gen. 1:2). This section is not unlike the confession of trust within a psalm of lament (for example, Ps. 13).

12:17–21 Job may be saying that God plunders counselors (such as his friends) and makes fools of judges such as himself. The word plundered could also be translated "make barefoot."

12:22, 23 God's reversal of darkness to light was precisely what Job needed (10:21, 22).

12:24, 25 God's coming reversal of human wisdom is desired by all who presently suffer the arrogance of people who prate their knowledge with no fear of the living God (Prov. 1:7).

13:1, 2 what you (Heb. plural) know, I also know (at 12:3). The irony is that neither Job nor his friends know very much because they all assume an inflexible dogma of retribution. The point should not be lost that the wisdom of the friends, although misapplied in this instance, is true wisdom —wisdom of God. There is a valid concept of retribution. It is just that it is not inflexible.

13:3, 4 Job desires to reason or argue his cause before God. He rejects the incompetent counsel of his three friends who, like worthless physicians, have made a wrong diagnosis concerning the cause of his disease and suffering. In fact they were forgers of lies, literally "falsehood-plasterers." Job's friends were smearing his sores with a sham concoction of dogma. Instead of piously accusing their unfortunate friend, they should have been praying with him.

13:5–13 In response to Zophar's derisive question concerning Job's words (11:3), Job expresses the desire that his friends would be absolutely silent. Indeed, that would have been the friends' wisest action (Prov. 17:28). Job's sarcasm reflects his earlier words to them in 12:2. Using the vocabulary of a wisdom teacher, Job explains his reason for insisting on silence. He wants them to hear and pay attention to his words. He urges them to listen diligently to his words instead of trying to defend God. Their pious platitudes are as worthless as proverbs composed of ashes.

13:14 The latter half of the verse seems to clarify take my flesh in my teeth to mean risking loss of one's life like an animal who tries to defend itself while carrying its prey in its mouth.

13:15–17 trust Him: While these verses are widely known as a powerful statement of Job's trust in God, they are not without difficulties. The Hebrew word translated Him is similar in sound to the Hebrew word for no. Thus some have translated these verses as follows: "Behold, He will slay me; I have no hope." Yet the positive translation of these verses as it is here seems preferable because it follows the flow of the section (vv. 13–19), which has other positive elements (vv. 16, 19). It also makes wonderful sense within these verses. Job believes that God is in the process of slowly taking his life. But in a bold declaration of faith, Job declares his absolute trust in God. For when he would be brought into God's presence, he would plead his cause directly with God. And then, if not before, Job would rediscover what he had never really lost: God's love and salvation (v. 16).

13:18, 19 I shall be vindicated: Job's strongest statement of confidence so far in the book that God will declare him innocent.

13:20–28 Since Job is still in this life of pain (v. 15), he turns to God as best he can and appeals his case directly to Him. Job requests that God, as plaintiff, list the specific charges He has against him rather than continue being his Judge.

13:24–26 The Hebrew terminology resembles vv. 20, 21. Job asks why does God hide His face, a Hebrew idiom indicating the absence of God's favor and blessing.

13:27, 28 In a portrait of God's "malevolent activities," Job uses the verb watch. The word normally describes God's benevolent care over a person's life, but in the Book of Job it depicts the role God gives to Satan (2:6).

14:1–6 Job agrees with Eliphaz's assessment that a person is born for trouble. He stresses life's misery and brevity through two vivid metaphors: a fading flower and a fleeing shadow.

14:5, 6 That God has determined the length of a person's life (Ps. 90:10) emphasizes God's sovereign power and wisdom, and conversely the impotence of human beings, who are under divinely set limits.

14:7–9 hope for a tree: Job implies that life is better for trees than for people. When a tree falls, it can sprout again. This is precisely the point of Isaiah's beautiful prophecy (Is. 6:13). The house of Jesse—that is, Israel—will be cut off, as one might cut down a great oak tree. But in God's great mercy, that tree will sprout new growth. The "holy seed" is in the stump. That new growth is the beautiful Branch (Is. 11:1), the Savior King whose name is Jesus.

14:10–13 Job's wish for the grave to be a temporary hiding place from God's wrath differs dramatically from his earlier remarks concerning the grave (7:9, 10; 10:18–22). He attributes the cause of his suffering to God's wrath because he assumes the retribution dogma that the righteous are always blessed and the wicked will eventually experience God's judgment.

Life after Death

Throughout history people have wondered whether this life is all there is. Is there a heaven or hell? Or does it all end here? Job asked that same question as he contemplated his sufferings (Job 14:14). He believed that death would end his pain (14:13); but would it also end his existence? Elsewhere Job described death as the "way of no return" (16:22) and the "king of terrors" (18:14). At times it appears that Job did not have a particularly positive outlook as he faced the end of life.

Yet in reading about Job's perspective on death, it is important to remember that he was working from a smaller knowledge base than God's people have today. He probably had no written portion of Scripture, and he was unfamiliar with the work of Jesus to deliver people from sin and death (Rom. 6:23; 1 Cor. 15:20–28).

Yet even without these important truths, Job had a certain confidence that he would see God after death. In fact, his stirring declaration of faith, beginning with the words, "I know that my Redeemer lives" (Job 19:25–27), has provided hope for generations of believers (helped in no small measure by George Frideric Handel, the eighteenth-century composer who set Job's lines to music as part of his masterpiece, "Messiah").

Whatever questions about death may have lingered from the days of Job, Jesus answered them when He declared, "He who believes in Me, though he may die, he shall live" (John 11:25). For that reason, Jesus' followers can celebrate even in the midst of grief and mourning over the loss of friends and loved ones. Jesus has promised eternal life to believers, free from all tears, sorrow, and pain (Rev. 21:4). That is why when it comes to death, Christians are a people of hope.

14:14–17 Job's question if a man dies, shall he live again is answered with an emphatic yes by Jesus and the NT authors (John 11:23–26; 1 Cor. 15:3–57; compare Is. 26:19; Dan. 12:2). But Job responds to his own question by a determination to wait for his change to come. Since Job considers life hard (7:1), perhaps he is implying that he will wait for relief from his suffering through death to find out the answer.

14:18–22 You destroy the hope of man (v. 19): Despite the hope against hope of vv. 13–17, the OT believer admits that he sees little evidence for a blessed afterlife. This is the importance of Jesus' resurrection. He promises, "Because I live, you will live also" (John 14:19).

15:1–3 The insinuation that Job had filled himself with the east wind is an allusion to the violent and scorching wind from the desert that brought no rain. Thus Eliphaz is implying that Job's arguments were destructive (vv. 12, 13) and without beneficial substance (the context of v. 3).

15:4–6 Eliphaz's statement your own mouth condemns you expresses ironic agreement with Job's earlier words (9:20). But Eliphaz deliberately twists Job's words to say that Job no longer needs a day in court since his own mouth has already incriminated him.

15:7 Are you the first man who was born: This sarcastic question anticipates a theme developed in the Lord's speeches (38:4–21).

15:8–11 wisdom … know: Eliphaz throws Job's words of 12:3; 13:2 back into his face. He counters Job's sarcastic rebuttal to Bildad that wisdom comes only with age (12:12) by saying that people much older than Job's father are on their side. Since Job was already a mature man who had raised ten grown children, this may be an exaggeration for effect.

15:12 wink: Although the precise meaning of the Hebrew word is not certain, it may mean "flash (with anger)" (context of v. 13).

15:13 The Hebrew word translated spirit may also be translated "temper" or "anger," as in Prov. 16:32.

15:14, 15 Eliphaz rephrases his thought of 4:17, 18 by interweaving an apparent gibe at Job's complaint of 14:1 about man "born of woman."

15:16–18 The phrase what I have seen shows that Eliphaz bases his instruction on experience and observation (4:1). He also appeals to the wisdom tradition as Bildad has done in 8:8–10.

15:19, 20 hidden from: The Hebrew could also be translated "stored up for."

15:21, 22 dreadful: Eliphaz begins his subtle argument to prove that Job is a wicked man. He alludes to Job's dread, the same word translated feared in 3:25, as an implicit indicator that Job is wicked.

15:23, 24 By using the phrase make him afraid in the context of a day of darkness, Eliphaz twists the words of Job's lament about the day of his birth (3:4, 5) to fit the dark day of his death (10:18–22). Then in contrast to 14:20 where Job blames God for prevailing against people, Eliphaz says that the wicked man's own fears overpower him.

15:25–33 The imagery of the fat man who eventually loses his wealth and possessions by divine punishment for his wickedness insinuates that Job's calamities have occurred because of his own self-indulgence.

15:34, 35 In mentioning the fire that will consume the tents of the wicked, Eliphaz employs the same two words that describe the fire of God that devoured Job's sheep and servants (1:16).

16:1, 2 I have heard many such things: Beginning with a rare direct allusion to what the previous speaker just said, Job belittles his friends as miserable comforters. To paraphrase Job: “Speaking of trouble, rather than comforting me in my troubles as a good counselor should, you have increased my trouble despite your claims to the contrary.”

16:3 The phrase words of wind is a caustic comeback to Eliphaz’s words in 15:2 and Bildad’s in 8:2. Both had twisted Job’s words of 6:26 (8:2; 15:2, 3).

16:4–18 The phrase shake my head at you indicates a mocking posture (as in Ps. 22:7). However, the word comfort, meaning “to nod the head sympathetically,” is used in 2:11 of the friends who came to console him. In effect, Job is saying: “Please nod your head with understanding instead of mocking and ridiculing me.”

16:19–21 The identity of Job’s witness is disputed. One’s understanding about Job’s “Redeemer” in 19:25 will affect one’s understanding of Job’s witness (19:25). Some argue that Job was referring to God. However, the context of 9:33, where Job wished for an impartial mediator between God and himself (9:32, 33), and the immediate context of v. 21 suggest that Job was using a legal metaphor to express his wish for an advocate who would plead for him with God, as a man pleads for his neighbor on earth. This anticipates Jesus Christ, who is our Intercessor (Heb. 7:25) and Advocate (1 John 2:1).

16:20–22 The difficult Hebrew phrase rendered my friends scorn me might also be translated “my interpreter is my friend.” What a powerful image this is!

17:1–11 In another legal metaphor, Job appeals to God to act as his advocate by laying down a pledge, that is, providing bail. The use of the same metaphor in Ps. 119:121, 122 to indicate the psalmist's request for relief from his "oppressors" may suggest that Job was pleading for God to demonstrate confidence in his innocence.

17:12 This verse may be a caricature of the friends' false assurances that if he would repent, his darkness would soon become light.

17:13, 14 Job counters the false assurances of his friends with a facetious statement about waiting for the grave as one who longingly desires to go home to his house and his long-lost relatives, corruption (or "the pit") and the worm.

17:15, 16 The plural verb they go down may refer back to the words corruption and worm (v. 14).

18:1–3 When Bildad asks why he and his friends are counted as beasts, he apparently resents the implication of Job's words in 12:7–9.

18:4 The phrase you who tear yourself in your anger seems to be Bildad's answer to Job's allegation that God had torn Job in His anger (16:13).

18:5–10 net … trap: Six different Hebrew synonyms for various types of nets and traps emphasize the many imminent dangers that God has designed for the wicked to ensure that they will be caught in their wickedness.

18:11–14 Bildad cruelly attributes Job's disease to the firstborn of death, a reference to the demon of plagues and disease (3:8). The king of terrors is probably death personified as a king. Others suggest that this may refer to Satan.

18:15–19 In describing roots as being dried or withered, Bildad contradicts Job's previous argument about the tree that is cut down but sprouts up from its roots (14:7, 8). There seems to be no hope for Job's family tree because God, who is about to wipe the memory of Job from the earth, has already removed his descendants or posterity. In ancient times this was a sign of a divine curse. Once again Bildad manifests great insensitivity toward Job over the loss of his children (8:4).

18:20, 21 In this summation of the evidence, Bildad uses the word wicked, in Hebrew literally the "unjust one," to suggest that he is refuting Job's allegation that God has turned him over to the "ungodly." Bildad believes that the evidence he has exhibited in vv. 5–20 implicates Job himself as the culprit, the wicked one.

19:1, 2 How long will you torment: Job is tired of hearing Bildad's rude questions and the tormenting words of all his friends.

19:3–8 Job's friends have used the disgrace associated with his disease to plead the case that he is guilty of sin (10:17; 16:8; 17:3). With the statement God has wronged me, Job responds to Bildad's implication in 8:3 that God does not subvert justice. He argues that Bildad's theory about God does not fit the facts. Instead he asserts that God has wrongly entrapped him as though he were a wild animal or criminal. In describing God as surrounding him with His net, Job continues the imagery of the divine hunter initiated by Bildad. Essentially, Job feels fenced in by God when it is really Satan who has been mistreating him (1:10; 3:23).

19:9, 10 Job compares his removal from the respected position of judge or city councilman (29:7–25) to being dethroned like a king whose crown is taken from his head. Job's hope, which had once sprouted up like a new tree from a stump (14:7–9), has been totally uprooted.

19:11–17 The mention of the children of Job's own body is problematic since the book seems to document the loss of all ten of his children (1:2, 18, 19). It is possible this is a rhetorical statement: "I would be repulsive even to my children" (compare v. 18).

19:18–20 The meaning of the phrase skin of my teeth is uncertain. It may imply that his body was so devastated by disease that his teeth had fallen out and only the skin or gums of his teeth were left intact.

19:21, 22 That Job believed the hand of God has struck him is ironic, since in fact, God had refused Satan's request to "stretch out His hand" against Job (1:11; 2:5).

19:23, 24 The irony of this verse in the context of the present book is wonderful. More significantly, some of Job's words would best have not been written!

19:25, 26 Job expresses his confidence in his living Redeemer, which in this legal context may be translated "Vindicator" or "Protector of the Family Rights" (Ps. 119:154; also Ruth 4:1 where the word is translated close relative). Some interpreters believe that Job was referring to God, a view supported by the context of 17:3 and possibly by the mention of God in v. 26. However, the context of the Book of Job—Job's longing for a mediator (9:33) and his desire for someone to plead on his behalf with God (16:19–21)—may suggest that he was thinking of someone other than God. Here is a strong, resolute hope for a mediator between God and humanity.

Ultimately Job’s longing for a vindicator or mediator was fulfilled in Jesus Christ (1 Tim. 2:5).

(Heb. raah) (19:27; Deut. 3:27; Eccl. 11:7; Is. 26:10; Lam. 1:9) Strong’s #7200: This is the common term used in reference to the natural function of the eyes and is thus most often translated as see (Gen. 48:10; Deut. 1:8; 2 Kin. 3:14; Mic. 7:9, 10). The word also has a number of metaphorical meanings, such as acceptance (Gen. 7:1; Num. 23:21) and provision (Gen. 22:8, 14; 1 Sam. 16:1). It can even convey the notion of assurance and salvation, as is the case here. In 42:5 the word means “to see” in the sense of “to come to recognize” or “to experience fully” something previously known or understood. At times the word is associated with a prophetic message, as a prophet is described as seeing a vision from God (Is. 6:1; Jer. 1:11–13; Ezek. 1:1).

19:27 Again, the redundant, emphatic pronoun I in the Hebrew text (as in v. 25) indicates a strong belief and deep conviction. This is a wonderful example of a sufferer passionately expressing his resolute faith even in the middle of a horrible situation.

19:28 The NKJV translation in me follows the Masoretic Text, but several Hebrew manuscripts and versions indicate the translation in Him. The difference is basically one of deciding where the quotation in the first part of the verse ends.

19:29 Job’s warning to his friends to be afraid of the sword for yourselves may have been his rebuttal of Eliphaz’s remarks about the wicked person watching in dread for the sword (15:22).

20:1–3 The word therefore alerts the reader that Zophar will respond to Job's speech. He reacts angrily to Job's strong warning in his last statement (19:28, 29). Furthermore, when he speaks of having heard the reproof that reproaches him, he notifies Job that the hard feelings about being reproached (19:3 has the same Heb. root kalam, "to insult," "to humiliate") were mutual, since he also had felt the sting of Job's insults. The tragic results of venting one's emotions to others through sarcasm and insults illustrates that a war of words is a lose-lose situation. How tragic that these wise men failed to apply the wisdom principle that a "soft answer turns away wrath" (Prov. 15:1)!

20:4–6 Zophar confronts Job's confident statement in 19:25 with a sarcastic rebuke. Since Job supposedly knew so much about his Redeemer, surely he knew the wisdom teaching that the wicked prosper only for a short time.

20:7 The word refuse may also be translated "dung." This would be a scathing comment.

20:8–19 Though evil may be sweet to the wicked for a while, the certain consequences of their behavior will bring about their downfall.

20:20, 21 In stating that the wicked person knows no quietness, Zophar implies that Job has received what he deserves. Zophar's statement that the well-being or "prosperity" of the wicked will not last fits Job's circumstances: Job has lost everything. In essence, Zophar is confirming Job's complaint in 7:7 that he will "never again see good."

20:22–26 The phrase fire will consume echoes Eliphaz's searing words of 15:34 (same Hebrew words). The translation shall go ill with him could also be rendered "shall feed on him."

20:27, 28 Zophar apparently reverses Job's appeal to the earth and heavens (16:18, 19) for vindication. He argues that the heavens and the earth will bear witness not to Job's innocence but to his iniquity.

20:29 In this summary verdict, Zophar suggests that it is too late for Job to repent (contrast his previous words in 11:13–20). God would have no clemency for such a wicked person.

21:1, 2 your consolation: Job tells the three friends that if they will listen carefully, they will finally be of some consolation, or comfort, to him.

21:3–6 keep mocking: Perhaps Job turned directly to Zophar to rebuke the most offensive of his friends. Zophar had not only claimed that Job mocked (Zophar used the same Hebrew word for mocking in 11:13), but he mocked Job's words (20:9).

21:7 Why do the wicked live: With a rhetorical question, Job begins exposing the loopholes in the retribution dogma—the belief that suffering always indicates God's punishment of a person. The prosperity of the wicked is still a mystery for believers today. Other biblical writers agonized over it (Ps. 37; 73; Jer. 12:1–4). But the Scriptures affirm that God is controlling everything to accomplish His good purposes (Rom. 8:28).

21:8 In saying that sometimes the descendants of the wicked are established, Job defends himself against the corollary that even if a wicked man prospers for a while, his children will be devastated (18:19).

21:9–16 Job reacts to Eliphaz's argument in 15:21–24 that although the wicked live peacefully for a while, they live in terror of inevitable destruction. Job contradicts this by saying that the wicked even live in their houses safe—without fear. The wicked simply deny God's existence, so they live without any fear of His judgment.

21:17 The rhetorical questions introduced by how often expect the answer "not very often." With the first question about the lamp of the wicked, Job challenges Bildad's belief that the wicked person's light does go out (18:5, 6). The second question opposes Zophar's dogmatic statement in 20:23 that God will judge the wicked before they find enjoyment in life.

21:18 This verse may also be construed as a question (being subordinate to v. 17).

21:19–27 Job denies the dogma that even if a wicked person prospers temporarily, his children will be punished. Job's position is sustained by other passages in the Bible (Deut. 24:16; Ezek. 18:1–28; John 9:1–3).

21:28 Where is … the dwelling place of the wicked? Job's friends imply that it is destroyed in this life. This is the point of view which Job is denying (v. 30).

21:29 Those who travel give additional testimony to support Job's position that there are wicked people who prosper, and by inference, righteous people who suffer.

21:30–32 Job may be quoting his friends' position that the wicked are doomed. However, the Hebrew words translated reserved for could also be rendered "spared from," which would indicate Job's own contrary belief. This latter view is supported by the Hebrew word translated brought out. This word reappears in v. 32 in the context of a wicked person being brought to the cemetery without being repaid for what he has done (v. 31).

21:33 shall be sweet: Job uses the same Hebrew word Zophar employed (20:12) in arguing that evil is sweet to the wicked person but will become bitter in his stomach (20:14). Job contradicts this by saying that things are sweet for the wicked even in the grave.

21:34 Job concludes his speech with a rebuke for their failed efforts to convince Job of their theological views. Again, we observe that the failure in the friends of Job was not one of concern or of conviction. It was in their inability to anticipate such a glaring exception to the expected pattern of retribution that they believed drives like an unwavering moral force through the universe. To Job, their words were vapor (Heb. hebel; Eccl. 1:2).

22:1, 2 The implication of Eliphaz's rhetorical question—that a human being cannot put God under any obligation that God must repay—is a valid theological principle that the Lord Himself corroborates in 41:11. However, his application of that principle to Job's circumstances (vv. 3–5) was invalid, for it was based on the faulty assumption that the righteous are always blessed and the wicked always experience God's judgment on earth.

22:3, 4 The same Hebrew root words for blameless and fear had earlier been used by Eliphaz in his courteous remarks about Job's "reverence" and "integrity" (4:6). In these verses, Eliphaz is being sarcastic.

22:5–9 naked … weary … widows: Eliphaz lists some trumped-up charges concerning the way Job gained his great wealth: greedy exploitation of the poor in business dealings; lack of hospitality or charity; and lack of compassion to the bereaved. Job categorically denied these charges (29:11–17; 31:13–22) and God's own witness to Satan reveals to the reader that the charges were false (1:8).

22:10–14 Can He judge: Eliphaz misrepresents Job's position. Although he accuses Job of not understanding God, it is Eliphaz who has the greater misunderstanding.

22:15–17 Eliphaz twists Job's words recorded in 21:14–16 to support his own view that Job was walking in wicked ways. Because of this, Job's prosperity was only temporary.

22:18 The phrase but the counsel of the wicked is far from me (quoting Job in 21:16) may be an example of innuendo, mocking Job for what he was saying and also expressing Eliphaz's own sentiments.

22:19, 20 In stating that the innocent will laugh the wicked to scorn (Heb. laag, "to mock"), Job's friend mocks his suggestion to keep mocking (the same Hebrew verb). The righteous will be glad when the wicked (including Job) are judged.

22:21 The Hebrew word translated acquaint yourself, or sometimes "yield," is derived from the same root as "be profitable" in v. 2. This might be a play on words: "Although you cannot be profitable to God through your efforts, you can acquaint yourself with or yield to Him."

22:22, 23 Eliphaz issues another call for repentance (5:8–17) by asking Job to return to the Almighty. Then he suggests that Job remove iniquity from his tents, a reiteration of Zophar's words (11:14).

22:24–29 Eliphaz implies that Job has been trusting in his riches rather than in God, something Job would deny in 31:24, 25. Then he urges Job to trust in the Almighty God as he does in gold.

22:30 Eliphaz's prediction that God would deliver one who is not innocent through the purity of Job's hands would be fulfilled ironically through Job's prayer for the three friends (42:8–10).

23:1, 2 Job is bitter because of his suffering and the false accusation of his friends. Even today: Probably means “even now.”

23:3 More than anything else, Job seeks to find God. At God’s seat (throne), he is sure he would find justice because the reign of God is based on righteousness (Ps. 97:2).

23:4–9 After he presents many persuasive arguments, Job will rest his case because he knows God will be just. Job desires to know and understand rather than win an argument. Above all, he seeks to restore his communion with God.

23:10–12 Job’s use of the metaphor about gold to express his assurance of being found pure from guilt may be a rebuttal to Eliphaz’s brazen words of 22:24, 25. When Job asserts that he has kept God’s way, he rejects Eliphaz’s accusation that he has kept the way of the wicked (22:15).

23:13–16 When Job contemplates the unique power and sovereign freedom of God, he is terrified. To him, God seems to be a capricious despot who does as He pleases (9:12, 34).

23:17 This verse likely describes Job’s deep depression, not only because of his losses, but also because of his failure to understand God’s purpose.

24:1 Since times are not hidden from the Almighty might also be translated, “Why are not times stored up by the Almighty?” The parallelism of the second line may indicate that the word times alludes to the set days for God’s judgment.

24:2–8 Removing landmarks in the ancient Middle East was tantamount to stealing land. It was a serious crime that placed a person under a divine curse (Deut. 27:17).

24:9–11 It is ironic that Job complains about God allowing people to snatch an infant from its mother’s breast. Previously he had complained that God had not taken him from his mother’s breasts after his own birth (3:12).

24:12, 13 In this transition between lists of social crimes and criminal acts, Job protests against God ignoring those who cry out for help, since God was supposedly ignoring his own cries for help.

24:14, 15 the murderer rises with the light is a good literal translation of the Hebrew text. The most natural meaning of the word light is “at dawn,” but it may denote “at dusk” (context of vv. 14–16).

24:16 Thieves would break, literally “dig,” into houses by night. The walls of houses were built of mud bricks through which thieves could dig. Marked for themselves may mean “shut themselves up” by day.

24:17 The words if someone recognizes them / they are in the terrors of the shadow of death, may also be rendered, “For they are acquainted with the terrors of deep darkness.” On the words shadow of death, read 3:5.

24:18–25 These verses about the ultimate fate of the wicked are problematic. They sound more like the friends’ words than Job’s (15:1—21:34). Therefore, critics usually assign them to Zophar, who has no speech in the third cycle of dialogues, or to Bildad, whose last speech is very short (25:1–6). However, they should be considered as Job’s words, for he was probably quoting his friends’ viewpoint in order to refute them.

25:1, 2 In referring to God's dominion and fear, Bildad seems to be responding to Job's comments (23:13–17) that the very thought of God's sovereignty made him afraid.

25:3, 4 Bildad repeats the previous rhetorical questions posed by Job (9:2) and Eliphaz (4:17; 15:14) to emphasize that a person cannot be righteous or pure before the Lord.

25:5, 6 Bildad's view of God's dominion and majesty in the heavens causes him to devalue mortal man as a maggot. He responds insensitively to Job by suggesting that Job does not need to wait until he dies to be grouped with the maggots (the same Hebrew word that Job used in 17:14). This was caustic sarcasm, for Job was in fact covered with worms (7:5).

26:1–4 How have: Rather than presenting genuine questions, these verses are probably sarcastic exclamations by Job to imply how little Bildad has helped him. To paraphrase Job: “You’ve really been a big help to me! How encouraging that you tell me I’m nothing but a worm (25:6)! Finally my cries for help have been answered.”

26:5, 6 The words of these verses echo the thoughts of God’s omnipotence found in the Psalms (Ps. 139:7–12). While Sheol and Destruction—that is, death or the place of the dead—were fearful, hidden concepts to Job and his contemporaries, they caused no fear and held no secrets for the all-knowing God.

26:7, 8 the north over empty space: The Hebrew word translated north probably does not refer to a geographical designation (the same Hebrew term describes God’s mountain in Ps. 48:1, 2) but to God’s dwelling place in the heavens (v. 9 mentions God’s throne). If the statement that God hangs the earth on nothing (Gen. 1:2) refers to the suspension of earth in space, it preceded Newton’s concept of gravitational attraction by thousands of years. Though this may ultimately be the divine intent, it is not clear that Job himself would have understood the complete meaning of his own words. He probably thought, as did other ancients, that the earth was a circular disk (v. 10) supported by nothing. In other words, he thought of the earth as floating on the vast subterranean waters.

26:9 The translation throne (Heb. kisseh, an alternate spelling of the word, kisse, “throne”) follows the Masoretic Text, which is probably correct. However, some translate “full moon” (changing the word to keseh, an alternate spelling of kese).

26:10, 11 Job’s graphic description of the circular horizon and the pillars of heaven—probably the mountains that held up the heavens in ancient cosmology—pictures the way the earth appears to the human eye.

26:12, 13 With his power God controls the sea, which was a symbol of evil and chaos. The highly figurative language may express the power of God over creation in a wide variety of ways. Here the sea and storm are merely creatures under the control of the Creator.

IN CONTEXT

The Place of the Dead

The understanding of the afterlife in Judah and Israel resembled that current in Mesopotamia and Syria-Palestine. Under the earth, in a dark muddy realm, was Sheol—the netherworld where all the souls of the dead go, whether good or evil. The popular notion in Egypt of an afterlife with a touch of hope for a good eternity did not influence Palestine, despite Egyptian control of Canaan for a millennium. In Palestine, Sheol was understood as a place of darkness, meaninglessness, and hopelessness. Once entering the netherworld, one had to stay there. The prospect of eternity in a most unpleasant place made a long life in this world quite desirable.

The dead retained their individuality in the netherworld, and one could have contact with them. Tubes have been found in the tombs of Palestine from the Bronze Age through the Hellenistic period which allowed food or wine to be dropped into the netherworld. The living sought information from the dead through necromancy, as Saul attempted to consult Samuel's spirit rising from Sheol (1 Sam. 28:11–19). This form of inquiry was forbidden by Israelite law (Deut. 18:10, 11).

The cultures surrounding Judah and Israel had deities who ruled the netherworld. In Mesopotamia the divine couple Nergal and Ereshkigal hanged the corpses of the dead on butchers' hooks like slabs of meat. Egypt's afterlife under the rule of Osiris was more appealing, if you survived the journey to the land of the blessed dead. Syria-Palestine had the god Mot (meaning "death") who was hungry to devour the living. The voraciousness of the netherworld and the mercilessness of its ruler, Mot, is reflected in the "devouring" and "king of terrors" of Job 18:11–14.

26:14 This is one of the most stunning of all the verses in the Bible that describe the power of God. Job asserts that if we truly considered God's great power, we would know that what we observe of creation represents the mere edges of His garment—just His whisper. What would happen to us if ever He were to thunder?

27:1 Moreover Job continued his discourse: The different editorial formula for introducing the speaker (as in 29:1) suggests something unusual. Perhaps Job had paused briefly to wait for Zophar before he continued speaking.

27:2, 3 As God lives: These words reflect part of an oath formula used in ancient courts. Job paradoxically combines these words with two accusations against God. According to Job, the living God is the very one who has denied him justice—his legal right to due process. Job swears in the name of the divine Judge who, as his opponent, has perverted justice in His own favor. He alleges that God has made him bitter. Though Job repeatedly complained of a bitter spirit (7:11; 10:1), the Lord did not cause him to respond that way. Job's responses only exposed the attitude that lay deep within his being. The message of the Lord for Job was that no matter what the circumstances, one should resolutely trust in God (40:8; 42:1–6).

27:4, 5 Job denies that he would use the tactics of his so-called friends (13:7). He not only refuses to speak wickedness, he will not lie nor attempt to defend himself. you: This Hebrew plural (vv. 11, 12) refers to all of Job's three friends. Job maintains that they are erroneous in their reasoning, and to agree with them would be to compromise his integrity.

27:5, 6 Job's determination to hold fast his righteousness and integrity was remarkable. The Hebrew word translated hold fast also occurs in 2:9. Though Job believed that God had taken away a fair trial (v. 2), he would not put away his integrity. He persevered despite the discouraging words of his wife and friends.

27:7–12 In this imprecatory prayer, Job wishes that his enemy would receive the fate reserved for the wicked. Since he turns the words of his friends back against them, he may be alluding to his friends collectively as an enemy who rises up against him and deserves the fate of the wicked.

27:10–12 Job returns Eliphaz's own advice back to him (22:22–27). Whereas Eliphaz counseled Job to turn to the Almighty for instruction and to delight in Him, Job denies that a godless person would turn to God, much less delight himself in the Almighty. Therefore, Job insists that Eliphaz and his friends should turn to the Almighty and receive instruction.

The Fairness of God

Fires. Floods. Earthquakes. Famine. So many people seem to suffer from "acts of God" that strike without warning. Like Job, they appear to be relatively innocent of wrongdoing that might explain their pain. People wonder, "Is God fair to let these things happen?"

This was one of the questions with which Job and his friends wrestled. Calamity struck Job and his family for no apparent reason. Why? His friends took the view that God was punishing him, that he must have done something wrong to deserve such evil. Job disagreed, not only because he felt certain of his own integrity, but because the wicked actually seemed to prosper, not suffer (Job 12:6).

Yet that only brought Job back to the original question: Is God fair? If the wicked prosper, where is justice in the world? Job concluded that the seemingly easy life of the wicked is very temporary; sooner or later it will all fall apart (27:13–23). In the end, Job maintained, God will humble the proud, those with integrity will inherit their possessions, and justice will be served.

Ultimately God is indeed fair (36:6; 37:23, 24)—a fact for which we can be thankful, because life is not fair. In this life, people do not always get what they deserve. But this life is not the end of the story. God Himself will write the final chapters.

27:13–23 Since these verses sound more like the friends' words than Job's, some scholars assign them to Zophar or Bildad. However, since Job had a fondness for turning the words of his friends back in their faces, these verses may be a satirical paraphrase of the friends' teaching about the fate of the wicked (24:18–25).

27:17 Job's prediction that the innocent will divide the silver may foreshadow what happens to Job himself in 42:11.

28:1–28 This is a magnificent wisdom hymn that is naturally divided into three stanzas by the refrain of vv. 12, 20, with v. 28 serving as a conclusion. The rhetorical questions in the initial refrains (v. 12) link the first two stanzas which provide a negative answer: (1) Though human ingenuity can discover precious metals, it cannot find true wisdom (vv. 1–11). (2) People cannot find wisdom because they cannot fathom its value, which is beyond silver or gold (vv. 12–19). The final stanza (vv. 21–28) supplies a positive answer to the questions of the refrain (v. 20): Only God knows true wisdom, the wisdom He has placed in the fabric of creation (vv. 21–27) and has revealed to humanity (v. 28).

28:1–5 The mention of iron being mined from the earth implies a time after the beginning of the Iron Age (around 1200 B.C.) for the writing of the Book of Job.

28:6 The term translated sapphires probably means lapis lazuli.

28:7, 8 The bird, the falcon, and the lions represent all animals of every kind. No animal is familiar with the treasures hidden in the earth that human beings can discover (vv. 2–11).

28:9–11 The streams from trickling may be rephrased “the sources of the rivers.”

28:12 The word wisdom (v. 20) may emphasize the true wisdom that only the Lord knows (vv. 23–27) and that people may learn in relationship with Him (v. 28).

28:13–19 Every verse in this whole stanza has the Hebrew word for not at least once, stressing the absence of wisdom and even the desire for wisdom. Thus the rhetorical questions concerning the whereabouts of wisdom and understanding (v. 12) receive an emphatic answer: not anywhere in the land of the living or of the dead (v. 14 and its parallel in vv. 21, 22).

28:20–27 Only God understands the way of wisdom and knows the place of understanding. Though people surpass the animals in knowing the place of precious metals (v. 1), and the “source” of gems (v. 6), God alone is the master and source of wisdom (vv. 27, 28).

28:28 This verse vindicates Job’s stance and marks a transition from the dialogue to the discourses. The words He said may introduce a reference to the Book of Proverbs (Prov. 3:7; 9:10).

29:1, 2 Job's wish for the prosperity of months past suggests how long it was since his suffering began (7:3).

29:3–5 The picture of God's lamp shining on Job's head symbolizes divine blessing and success (contrast 18:5, 6; 21:17; also Ps. 18:28, 29).

29:6 The abundance of cream (or curds) and oil indicates wealth.

29:7 The gate of the city with its nearby open square, similar to the modern courthouse square, was a place where town business and court proceedings were held (Ruth 4:1).

29:8–11 saw me and hid: Job describes the respect he had received from young and old alike because of his position in the city.

29:12, 13 Job rejects Eliphaz's allegations of 22:6–9.

29:14, 15 The vivid portrait of Job being clothed in righteousness and wearing justice like a judicial robe is a stark contrast to his present condition, with his flesh being "clothed" with worms and dust (7:5). He will emphasize this in ch. 30.

29:16 Job was a father to the poor (i.e., a benevolent protector of their rights). Similarly King Hammurabi (in the epilogue to his famous Code) describes himself as "a true father to the people," whose words helped the cause of the oppressed.

29:17–19 broke the fangs: Job had rescued the poor (v. 12) and the helpless from the wicked. Functioning much like a judge, Job had established justice and righteousness (v. 14). This explains his frequent use of legal metaphors in his speeches (9:3).

29:20–25 Job reminisces about his past days of glory. While undergoing severe trials, he did what many of us do: he longed for "the good old days" when he still had prowess or "glory" with the bow. The phrase bow is renewed apparently symbolizes a rejuvenation of vigor and might (Gen. 49:24). Bows were usually unstrung when not in use, allowing the wood to retain its strength.

30:1–6 But now introduces Job's lament (ch. 30) about the complete reversal of his former prosperity (ch. 29). Rather than everyone respecting him (29:8–11, 21–25), even young ruffians were daring to mock him (29:24). These young people were so base that Job had disdained to put their fathers, who were presumably better than they, with his dogs. His words not only stress how low they are but also how humiliated he feels as an outcast among outcasts (vv. 9–11).

30:7 brayed: Job's use of this verb emphasizes not only that the ruffians are poor (24:5, where the poor are called "wild donkeys"), but also that they act more like animals than human beings.

30:8–10 Job denigrates the families of the outcasts as vile men (Heb. bene-nabal, literally, "sons of a fool"). Ironically Job had already used the latter word in warning his wife.

30:11–15 When Job says God loosed his bowstring, he apparently expresses a meaning opposite to that in 29:20. Here the words mean that God had put him "on the shelf," as a bow is set aside when it is unstrung.

30:16, 17 When Job says that his soul is poured out like water, he means being emotionally and physically drained of strength (Lam. 2:11, 12) because of his days of affliction (vv. 1–31). These words are much like those of David, as found in Ps. 22:14, 15.

30:18, 19 Job compares the terrible effects of his suffering and disease (vv. 16, 17) to being choked by a powerful force. Then he identifies God as the One who abuses His great power by harming Job for no apparent reason (9:19; 24:22). To the suffering Job, God seems like a gangster who grabs a person by the neck and flings him into the mire. He blames the Lord for throwing him in the ashes (2:8), even though Satan was in fact the cause of his suffering (2:4–6).

30:20, 21 Ironically, Job blames God's strong hand, which Satan could not move, for calamities that have actually been caused by the hand of Satan (1:11, 12, 18, 19).

30:22, 23 I know: Job declares his frustration with God almost as directly as he had expressed his confidence in the Redeemer (19:25). Just as surely as he knows that God will vindicate him, he also knows that God will bring him to death.

30:24 The meaning of this verse is disputed because the Hebrew text does not identify whether God or a human is the subject of the clause stretch out his hand. Yet if we assume that this verse refers to God, the point is potent. If the rubble could speak out, God would hold His hand. How can He not stay His hand when it is a man who calls out to Him?

30:25 Job builds on the image of the helpless (v. 24) by remembering his own compassion for the poor. Now that he is downcast, why does God not sympathize with him?

30:26, 27 By utilizing the same two Hebrew verbs used in 29:21, Job contrasts the demeanor of his constituents who waited (Heb. yahal) for him silently (Heb. damam), with his own stance before God. When Job waited for light, his disappointment with the darkness would not allow him to rest (Heb. damam, "be still or silent") internally.

30:28–31 In light of the nearby reference to Job's dark, diseased skin (v. 30), the word mourning might mean "darkened," as in 6:16. When Job cries out for help, both God (v. 20) and people of all social classes ignore him. His loud cries for justice are as futile as the wails of jackals and ostriches. Because of his diseased condition (v. 30), Job feels ostracized, like these animal inhabitants of desolate places.

The Sin of Lust

Job's sufferings caused him to make a sweeping inventory of his inner life. One of the areas he evaluated was his attitude toward women and how he handled his own sexual drives (Job 31:1).

Job openly acknowledged the power of sexual appetites. He catalogued the steps of lust from "looking upon a virgin" (31:1), to allowing one's heart to follow one's eyes (31:7), to finally allowing oneself to be enticed by a woman and then scheming to have her (31:9).

Some may see this progression as normal, natural, or unavoidable. But Job viewed lust as a serious moral failure (31:11). He spoke of it in the same context with: • falsehood and deceit (31:5); • oppression of slaves (31:13–15); • mistreatment of the poor (31:16, 19, 20); • abuse or neglect of widows (31:16, 18); • taking food out of the mouth of starving orphans (31:17, 18, 21); • rejoicing over the misfortunes of others, even if they are one's enemies (31:29, 30); • trusting in wealth (rather than in God, 31:24); and • hypocrisy (31:33, 34).

Lust is a serious sin!

31:1–40 Job's oath of innocence (29:1—31:40) contains curses that he invites God to impose if He is to find Job guilty (vv. 8, 10, 22, 40). Thus ch. 31 corresponds structurally to Job's curse against his day of birth in ch. 3. It bears a general similarity to the oath of clearance, widely used in ancient Mesopotamia. In this oath, an accused person would swear his innocence at a trial. However, the ethical content of Job's confession, with its emphasis on inward motivation (vv. 1, 2, 24, 25, 33, 34) and attitude (vv. 1, 7, 9, 26, 27, 29, 30), is unique and unparalleled until Jesus' Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5—7). Yet in this oath, a hint of pride creeps in (vv. 13, 16; ch. 37), setting the stage for the speeches of Elihu and the Lord.

31:1 This verse begins Job's oath of innocence (ch. 31). When Job made a covenant with his eyes, he wisely recognized that the eye is the main avenue for temptation (vv. 7, 9, 26, 27).

31:2–5 The word if was part of a formula used by accused persons to swear their innocence (vv. 7, 9, 13, 16, 19–21, 24–26, 29, 33, 38, 39). The full oath formula was, in effect, "If I am guilty of this crime, may God impose that curse." Because of hesitation about speaking a curse, the person swearing the oath would normally use an abbreviated version. By contrast, Job's daring use of the full formula four times (vv. 7–10, 21, 22, 38–40) demonstrates his confidence that he would be acquitted.

31:6–13 Job implies that he had been fairer in listening to the lawsuit or cause (Mic. 6:1) of his own servants than God was being with his complaint.

31:14–16 Job claims to have satisfied the desire of the poor, possibly in contrast to God's refusal to give Job a fair hearing before Him.

31:17–22 The loss of an arm in ancient society usually meant the loss of income, respect, and even life itself.

31:23–27 The phrase my mouth has kissed my hand reflects the apparent ancient custom of kissing the hand as a prelude to the superstitious and idolatrous act of throwing a kiss to the heavenly bodies.

31:28–34 God who is above: Job was resolute in his belief in the one, living God. Though he lived in a world filled with notions of many gods, Job believed in one God. This text expresses the monotheism of early biblical faith, in contrast to the prevailing polytheism of that time.

31:35 Job's wish for one to hear him seems to express his continued desire for an impartial mediator or judge (9:32, 33; 16:19; 19:25). Job's mark refers to his written signature attached to his oath of innocence (ch.

31). He seeks a subpoena to compel God the prosecutor to answer him with specific charges, or perhaps an acquittal in a book, that is, a legal document. Hence, Job is arguing that God has not been following proper court procedure (13:22).

31:36 Job believed that the written charges would be so few, if any, that he could wear the document proudly on his shoulder.

31:37–39 Job would declare to God the number his of steps or give account for his every act and thought (14:16; 31:4). His idea of approaching God like a prince shows his confidence that he will be vindicated but reflects a lack of humility, an attitude that the Lord Himself will address (38:2, 3; 40:9–14).

31:40 the words of Job are ended: For the second time, the dialogue comes to a close (27:23), ending in a stalemate. Job has finished his words, and his three friends have nothing more to say. This leads to the voice of a new speaker, Elihu.

IN DEPTH

Worshiping the Sun and Moon

As Job takes an oath of innocence (Job 31), he swears that he has never been enticed to worship the sun or moon (31:26, 27). Possibly worshipers threw kisses to these celestial deities, since kissing was part of idol worship (1 Kin. 19:18; Hos. 13:2). Job again swears that he has not gestured such kisses (Job 31:27). Job's oath reflects the popularity of both the sun and the moon as deities in Syria-Palestine.

Yareah, the moon good, is mentioned in the Ugaritic ritual and mythological texts, dating around 1400 to 1200 B.C. In one narrative Yareah is a guest at a drinking feast of the gods, but there is little mention of him otherwise. The moon god Sin of Haran was worshiped throughout Syria-Palestine and Mesopotamia from the third millennium through at least the Hellenistic period (332–37 B.C.). The characteristic crescent moon with dangling tassels, which symbolized this deity, has been found on numerous inscriptions and steles (stone slabs), including some discovered in Judah and Israel.

Much more is known about Shemesh. This deity, who could appear as either feminine (sun goddess) or masculine (sun god), was important in all ancient Near Eastern pantheons. In Ugarit the goddess Shapsu (meaning "sun") was the arbiter of divine judgment as proclaimed by the chief god El. In this she mirrored an image, found from Egypt to Mesopotamia, of the sun as a god of justice.[L&T, 1089]

People of the ancient Near East believed that the sun god rode through the sky by day and the netherworld at night, and thus saw and knew all human activity. Such knowledge made Shemesh useful for locating anyone who was to receive a message from El. In the Ugaritic texts, El sends Shapshu to order Baal and Mot to stop fighting. In Egyptian thought, the sun god (who had several names, including Re and Aton) was believed to be the creator of the universe each morning.

32:1 The phrase these three men seems to stress the distant relationship between Job and his so-called friends. A gulf existed partly because the trio had been accusing Job of self-righteousness.

32:2, 3 Elihu was of the tribe of Buz and of the family of Ram, perhaps an ancestor of King David (Ruth 4:19). His name means “He Is My God.” Elihu was angry about what both Job and his friends had been saying. Like the other friends, Elihu thought that Job had only justified himself.

32:4, 5 The editorial introduction (vv. 1–5) emphasizes the wrath of the young man against Job (v. 2) and against his three friends (vv. 3, 5). The word wrath is found four times in these verses.

32:6–22 I am young: Elihu introduces himself and his four speeches as he explains why he has waited to speak but feels compelled to speak out at the present time.

32:21, 22 As a reassurance to Job concerning his complaint that the friends are partial to God (13:7–10), Elihu promises not to show partiality in his voluntary role as an arbiter (vv. 12–14).

33:1–6 The translation spokesman (literally, “as [or like] your mouth”) may be supported by the similar Hebrew wording of Ex. 4:16. However, the Hebrew text could suggest that Elihu was just like Job in that his mouth spoke to God in the same way Job’s did. That he also had been formed of (Heb. qaras, literally, “pinched [from]”) clay supports the latter view. An interesting parallel occurs in the Babylonian “Epic of Gilgamesh” where the goddess Aruru pinched off clay to form the man Enkidu.

33:7, 8 Elihu responds to Job’s fear of God (9:34; 13:21). Elihu reassures Job that he has nothing to dread since his hand will not be heavy on him.

33:9–13 In vv. 9–11 Elihu summarizes Job’s position as he perceives it. Then he confronts Job by saying that Job is not righteous in attacking God. With great perception, Elihu cuts straight to the heart of Job’s problem. Job has been treating God as though he were God’s equal. Since God is greater than man, Elihu asks: Why do you contend or “file a lawsuit” against God? Job had been treating God as though He were merely a human who could be held accountable in court (34:23). Elihu continues this thought when he implies that Job has become proud—even while he sits dejected in the ashes (v. 17; 35:12–16).

33:14, 15 In response to 7:14 where Job complained of nightmares, Elihu suggests that God may have been trying to teach Job something through a dream or a vision of the night.

33:16–19 God seeks to keep mankind from the pit (Heb. shahat, the domain of the grave). The so-called “bottomless pit” (the shaft of the abyss), leading into the underworld or hell. Revelation 9:1, 2 may be a development of this concept. The point here is that God controls the length of our life.

33:20, 21 Elihu cites situations that fit Job’s circumstances (6:17; 16:8).

33:22 the executioners are probably angels of death.

33:23–25 The precise identity of the messenger or angel is disputed. God may have employed this figure as a mediator to address Job’s need for an impartial arbiter (9:32, 33; 16:19) and to contradict Eliphaz’s counsel of 5:1. The intercessory role of this messenger to lead Job to repentance (v. 27) sounds much like the role that Christ would play (Heb. 7:25).

33:26 he (i.e., the sinner; v. 27) will pray.

33:27–33 This conclusion to vv. 14–30 succinctly states God’s primary purpose in getting a person’s attention through dreams and suffering: He wants to keep him from the Pit—that is, the grave and hell—and give that person the light of life—a meaningful life.

34:1–2 In vv. 2–15 Elihu addresses you wise men, probably a sarcastic reference to the three friends whose wisdom he had belittled in 32:12–16.

34:3–15 Surely God: Perhaps in response to Job's charges in 9:22–24, Elihu defends God's impartiality according to the traditional retribution dogma: God will justly punish the wicked. Elihu defends God's justice by siding with Bildad (8:3) against Job (19:6).

34:16 Elihu addresses Job directly in vv. 16–33, as indicated by the singular Hebrew verb translated hear.

34:17 The two rhetorical questions in this verse seem to rephrase Job's complaints of 9:14–31 and 24:1–17 in order to refute them. Will you condemn Him who is most just: The second question anticipates the Lord's own rebuke of Job in 40:8.

34:18–22 These verses emphasize God's omniscience (that He sees and knows all the ways of man).

34:23–28 Elihu responds to Job's complaints about God ignoring the plight of the poor and afflicted (24:1–12) by asserting that God does hear the cry of the poor and the cry of the afflicted.

34:29, 30 The sentence translated when he gives quietness, who then can make trouble? (supported perhaps by v. 30), may also be rendered "when He exhibits quietness, who then can condemn?" The parallelism of the next line (when God hides his face), and the context of Job's complaints, favor this latter translation.

34:31–33 The precise meaning of the Hebrew in this paragraph is unclear. Verses 31, 32 may be a caricature of Job's words.

34:34–37 Elihu's conclusion mixes sound analysis with an unfair representation of Job's position. His statement that Job's words are without knowledge anticipates the Lord's own words (38:2).

35:1, 2 Elihu asks: Is it right (a legal term; Heb. mishpat, "just") that Job acts as if his righteousness is more than God's. Building on Eliphaz's inquiry (4:17), he correctly perceives that Job has implied that his ethical standards are higher than God's.

(Heb. mishpat) (35:2; Pss. 1:5; 9:4; Prov. 12:5; Jer. 26:11) Strong’s #4941: The Hebrew term translated here as right represents an important idea in the understanding of the judicial side of government, whether by humans or by God. The central idea of most uses of the term in the Bible is “justice” (Ps. 72:1, 2). The word can be used to designate the act (“judgment” in Josh. 20:6), the place (“the Hall of Judgment” in 1 Kin. 7:7), or the process (“judgment” in Is. 3:14) of a case of litigation, as well as the sentence (“deserves” in Jer. 26:11) or the time of judgment (“judgment” in Ps. 1:5). In the present passage, Elihu was asking whether Job had the legal right to question God’s righteousness. Elihu correctly perceived that Job was implying that his ethical standards were higher than God’s (29:12–17; 31:13, 16).

35:3 By reading between the lines of Job’s many complaints, Elihu exaggerates Job’s position: “What benefit do I receive for being good?” Though Job had never made a bargain to serve God for mutual benefit, as in the religions of his day, Job’s actions and words may have seemed to reflect that pagan attitude (read Job’s own paraphrase of the sentiments of the wicked in 21:15).

35:4–8 God was not under any obligation to Job for any work or deed (41:11). Therefore, it was logically inconsistent for Job to demand that God must appear in court (31:35).

35:9, 10 People cry out (first verb, Heb. zaaq) for help (second verb, Heb. shawa’), because they need deliverance from the oppressions of the mighty, not because they acknowledge God as their maker. The nation of Israel during the period of the judges illustrated this principle. Their numerous cries to God were not always in repentance for sin but cries of desperation for deliverance from oppressors (Judg. 10:10–14, which uses Heb. saaq and zaaq interchangeably). This principle may explain many unanswered prayers today. However, this does not mean that all unanswered prayers are a result of pride. A general principle should not be made an ironclad rule; indeed, such was the very error of Job’s friends in applying the retribution principle as a dogma.

35:11–16 One reason God does not answer when people cry out is that they are full of pride and devoid of pure motives (James 4:3). Elihu implies that Job’s prayers have not been heard because of his pride (33:17). This accurate perception prepares the way for the speeches of God (chs. 38; 39).

36:1–4 Elihu's claim to be one who is perfect in knowledge is an arrogant statement. Unless he is being sarcastic, it borders on blasphemy (same phrase used of God in 37:16). Perhaps this statement illustrates the tendency in youth (32:4, 6) to think one has all the answers.

36:5–12 Elihu states his thesis: God is both mighty and just in His dealings with humankind (36:1—37:24). Elihu challenges Job's assertion that the wicked are not punished by God (21:7) and his subsequent arguments (21:27–33). Then Elihu counters Job's complaints of 24:1–17.

36:13–15 Affliction will also reveal the hypocrites who, because their hearts are incorrigibly wicked, do not cry to God for help. The warning is clear: Do not reject God's message by failing to cry out to Him for help (Rom. 1:18–32).

36:16–29 Take heed: Elihu says that God intended to teach Job something through his affliction. Rather than trying to correct the Teacher, Job should remember to magnify God's work as Maker of all things. Thus, Elihu is setting the stage for the Lord, who will emphasize this concept in His speeches (38:1—42:6).

36:30, 31 light (the normal translation of the Heb. noun or) could designate "lightning" as it does in v. 32 and 37:3. This translation is also probable for 37:21 (and possible for 37:11, 15).

36:32 God the sovereign warrior commands the thunderstorm as He dispenses lightning from His hands like arrows (16:12, 13). The Book of Job makes clear that God alone controls the unpredictable changes of the weather (38:22–30, 34–38).

36:33 The meaning of this verse is unclear in the Hebrew text.

37:1, 2 The plural Hebrew verb hear attentively indicates that Elihu appeals to Job and his friends and perhaps to any bystanders listening.

37:3, 4 The voice of God roars. The Hebrew word for roars seems to compare thunder to God growling like a lion, the majestic king of beasts.

37:5–7 He says: As God once spoke and brought forth light, land, and all manner of life (Gen. 1:3, 9, 14, 20, 24, 26), so now He speaks and controls all that He has made (Ps. 147:15–18). God uses the winter storms to stop the hand of every man so that he cannot work but instead may recognize the work of God.

37:8, 9 Elihu continues to praise the all-powerful God with a series of metaphors. He describes God as keeping the wind in a chamber just as He does the snow and hail (38:22, 23).

37:10 In a poetic figure of speech, Elihu speaks of the breath of God causing ice to form and waters to freeze. All of this is spoken with joyful delight, for Elihu is celebrating God's control of the world.

37:11 The phrase His bright (Heb. or, "light") clouds may also be rendered as His cloud(s) of lightning.

37:12 The nautical term guidance, literally "steerings" or "rope-pullings" (the usage of this word in Prov. 1:5), portrays God as the wise Captain who skillfully charts the course for the clouds, which respond obediently to His hand at the helm.

37:13–17 God causes the storm to come for three specific reasons: (1) for punishment for people's wickedness, (2) for the nourishment of the earth (context of vv. 3, 6, 12), and (3) for supplying the needs of His people. For correction presents the idea of judgment by His rod or scepter. for mercy: The faithfulness and loyalty of God to His covenant promises are often tied to this word. This is the word that may be translated "loyal love" (Ps. 13:5). Thus God uses storms both to judge the earth and to bring the blessing of rain for His people (Ex. 15:7–10; Deut. 28:12).

37:18 Strong as a cast metal mirror: Ancient mirrors were firm and unbreakable because they were made of polished bronze.

37:19, 20 Resuming his role as arbiter, Elihu states (perhaps sarcastically): teach us what to say to God; we can prepare nothing (Heb. arak, "to set in order { a legal case} ," as in 13:18), because you have kept us "in the dark."

37:21, 22 If people cannot look at the bright light of the sun in the skies, how much more difficult is it to approach God (v. 20), who appears in His own golden splendor and awesome majesty? See the experience of Moses described in Ex. 34. the north: In ancient times, north was viewed as the direction of God's abiding place (Is. 14:13).

37:23, 24 Elihu's concluding words offer praise to the living God who is at once elusive—we cannot find Him—and merciful—He does not oppress. Judgment means "justice." Justice means "righteousness." fear: Finally Elihu speaks of the reverential awe and worshipful wonder that all people should have for their omnipotent Creator.

38:1 out of the whirlwind: Though Job feared that God would crush him in a tempest (9:17), God does not come to destroy Job; rather God overwhelms Job into submission in order to restore him to his proper role as the Lord's servant.

38:2, 3 The theme of the first speech of the Lord is given here: Job darkens the counsel of the Lord—that is, God's plan or design for the universe. Ironically, God challenges Job to teach Him (v. 3; 40:7). These challenges are designed to alert Job to the consequences of his complaints and demands. Job's defiant attempt to meet God on equal footing in a law court (31:35–37) amounts to a rival claim to His throne (40:10–14).

38:4–7 Perhaps partially in reply to Job's words about the Lord shaking the pillars of the earth (9:5, 6), the Lord asks Job if he was an eyewitness when He laid the earth's foundations.

IN CONTEXT

Laying the Foundations of the Earth

Public building projects in the ancient Near East were begun with religious rituals, including liturgical singing in praise of the major deities. Kings ritually, if not actually, helped set the foundations of temples and symbolically aided the construction workers in laying walls and fastening gates. In Job 38:4–7, the universe is pictured as a great building project by God. All the inhabitants of heaven sing for joy as the foundations of the earth are laid (Job 38:7).

The heavenly beings who sing and shout are “the morning stars” and “the sons of God” (38:7). In the group of languages called Northwest Semitic, which includes Hebrew, “sons of God” is a standard way to describe the pantheon of deities. The specific mention of the morning stars may reflect Egyptian notions that creation begins anew each morning just as light appears along the horizon. Thus creation begins anew when the morning stars are in the sky. God reminds Job that he was not present, and cannot know what happened at creation when the heavenly choir sang (Job 38:4).

38:7 The joyful response of the morning stars, personified as singing, and the sons of God (1:6) as eyewitnesses to the earth’s creation contrast with Job’s complaints that were spoken in ignorance.

38:8–11 The Lord emphasizes His control of the sea and its proud waves. These forces, which ancient society considered to be chaotic and threatening, were allowed to exist only within divinely set limits (v. 10). Though Job knew this in theory (26:12, 13), he needed to apply this truth to his life.

38:12–15 The Lord answers Job’s complaints that wickedness is rampant at night (24:13–17). Using personification, the Lord describes how He alone commands the morning to get out of bed and the dawn to pull off the covers of the night in order to shake out the wicked like bedbugs. God implies that only because of His control of the darkness are the activities of the wicked curbed at all. The Lord grants some freedom to humanity, but the wicked cannot go beyond His set limits. This section may be compared with the more familiar words of David in Ps. 19.

38:16–18 Has Job ever been to the bottom of the sea or taken a trip through the gates of death? Perhaps in response to Job's desire for a respite in the darkness of Sheol (10:18–22), the Lord wants to know if he has ever been there.

38:19–21 Since Job had spoken intelligently about the distant horizons (26:10), the Lord exposes Job's limited knowledge by asking him to lead a guided tour to the abode of light and darkness. Since Job had stated that the wicked "do not know the light" or "abide in its paths" (24:13, 16), the Lord reveals the deficiencies of Job's secondhand knowledge. Had Job been there in person, he would have understood that the Lord has a place for both darkness and dawn, as well as for good and evil.

38:22–30 By asking if Job understands the seemingly unpredictable weather phenomena, the Lord reveals that His designs are not centered on humanity alone. Though God utilizes meteorological elements to intervene in human affairs (vv. 22–24), He also uses them to limit the chaotic wilderness and sea (vv. 25–30) that lie outside the human realm.

38:22, 23 The graphic metaphor of the treasury for snow and hail portrays these elements as weapons in the arsenal of God. He uses hail as sling stones (Josh. 10:11). He prepares other weapons, including snow (Ps. 68:14), thunderstorms, lightning (v. 24), and winds (37:9).

38:24–29 frost of heaven: Since frost is water vapor from the atmosphere that has condensed on cold surfaces, the word heaven may refer here to the atmospheric heavens.

38:30–32 The Great Bear with its cubs is a reference to the constellation known as Ursa Major.

38:33–38 In asking whose command the clouds obey, the Lord implies Job's impotence and ignorance of these matters, as well as His own sovereignty and omniscience. voice: The Lord alone controls the storms and lightning (36:32). The obedience even of lightning to God's command serves as another subtle rebuke to Job's complaints.

38:39—39:30 The Lord interrogates Job concerning the animal kingdom to demonstrate Job's impotence to govern it and his ignorance of God's providential plan (38:1—40:5). The wild animals listed were either favorite game animals of kings or used by royalty. Before Job could validate his claims to be able to run the universe better than the Lord, he would need to prove that he could control these hostile forces.

38:40, 41 If the Lord provides for the young raven who cries out for help, how much more will He hear and provide for people when they genuinely cry out for help?

39:1–4 God, who provides the prey for the predators (38:39–41), also takes care of that prey, which includes the mountain goats and deer. By taking care of them in their most vulnerable moment of giving birth, the Lord provides for order and balance in nature.

39:4 The Hebrew word translated with grain may also be rendered “in the open field.”

39:5–12 The wild donkey, the symbol of the exploited poor in 24:5, finds satisfaction where God has placed him on earth free from the shouts of the driver or “slave driver.” This contrasts with Job’s complaints about the voice of the oppressor (3:18). True freedom is found in being content where God has placed us (Phil. 4:10–12).

The Wild Donkey

The onager (Job 39:5) is a name for the wild donkey. The onager was related to the Asian wild ass, called the kiang, but was generally smaller, with a broad stripe along its back. Onagers still exist throughout Asia.

Unlike domesticated donkeys, which were often used as beasts of burden, wild donkeys roamed freely throughout the wastelands of the Middle East. God used them as symbols of free-spirited independence in describing His ways to Job (Job 39:7–8).

The ostrich, which once lived in the Near East, is scorned in the Book of Job because of its haphazard nesting habits (Job 39:13–18).

39:13–25 Job had identified himself closely with the ostrich (30:29). Therefore, the Lord ironically agrees that there are similarities. Both are deficient in knowledge (v. 17; 38:2). But although the ludicrous-looking ostrich is no doubt laughed at (as was Job; 30:1) and experiences misfortunes (vv. 14–16), the ostrich is not concerned about the situation. This contrasts with Job, who has been full of worry (3:25; 15:24).

39:26–30 God asks Job if he designed the majestic birds—the hawk and the eagle—by his aerodynamic genius. eagle: The context of v. 30, where the young birds feast on the blood of the slain, suggests that a vulture is in view. However, the traditional translation eagle conveys the royal and majestic qualities associated with the vulture in the ancient Middle East (vv. 26–30), in contrast to the revulsion its name brings to many modern readers.

39:30 The implication is that God allows the young vultures to feed on the blood of slain people to help prevent the spread of disease. This is an answer to Job's complaint about God's failure to stop the exploitation of the helpless (24:1–17) and His ignoring of the pleas of the dying. The Lord demonstrates to Job again that He limits evil.

40:1–3 Moreover the LORD answered: The Lord reinforces His initial thematic challenge (38:2, 3) with a dynamic question loaded with legal terminology. The word contend means “to bring a lawsuit” (9:3). God reverses Job’s accusation that God has brought a lawsuit against him (the same Hebrew word is found in 10:2). It really has been Job accusing God, not the other way around. The Lord reprimands Job for his error. Who is Job to judge God? The Lord might be implying that Job has been trying to be his own “mediator” or “redeemer” (40:14).

40:4 vile: The context of vv. 4, 5 suggests that the Hebrew word for vile means “insignificant” or “unworthy.” Job’s placing his hand over his mouth is probably a gesture of respect (29:9) as God’s subordinate.

40:5–7 prepare yourself: But God has not finished speaking. The words of v. 7 are repeated from 38:3, but the stakes are even higher now.

40:8 The Lord confronts Job with critical errors in his speeches. Job has dared to annul God’s judgment or justice. The context of Elihu’s speeches, where Elihu used this same word concerning the Lord’s kingship over the universe (34:17; 37:23), suggests that Job has maligned God’s justice by claiming that God rules without establishing moral or social order in the universe (24:1–17). Because Job had assumed the inflexible retribution dogma, which views suffering in this world as God’s punishment for sin, Job had to condemn God in order to maintain his own innocence.

40:9–14 The absurdity of Job’s defiant criticism of the way the Lord runs the universe (read 29:2–17 for Job’s claim to be fair in his judicial duties) is forcefully brought to his attention by God’s ironic invitation to become “king for a day” over the whole universe. If Job had the power, let him don the royal regalia of God’s majestic attributes and humble the proud and wicked forces in the world. Job had criticized God for not doing this well enough (21:30, 31; 24:1–17).

40:15–24 The identity of the behemoth, meaning the “great beast,” is disputed. Suggestions include the elephant, some sort of dinosaur, or a purely mythical monster. The hippopotamus, which had overtones of cosmic evil, seems to fit the biblical and cultural evidence best. Job could not approach, much less subdue, this massive beast; how could he force his way to the Almighty with his case (40:15—41:34)? As the description of the beast continues, the elaborate language goes beyond any physical hippopotamus and presents the beast as a symbol of chaos. The same pattern is seen in the development of the Leviathan in the next section (ch. 41).

40:24 The clause though he takes it in his eyes is one possible translation of the Hebrew. However, it might also be construed as a question: “Can one take him by his eyes?” The phrase in his eyes may refer to the difficulty of capturing the hippopotamus when it is submerged, with only its eyes above the water. Also, because of the thick hide of the hippopotamus most weapons are ineffective unless they are shot through its eyes.

41:1 The identity of Leviathan, basically a transliteration of the Hebrew word for “sea monster” or “sea serpent,” is disputed. The traditional view is that it is the crocodile. As in the case of the behemoth (40:15–24), the description of Leviathan begins as a grand, poetic description of a well-known, formidable beast. But by the time the description is complete (vv. 18–21), Leviathan has become a fire-breathing dragon, a powerful symbol of chaos, evil, and destruction. Ultimately, Leviathan’s image is a portrait of chaos at the beginning of God’s creation and of Satan at the consummation of the ages (Ps. 74:2–17; Is. 27:1; 51:9). Only God can control and destroy Leviathan; Job can only shrink back in humble fear. By means of ironic rhetorical questions, the Lord interrogates Job concerning his inability to confront, much less subdue, Leviathan.

41:2, 3 The reed indicates the material that was twisted or spun into a cord or rope, perhaps to “string” the Leviathan like a fish. However, the clause pierce his jaw with a hook may suggest the picture of Leviathan as a prisoner of war with a hook or ring in his jaw or nose (2 Chr. 33:11). This view is supported by the context of v. 4. This imagery is also used in Ezek. 29:3, 4, which describes the Lord capturing Pharaoh like a crocodile and putting hooks in his jaw.

41:4–9 The Lord continues to confront Job with a series of rhetorical questions. Can Job make Leviathan an eternal servant or vassal? The Lord’s mention of the covenant implies that perhaps Job could offer it a peace treaty, like a great king subduing a lesser king in battle (v. 34).

41:10 When the Lord says no one would be so foolish as to stir Leviathan up, he is replying to Job’s desire that this monster be roused (3:8). In effect, the Lord questions Job: “What would you do, Job, if he were provoked?” (vv. 8, 9).

41:11 Who has preceded Me could also be rendered “who has confronted Me?” that I should pay: The Hebrew verb means “to pay a debt” or “to make restitution for something lost or stolen.” The Lord confronts Job for implying that God owed him something for being righteous (34:5–8) or that God had to make restitution for the property and posterity He had allegedly stolen from Job (10:3). Thus the Lord plainly refutes Job’s misconception that God is obligated to reward a person who is obedient. The idea that God does not have to reward us for what we consider good works is an essential part of the biblical doctrine of salvation by grace apart from our works (Eph. 2:8–10).

41:12–34 mighty power: The Lord reinforces the argument of vv. 1–11 by describing the invincibility and terrifying splendor of Leviathan's bodily features.

41:19–21 Using poetic exaggeration (v. 18), the Lord gradually transforms the physical Leviathan to the mythological dragon (7:12), which breathes fire and smoke (vv. 19–21).

41:22–34 The phrase he beholds every high thing could also be translated "he looks down on everything haughty." King Leviathan, who is over all who have pride, gazes with a look of superiority at the haughty. Therefore Job, whose pride had been exposed, could never succeed in subduing the mighty Leviathan or validating his claim to be able to rule the world better than God.

42:1–6 The phrase I abhor myself means “to reject” or “to recant.” Job repents of his words and accusations that were based on the false belief that God always rewards the righteous in this life. Instead of accusing God of injustice, Job submits to the will of the sovereign Lord of the universe.

Job's Moment of Insight

After hearing from God, Job realized that he had been uttering "things too wonderful for me, which I did not know." The Hebrew word translated "know" implies more than a grasp of information; it suggests intimate knowledge of the sort that comes by personal experience. In effect, Job was admitting that all of his high-sounding talk had been so much blabber; he hadn't really known what he was talking about, certainly not the way God knows.

Likewise, Job had been pontificating on things that were "too wonderful" for him—literally incomprehensible or astonishing, things that only God could understand (compare Ps. 139:6). Job thought he was coming to terms with his troubles. Then he saw God, and he realized that he had no idea.

Job's response to this unexpected encounter with God was a sense of utter and absolute humility (Job 42:5, 6). The words, "I abhor myself" might be translated, "I reject what I have spoken"; "I cast away my words"; "I despise or disdain them." It's as if Job had written a journal or a book to detail and interpret his experience (19:23, 24), or a legal brief to make his case before God (31:35–37). But upon realizing who God was, he threw the book away.

As for Job's "repentance" (42:6), the word translated "repent" is not the term used for repentance from sin (shub, "to turn back or return"; compare 1 Kin. 8:47; Jer. 5:3), but a word meaning "to be sorry" or "to console oneself" (nacham). In other words, Job threw away his pretensions to wisdom and comforted himself "in dust and ashes," a common symbol of mourning or humility. He was satisfied with the humble knowledge that his sufferings were all part of the purposes of God—even if he could not understand those purposes with his finite mind.

42:7, 8 In contrast to his friends, Job had spoken of God what is right. Unlike the friends, Job had recanted his false belief, repented of his pride (v. 6), and affirmed God's unconditional sovereignty over his life (v. 2). Job had been right in maintaining his innocence in the face of his friends' false accusations.

42:9–11 Since Israelite law required a thief to restore double for stealing "an ox or donkey or sheep" (Ex. 22:4), it was ironic that the LORD gave Job twice the amount of livestock he had before (v. 12). Clearly, the Lord was not admitting that He owed Job anything (41:11), but He was expressing His benevolent mercy.

42:12–17 The restored prosperity of Job should not be seen as compensation for his piety (41:11). After Job had given up his demand for his former prosperity, the Lord could give it to him as a free gift. This conclusion shows that the Book of Job does not totally reject the principle of divine retribution but only its false application. It concurs with the Book of Proverbs that the fear of the Lord normally leads to an abundant and long life. But we cannot presume that God will always operate in this manner, as Job's friends had done.

The Book of Psalms

——————— AS ONE OF THE GREATEST COLLECTIONS OF SONGS, prayers, and poetry, the Book of Psalms expresses the deepest passions of humanity. In these pages we can hear the psalmist's desperate cry in the midst of despair as well as his ecstatic praise of his Provider and Comforter. We can hear him pouring out his soul in confession but also bubbling over with joy. The Psalms lead us through the valleys and peaks of human experience, but in the end they guide us to the praise of our loving Creator.

Like the Pentateuch, the five books of Moses, the Book of Psalms is arranged in five sections: Book I (Pss. 1—41), Book II (Pss. 42—72), Book III (Pss. 73—89), Book IV (Pss. 90—106), and Book V (Pss. 107—150). Each book concludes with a doxology, an affirmation of praise to God found in the last verse or two of the concluding psalm. In the case of Book V, the entire last poem, Ps. 150, is the concluding doxology. The reason for this arrangement of the Book of Psalms is not clear. Most likely it had something to do with the use of the Psalms in the praise of God in temple worship. Books I and II are composed primarily of Davidic psalms; Book III includes the psalms of Asaph (Pss. 73—83) and the psalms of the sons of Korah (Pss. 84—88). Books IV and V include anonymous psalms, along with a few by David and others.

Many of the psalms can be identified as certain types by their theme.

The royal psalms emphasize God as King, often using the words "the Lord reigns." These psalms speak of His rule as Creator, as Savior of Israel, and as the Coming One. The royal psalms often point forward to the coming rule of the Savior King, the Lord Jesus.

The psalms of Zion focus on Jerusalem, using its endearing name Zion. These psalms rhapsodize on the city as God's choice for the site of His holy temple, the place for true worship of His name.

The penitential psalms are poems in which the poet confesses sin to the Lord, asks for and receives forgiveness, and then praises God for the renewed relationship that God's forgiveness provides.

The wisdom psalms focus on some of the same issues that are found in the Book of Proverbs. These psalms present sharp contrasts between the righteous and the wicked, address God's blessing and cursing, and often focus on righteous living.

One subcategory of the wisdom psalms is the Torah psalms. These are poems that focus on the beauty, truth, and sufficiency of the Law of God. Two other subcategories of the wisdom psalms are the creation psalms and the history psalms. In the creation psalms, the poet calls for the believer to praise God as the Creator of the universe and the Savior of His people. In the history psalms, the poet recounts the history of Israel and asks for a renewed commitment to God—even in the face of a history of rebellion.

Some of the most troubling psalms are those that contain prayers asking God to curse the wicked. These imprecatory psalms are sometimes thought to conflict with the sentiment of the gospel, but in fact they accurately reflect God's abhorrence of evil.

In contrast to the imprecatory psalms are the joyful and prophetic Passover psalms that became a part of the Passover celebration in Judaism. These psalms are a remarkable celebration of the great acts of the Lord in delivering His people from Egypt, the theme of the Passover celebration. They point forward to the deliverance that would come through the Savior, Jesus.

A final group of psalms is clustered at the end of the book. These are the Hallel psalms, named for the principal Hebrew word for praise, hallel. As their name suggests, these psalms praise God for His character and saving works.

In order to fully appreciate the Psalms, a certain number of their characteristics should be kept in mind.

First, the Psalms were written for singing. These were songs for public worship in the temple of ancient Israel. They are not merely poems but lyrics for music from the ancient world. As such they contain musical conventions peculiar to music and worship during that time.

Second, the poems in the Psalms were written over a period of a thousand years, from the time of Moses in the fifteenth century B.C. to the time of Ezra in the fifth century B.C. Although David is the main author associated with the composition of the Psalms, many other authors from various time periods contributed psalms to what would become the Book of Psalms.

Third, the Psalms were collected and arranged over a long period of time. This process involved some editorial additions to the poems, some cutting and expanding, and some rearranging and restructuring of various psalms. The Holy Spirit, who had inspired these poems in the first place, oversaw this process of restructuring them for temple worship.

Fourth, the Psalms were written in the language of the human spirit, the utterances of the soul. The Psalms are not cool, reasoned prose but deeply emotional works that use wrenching language, dramatic exaggeration, and figurative speech.

Fifth, psalms and the writing of psalms were part of ordinary life for the Israelites. The Scriptures record a number of times when the Israelites spontaneously responded to the Lord with a psalm of praise. Moses sang a psalm in praise of God (Ex. 15); Deborah and Hannah did the same (Judg. 5; 1 Sam. 2); and David blessed the Lord with a psalm (1 Chr. 29). Through a psalm the Israelites would express their devotion and thanks to their Lord. This tradition continued into the NT period, for Mary in Luke 1 responded to the angel's message with a psalm (Rev. 5). This Israelite tradition of psalm writing was confirmed by the discovery of a number of original psalms among the Dead Sea Scrolls discovered in 1947.

Sixth, individual psalms were written for different purposes. Some began as works of private devotion, while others were designed from the beginning to be used in public worship. Ultimately, all the Psalms became the treasure of all the people in temple worship, for no matter what subject they addressed, they always led the people to the worship of the living God.

Finally, it must be remembered that the Psalms were written in the language of response. Each psalm records in powerful, poetic language one individual's response to God. From a desperate cry to an ecstatic shout of joy, each psalmist responds to God in the middle of a particular situation. Even though the Psalms became a part of the community's worship life, they remained a vehicle for individual expression as well. Even today, the Psalms are used both in public worship and in the devotional moments of individual Christians.

The superscription—the introductory words found before the first verse in most psalms—many times attributes the following psalm to King David, the "sweet psalmist of Israel" (2 Sam. 23:1). These superscriptions were probably not part of the psalms when they were originally composed but were added by editors to aid in the interpretation of the poems. Nevertheless, there is no reason to discount them. The historical books of the Bible speak of David's considerable accomplishments as a musician, singer, and composer of poems (1 Sam. 16:19–23; 18:10; 2 Sam. 1:17–27; 23:1–7; 1 Chr. 29:10–15). Moreover, one of David's psalms is recorded in 2 Sam. 22 and reappears with only slight variation as Ps. 18. Parts of the medley that David presented to Asaph in 1 Chr. 16:8–36 are taken from Ps. 105:1–15, Ps. 96, and Ps. 106:1, 47, 48. Thus, the connection between King David and the Psalms is well documented.

Of course, David is not the only composer of the Psalms. Others include contemporaries of David whom he placed in charge of worship in Jerusalem: Ethan, Heman, and Asaph. Solomon followed in his father's footsteps by writing psalms as well as proverbs. Some of the earliest psalms were written by Moses, five centuries before the time of David. One priestly family, the sons of Korah, continued to write psalms for centuries. Women, such as Deborah (Judg. 5) and Hannah (1 Sam. 2), wrote psalms as well. However, the composers of many of the psalms remain anonymous. Some of these anonymous psalms may be attributed to David, but certainly not all of them. Psalms were still being written during the time of Ezra. It was in Ezra's time that the Book of Psalms as we know it was compiled.

Commentary

Psalm 1, a wisdom psalm, presents a vivid contrast between the way of the righteous (vv. 1–3) and the way of the wicked (vv. 4–6). No author is named nor is any circumstance given for the writing of this poem. It was probably written late in Israel's history. With its focus on the distinctions of character and the different destinies of the righteous and the wicked, this psalm serves as an introduction to the entire Book of Psalms. The psalm is like a beacon of light piercing the darkness of a stormy night. It illuminates and points to the truth even when the falsehoods of our culture begin to cloud our thinking. The psalm affirms that there is one way to true life; to ignore this way is to foolishly accept death (Prov. 1:20–33).

IN DEPTH

A Key to Understanding the Psalms

A fuller appreciation of the eloquence of the Psalms can be gained by understanding the basics of Hebrew poetry. The lack of a predictable rhythm and rhyme has confused some people about the poetic nature of the Psalms. Although Hebrew poetry contains some rhythm, it primarily makes use of repetition and recapitulation. One line of a verse is followed by another that gives a variation of the same idea. Not only do the psalmists use this poetic technique, but the authors of proverbs use it as well (see the Introduction to Proverbs). The second line of a proverb usually reinforces the meaning of the first line (Prov. 22:1). This reinforcement of the thought is not mere tautology, but the graceful artistry of a poet. The first line makes a statement that the second line sharpens or heightens.

A psalmist could modify this general pattern in a number of ways. First, the psalmist could use synonymous parallelism to make the two elements similar. For example: But his delight is in the law of the LORD, And on His law he meditates day and night. (1:2) Second, the psalmist could contrast the two elements. This type of parallelism, called antithetical parallelism, usually contains the word “but.” For example: For the LORD knows the way of the righteous, But the way of the ungodly shall perish. (1:6) Third, the psalmist could develop the theme of the first line in the second line. This is called synthetic parallelism. For example: Blessed is the man Who walks not in the counsel of the ungodly, Nor stands in the path of sinners, Nor sits in the seat of the scornful. (1:1) A fourth improvement on general parallelism is climactic parallelism. In this type of parallelism, the first member of a couplet is incomplete and the second member partially repeats the first member and then completes the thought. For example: Give to the LORD, O families of the peoples, Give to the LORD glory and strength. (96:7) Finally, the psalmist could use emblematic parallelism. In this type, the first line contains a figure of speech and the following lines explain the figure by expansion or explanation. In the following example, the parallel lines of this verse explain the meaning of the expression “like a tree.”

He shall be like a tree Planted by the rivers of water, That brings forth its fruit in its season, Whose leaf also shall not wither; And whatever he does shall prosper. (1:3) With poetic parallelism, the Hebrew psalmist powerfully expresses his praise of the Lord. By reading the psalms aloud and emphasizing the parallel elements, one can gain some sense of the harmonious poetic language from which the translation is derived.

1:1 The Hebrew word for man in this context means "person," without reference to gender. Who walks not: The parallelism in this verse speaks of an increasingly deeper involvement with wickedness: "walking beside," "standing with," "sitting beside." Similarly, the terms for the wicked are progressive: ungodly, sinners, and the scornful. The imagery of this verse presents an ideal righteous person—one who is in the world but quite unaffected by the world.

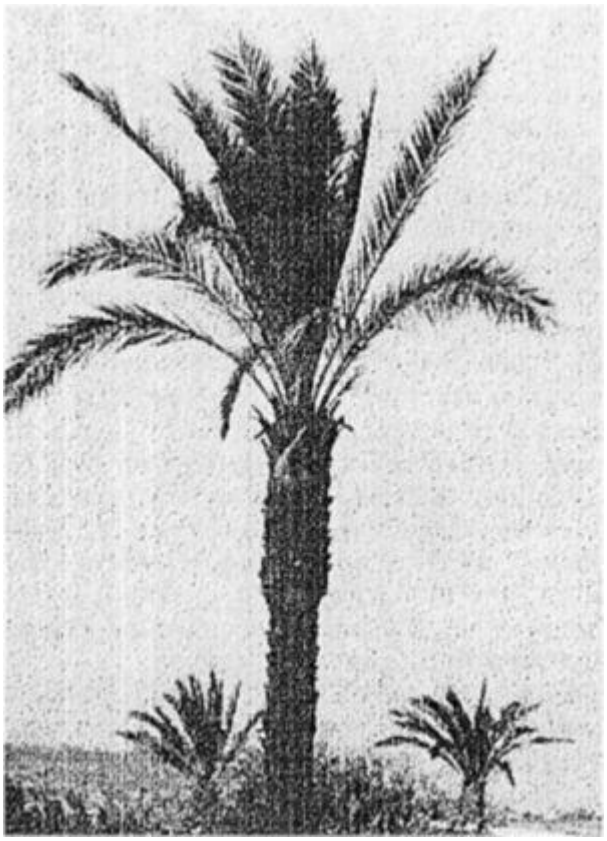
1:2 But his delight: The contrast is strong. Instead of finding enjoyment in entanglements with wicked persons, the godly person finds his or her deep enjoyment in the things of God, particularly the Word of God. The law of the LORD refers specifically to the Pentateuch, the first five books of the OT. The Hebrew word for law expresses the idea of God pointing out the path for life in fellowship with Him (19:7–11). Meditates means "to mumble" or "to speak to oneself" (4:4). Biblical meditation is focusing the mind on Scripture.



The psalmist compared a righteous person to a desert palm tree flourishing in an oasis (Ps. 1:3).

1:3 like a tree: This simile presents an image of a desert date palm that has been firmly planted in a well-watered oasis (Jer. 17:8). Everything about the tree is valuable and productive. Likewise, the righteous are valuable and productive to God—people in whom He finds pleasure (33:15; 147:11). Shall prosper is not a guarantee of the future financial worth of the righteous; rather, the righteous person is always useful and productive to the Lord.

1:4, 5 Like chaff, the refuse that is blown away by the wind after the grain harvest, the ungodly have no stability (35:5; 83:13). When the judgment comes, the ungodly will no longer stand (5:5). This is similar to the picture of final judgment in the Olivet Discourse of Jesus (Matt. 25:31–46).

1:6 The Bible speaks of two ways (Prov. 2:8; 4:19), only one of which leads to God. This is a consistent biblical theme, culminating in the celebrated words of Jesus, “I am the way” (John 14:6). The verb knows in this context refers not just to God’s awareness but to an intimate, personal knowledge (101:4). God is intimately involved with the way of the righteous but has no connection with the way of the ungodly, except in judgment (146:9).

Psalm 2, a royal psalm, focuses on the coming glorious reign of the Lord's Messiah. The author is anonymous in the Hebrew text, but the NT apostles assign it to David (Acts 4:24–26). This psalm should be read in conjunction with Ps. 110. Both psalms point prophetically to the coming rule of Jesus (Acts 13:33; Heb. 1:5, 6; 5:5; Rev. 2:26, 27; 12:5). Psalm 2 has four movements, each related to a different voice or speaker: (1) a description of the plans of the wicked (vv. 1–3); (2) the Father's derisive laughter from heaven (vv. 4–6); (3) the Son's declaration of the Father's decree (vv. 7–9); (4) the Spirit's instruction to all kings to obey the Son (vv. 10–12).

2:1 Why do the nations rage: This passage has multiple meanings. Originally it referred to the nations that confronted David and his legitimate successors. But the Davidic kings were mere shadows of the coming great King, the Savior, Jesus. Consequently, the verse also refers to any attack on Jesus and His divine kingdom. This assault by the nations occurred in its most dramatic form at the cross, but resistance to God's kingdom has continued. Throughout history, nations have resisted the claims of the gospel, the foundation of Jesus'kingdom.

2:2 LORD refers to the Father. His Anointed (18:50; 132:10) refers to the Son. The word conveys a sense of royalty, for kings were anointed (1 Sam. 10:1; 16:13). The kings of the earth would attempt to withstand the very King of the universe.

2:3 let us break their bonds: This is ultimately an end-time scenario that is described more fully in the NT (Rev. 19:11–21; Ps. 110). Here the kings of the earth make their last stand in their rebellion against heaven's King, Jesus.

2:4, 5 hold them in derision: God laughs scornfully at an attack on His Son (37:13). The idea of "fighting off" the will of God is truly preposterous. He who sits in the heavens: God is King of the universe (Ps. 93). What are the puny kings of the earth compared to Him?

2:6 My King: David and his legitimate heirs were given a divine promise that they would rule the Israelites under the Lord's blessing. Any attack on the king of Israel was an assault on God's promise. Zion is another name for Jerusalem. My holy hill: The site of Zion was "holy," for it was declared to be so by God. It was the place where Abraham bound his son Isaac (Gen. 22), where the holy temple was built (2 Chr. 3), and where the Savior would die (Matt. 27).

IN CONTEXT

The King's Relationship to Divinity

The position of king in the ancient Near East was the point at which heaven and earth came together. The Egyptians believed their pharaoh was divine and returned to the gods when he died. From about 1500 B.C. the pharaoh was thought to be the son of the god Amon-Re, as well as the "image of god," both physically and in his actions. Egyptian kings had their own priests, and their palace was treated as a temple. The pharaoh counted on the help of the other gods in ruling his kingdom. As long as he did not alienate the other deities, they would fight with him to protect or expand the kingdom of Egypt.

In Mesopotamia, rulers were not considered divine, but they were understood to have been appointed king by the patron deity of their city or empire. Since the god had chosen him, the king ruled as vice-regent of the god and was accountable to the god for all his actions. As long as the king did what was expected of a good ruler, the gods would protect him and guarantee victory over his enemies.

Such ancient Near Eastern theology was used by Judah to celebrate the crowning of Davidic kings in Jerusalem. The psalmist describes Yahweh speaking to Judah's new king in words parallel to the Mesopotamian royal texts: "You are My Son, today I have begotten You" (Ps. 2:7). The early Christians understood Psalm 2 to refer to Jesus as the Messiah (Acts 4:25, 26; 13:33). But originally Psalm 2:7 meant that Judah's king was the legitimate heir to the throne (other rulers were "adopted"). The king was the vice-regent of Yahweh, seated at His right hand, and Yahweh would guarantee victories for the king over Judah's enemies.

2:7, 8 You are My Son: Each time a legitimate son of David was crowned king as the successor to his father in the city of Jerusalem, these words could be used of him. The new king was adopted by God as his "son"; he would look to God as his "Father" (2 Sam. 7:5, 14). This formula of adoption was announced in a solemn ceremony of coronation attended by priests and prophets, with pomp and celebratory worship of God. In the NT, the Son of God is also declared to be the King, the true Anointed, the Christ (Matt. 3:17; Mark 1:1, 11; Luke 3:22; John 1:18; Acts 13:33; Heb. 1:5; 5:5).

2:9 rod of iron: The future rule of the royal Son would be absolute. There would be no rebellion.

2:10, 11 be wise: Potentially rebellious kings would avoid terrible judgment only by submitting to the Anointed of God. rejoice with trembling: Only with the proper fear, adoration, reverence, and awe of the Most Holy God could there be genuine joy in the coming kingdom.

2:12 Kiss the Son: In this passage, the kings and all peoples were presented with a clear choice. They could either love and respect the Lord's Anointed and so experience His great blessing, or they could refuse to submit, and incur God's wrath.

Psalm 3 is a lament psalm ascribed to David. The superscription indicates a precise setting: the period of David's flight from his son Absalom (2 Sam. 15). This is one of the few psalm titles that ties a psalm to a specific incident in the life of David. The brief poem has four movements: (1) David's opening lament (vv. 1, 2); (2) his strong confession of trust (vv. 3, 4); (3) his determined act of faith (vv. 5, 6); (4) his continuing plea (vv. 7, 8).

3:1, 2 Many: At this point in David's life there was one specific foe who troubled him greatly—his son Absalom. However, David's friends had also become his foes because they were advising him that no one would help him, not even God. Selah: This is a musical term, perhaps indicating a pause in the lyrics for a musical interlude.

INSIGHT

Mysterious Musical Notation

The term Selah (Ps. 3:2) is used seventy-one times in Psalms and three times in Habakkuk, yet its exact meaning remains obscure. Perhaps the best guess is that it indicated a musical interlude or transition.

The root word from which Selah is thought to come means “to lift up.” That has led some to believe that Selah marks a climax in the music in which the singers and musicians are to “lift up” their praise to God. Another suggestion is that Selah is an acronymic shorthand for a musical direction, somewhat similar to modern-day notations such as mf for mezzo forte (moderately loud) or pp for pianissimo (“very soft”). According to this theory, Selah supposedly means “change of voices” or “repeat from the beginning.”

3:3, 4 The phrase but You, O LORD changes the mood of the psalm from dejection to confidence. David says three things of the Lord: (1) When no one would help David, God was his shield. (2) When David had nothing to treasure, God was his glory. (3) When no one would encourage him, God Himself would encourage him and lift his head. Holy hill is a poetic reference to God’s dwelling in heaven; the place of Israel’s worship was but a physical symbol of this dwelling.

3:5, 6 I lay down and slept: Given the stress that David faced, it is remarkable that he was able to enjoy a night’s rest. This was possible only because of God’s sustaining power. God’s gift of rest may be given even in the most troubling times. I will not be afraid: When God is one’s protector, there is no need to fear (23:4; 27:3; 118:6).

3:7, 8 In the language of the lament psalms, David calls out for God to arise, to move on his behalf, to incline to his prayer (40:1). on the cheekbone: In the poetic imagery David uses, his enemies are like powerful beasts whose strength is in their jaws and whose terror is in their teeth. God’s strike at the source of their strength means that they are no longer a threat. Salvation, in this instance, refers to deliverance from the immediate pressure that the psalm has already described. One meaning of the Hebrew word translated salvation is “room to breathe.” Your people:

As is the pattern in Psalms, the experience of the individual becomes the template for the community.

Psalm 4 is linked to Ps. 3 in mood and concept. Both speak of the possibility of finding such peace in God's presence that even when torn by physical and emotional pain, a person may still have restful sleep (3:5; 4:8). This is a lament psalm of the individual, but one in which there is an unusual degree of confidence. To the wicked there is a proclamation of hope rather than a pronouncement of doom. Psalm 4 is the first of the psalms to have a superscription that focuses on its musical nature. To the Chief Musician is a notice that indicates that this psalm is from an early collection of psalms used in temple worship. With stringed instruments specifies the musical setting for the psalm. A Psalm of David serves not only as a notice of authorship, but also as a reminder that the poem was to be sung. The structure of the psalm is as follows: (1) a petition for deliverance (v. 1); (2) an address to the wicked, encouraging them to turn from falsehood and to trust in God (vv. 2–5); (3) an assertion that only God is able to provide genuine joy, deep peace, and abiding safety (vv. 6–8).

4:1 O God of my righteousness can also be translated "O my righteous God." The phrase has two meanings: (1) only God is righteous; and (2) all of a person's righteousness is found in Him alone. The psalmist is facing a very pressing need, but his confidence in God remains especially strong. He addresses God in terms of His character—His "righteousness." Then he speaks of God's earlier saving works in his life: You have relieved me in my distress.

4:2 How long: The psalmists often use these words to question God (13:1, 2). Here they are addressed to the wicked. my glory: For the believer, one's sense of glory or honor is found in relationship to the Savior.

4:3 set apart: This is the central point of this psalm. God has identified the godly—those who are devoted to God and His ways. He exercises special care over them and listens to their prayers.

4:4, 5 Be angry, and do not sin: These words are cited by Paul in the NT to describe "righteous indignation" (Eph. 4:26). Here the psalmist exhorts his reader not to let anger or anxiety erode complete trust or faith in the Lord. Offer the sacrifices of righteousness: These words speak of the salvation experience. put your trust in the LORD: Those being addressed here are the wicked (1:4–6). Thus in this psalm, the poet calls his neighbors to put their faith in God (Ps. 67).

4:6 any good: Although our lives often seem to be filled with uncertainty, there is never uncertainty with God. light of Your countenance: This phrase recalls the Aaronic benediction (Num. 6:26) and indicates God's favor. Those on whom the Lord shines His face are truly blessed.

4:7 grain and wine: The joy God gives transcends the joy of the harvest. Agricultural produce, the result of abundant rain on fertile soil, was a blessing of God on His people. But there is something greater than full barns and overflowing cisterns—the joy of God's presence.

4:8 The peace that God gives is far from a relaxation technique. It is a peace that enables an anxious person to lie down and sleep (3:5).

Psalm 5, a lament psalm, speaks of an unspecified but distressing period of David's life, a time marked by enemies who verbally opposed him and his rule. In the culture of the OT, a blessing or a curse was an appeal to God to do what the curse or blessing specified. So when David's enemies hurled curses at him, they believed that those curses called on divine power to destroy him. In this psalm, David is in distress because of the lies and boasts of his adversaries (101:7). He identifies his own cause with that of the Lord, so that attacks on him became attacks on God Himself. The "righteous" in v. 12 ultimately points to Jesus, as is common in the Book of Psalms (1:6). The psalm has three movements: (1) a prayer to the Lord for deliverance in a time of trouble (vv. 1–6); (2) a desire to worship the Lord in a time of trouble (vv. 7–9); (3) a longing for final judgment by the Lord in times of trouble (vv. 10–12).

5:1–3 Give ear: As in 4:1, this is the language of a person who believes from experience that God has forgotten his plight. The sufferer calls on the Lord to listen, even though the Lord has been continually listening and caring. Meditation here refers to incessant groaning. My King: The psalmists often address God in heaven as King, the ruler over all. At times, the psalms focus on prayer in the morning (88:13)—a commendable habit that helps a person to dedicate all the activities of the day to the glory of God.

5:4–6 Takes pleasure means to find enjoyment or reason for laughter. There is no enjoyment to be found in evil. The Hebrew word for boastful is the same one used to describe the praise of God. The praise of God is the focus of the psalms, but praise of self—a mere boast—is a twisted, human perversion of true praise. not stand: This psalm speaks of final judgment on the wicked (compare 1:5). They will not be allowed to stay in His glorious presence. You hate: God's hatred is not merely a feeling but an action of His will. The phrase workers of iniquity occurs often in the psalms to describe those who characteristically practice evil (14:4).

Does God Hate?

We know from Scripture that God is a God of love who shows mercy to sinners (Ps. 103:3; Matt. 9:12–13). Yet the Psalms declare that He "hates" people who commit iniquity and wickedness (Pss. 5:5; 11:5). How can we reconcile these seemingly contradictory pictures of God?

When the Bible speaks of "hatred," it does not mean the normal human reaction of retaliation or "getting even" for wrongs suffered. Nor does it mean a mad, irrational response to wrong or injustice. Rather, biblical "hatred" describes a studied expression of anger rooted in a commitment to justice. God does get angry at sin that injures and destroys His creation, especially human beings made in His image. He will not tolerate that which violates His "very good" work (Gen. 1:31).

But God's righteous indignation is not a fit of anger. It is rather a carefully considered application of a just disapproval and penalty against wrongdoing. It is godly wrath against evil (Ps. 2:5, 12).

5:7, 8 But as for me: In the Hebrew text, these words indicate a sharp contrast with the previous description of the wicked. The Hebrew word temple can be used of any very large structure—"palace" or "big house." David was a leader in reforming the worship of God in Jerusalem, and he established a structure for the worship that would take place in the temple to be built by Solomon. David uses the word temple in anticipation of the future glorious building; all later generations of Hebrew worshipers would understand their own worship better because of the use of this word in these psalms. Make Your way straight: David prayed that God would make clear His will for him.

5:9, 10 Their throat is an open tomb: These words describe the perverse language used by people in opposition to God. Paul used the words of these verses to argue for depravity of all people (Rom. 3:13).

5:11, 12 rejoice: Here the psalmist describes the joy of the saved, the ecstasy of the ones whom God saves from their own deserved destruction. Our joy must always be focused on our Savior (Phil. 4:4).

Psalm 6 is a lament psalm that shares elements of the penitential psalms. David was experiencing what he feared to be a mortal illness. He sensed that this illness may have fallen on him because of his own sinfulness. The title of the psalm is similar to those of Pss. 4 and 5. The specification of instruments is a reminder that this very personal psalm became part of the worship of the community when the temple was built. The psalm has four movements: (1) a petition for the Lord's mercy at a time of great pain (vv. 1–3); (2) an affirmation that the praise of the Lord comes from the living (vv. 4, 5); (3) a description of the psalmist's suffering (vv. 6, 7); (4) a rebuke of the psalmist's enemies, for the Lord has heard his prayer (vv. 8–10).

6:1–3 in Your anger: The psalmist suffers from a grave physical illness, one from which he fears he might not recover (v. 5). His principal concern is not only that his suffering might be more than he could stand but also that it comes as a result of God's severe anger. In his mourning, David cries out to God (as in 38:1). My bones is a poetic way of describing a deeply troubling illness; David's entire being is in torment.

6:4, 5 Return: This is a typical part of a petition in the psalms of lament (Ps. 13). The call for God to act is based on faith, even during a period of great stress. Your mercies' sake: Perhaps the most significant single term in the Hebrew text regarding the character of God is the word rendered mercies here. The Hebrew word describes what some prefer to call the loyal love of God. The translations vary because the word has much depth. Aside from the personal name of God (Yahweh), it may be the single most important term describing Him as the object of praise in the Book of Psalms (36:5). In the grave: When a believer dies, his or her voice is lost from the singers of God's praise in temple worship. The reasoning is clear: If God still desires to hear David's voice in worship, He must keep David alive. David would be of no use to God dead; alive he could sing, shout, and testify to God's love and His mercy (94:17).

6:6, 7 make my bed swim: This language of exaggeration is a way of emphasizing the reality of his pain. He seems to be weeping so profusely that he is about to drench his bed, drain his ducts, and die of grief.

6:8–10 Depart: Psalm 6 is a lament psalm in which the Lord answers the prayer of the afflicted David. The change of mood in the psalm is due to the Lord's response. David who has been so ill is now healed. The Lord has answered David's prayer. workers of iniquity: See 14:4; 101:8. Let all my enemies be ashamed: The psalmist speaks in righteous indignation against those who have reviled him, and more importantly have ridiculed his God.

Psalm 7 is a lament psalm, featuring David's protestations of innocence. In some psalms, the psalmist indicates that his suffering is deserved. Such cases lead to confession of sin. But in other cases, psalmists, like David in this psalm, do not believe they deserve the suffering or the feeling of being abandoned by God. Hence this psalm expresses David's extreme sorrow. Of course, none of us is exempt from sin and guilt. Ultimately all of us deserve God's wrath (Rom. 3). But when we become children of God, we anticipate mercy. Often we are shocked when we face suffering. But the dominant message in the Book of Psalms is twofold: (1) God is good; and (2) life is difficult. The life of faith is lived between these two realities. Although the title of the psalm refers to "Cush, a Benjamite," the Scriptures do not identify who this person was or what event in David's life prompted this psalm. The psalm has several brief movements: (1) an initial appeal for deliverance (vv. 1, 2); (2) a protest of innocence (vv. 3–5); (3) an appeal for God's judgment, part one (vv. 6–8); (4) an appeal for God's judgment, part two (vv. 9, 10); (5) a picture of God's judging work (vv. 11–13); (6) a portrait of the wicked (vv. 14–16); (7) a vow of praise (v. 17).

7:1, 2 I put my trust: The verb here can describe the action of a bird seeking refuge in the wings of its mother. This picture is found in the Book of Psalms (11:1; 17:8) and in the historical books (Ruth 2:12). Tear me like a lion vividly conveys the psalmist's fear. David had witnessed a lion who had captured its prey, and he compares his own fate to being captured and torn apart.

7:3–5 if I have done this: David protests that he is innocent of whatever charge his enemy has brought against him (Ps. 94). let him trample my life: These solemn words are spoken to God. The Lord can enact His judgment through David's enemies if his protest of innocence is false.

7:6–8 in Your anger: This is a plea for God to display His anger against the psalmist's adversaries, to judge them for their slander against David. Lift Yourself up: David implores the Lord to rise from His throne to intervene on his behalf, to bring justice in the intolerable situation (3:7). Judge me: Only someone confident of his own innocence would dare to pray these words before the Lord. David was innocent of the charges. He had not attacked someone without cause (vv. 3–5).

7:9, 10 In the Hebrew, hearts and minds is literally "hearts and kidneys"—an ancient way of describing the innermost person. My defense means “my shield.” God hovers over the believer like a military shield, an invisible defense (33:20).

7:11–13 God is angry: The indignation of God is directed at the enemies of His people. sharpen His sword: The imagery in vv. 12, 13 is of a great warrior preparing for battle: the Warrior is the Lord and the battle is against the wicked (37:9; 118:10).

7:14–16 conceives trouble: The wicked become “mothers” to trouble. They will give birth to their own destruction.

7:17 Most High is a term often used to describe God’s authority over the nations (47:2; 78:35; Deut. 32:8). The God of Israel is not just another national deity—He rules all nations.

Psalm 8, a psalm of praise with wisdom connections, is a poetic reflection of the great creation text of Gen. 1. This psalm expresses wonder at the majestic and sublime nature of God. However, the center of the psalm focuses on human beings, a rarity in Scripture. But even this focus leads to the praise of God, the Creator of humanity. Thus the psalm sets to music the significance of the phrase "in His image" in Gen. 1:26–28. The structure of the poem is: (1) a prologue in praise of God's excellent name (v. 1); (2) the praise of God from children (v. 2); (3) the praise of the Creator of humanity (vv. 3–8); (4) an epilogue in praise of God's excellent name (v. 9).

8:1 How excellent is Your name: The name of God and the glory of God are alternate ways of describing who He is. See the description of the meaning of the name of God in Ex. 3:14, 15 and the focus on the name of God in 113:1–3. This psalm ends with the same words it begins with. These words of praise to the name of God form a frame for its central subject—the praise of man as male and female, whom God has made to reflect His majesty.

8:2 mouth of babes: This verse was quoted by Jesus (Matt. 21:16) to the priests and scribes who wanted to squelch the people who were speaking the words of 118:26 in praise of Jesus.

8:3, 4 Your heavens: David is in awe at the splendors of creation; the wonders of nature lead him to praise its Creator. Even the universe with its infinite distances was the work of the Lord's fingers (19:1). What is man: In view of the vastness of creation and the surpassing glory of God the Creator, who are we to presume upon Him? Here man refers to all human beings regardless of gender.

8:5–8 You have made him a little lower than the angels: The response to the rhetorical questions of v. 4 is stunning. Man, as male and female, stands at the summit of God's creation. The Hebrew text is "You have made him to lack little of God." The Septuagint, the ancient Greek translation of the OT, translates the Hebrew word meaning "God" as angels. The author of Hebrews bases his argument in Heb. 2:5–9 on the Septuagint. So both readings are true. God made human beings in His image, just a little lower than angels. The words crowned him with glory fill out and explain the parallel phrase "a little lower than the angels." God created human beings as majestic creatures who were to rule over His creation. But in our fallen state, we are profoundly disfigured, a perversion of the majesty God has intended (9:20). However, Jesus restores those who put their trust in Him. In Christ, we recover majesty; in Him, we become the people that God wants us to be. Whenever we feel worthless, the words of this psalm should encourage us. We and all other human beings are valuable because God Himself created us in His own glorious image.

8:9 O LORD, our Lord: The first word is the divine name Yahweh. The second Hebrew word translated our Lord speaks of the One in control: “our Sovereign.”

Psalm 9 may have been originally one poem with Ps. 10. Indeed, there is evidence that several of the psalms have been restructured in varying ways (Pss. 42; 43). Note that Ps. 10 does not have a new superscription and that the two psalms deal with the same theme. Moreover, the psalms in the Hebrew text form a partial acrostic pattern. Ten of the initial letters of verses in Ps. 9 follow the order of the Hebrew alphabet, and seven initial letters in Ps. 10 continue the same pattern. In Hebrew, this pattern is pleasing to the listener and attests to the skill of the poet. Although Pss. 9 and 10 are psalms of lament, they present a triumphant determination to praise God. The structure of Ps. 9 is as follows: (1) a determination to praise the Lord (vv. 1, 2); (2) a rehearsal of God's saving deeds (vv. 3–5); (3) a rebuke of God's enemies (vv. 6–8); (4) a statement of confession (vv. 9, 10); (5) an ascription of praise to God (vv. 11, 12); (6) a petition for deliverance by God (vv. 13–16); (7) a vision of the judgment of the wicked (vv. 17, 18); (8) a call for deliverance by God (vv. 19, 20). The title of the psalm, which ascribes the poem to David, may also indicate the tune to which it was to be sung, "Death of the Son."

9:1, 2 with my whole heart: Real praise is not halfhearted; it involves one's whole being (146:2). The words of these two verses are characteristic of the praise of God in the Psalms. He is to be praised for His works and His name. His name represents who He is; His works stand for all He does. Most High is a designation for the Lord, especially as He rules the nations (47:2; 78:35; Deut. 32:8).

9:3–5 The enemies are not identified; this is common in the Psalms. All subsequent readers can fill in their own list of those who trouble them. The poet has confidence that God is in control (v. 4) and that He executes judgment (v. 5). Therefore in the middle of trouble, the psalmist is able to foresee the end of his enemies (vv. 17, 18).

God the Judge

However nations might justify and judge their actions, the ultimate Judge of their conduct is God. His righteousness, which flows from His very character, is the final standard against which right and wrong is measured (Ps. 9:4). This righteous Judge rebuked the nations of David's day for failing to do what David had done in Psalm 8—acknowledge God (8:1, 9).

The kingdom of Israel quickly rose to a place of prominence and power under David and his successor, Solomon. This window of opportunity opened during a period in which no one empire dominated the Middle East (c. 1000 B.C.). Egypt was in decline and Assyria had not yet become a major power. The two Israelite kings seized the moment by strengthening Israel's defenses, expanding its borders, increasing its trade, and storing up enormous wealth.

Meanwhile, many of Israel's neighbors continued to ignore God and govern with wickedness. Instead of ruling their people with justice and compassion, they often oppressed them. They also attacked other nations without provocation, destroying innocent people (Ps. 9:6). But God responded by destroying the destroyers. He pledged not to forget the needy and helpless, and avenged the injustices they had suffered by blotting out the wicked (9:7–18).

The same righteous God sits in judgment on the world today. He watches what nations do, and will not leave their sins unpunished. Nations and their leaders are still accountable to the Lord for their programs and policies. This fact should kindle a healthy fear of the Lord and a humble recognition that human leaders are only mortal (9:20).

9:6–8 One day even the names of the enemies of God will be forgotten. But the name of God will endure forever. One day there will be a final judgment when God will make right every wrong and establish His peace based on justice (96:13).

9:9, 10 Refuge speaks of a secure height, something inaccessibly high. David was often outdoors, and he used images from physical geography to describe the wonder of God's protective care (91:1, 2). who know Your name: To know the name of God was the OT equivalent of saving faith in the NT. have not forsaken: This is a further explanation of the meaning of God's name. Since the Lord is God, He cannot abandon those to whom He has bound Himself. He is a faithful God—a God who never gives up on His people.

9:11, 12 He avenges blood: God is the Avenger, not any person (Deut. 32:35). One day God will judge the wicked. In the end, He will establish His just rule.

9:13–16 David asks that his life be spared from the gates of death so that he might praise the Lord in the gates of the temple. David moved from the gates of death to the gates of life. Only God could accomplish such a sudden reversal; only the Lord could lift him from such depths. Daughter of Zion was an endearing term for Jerusalem. As Jacob was God's "son," so Jerusalem was God's "daughter" (Ps. 48). In the net: David prays that the evil the wicked intend for him will become their own trap (7:15, 16; 35:7, 8).

9:17, 18 hell: Just as the Psalms speak of heaven as the destiny of the righteous (23:6), so they also speak of hell as the destiny of the wicked (1:6). It is a place from which the righteous want to be delivered (86:13). Passages like this one confirm the NT affirmation of a day of final judgment in which the righteousness of God will be displayed and the wickedness of unrepentant humankind will finally receive punishment (Matt. 25:31–46). The expectation of the poor describes the often fruStrated hope that the oppressed may feel in this life. One day, however, they will be vindicated, for God Himself is their Protector (140:12).

9:19, 20 Do not let man prevail: Although human beings are made in God's image as described in Ps. 8, the wickedness of fallen humanity is profound. Humanity in rebellion against God is a gross perversion of God's plan. The Lord cannot allow this arrogance to go unchallenged.

Psalm 10 was originally part of Ps. 9. The two are found as one psalm in the Septuagint, the ancient Greek translation of the Hebrew Scripture. Psalm 10 reiterates the desire expressed in Ps. 9, that the Lord would deal with the wicked enemies of the psalmist. This psalm reflects a sense of urgency: the psalmist pleads for immediate deliverance from his enemies. The structure of Ps. 10 is: (1) an inquiry into the Lord's inaction (vv. 1, 2); (2) a description of the actions of the wicked (vv. 3–11); (3) a renewed call for the Lord to rise in judgment (vv. 12, 13); (4) a confession of trust in the Lord's final judgment (vv. 14, 15); (5) a presentation of praise to God who is King (vv. 16–18).

10:1, 2 Stand afar off are classic words of lament or mourning (13:1–3). As the psalmist views the actions of the wicked, he finds himself angry at wickedness and wondering how God can remain apathetic and inactive. But even with his doubts, he continues to pray to the only God who can deliver him from his troubles.

10:3, 4 God is in none of his thoughts: For the psalmist, this is the most difficult part of his circumstances (14:1). With no thought of God, his wicked enemies are able to boast in themselves. They turn reality upside down by praising evil and spurning God.

10:5, 6 Only those who stand on the sure foundation of God's Word can confidently say, I shall not be moved (15:5). The wicked who have lost all sense of God assume that they can use these words themselves. But eventually they will be swept away by the turmoil and troubles of this world (Prov. 10:25; Matt. 7:24–27).

10:8–10 sits in the lurking places: The psalmist views the wicked as oppressors. They are similar to lurking beasts, ready to pounce on their prey.

10:11 God has forgotten: The wicked behave the way they do because they doubt that the Lord knows, cares, or will act. They want to believe that there will be no final judgment, so they feel free to do as they please. But the truth is that God will establish justice (vv. 14, 15).

10:12, 13 Arise, O LORD: The psalmist returns to his call for God to act (9:19, 20).

10:14, 15 You have seen is the classic confession of trust in God in the psalms of lament. God does know; He does see; and He will act. God protects those like the fatherless who have no other protection (27:10). Break the arm: As in 3:7, this is a call for God to destroy the power of the wicked. This impassioned curse on the wicked displays the righteousness of God.

(Heb. goy) (2:1; 10:16; Judg. 2:21) Strong’s #1471: The Hebrew word goy basically means a body or group of people and is usually translated nation. Although goy can be used to designate the people of Israel, especially before their settlement in Canaan (Josh. 4:1; 5:6), the term generally refers to neighboring pagan nations (Deut. 4:38; Judg. 2:21, 22). These nations, characterized by wickedness (Deut. 9:4, 5), were considered enemies of God (2:1; 10:16). Yet the nations were not without hope, for the OT also speaks of the grace of God extending to all people through the coming of the promised Messiah (Is. 2:2; 11:10; 42:6).

10:16–18 The LORD is King: These words suggest that Pss. 9 and 10 are royal psalms. Usually the royal psalms have a more positive viewpoint. They take the stance that God is King and the world is established and will not be moved. On the other hand, Pss. 9; 10 question how there can be such distress in the world with God as King. But since God is King, this psalm concludes with the fervent prayer that the will of God may be done on earth as it is in heaven (Rev. 19:1–6).

Psalm 11 is a psalm of trust. The title ascribes the psalm to David. In the middle of the psalms of lament (Pss. 9; 10; 12), this psalm expresses great trust in the Almighty Lord. It is the context of adversity that makes this psalm of trust all the more impressive. This brief poem has three movements: (1) an affirmation of trust in the Lord even during the assaults of the wicked (vv. 1–3); (2) an affirmation of trust in the Lord who reigns above and who will judge the actions of the wicked (vv. 4–6); (3) an affirmation of trust in the Lord because of who He is (v. 7).

11:1–3 The phrase I put my trust describes seeking refuge, similar to a bird under the wings of its mother (Ruth 2:12). Flee as a bird: Here is the contemptuous challenge of the wicked. They are like their father, the devil (John 8:44; 2 Cor. 11:13–15). They view the righteous as helpless birds flying to their mountain home. They do not realize that their mountain home is protection in the Lord Himself. bend their bow: This is a picture of the wicked on the hunt for the righteous (10:8–10). foundations are destroyed: These verses are the taunt of the wicked to the righteous. They are a false charge; the words are untrue. The foundations are not destroyed; there is a great deal the righteous can do (Eph. 6:10–18). Most important, the righteous can keep trusting in God, their true foundation.

IN CONTEXT

Where God Lives

Some passages of Scripture seem to declare that God lived in the inner sanctuary (or Most Holy Place) of the tabernacle, and later of the temple. Other passages appear to speak of God living in heaven. So where exactly does God live?

The answer is that God is pure spirit who is infinite and therefore not bound by time or space. He cannot be said to live in a place, in a way that would imply that He is limited to a specific location. At best, God can be said to live everywhere, though that is a very human way of looking at things. God lives in eternity, which is beyond human understanding.

Psalm 11 reflects that mystery by referring to God's dwelling place as "heaven" (Ps. 11:4). His presence in the temple, while real, was not exclusive.

God has made Himself known at certain times and locations in our world. He revealed Himself to the Israelites at Mount Sinai (Ex. 19:16–20), and later in the tabernacle (Lev. 9:23–24) and temple (2 Chr. 5:14). He also revealed Himself in His Son, Jesus (John 1:14; 14:9). Paul wrote that Christ lives in believers (Gal. 2:20), as does the Spirit of God (1 Cor. 3:16).

The point for us to apply is that God is not limited to buildings. That is not to say that houses of worship such as church sanctuaries have no value. But they are more a refuge for us than a residence for God.

11:4–6 The words in His holy temple prove that the charge of v. 3 is false. God is in control; the foundations are not destroyed. His eyes behold: It may appear that God is not involved (10:11), but He does see and He will act (Ex. 2:23–25; 3:6–15). tests the righteous: There are times when the Lord allows trials to come into the life of the righteous as a test. But God's actions are more severe toward the wicked, whom He hates. The Hebrew word for hates is a strong term that speaks primarily of rejection (5:5). rain coals: The source for "fire and brimstone" judgment is the story of God's judgment on Sodom and the other cities near the Dead Sea in Gen. 19.

11:7 Because the LORD is righteous, the believer who is under stress can continue to trust in Him. Such faith allows one to ignore the taunts of the wicked. The believer needs only to return to the enfolding wings of God to renew strength and purpose in the midst of a troubled day.

Psalm 12, a psalm of lament, begins with a focus on the power of the wicked's perverse mouth (Pss. 52; 120). It concludes powerfully with an assertion of the power of the pure and truthful words of God. The title ascribes the poem to David. The psalm has five movements: (1) a description of the language of the wicked (vv. 1, 2); (2) a prayer for God's intervention (vv. 3, 4); (3) the intervention of God to deliver His own (v. 5); (4) a characterization of the language of God (vv. 6, 7); (5) a reminder of the continuing presence of the wicked (v. 8).

12:1–3 godly man ceases: David wonders if there are any righteous people left. speak idly: This psalm charges the wicked for using words to destroy and hurt others.

12:4 With our tongue: Because the wicked do not submit to any authority over them, much less God Himself, they believe they can say anything they want.

12:5–7 Now I will arise: With these dramatic words, God speaks to David and reveals His righteous character. He will not linger; He will judge the speech of the wicked. pure words: In contrast to the idle words of the wicked (vv. 1–4), the words of God are altogether trustworthy. The eternal and steadfast nature of the Lord Himself stands behind His words. He will establish justice just as He has promised to David (v. 5).

12:8 The wicked prowl: Even with God's words of judgment, there are still wicked people looking for those whom they might destroy. One day there will be full punishment (10:16–18). For now, we still struggle with the help of the Holy Spirit against the evil in our own souls and the pervasive wickedness in our world.

Psalm 13 is a psalm of lament, an impassioned cry to the Lord for help. It is ascribed to David. The psalm is brief, even terse; but it is remarkably powerful in its tone and imagery. There are similarities between this psalm and Ps. 142. This psalm has three movements: (1) a lament of the forsaken (vv. 1, 2); (2) a petition for deliverance (vv. 3, 4); (3) a confession and a vow of praise (vv. 5, 6).

Lament Psalms

In the lament psalms, we hear the strong, emotional words of sufferers. These are words written by real people in very difficult situations. Sometimes the forcefulness of the psalmists' complaints against God is shocking. But these godly sufferers know that God will not be angry with their honesty, for even when they scream at God, it is a scream of faith.

The following is the basic structure of the psalms of lament: 1. An introductory cry

2. The lament proper

- I am hurting
- You do not care
- The enemy is winning

3. A confession of trust 4. Reasons for God to act

5. Petitions

- Hear me
- Save me
- Punish them

6. A vow to praise God

The introductory cry can be very brief—just an "O God," as in 79:1. This is the psalmist's cry of distress to the living God who will act on his behalf once again—even as He has done in the past.

The lament proper often consists of three parts. The first part introduces the pain and hurt that the psalmist is experiencing (6:6). The second part of the lament is the most astonishing, for in this part the psalmist addresses God directly. Often, God is accused of inattention, forgetfulness, or no longer caring about the psalmist and his plight (13:1). In the third part, the psalmist describes the success of the wicked (10:3–11). The wicked present two intolerable problems to the psalmist: one is the personal attack upon the psalmist, a friend of God; and the other is what this evil attack means for the reputation of God.

In the lament psalms, these complaints are followed by statements of trust. The confession of trust shows that the psalmist still believes in God—even when his faith is under assault by the evils of the world, the pressures of advisors, and nagging doubts. In the middle of his painful situation, the psalmist reminds himself of God's care for him in the past (13:5).

Many of the lament psalms contain a section giving further reasons for God to act. Here the psalmist describes in more detail his own situation, the acts of the wicked, or the consequences to his life and to the community of believers if the Lord does not deliver him from his distress.

On the basis of a renewed trust in the Lord, the psalmist presents his petitions. He calls out to God to listen to him, to deliver him (71:2), and to punish his enemies, who mock his faith in God (71:13). Finally, the psalm concludes with a vow of praise. The psalmist promises to praise God before the congregation when God delivers him from his plight (9:14).

The psalms of lament are a model of godly response to suffering. The Lord does not expect us to remain stoic when we face suffering. We can pour out our souls to the Lord. However, in the middle of our cry, we must remember God's loving care for us in the past so we can willingly trust Him with the future. With this type of response, we can renew our hope in the living Lord.

13:1, 2 These two verses present all three pronouns that occur in a typical lament psalm: (1) I am hurting; (2) You have forgotten; (3) they are winning. Four times in two verses David screams out how long (4:2; 6:3). The Lord allows David to pour out his anxiety before Him. But by the end of David's prayer, the Lord has granted him a correct perspective on his situation. David's only option is to trust in the sovereign mercy of his loving God.

13:3, 4 Enlighten my eyes: As a person who is nearing death might sense the dimming of his vision (38:10), David also senses his death and pleads with God to intervene before he dies. Lest my enemy say: If God does not intervene, not only will the psalmist be lost from the community that praises the living God (6:5), but his enemies will also claim a victory over him and his God. Fundamentally, the Lord's honor is at stake. rejoice:

The enemies' rejoicing would be intolerable because it would be aimed in part against God in whom the psalmist has trusted (35:19).

13:5, 6 This is the turning point of the psalm. The tone of the psalm abruptly changes from despair to hope. In this verse, David recalls his commitment to trust God completely. The term mercy describes God's loyal love, His faithfulness to His commitment to take care of His people. I will sing was the psalmist's vow to praise God in the worshiping community. Based on the assurance that God will deliver him, David resolves to tell the people about it—this is the essence of praise (40:1–3).

Psalm 14, which is closely allied with Ps. 53, is a wisdom psalm attributed to David. It speaks of the foolishness of living as if God did not exist. The psalm has three movements: (1) a description of the pervasiveness of evil (vv. 1–3); (2) an assertion that final judgment is coming (vv. 4–6); (3) a prayer for God's kingdom (v. 7).

14:1 The word fool refers not to mental inability but to moral and spiritual insensitivity. The phrase no God suggests "practical atheism," the view that if there is a God, it really does not matter to one's life. This is the viewpoint stated in 10:4, 11; 12:4. The Hebrew word for corrupt has the idea of soured milk. Those who cease to believe in God will eventually "sour"; they will degenerate into doing evil.

14:2, 3 The LORD looks down: Here the Lord's inquiry leads to judgment (as in Gen. 6:12). The pictorial language is a way of describing the omniscience of God, the fact that the Lord knows everything. No, not one: The biblical teaching on depravity is not that each individual is as evil as he or she could possibly be, but that sin is present in every individual (Rom. 3). Since no one is perfect, all must ask God for His forgiveness—something He freely gives to those who place their trust in His son Jesus (Eph. 1:7; 1 John 1:9).

14:4, 5 The wicked lack knowledge of God's truth. Although people may be brilliant in their chosen fields, they can still be morally insensitive and spiritually closed to the issues that have eternal consequences. My people refers to those who are faithful to God. God has delivered a group of people from the prison of wickedness. These people are His people and must follow His ways. They may become special targets of the wicked because they are different. There is an adverb of place that alludes to the final judgment.

14:6 His refuge speaks of shelter, as in the shadow of a tree. David as an outdoorsman had experienced the urgent need of shelter from the fierce elements. He uses this common experience to describe the various ways in which God protects His people from the storm of evil that surrounds them (9:9).

14:7 The salvation of Israel refers to a future salvation, the coming reign of God (Pss. 2; 89).

Psalm 15 may be a wisdom psalm, but its principal focus is on the proper approach to the worship of God. Although all of the psalms were used in the worship of God, we might call this poem a worship psalm because of its special focus on this subject. The psalm asks the question, Who is righteous enough to approach God? Certainly no one is except Jesus, the Messiah. But there have always been those who stand before God as forgiven sinners, whose righteousness comes as a gift from God. We who are in Christ learn to come boldly into the presence of the Father because we come on the authority of His Son (Heb. 4:16). Jesus makes us feel at home in the presence of the Father. This psalm, ascribed to David, is posed in question-and-answer format. There are three movements: (1) the question of who may approach the holy God (v. 1); (2) the response (vv. 2–4); (3) the blessing (v. 5).

15:1 who may abide: Except for priests, people did not live in the precincts of the temple. These words describe an approach to God's presence in which one might feel accepted, even "at home." holy hill: As in 3:4, this phrase is used of the presence of God in the temple or the tabernacle. The Hebrew term is a general one that refers to wherever the tabernacle was in David's day; later readers and singers of this psalm appropriately applied the word to the temple built in Jerusalem.

15:2–4 He who walks uprightly speaks of relative righteousness, not absolute righteousness, for no one is innocent before God. The Lord commands us to be holy (1 Pet. 1:15, 16), and He also gives us the power to become holy (2 Thess. 2:16, 17). vile person is despised: The righteous hate what God hates (vv. 4, 5). The point is not so much the emotion of hatred as the deliberate rejection of wicked ways (1:1). swears to his own hurt: When a righteous person takes an oath, it must be honored even if it requires suffering.

15:5 never be moved: The promise of God for the righteous is for this life and for the life to come. The Lord is the righteous person's sure foundation.

Psalm 16, a psalm of lament, has a remarkable prophetic aspect that parallels many of the messianic prophecies concerning the Suffering Servant (Is. 53). This poem of David became central in the preaching of the apostles in the early church (Acts 2:22–31). The psalm has four movements: (1) a petition to God for deliverance (vv. 1–3); (2) a condemnation of the wicked and their practices (v. 4); (3) an exaltation of the psalmist's relationship with God (vv. 5–8); (4) a confident assertion that God will spare the psalmist's life and bless it (vv. 9–11).

16:1–4 I put my trust: David uses the expression of a bird seeking refuge under its mother's wing to indicate his complete trust in the Lord (compare 7:1; 11:1). From this strong stance of confidence, he is able to boast that his goodness comes only from God. He shares with the people of God the enjoyment of God's presence.

16:5–8 My inheritance refers to the Promised Land. God had given this inheritance to His people (Deut. 6:1–3). However there was a greater inheritance for the Levites, who did not receive a share in the land (Num. 26:62); their share of the inheritance was in the Lord. David had an ancestral inheritance in the land. As king, he also had extensive royal holdings. But he realized that no inheritance was greater than his relationship with Almighty God.

(Heb. simchah) (16:11; Neh. 8:12, 17; Prov. 21:15; Jon. 4:6) Strong’s #8057: This Hebrew word is one of several frequently occurring Hebrew words that express exceeding gladness or rejoicing. Like its synonyms, this word can apply to a disposition of the heart (Prov. 14:10; Jer. 15:16). It is frequently set in a context of feasting (Neh. 8:12) and singing (137:3; 1 Sam. 18:6), as it is in a prophecy concerning God’s singing over Jerusalem (Zeph. 3:17). The word is also used for the senseless happiness of the enemies of God’s people (Judg. 16:23; Ezek. 35:15; 36:5), of the foolish (Prov. 15:21), of the lazy (Prov. 21:17), and of the hypocrites (Job 20:5). However, joy in the Bible is usually associated with the people of God, who celebrate God’s blessing at a number of occasions —feasts, coronations of kings, victories in battle, and the dedication of the rebuilt walls of Jerusalem (Num. 10:10; 1 Kin. 1:40; 2 Chr. 20:27; Neh. 12:27). In fact, Moses exhorts the Israelites to serve God with joy, so that they would not lose their blessing (Deut. 28:47).

16:9–11 path of life: With this phrase David speaks of his escape from death at a critical point, but he also indicates the eternal life given by the resurrected Savior to all who trust in Him.

Psalm 17 is a special use of the psalm of lament; it is a protest of innocence (Pss. 26; 35; 43; 69). The psalm is ascribed to David. At times, David suffers under the heavy hand of God's anger because of unconfessed sin in his life. But there are other occasions where he insists that his present troubles are not caused by any fault in his life. In such a case, he calls upon God to vindicate him. God indicates through these psalms that He has a special concern for people who experience undeserved suffering, even though He allows the trouble to come for reasons that may never be known in this life. The poem has six movements: (1) a plea for vindication (vv. 1, 2); (2) an acknowledgment of God's testing (vv. 3–5); (3) a plea for God's mercy (vv. 6–9); (4) a description of the wicked (vv. 10–12); (5) a renewed plea for vindication (vv. 13, 14); (6) a statement of resolute faith (v. 15).

17:1, 2 a just cause: With these words, David sets the tone of the psalm. By protesting his innocence, he hopes to convince God to move on his behalf and deliver him from his trouble. He asks for God to search him thoroughly and to declare his vindication, often translated "justice" or "judgment."

17:3–5 tested my heart: David knows that God has done what he is requesting even before he asks. That is, God knew David's needs and what was in his heart. David's prayer helps David to focus on the source of his strength and reaffirm his determination to live a pure life (1:1–3; 19:14).

17:6–9 Incline Your ear is pictorial language describing the mercy of God (40:1): God will stoop down to earth to hear David's plea. lovingkindness: This significant term for God's loyal love is enhanced by the Hebrew term for marvelous, a word used in the Bible only with reference to God. The apple of Your eye: Just as a person has an instinctive response to protect the eye, so God cares instinctively for His servants. shadow of Your wings: Here God is described as a "mother hen" in a positive sense. Chicks who flee for protection to the wings of their mother find not only safety but warmth and love as well. In the same way, God protects us.

17:10–12 The words fat hearts are a description of insensitivity, similar to the language of Is. 6:10. As a lion: This language is similar to that of 10:8–10. The point is that the wicked are insensitive to human needs; they are like lions who wait for the right opportunity to destroy their prey.

17:13, 14 Arise, O LORD: The same language is used in 9:19, 20; 10:12, 13. their portion in this life: The wicked live their lives with only the pursuit of the pleasures of this world in mind. The righteous should not try to obtain what this life can offer, but instead pursue God and His ways.

17:15 when I awake in Your likeness: This verse is a key text on biblical immortality in the OT. Having rejected the idea that the pleasures of this life are ultimately fulfilling, David anticipates the day when he will awake in glory and be made in the likeness of God.

Psalm 18 is attributed to David. The text of this psalm is found in 2 Sam. 22 with some variations. The superscription indicates that this psalm was David's hymn of celebration to the grace of God. This may be a psalm of trust (Ps. 23), but it is unique. The lengthy poem has several movements: (1) a statement of faith and a description of deliverance (vv. 1–6); (2) a poetic description of God's battle for David's deliverance (vv. 7–19); (3) a recital of the blessings of God on the righteous (vv. 20–27); (4) an offering of praise to the person of the Lord (vv. 28–36); (5) a recounting of battles and victories in the Lord (vv. 37–45); (6) concluding praise for God's work of deliverance (vv. 46–50).

18:1 I will love You, O LORD: Twice in the Psalms the poet declares a love for God (116:1). Here an unusual word for love is used, referring to compassion as deep as a mother's love.

18:2, 3 The Hebrew word for my rock is balanced by its parallel Hebrew word my strength, meaning also "my rock." References to God as a mountain fortress that protects the believer are found many times in the Psalms (91:1–3; 144:1). This is a particularly apt image for David, who many times had to hide in the mountains for security (1 Sam. 26:1, 20). The words strength and stronghold reinforce the image of God as Protector. The horn symbolized strength.

18:4–6 In these verses, David describes how his life is endangered. Using very strong language, he expresses the pain he feels as he watches death come near: sorrows of Sheol. But even in the great depths of his trouble, David makes his distress known to God. He cries out to the LORD and the faithful God answers him.

18:7–9 the earth shook … He bowed the heavens: Underlying these poetic words is the understanding that the Almighty will turn the universe inside out, if necessary, to deliver His servant.

18:10–14 The language He rode upon a cherub is similar to the descriptions of Baal in Canaanite poetry. Thus David is taking the words typically used to praise Baal and applying them to the living God, the only One who truly deserves such praise. The cherub is a royal symbol and thus speaks of God's power and glory (80:1). The references to darkness speak of the hiddenness of God. He cannot be completely understood by those whom He has created. The references to brightness speak of God's holiness.

18:15 the channels of the sea: This culminates the picture of God's turning the universe upside down (v. 7). Even the most hidden passages of the sea are exposed, as are the elements that hold the earth together. The Lord God does all this to rescue His servant David (v. 16). All of the Lord's fearsome power is used to save the one who worships Him. The passage vividly illustrates why the believer has no reason to fear (Heb. 13:6).

18:16–19 He drew me out of many waters: Again, David draws from the language of the Canaanites, turning it to the praise of God. The waters were regarded as dark gods in Canaan. But according to David, God is Lord of all, and the waters are His creatures. He delivers His servant David from any power that might hold him. Why David might ask, would God tear apart all of creation to act on his behalf? Because God takes pleasure in those who serve Him.

18:20–24 cleanness of my hands: David pleads his integrity, as in Ps. 17. Contrast this language with the description of the bloodied hands of unfit worshipers in Is. 1:15. blameless: As in Ps. 15, these are descriptions of relative righteousness. No one is completely innocent before God. But God enables His servants to pursue godliness in this life.

18:25–30 With the merciful: The poet describes the actions of God in terms of the people to whom He relates. God deals with each person according to his or her attitude. He opposes the proud but delivers the humble, for the humble turn to Him for strength.

18:31 who is God: With a question, David confesses that he cannot compare God to any person, god, or object (113:5; Is. 40:25).

18:32–36 The use of battle armor, such as a shield, as an image of God's provision for the righteous, is found in both the Old and New Testaments (Eph. 6:10–20).

18:37–41 pursued my enemies: God gives David strength to complete the battle against his enemies. God Himself is a Warrior (Ex. 15:3) and He outfits His servants for battle. to the LORD: Apparently in the extremes of battle, the enemies of David found no help from their gods, so they screamed aloud to David's God for deliverance. But God would not answer them. There is only one prayer from the wicked to which He gladly listens —the prayer of repentance.

18:42, 43 Head of the nations is language that prophetically speaks of the reign of the Messiah. David gained his empire by the work of the Lord on his behalf. But David's empire was only a picture of the kingdom of God that will one day be governed by David's greater Son, the Lord Jesus.

18:44–50 Ordinarily, praise to the Lord was given in the congregation of the Israelites. On occasion the poets speak of God's victories among the Gentiles who still worship other gods (138:1). This was a form of mission activity during the OT period (117:1). By proclaiming the victories of God to the nations, the poets were calling for the nations to respond in faith. How fitting that Paul would cite this verse (or its parallel in 2 Sam. 22:50) in Rom. 15:9 as a indicator of God's ongoing intention to bring His salvation to all people. to His king: David's victories are prototypes of the victories of the great King to come. The use of the word anointed is appropriate for David, but it points forward to the Savior who is the Anointed One (2:2). The words to David and his descendants forevermore connect the previous promises to the only Son of David who inherited an eternal kingdom, the Savior Jesus (2 Sam. 7).

Psalm 19, a wisdom psalm, celebrates the Word of God in the context of creation. Thus it is both a creation psalm and a Torah psalm. Both the creation psalms and the Torah psalms are regarded as subgroups of the wisdom psalms. The poem begins with the heavens, centers on the Word, and culminates in the heart of the servant of God. The poem has three movements: (1) a celebration of the greatness of God's creation (vv. 1–6); (2) a celebration of the purity of the Word of God (vv. 7–11); (3) a contemplation of the life of the person of God (vv. 12–14).

How We Know about God

Our understanding of God comes from three levels of His self-disclosure: the general revelation of Himself through nature, which He created (Ps. 19:1–6), the special revelation of His Word (19:7–11), and the particular work of God in one's individual life (19:12–14). After looking first at the firmament of God's world and then at the Word, which is the foundation of that world, David focuses on his own infirmities in his inner world.

Psalm 19 is typical of many psalms that look back and forth, up and down, outward and inward (compare Ps. 139). David realized how much he needed God to provide an integrated understanding of life. We can gain similar insight by using these multifocused psalms first to consider God's glorious universe, then to apply the spiritual disciplines of confession, Bible study, and prayer to our own lives, and finally to bear public witness to what we have come to know, see, and experience of God above, God around us, and God within.

19:1–6 All of creation including the heavens reveals God's glory and majesty (Rom. 1:18–20). Firmament is another word for heaven (Gen. 1:6). The vast expanse we see is testimony to the craftsmanship of God (8:3). From the vantage point of earth, there is no heavenly body so wonderful as the sun. In the ancient Middle East the sun was often thought of as a god. In this poem, the sun is but a stunning symbol of the Creator. Like a bridegroom, it is pictured as celebrating its Creator.

19:7–11 The law is the Torah, which means "instruction" or "direction." This passage (vv. 7–9) presents six words for the Law of God—law, testimony, statutes, commandment, fear, and judgments; six evaluations of the law—perfect, sure, right, pure, clean, and true; and six results—converting the soul, making wise the simple, rejoicing the heart, enlightening the eyes, enduring forever, and righteous altogether. The value of the Scripture cannot be compared with any other desirable thing—even gold. It provides the key to wisdom, joy, and most importantly, eternal life.

(Heb. bar) (19:8; 24:4; Prov. 14:4) Strong’s #1249: This Hebrew term appears only seven times in the Bible and always in the poetic books. Possibly it derives from a verb that can mean (1) to purify, (2) to choose or select, or (3) to make shine or polish. In 19:8, the word is associated with the eyes, suggesting radiance (compare Prov. 4:18). The concepts of “selectness” and “radiance” may fit the use of this word in the description of the chaste and pure Shulamite (the word is translated as favorite and clear in Song 6:9, 10). The term appears with other words denoting cleanness and purity (19:7–9), especially purity of the heart (24:4; 73:1).

19:12–14 his errors: The discussion of the nature and perfection of the Law of God leads the psalmist to consider his own imperfection. He is aware of both hidden faults and presumptuous sins; he asks to be delivered from both. His final prayer corresponds to 139:23, 24. My strength means “my rock” (18:1). My Redeemer describes God as the One who purchases our freedom from any bondage or slavery. The principal meaning of the word is “defender of family rights.”

Psalm 20, a royal psalm, is a psalm of trust ascribed to David. The tone of the psalm is one of blessing, such as a king might bestow on his people, perhaps on the eve of battle. The brief poem has three movements: (1) God's blessing in battle (vv. 1–5); (2) the assurance of God's deliverance (v. 6); (3) an assertion of faith in God the King (vv. 7–9).

20:1–5 The day of trouble likely refers to the day of battle. But it has wide application for any troubled day in the life of the believer. sanctuary: Help from God was perceived to come from the temple in Jerusalem. Ultimately it comes from God's dwelling in heaven, of which the earthly sanctuary was a symbol. your offerings: The soldiers who were about to go to war would have completed the necessary sacrifices for confession of sin (Lev. 1—7). In the immediate context, salvation is used to describe daily deliverance from the rigors of the battle and the victory over the enemy. But the Lord's deliverance of us from our spiritual troubles should prompt the same type of praise.

20:6 King David was the anointed of the Lord (18:50). His right hand: This is a slogan that describes God's powerful deliverance of the Israelites from Egypt (17:7; 44:3; 118:16; Ex. 15:6).

20:7–9 Chariots were the leading weapon on the ancient battlefield. The implements of warfare are mere tools in God's hand—the wise trust in God because the battle belongs to Him. May the King answer: Above King David was God the Great King; moreover, one day King Jesus would rule from sea to sea.

Psalm 21 is another of the royal psalms of David. Psalm 20 is a prayer of the king for God's blessing on his army. Psalm 21 is an assurance of God's blessing on the king. Both psalms, as is the case with all the royal psalms, speak ultimately of the great King to come, the Lord Jesus. Psalm 21 has four movements: (1) a declaration of praise to God by the king (vv. 1, 2); (2) a review of God's blessing on the king (vv. 3–7); (3) an expectation of the final destruction of all enemies of the king (vv. 8–12); (4) a renewed commitment by the people to praise God (v. 13).

21:1, 2 joy in Your strength: An ancient king would tend to find joy in his own strength and power (20:7, 8). But a wise king would find pleasure in the Almighty, for all power comes from Him. Your salvation: Ultimately, spiritual salvation may be in view, but the immediate issue is more mundane. One meaning of the Hebrew word salvation is "room to breathe." God had given King David a release from the pressures and constraints that bound him. Jesus speaks of this kind of salvation in Matt. 24:13, as does Paul in Phil. 1:19 (James 1:21). his heart's desire: The Lord gives people their aspirations when they are derived from a fundamental desire for God's honor and glory (20:4; 37:4; 145:19).

21:3–7 blessings of goodness: King David acknowledges that all he has is God's gift; his kingship itself (the crown) is a gift from the Lord. But God's greatest gift is life—temporal and eternal. In response to God for His many gifts, David trusts in the LORD, for he knows that this trust is not misplaced (15:5). These words of this passage should not be limited to King David, for they also speak generally of God's blessings on all believers. Each of us shares in the blessings of true royalty when we place our trust in the Lord, the Great King.

21:8–12 As is customary in the Psalms, the enemies of the king are the enemies of the Lord. Therefore the curse on the enemies is provoked by holy zeal for the glory of God (Num. 25). The time of Your anger may refer to any period of God's judgment, but compare to "the day of the Lord" (Joel 2:1; Zeph. 1:14). Their offspring: The wicked intend evil against the Lord; but He will prevail, causing them to flee from His anger.

21:13 Be exalted: The psalmist concludes with a shout of joy as he leads the faithful people in praising God for the promise of His final victory.

Psalm 22 is a profound lament psalm that concludes as a triumphant psalm of praise for God's deliverance. Although this psalm speaks of David's own distress and the Lord's deliverance of him, it also prophetically describes in remarkable detail Jesus' crucifixion and resurrection. The language David uses to describe his own predicament is prompted by the Holy Spirit. Thus it could span a thousand years to describe precisely the experiences of the Savior Jesus—both His excruciating death and victorious resurrection. See also Ps. 69, which predicts the emotional and spiritual suffering of Jesus. The title of Psalm 22 indicates that it was sung to the tune "The Deer of the Dawn." This lengthy poem has two main sections: (1) a description of the agony of impending death—an interplay of lament, confession, and petition (vv. 1–21); (2) an ecstatic celebration of great victory—a series of vows to praise God in the congregation (vv. 22–31).

22:1–3 With the words My God, My God, David expresses a painful sense of separation from God at a time of great trouble (38:21). These words were quoted by Jesus while in agony on the Cross (Matt. 27:46; Mark 15:34).

22:4 Our fathers trusted in You: Even in the midst of great pain, David confesses His faith in the God of his fathers. God has been faithful to earlier generations; surely He will continue to be faithful to those who call upon Him (v. 21 for God's faithful answer).

22:5–8 David's suffering makes him feel as though he were no longer human—instead he feels like a worm. When David was at his lowest, his enemies ridiculed his faith in the Lord. These words also describe the experience of the Savior who endured the verbal abuse of His tormentors (Matt. 27:27–31, 39–44).

22:9, 10 You made Me trust: With troubles and taunts swirling around him, David places his trust in the Lord—the One he has trusted throughout his whole life. David's response to difficult circumstances is instructive. Instead of doubting God's goodness, David reaffirms his lifelong faith in the Almighty.

22:11 Be not far from Me: David repeats his original plea (v. 1) for emphasis (vv. 19–21). He cannot endure his suffering without divine support.

22:12–15 David uses striking imagery to describe his distress. He is surrounded by animals—bulls and lions. Moreover, David's distress is so profound that he feels as if his life has been drained from him, as one might empty a jug of water. These words become even more poignant when they are applied to the sufferings of Jesus on the Cross (John 19:34). My tongue clings to my jaws: Jesus' words "I thirst" (John 19:28) expressed the pain of terrible thirst. the dust of death: For David, death would be avoided at this time (as in 16:9, 10). For the Savior, however, there was no reprieve.

22:16, 17 dogs: This is the third animal portrayal of the psalmist's enemies (vv. 12, 13). They pierced My hands and My feet explicitly predicts the crucifixion of the Lord Jesus Christ. The words are merely a figure of speech for the terrifying experiences of David; but as a prophet (Acts 2:30), David spoke accurately of the sufferings of Jesus.

22:18 The soldiers at Jesus' crucifixion gambled for His garments, in direct fulfillment of this text (Matt. 27:35).

22:19–21 Up to this point, the focus of this psalm has been on the suffering of the psalmist. The Lord God, who seemed so distant (vv. 1, 11), is now petitioned to draw near, to help, deliver, and save. The Lord is the only source of Strength to help David fight off the attacks of his tormentors. The use of animal imagery is now given in reverse order: dog, lion, and wild oxen—in contrast to bulls (v. 12), a lion (v. 13), and dogs (v. 16).

22:22–24 Not only does the psalm describe David's pain and prophetically Jesus' suffering on the cross, it also depicts God's deliverance. The Lord has answered, and David who has suffered so much promises to sing the praises of the Lord, his Deliverer. Nor has He hidden His face: The psalm begins with a sense of desperation based on a feeling of separation from God (v. 1). But the psalm ends with praise and gratitude: in reality God is near, He has answered, and He does save. David's hope has not been misplaced.

22:25, 26 David promises to praise the Lord for His miraculous salvation among other believers—in the great assembly at the temple (13:6). This public proclamation would encourage others to place their trust in the faithful Lord who rescues His people.

22:27–30 All the ends of the world: For David, these words refer to the spread of the news of his deliverance to places far outside of Judah. For the Savior Jesus, these words speak of the eventual spread of the gospel of redemption to all the families of the nations, a fulfillment of God's promise that He would bless all nations through Abraham's descendants

(Gen. 12:3). Those who go down to the dust is a common biblical expression for physical death and the resulting decay.

22:31 to a people who will be born: The gospel message of the death and resurrection of Jesus will spread not only geographically but also throughout all time. All people will hear the clear message of what God has done.

Psalm 23 is a psalm of trust. Within the six verses there is a development of the single theme of the first verse: David has no fear or concern, for the Lord is his Shepherd. This psalm of trust presents David in two ways. On the one hand, he is the “sheep” whose Shepherd is the Lord. At the same time, one of the most common descriptions of kingship in the ancient world is that of shepherd. In this sense, David as king was shepherd over the flock of Israel. This means that Ps. 23 is also a royal psalm. Even though the word “king” does not appear in it, this psalm is a description of what it means to be a good ruler. Moreover, the psalm prophetically speaks of Jesus. He is the Good Shepherd whose flock trusts in Him (John 10) and the King whose perfect rule will be established (Luke 23:2, 3; Rev. 17:14). The psalm has two movements: (1) a description of the Lord as Shepherd caring for the psalmist’s every need (vv. 1–4); (2) a description of the Lord as Shepherd extending His mercy to all (vv. 5, 6).

IN CONTEXT

Shepherd Boy

Psalm 23, the shepherd's psalm, was composed by David, who himself was a shepherd in his youth: • David was out keeping sheep when Samuel the judge came to his father Jesse's home to find a king of God's choosing (1 Sam. 16:11).

• The youngest of eight sons, David was left behind to tend sheep when his three oldest brothers went to battle. However, he occasionally visited them (17:12–20, 28).

• David used skills honed during years of shepherding to kill Goliath (17:34–37, 40–51).

• David is remembered as having been chosen by God and taken from the sheepfolds to shepherd the people of Israel (Ps. 78:70–72).

Psalm 23 reflects David's career shift. While the first four verses paint a pastoral picture, the last two have David sitting at a banquet table, most likely as king, while his enemies—those over whom God has made him triumph—look on. Having grown up in rural places, David had come to the city to exercise authority and power.

23:1 The LORD is my shepherd: The word pictures David uses for God come from his own life and experience. He had been a shepherd in his youth (1 Sam. 16:19).

23:2 Any disturbance or intruder scares sheep. They are very fearful animals and cannot lie down unless they feel totally secure. green pastures: David uses eloquent language to express his view of the abundant care God gives to His people. still waters: Sheep are afraid of fast-flowing streams. God's provision of still waters has a soothing effect and calms the sheep.

23:3 He restores my soul: God refreshes His people with His quiet voice and gentle touch. For this reason, the sheep know the Shepherd and are known by Him (John 10:14). For His name's sake: The loving actions of the Shepherd proceed from His nature.

23:4 The valley of the shadow of death can refer to any distressing time in our lives. The awareness of our own mortality often comes with sickness, trials, and hardship. But the Lord, our Protector, can lead us through these dark and difficult valleys to eternal life with Him. There is no need to fear death's power (1 Cor. 15:25–27). You are with me: The Good Shepherd is with us even in what seem the most difficult and troubling situations. Your rod and Your staff: Ancient shepherds used the rod and staff to rescue, protect, and guide the sheep. Thus, they become symbols of the Good Shepherd's loving care over His flock. The sheep are not alone, their Shepherd is standing over them, guiding them into safety—just as the Lord stands over us and protects us.

23:5 a table before me: God's provision is so luxurious, it is as though He has prepared a banquet. anoint: Typically an honored guest in the ancient Middle East was anointed with olive oil that contained perfumes. My cup: God's provision is as abundant as the wine offered to a guest by a generous host. The lavish treatment of the guest is indicative of the loving care of God for His people.

23:6 The use of both mercy and goodness to describe God's loyal love intensifies the meaning of the two words. What is described in v. 5 is God's overabundant mercy—love that is in no way deserved. The Hebrew verb follow describes an animal in pursuit. When the Lord is our Shepherd, instead of being stalked by wild beasts we are pursued by the loving care of the Lord. the house of the LORD forever: God's promise for the Israelites was not just for the enjoyment of this life in the land of promise (6:1–3); it was also for the full enjoyment of the life to come in His blessed presence (16:9–11; 17:15; 49:15).

Psalm 24, a psalm of David, is one of the royal psalms. The psalm describes the Lord's entrance into the holy city. It may have been sung when David brought the ark of the covenant to Jerusalem (2 Sam. 6:15). This psalm is often linked with Pss. 22; 23, for all three psalms speak prophetically of the Lord Jesus. Psalm 24 also has some affinities with Ps. 15, for both ask and answer the question of who is fit to come into the presence of the Lord. The answer in Ps. 15 focuses on a person's righteousness; the answer in Ps. 24 focuses on the King of glory. Psalm 24 should also be read with Pss. 2; 110, which share a focus on the return of the Lord Jesus Christ to establish His kingdom on earth. This psalm has three movements: (1) praise to God the Creator and Sovereign of the world (vv. 1, 2); (2) an inquiry concerning the appropriate approach to the Lord (vv. 3–6); (3) an anticipation of the King of glory (vv. 7–10).

24:1, 2 The earth is the LORD's: The psalmist praises God as Sovereign over all He has created. These words also set the stage for the question of vv. 3–5: If God is Lord over all, who then may approach Him? those who dwell therein: God's rule extends to all people, even those who do not acknowledge His power. founded it upon the seas: Drawing on the language of Gen. 1 in which God calls the dry land to rise from the watery abyss (Gen. 1:2, 9), David describes God's continued control over the waters.

24:3 Who may ascend: As in Ps. 15, those who approach the Holy One to worship Him in the temple in Jerusalem—His holy place—must approach Him in righteousness. This verse highlights the inability of any person except the King of glory to stand before God.

24:4, 5 Clean hands refers to a person's actions; pure heart refers to inner attitude.

24:6, 7 Lift up your heads: The gates of the city seem to sag; the doors appear loose. But they must rouse themselves for the King of glory. One is coming who is worthy to stand in the holy place. As He nears, the gates raise themselves to honor His entry.

24:8 Who is this King: This is praise for the King who is fresh from battle. This is the One who may enter the city, the Lord Himself. Only with the coming of Jesus did the meaning of this ancient poem become clear (Matt. 21:1–10; Rev. 19).

24:9, 10 The LORD of hosts: The repetition in these verses is for effect and emphasis. This is praise for the coming King.

Psalm 25 is a psalm of lament. But in the middle of his sorrow, David petitions the Lord to forgive him. Although the psalm contains elements of a lament psalm and a penitential psalm, the mixture of the two forms makes the psalm unique. The psalm is an acrostic, with one poetic line for each successive letter of the Hebrew alphabet. The structure of the psalm is as follows: (1) an introductory appeal that David will not be ashamed before his enemies (vv. 1–3); (2) a call for God to forgive David (vv. 4–7); (3) a focus on the character of God (vv. 8–10); (4) a renewed call for God to forgive David (vv. 11–18); (5) a concluding appeal that David will not be ashamed before his enemies (vv. 19–21); (6) a concluding prayer for Israel (v. 22).

25:1–3 Let me not be ashamed is the opening and closing appeal of Ps. 25 (v. 20). Shame is the intended end of the enemies of God (35:26), but not of the faithful. who waits: Waiting on the Lord is the equivalent of hoping in Him (25:5; 40:1).

25:4–7 Show me is an appeal to God to enter into David's life more directly, to help him become conformed to the character of God (Rom. 12:1, 2). sins of my youth: Both the sins of immaturity and the transgressions of adulthood need forgiveness (1 John 1:9).

“remember”

(Heb. zakar) (25:6, 7; 106:45) Strong’s #2142: This Hebrew verb has as its basic meaning “to contemplate” or “to call to mind.” When it refers to recalling past ideas or events it is translated remember (Gen. 42:9; Num. 11:5). In other passages, it pertains to thinking about the future and is translated dwell on (Eccl. 5:20), consider (Lam. 1:9), and mention (Jer. 20:9). The psalmists frequently call on God to remember His people (106:4) or His mercy (25:6, 7). This does not imply that God has forgotten, but instead it is a request that God would take action according to His promises.

25:8 Good and upright is the LORD: In the midst of David’s plea for forgiveness, he praises God by speaking of two of God’s characteristics. God must be both good and upright. Because He is both, the Lord extends mercy to repentant believers and at the same time promises not to allow the guilty to go unpunished. God will bring justice to this fallen world.

25:9–14 Pardon my iniquity: David returns to the subject of his own sinfulness, summarizing vv. 4–7 as well as expressing his desire for the Lord to teach him. fear Him: Those who fear the Lord pay attention to His instructions and thus learn the secrets of God’s wisdom (111:10; Prov. 1:7; 3:32).

25:15–20 Let me not be ashamed is a reprise of the opening verses, with emphasis both on David’s enemies (v. 2) and on his continuing stance of waiting in expectant hope (v. 5).

25:21, 22 Redeem Israel: This concluding verse is outside the general acrostic pattern of the psalm. Here David petitions the Lord to be compassionate with the nation Israel just as He has been with David. The Lord was not only the personal Savior of David, but also the Savior of all the Israelites.

Psalm 26 is a psalm of lament in which there is a protest of innocence (Pss. 17; 35; 43; 69). The structure of the Psalm is as follows: (1) a prayer for vindication (vv. 1, 2); (2) an assertion of integrity (vv. 3–5); (3) a vow of praise (vv. 6–8); (4) a prayer for discrimination (vv. 9, 10); (5) an assertion of integrity (vv. 11, 12).

26:1, 2 The Hebrew word for vindicate usually means "to judge"; however, here it means "to declare righteous." my integrity: This is the prayer of a forgiven sinner who is living in the fear of God but whose life has been plagued by undeserved evil. My mind and my heart refer to the innermost person.

26:3–5 Your lovingkindness: The loyal love (13:5) of God is the recurring focus of the Book of Psalms. have not sat: As in the description of righteousness in 1:1, David declares that he has no part with men of wickedness or idolatry. Instead he has continually sought the Lord.

26:6–8 go about Your altar: The heart of this psalm is the desire to worship God in integrity. In this regard, the poem shares the spirit of Ps. 15. where Your glory dwells: The place where God chose to reveal His glory to His people. The priests interceded for the people with the required offerings. Today "the Most Holy Place" is in the presence of God, where our Savior pleads our case (Heb. 7:25).

26:9–11 Do not gather: On the basis of his protests of integrity (vv. 1, 2), David prays for divine discrimination (4:3). God distinguishes those who have responded to His grace from those who have not.

26:12 As always in the Psalms, praise is a public and vocal action that has its proper place in the congregations of believers.

Psalm 27, a psalm of trust (Ps. 23), begins with David's affirmation of the reality of God in his life. The poem presents a strong desire to live in the presence of God and points to the ongoing need for believers to continue to "wait" on the Lord. The psalm has six movements: (1) a determination not to fear enemies because of God's presence (vv. 1–3); (2) a desire to live in the presence of the Lord (vv. 4, 5); (3) an affirmation of praise in God (v. 6); (4) a prayer for God's continuing presence (vv. 7–10); (5) a prayer for continuing trust in the midst of a life of stress (vv. 11–13); (6) a word of instruction (v. 14).

27:1–3 Light indicates deliverance from darkness (Gen. 1:3), which is a biblical symbol of evil. The word salvation combined with the word light means "saving light" (3:8). to eat up my flesh: David pictures his enemies as ravenous beasts who would shred his flesh (10:8–10; 22:12–16).

27:4, 5 The phrase dwell in the house of the LORD expresses David's desire to be always nearer to God's presence. The beauty of the LORD speaks of God's "pleasant nature." The name Naomi in the Book of Ruth is related to the Hebrew word for beauty.

27:6 Sacrifices of joy are praise offerings the believers bring to God to celebrate the blessings He gives them (Heb. 13:15).

27:7–13 Throughout this psalm, seeking the presence of God (His face) was the psalmist's highest purpose. Enemies might dissuade the righteous from seeking the presence of the Lord. But the psalmist wants to know God's presence in this life—in the land of the living.

27:14 To wait on the LORD is to demonstrate confident expectation. The Hebrew word for wait may also be translated "hope." To hope in God is to wait for His timing and His action (40:1; Is. 40:31).

Psalm 28, a psalm of lament, is attributed to David. The psalm includes a prayer against David's enemies and a royal invocation of praise to the Lord. The psalm has four movements: (1) an appeal to God that He not be silent (vv. 1, 2); (2) a petition to be distinguished from the wicked and their deserved punishment (vv. 3–5); (3) a blessing of the Lord for His work in the psalmist's life (vv. 6, 7); (4) praise for the Lord who delivers His anointed and His people (vv. 8, 9).

28:1, 2 my Rock: For further references to God as a fortress and refuge, see 91:1, 2. Do not be silent: One of the ways David senses the distance of God is His "silence" (13:1; 22:1). David might be referring merely to his lack of a sense of intimacy with God (27:4, 5), but it is also possible that he is awaiting a specific word from the Lord through a prophet or a priest. The pit is one of the terms for death in the Psalms (9:17, 18; 16:10; 143:7). As in 6:5, David asks to be rescued from death so that he might live to praise God. lift up my hands: One of the standard postures for prayer in the Bible (134:2).

28:3–5 Do not take me away: Again, the psalmist is asking to be delivered from death (6:5). according to their deeds: David pronounces his curse on the wicked, from whom he wishes to be distinguished (4:3). they do not regard: The language here is similar to that of Paul in Rom. 1:18–32. One day even the wicked will have to acknowledge God as their Creator and give Him the glory He deserves.

28:6, 7 Blessed be the LORD: See 103:1, 2 for a development of this theme. Because the plea of the psalmist has been heard, the last section of the poem is a hymn of praise (138:1).

28:8, 9 The term His anointed acknowledges God's covenant with David, His promise that He would be David's God and David would be His representative. This passage became a heritage of the monarchy, a treasure for each godly king in the Davidic line to go back to for strength and encouragement. Shepherd them: As in Pss. 23; 80, the comparison of God with a shepherd is an image of the loving care of a great king (Eccl. 12:11). This image also foreshadows Jesus, the coming King and the Good Shepherd (John 10:11).

Psalm 29 is a worship psalm (Ps. 15). But it is also a royal psalm that uses striking language to assert the sovereign reign of the Almighty. David has taken over some of the vocabulary and poetic style of the Canaanites and used it to praise the living God. As in the case of Ps. 93, the result is both a debunking of Baal and an unusual way of praising the true God of Israel. The psalm has three movements: (1) a call to the angels and all people to acknowledge the supremacy of God (vv. 1, 2); (2) a description of the living God as Lord over storms (vv. 3–9); (3) a blessing from God, who is enthroned as King on high, to His people (vv. 10, 11).

To Crown the King

Psalm 29 is a coronation anthem composed for the enthronement of a king. Perhaps it was performed on formal occasions of state, much like "God Save the Queen" or "Hail to the Chief" today.

Like other royal psalms, such as Ps. 2, this one points beyond David, the earthly king, to the heavenly King, the Lord. He is seen sitting on His throne, from which He has ruled the world since before anyone can remember, and will until the end of time (Ps. 29:10–11).

29:1 Give here means "to ascribe." O you mighty ones means "O sons of gods." This Hebrew phrase refers to spiritual beings who are in the presence of God. We know these beings to be angels. The Hebrew words are similar to those of Job 1:6, which also describes the angels who are in the presence of God.

29:2 glory due to His name: The call is for the angelic hosts to acknowledge fully the wonder of God. The poets of the Bible delighted in taking the ideas of the Canaanites and then stripping them of their essentials. See the scathing attacks on idolatry in 115:4–8; Is. 41:21–29. Here the poet takes a treasured image of Canaanite thought—Baal with other gods bowing before him—and turns it inside out. It is not Baal, but the true God who is worshiped. He is worshiped not by gods who do not even exist, but by His own angels.

Even the sturdy cedars of Lebanon could not stand before the Lord's might and power, the psalmist declared (Ps. 29:3–7).

29:3, 4 The voice of the LORD: Both the language and the parallelism of this verse directly reflect Canaanite poetry. Baal was believed to be the god of the storm who thundered in the heavens. Here the sound of thunder is a symbol of the voice of God. The phrase "the voice of the Lord" occurs seven times in the passage (vv. 3–9), like rapidly succeeding peals of thunder.

29:5–9 cedars of Lebanon: There is a dramatic energy to these verses as they trace the movement of the storm from the north of Lebanon and Sirion, an ancient name for Mount Hermon (Deut. 3:9) to Kadesh in the south. Nothing stops the advance of the storm; its effects reach from sea to land, from north to south, from animals to trees. As at the beginning of the psalm, all the angels in the heavenly sanctuary acknowledge the surpassing glory of the omnipotent God.

29:10, 11 As Baal was supposed to have been victorious over the waters, here it is God who is the true victor over all. He even controls the waters at the height of their destructive power, the Flood. There is no one to oppose His glorious rule; He is King forever. The LORD will give strength: Since He is the true God, there is none other. Only He can empower His people.

Psalm 30, a psalm of declarative praise, commemorates a time when God delivered David from mortal illness. The psalm has five movements: (1) a determination to praise the Lord (v. 1); (2) a report of deliverance (vv. 2, 3); (3) a call for others to join in the praise of the Lord (vv. 4, 5); (4) a report of the psalmist's mortal illness (vv. 6–10); (5) a presentation of the psalmist's praise to the Lord (vv. 11, 12).

30:1 I will extol You: David begins his song with a strong determination to praise God.

30:2, 3 up from the grave: David is not reporting a resurrection, but a deliverance from a nearly fatal illness. As in 28:1, the psalmist describes death as a great pit into which a person drops into the enveloping darkness of the unknown.

30:4, 5 Possibly David judges his illness to be in some way related to God's anger. in the morning: For a sick person, nothing is so long as a painful, sleepless night; few things are as desired as the coming of morning (5:3; 130:6; 143:8).

30:6–10 As in 6:5, the psalmist pleads with God to save his life so that he can fulfill his promise to praise God in the worship of the community. The emphasis is on singing praise to God in this life. Helper can be translated "power" or "strength" (33:20). What a sick person needs is strength for recovery: God is that powerful force.

30:11, 12 mourning into dancing: The psalmist has been transformed and renewed because of God's blessing on his life. He boasts in God as he fulfills his vow of praise. My glory refers to the psalmist's inner being (16:9).

Psalm 31 is a psalm of lament, but it has such a strong element of trust that it can also be classified as a psalm of trust (Ps. 23, for example). The psalms of trust grow out of the confession of trust that occurs in the psalms of lament. In this psalm, the relationship between the two classifications is apparent. There are two major sections: (1) the presentation of lament in the context of trust (vv. 1–18); (2) the presentation of praise in the context of lament (vv. 19–24).

31:1–3 The phrase I put my trust pictures the action of a bird seeking refuge under its mother's wings (11:1; 17:7; 91:1–4). A different word for trust occurs in vv. 6, 14, which has the connotation of leaning on someone or something (Prov. 3:5, 6). The imagery of God as the rock and fortress for the believer recurs often in the Psalms (91:1–3).

31:4, 5 With the words into Your hand I commit my spirit, David expresses a complete dependence on God—his life is in God's hands to do with as He pleases. These words were spoken by Jesus on the Cross shortly before His death (Luke 23:46) and by Stephen before his death (Acts 7:59).

31:6–11 I am in trouble are classic words of lament and thus begin the lament section of this psalm. My eye wastes away: David uses similar language in 6:7 to express his sorrow. a reproach: As in the case of Ps. 30, it is possible that what faces the psalmist is a terrible illness—perhaps a physical condition that makes him repulsive to others.

31:12–18 With the words my times are in your hands, David reaffirms his earlier expression of complete dependence on the Lord (v. 5). David petitions the Lord, who is in complete control of his life, for deliverance. Your face shine: As in 4:6, this expression grows out of the words of the Aaronic benediction in Num. 6:24–26. It is a plea for God to "smile" in favor on David.

31:19–22 This verse begins the praise section of the psalm. David affirms that the delights of knowing God far outweigh any other kind of pleasure. the secret place: God makes His people safe in the intimacy of His friendship (27:5). I said in my haste: The psalmist says things in his pain that he would not say under normal circumstances.

IN CONTEXT

Walled Cities

David was thankful for the protection God gave him through a strong city (Ps. 31:21). We do not know which city David had in mind, but several mentioned in the OT were refuges for him.

For example, the powerful Philistine city of Gath became a hiding place for David when he was fleeing from Saul (1 Sam. 27:1–4). Later he was given the Philistine city of Ziklag to use as his headquarters (27:5–6; 1 Sam. 30:1). Following Saul's death, Jerusalem became David's capital after he captured the supposedly impregnable stronghold of Zion from the Jebusites. David strengthened the city's defenses, but was forced to flee during Absalom's rebellion (2 Sam. 15:14–18).

In the ancient world, walled cities were one of the few protections against marauding bands of raiders and the sudden invasions of foreign armies. David praised God for the safety and protection of a walled city. In a similar way, believers today can be grateful to God for the means of protection He affords them.

31:23, 24 David encourages the community to join him in praising God. Of all the sacrifices offered in the OT period, only the sacrifice of praise continues in NT worship (Heb. 13:15). All you who hope in the LORD is a characteristic term of piety in the Bible.

Psalm 32, a wisdom psalm, is also one of the great penitential psalms. It is generally believed that this psalm—like Ps. 51—has its origin in David's response to God following his infamous affair with Bathsheba (2 Sam. 11). It is one of the marks of the integrity of Scripture that the low points as well as the triumphs of its principal characters are described. The structure of this psalm is as follows: (1) a description of blessing (vv. 1, 2); (2) a report of David's agony before he confessed his sins (vv. 3–5); (3) a lesson to others based on David's experience with the Lord (vv. 6, 7); (4) an oracle from the Lord on righteous living (vv. 8, 9); (5) concluding praise to the Lord for His mercy (vv. 10, 11).

32:1 Blessed, the word that begins the Book of Psalms (1:1), means "to be happy." It is appropriate that this term is used of both the righteous person of the first psalm and the confessed sinner in this psalm. sin is covered: The poet describes God's dealing with sin in various ways. Sin can be taken away, the basic meaning of the word forgiven, and covered, the basic meaning of atonement.

32:2–5 I kept silent: The silence was a stubborn resistance to admitting guilt, a hope that in time the sin and its penalty would go away. The more David delayed his confession, the more he suffered. David realized it was not just his conscience or his feelings that were assaulting him, but the heavy hand of God (38:1, 6–8). No matter who else is hurt, the principal offense of any sin is always against the LORD. You forgave: The consequences of David's sin with Bathsheba remained despite God's forgiveness (2 Sam. 12:13–20). But at this point, the greater news was God's forgiveness. God had restored His relationship with David.

32:6 who is godly: On the basis of his own experience, David instructs the congregation. They too can experience forgiveness if they will come to the Lord in faith as David has.

32:7 The psalm has quick and dramatic shifts. After addressing the congregation, David speaks directly to God: You are my hiding place.

32:8, 9 I will instruct you: The speaker changes. The Lord "comes into the psalm" to instruct the people. He exhorts the people not to be like a horse that will not go where its rider wants it to go; it has to be disciplined because it is stubborn. God does not want to muzzle or bridle His people like a horse. He expects His servants to respond promptly to Him of their own accord.

32:10, 11 The psalmist resumes his song by contrasting the many sorrows of the wicked with the joy of the forgiven sinner. He then calls for all the righteous to join him in public praise of the wonder of God’s mercy.

Psalm 33, a psalm of descriptive praise, calls for all people to join Israel's faithful in praising God and waiting on (trusting in) the Lord. This is one of the few anonymous psalms in Book I (Pss. 1; 2; 10). The structure is as follows: (1) a call for the righteous to praise God, in view of His righteous acts in creation (vv. 1–7); (2) a call for the nations to praise God, in view of His sovereign work in creation (vv. 8–12); (3) a call for the people to praise God, in view of His care of creation (vv. 13–19); (4) a concluding affirmation of confidence in God (vv. 20–22).

33:1–3 God sees the praise from believers as beautiful (147:1). harp: Throughout the Psalms, many instruments are employed to praise the name of the Lord (98:5; 150:3–5). to Him: Praise is always directed to One who deserves all praise, the Lord Almighty.

33:4, 5 Although the world is filled with evil and with people who have no thought of God (Ps. 14), believers must look beyond the apparent confusion of the world to see God's goodness—the goodness that manifests itself every time the sun rises, a bird sings, and a mother lovingly embraces her child. Out of His goodness, God holds together the earth and provides for the sustenance of all people. One day God's goodness will prevail over all evil (98:2).

33:6, 7 The reference to God's control of the waters of the sea has a twofold origin (24:2; 93:3, 4). It grows out of the creation story in Gen. 1, in which God brings dry land from the waters and establishes His place for the waters that remain (Gen. 1:6–10). The idea also grows out of Canaanite religious ideas, for the Canaanites considered the seas as malevolent deities. But the Lord alone is God. No power—no matter how evil—is a threat to His control (Job 26:10; Prov. 8:28, 29).

33:8, 9 The Bible presents the fear of the Lord as a mark of reverence and awe on the part of those who recognize Him as Lord (40:3). He spoke: The account of creation in Gen. 1 describes God's word as the sole source of creation. This psalm emphasizes God's word as the controlling element in creation (vv. 4, 6). It was by God's "breath" (v. 6) that He made all things.

33:10–12 In contrast to the ineffective counsel of the nations, the counsel of God is wise counsel that lasts forever. Blessed means to be manifestly happy; the same word is used at the beginning of Ps. 1. Those who listen to God's counsel will be happy.

33:13–15 The LORD looks on humankind with a sense of discriminating pleasure. The emphasis of this section is not condemnation, but discrimination.

33:16, 17 army: People should not rely on physical strength or material resources to save them. Salvation belongs to the Lord (3:8), both for spiritual deliverance and for physical strength.

33:18, 19 eye of the LORD: This is a particularly warm image of God's care for His people. God watches all people, but He looks with delight on those who fear Him and hope in His mercy (147:11).

33:20–22 waits: To wait on God is to adopt a stance of resolute faith (40:1). Just as we hope: The psalm concludes with a phrase similar to "Amen." This is a "yes" to God's mercy, a statement of agreement with His provisions.

Psalm 34 is a wisdom psalm and a psalm of praise. It is written in the form of an acrostic, with one verse for each letter of the Hebrew alphabet. One verse appears to have dropped out at some point; there is no verse for the Hebrew letter waw, that would otherwise appear after v. 5. The title of the psalm ascribes it to David and specifies that it was written to commemorate his escape from Abimelech the king of Gath (1 Sam. 21:10–15). The name of the king in 1 Sam. 21 is Achish. It is believed that Abimelech was a throne name and Achish a personal name. The experience of David in the city of Gath (1 Sam. 21:10–15) must have been profoundly disturbing. David could easily have died in this Philistine city. He escaped by pretending to be insane. Afterward, the one who had appeared to be a "fool" wrote this psalm of wisdom and praise in honor of the Lord. The structure of the poem is as follows: (1) a call for the congregation to join the psalmist in praise (vv. 1–3); (2) a declaration concerning the psalmist's deliverance from trouble (vv. 4–7); (3) instruction about the fear of the Lord (vv. 8–14); (4) a declaration of praise to the Lord (vv. 15–22).

34:1–3 at all times: The determination of David to praise God is similar to the words of Paul in 1 Thess. 5:18. Exalt His name together is David's call for the congregation to join him in his praise of God.

34:4–7 He heard me is a classic statement of praise in the psalms. God is praised for the deliverance He provides in response to the prayers of His people (40:1). were radiant: Those who came to God in prayer as David did found themselves transformed; it was as if they also experienced what Moses had on Mount Sinai (Ex. 34:29; 2 Cor. 3:18). Poor man refers to the needy as well as the humble, whom the Lord delights to deliver (147:6). The phrase the angel of the LORD and the name of God are often interchanged. With the sense of God surrounding or hovering over the believer in this manner, there is no need to fear—even in the most desperate times.

34:8, 9 The center of biblical mission in the OT is found in the words taste and see. The task of Israel was to attract the nations to their God. For their faithfulness to Him, God had promised to bless them abundantly, and when the nations saw this blessing they would see that the living God was with them. In the midst of a world of gods who were not good at all, there was one living God, and He was altogether good (100:5). Fear is a call to awe, wonder, worship, and reverence (Prov. 1:7). To fear God is to respond to Him in piety and obedience.

34:10 People who live by their wits may eat as infrequently as young lions. shall not lack: As is true of 23:1, this is not a categorical statement. Time after time, however, the believer is able to attest to the ways God has met needs.

34:11–14 Come, you children: David took on the role of a wisdom teacher addressing the young people who are in his charge (Prov. 3:1–12). Depart from evil: The same sentiment is found in 37:27.

34:15, 16 In this context, the eyes of the LORD symbolize His care and protection.

34:17–19 the LORD hears: With slight variations, this is a reprise of v. 6. The LORD is near: When the Scriptures speak of God being near, it is to comfort the believer with a sense of His care.

34:20 guards all his bones: This verse, which speaks of the Lord's preservation of the righteous, notes that not a bone is broken. John 19:33–36 shows that the words of this verse were fulfilled in detail in the death of Jesus. Despite the terrible suffering the Savior endured, none of His bones were broken. When the Roman soldiers came to break Jesus' legs to hasten His death, they found that He had already died.

34:22 This verse is outside the acrostic pattern; it summarizes the psalm, giving appropriate praise to the Lord who saves those who put their faith in Him (1 Tim. 4:10).

Psalm 35 is a psalm of lament and a protest of innocence (Pss. 17; 26; 43; 69). Like Ps. 94, this poem by David places an unusual emphasis on the role of his enemies. Sometimes it is called an imprecatory psalm. The structure of the psalm is as follows: (1) an appeal to God the Warrior and Judge to plead the psalmist's cause (vv. 1–3); (2) a series of petitions for God to dishonor His enemies, deliver His servant, and glorify Himself (vv. 4–10); (3) a second series of petitions and promises (vv. 11–18); (4) a third series of petitions and promises (vv. 19–28).

35:1–3 Plead my cause is the classic protest of innocence (Pss. 17; 26; 43; 69). David has been wrongly attacked, so he prays that God will deliver him from these assaults (Ps. 94). stand up for my help: David is not afraid to ask God to take up arms like a soldier and fight for him. The psalmist does not shrink from asking the Lord to comfort him by saying the words I am your salvation. All these demands demonstrated David's complete dependence on the Lord.

35:4–9 David's first petition calls for shame on his enemies (v. 26). This is not just a call to embarrass them; it is a call for final judgment. In this instance, the angel of the LORD is a scourge (contrast 34:7). without cause: Here is the heart of David's position: he has not done anything to cause this evil attack upon himself.

God and the Poor

The God we worship is deeply concerned that the poor and needy receive justice, deliverance, and vindication (Ps. 35:10). These deserve to be high on the agenda for any nation or public servant seeking to honor God and receive divine blessing.

The psalms mention "the poor" more than twenty-five times, usually either in terms of what the wicked are doing to them or what God is doing for them. Thus, to be on the side of God is to take up the cause of the poor. Doing so rescues the perishing (35:17), silences unjust critics (35:19–25), and magnifies the Lord (35:18, 27–28)—assuming that the spirit behind one's efforts is a genuine concern for justice and righteousness.

35:10 These two verses are the first prayer of confidence in this psalm (vv. 17, 27). All my bones refers to the inner being, the total person. who is like You: There is nothing in all the universe to be compared with God.

35:11–17 The psalmist begins his second cycle of petition with reference to treacherous witnesses, like the false witnesses in the story of Jezebel and Naboth in 1 Kin. 21. The actions of these witnesses are even more shameful because they had received the help of the psalmist in their own times of need. they rejoiced: The ferocity of these witnesses is appalling. The psalmist finds that they are like animals in the way they treat him, rejoicing that troubles have come upon him.

35:18 give You thanks: This is the second of the vows of praise that follow each cycle of petition in this psalm (vv. 9, 10, 27, 28). The Hebrew word for thanks means "to make public acknowledgment," to praise God in the community (122:4; 136:1).

35:19–21 The enemies would rejoice if someone like David fell, who had trusted in the Lord. hate me without a cause: Again, David asserts his innocence (v. 7). The fact that he is hated for no cause is baffling and discouraging. The passage also predicts the suffering of the Savior Jesus (John 15:23–25). peace: Far more than simply an absence of war, the biblical peace has the idea of wholeness, things as they ought to be. Note that the contrasting opposite here is not war, but deceit. Aha, aha: These contemptuous sneers are similar to the assaults in 22:7.

35:22–25 You have seen: The wicked were not the only ones who have seen David's grave distress (v. 21); God has also seen his pain. Stir up Yourself: The people of Israel know that God, unlike the false gods (1 Kin. 18:27), never sleeps (121:4; Is. 40:28). Yet for David, it seems as though God is napping (44:23).

35:26–28 The phrase be ashamed refers not to simple embarrassment, but to the revelation of the complete emptiness of wickedness before the judgment seat of God (14:5; 31:17; 36:12). Who favor: Only here do we learn that David has defenders: those who are on his side will share his joy when he is saved.

Psalm 36 is a wisdom psalm that gives a revelation of the nature of sin and an exaltation of God's unfailing love (Pss. 14; 53). The structure is as follows: (1) a revelation of the nature of sin (vv. 1–4); (2) praises to God, centering on His loyal love (vv. 5–9); (3) a prayer for God to continue His loyal love to His people even in the context of His final judgment (vv. 10–12).

36:1–4 The term oracle was used by the prophets of the OT to mean a divine utterance. In Mic. 4:6 the same Hebrew word is translated "says the Lord." In this psalm, David "the prophet" (Acts 2:30) has received a prophetic revelation as striking as any among the sons of the prophets. He has received divine insight into the nature of wickedness. no fear of God: Underlying wickedness is a complete disregard for the reality of God in a person's life and in the world. The word translated fear in this psalm is the same word used for "terror" at the final judgment (14:5). flatters himself: With no sense of God or of final judgment, the wicked become egotistical. words of his mouth: The theme of the wicked mouth is developed in Ps. 12. ceased to be wise: The wisdom that the psalmist observes here is the practical outworking of the skill of sound living. Wickedness is crookedness and perversity.

36:5, 6 The contrast of these verses with the previous ones is extreme. Just as the revelation of depravity in vv. 1–4 is awful, the revelation of the Lord's love is even more wonderful. great mountains … great deep: The contrasts continue with David ranging from the highest mountains to the depths of the sea to describe the perfect character of God. The height of the great mountains can be compared to how great God's righteousness is; the depth of the seas can be compared with how mysterious and inaccessible God's true judgments are. The word deep is also used in Gen. 1:2.

36:7–9 their trust: Because of God's nature, righteous men and women come to Him like nestlings seeking shelter under the wings of the mother bird (7:1; 11:1; 16:1; 31:1). Although the wicked are never satisfied (Prov. 27:20), the one who trusts in the Lord can find ample satisfaction. fountain of life: God's salvation and continuing mercy to His people are often described in terms of life-giving water (Is. 12:3; Jer. 2:13).

36:10–12 continue: On the basis of two of the revelations this psalm presents—the nature of the wicked (vv. 1–4) and the nature of God's loyal love (vv. 5–9)—David prays that God's loyal love will continue in the lives of His people. There the workers of iniquity have fallen: This is the third revelation in this psalm. David is given a glimpse of the horror of divine judgment on the wicked. In effect, the psalmist “sees” the judgment scene and shudders.

Psalm 37 is a wisdom psalm written as an acrostic. Its simple message is to maintain patience in the midst of troubles. God's people can have such patience because they know that their eternal reward will abundantly surpass any temporal troubles. The structure of the poem is as follows: (1) the need for patience in light of the apparent success of the wicked (vv. 1–11); (2) the need for patience in light of the final judgment of the wicked (vv. 12–22); (3) encouragement for the righteous in view of the role of the wicked (vv. 23–33); (4) a renewed call for patience in view of the apparent success of the wicked (vv. 34–40).

37:1–4 Do not fret is the theme of this psalm. When the wicked seem to prosper, the psalmist calls for patience, a renewed sense of dependence on the Lord, and a new sense of pleasure in knowing Him. the desires of your heart: When the righteous have desires that spring from the Lord, the Lord will surely fulfill those desires.

37:5, 6 To commit your way means "to roll it over on" the Lord. What a splendid picture of trusting in Him.

37:7, 8 Rest … wait patiently: These commands reemphasize the major point of the psalm, "do not fret" (v. 1). This is not a call to be inactive, but to depend actively on the living Lord. The psalm gives us a commandment to cease from worry.

37:9–12 The wicked sometimes appear to prosper; but constantly throughout this psalm the writer reminds his listeners that they will be cut off. yet a little while: From God's vantage point, the flourishing of the wicked is short (Eccl. 3:16, 17). the meek shall inherit the earth: Jesus quoted these words in Matt. 5:5, confirming the OT and showing the importance of the Psalms in His life.

37:13–17 The LORD laughs: These words recall the scornful laughter in 2:4. What sheer horror for the wicked to hear God's laughter directed against them! Contrast this laughter with the delight that the Lord finds in the ways of the righteous (v. 23).

37:18–20 The phrase the LORD knows the days of the upright has several meanings: (1) God knows our circumstances and provides for us; (2) God knows how long we will live and will sustain us to the end (90:12); (3) God knows that our days on earth are only the beginning of our days with Him in eternity.

37:21–23 the righteous shows mercy: There are many contrasts between the wicked and the righteous in the wisdom psalms; this one is based on contrasting attitudes toward possessions (15:5; 112:5). Of all the things on earth that God has created, only one will last—people. All material things will pass away (2 Pet. 3:10–12).

37:24 upholds him: The righteous know that when they fall, they are never left lying there; when they stumble, they are never completely forsaken.

37:25 begging bread: These words may be viewed from two perspectives: (1) The hunger of the righteous is temporary and will be replaced by fullness in the days to come; and (2) there is a hunger that the righteous never need to suffer: they are never deprived of the Lord's presence (John 6:35). Perhaps this is also a call to help the righteous when they do suffer hunger in this world.

37:26–29 The same command to depart from evil is found in 34:14. In this life people must choose either to cling to God and righteousness, or to pursue evil. The way of God leads to everlasting life. the LORD loves justice: Because God stands opposed to injustice, to support injustice is to become His enemy. God's people ought to love the things that He loves and detest the things that He hates.

37:30, 31 in his heart: At numerous places in the Psalms, the poet declares his love for God's Law and his effort to make it integral to his life (1:2; 19:7–11; 119:1–176).

37:32–35 To wait on the LORD is an act of faith; not to wait on Him is foolishness. like a native green tree: David admits that the wicked might prosper, but he also affirms that they will not enjoy success forever.

37:36, 37 In this context peace suggests "everything as it ought to be." The destiny of the righteous is in sharp contrast to the fate of the wicked (1:4–6).

37:38–40 salvation: The principal issue here is not regeneration but sanctification—the daily deliverance of God's people from temptation and evil. they trust: The psalm concludes with the trusting God, like chicks running to the wings of their mother (17:8; 36:7).

Psalm 38 is a psalm of lament, specifically a penitential psalm. In it, David pleads earnestly for the mercy of God even when he senses God's discipline. All believers face times of distress, some of them the result of sin. The psalms of penitence are a model for our own prayers of confession and a warning against the type of behavior that will lead to God's correction. The structure of the Psalm is as follows: (1) a plea to God to stop rebuking (vv. 1–5); (2) a description of David's suffering (vv. 6–8); (3) a second plea based on the actions of David's friends and foes (vv. 9–12); (4) a commitment by David to trust solely in the Lord even in the time of His anger (vv. 13–16); (5) a third plea for deliverance based on David's weakening condition (vv. 17–20); (6) a concluding plea based on David's certainty that there is salvation in the Lord alone (vv. 21, 22).

Reacting to Suffering

David saw his family torn apart by choices he had made (Ps. 38:11–12), even as his body was ravaged by sickness, possibly an acute skin disease (38:3, 5, 7). Yet however serious his physical problems may have been, they were overshadowed by the pain of his troubled heart (38:8, 10). Worst of all, he was unable to communicate his true thoughts and feelings (38:13–14).

Have sin and its consequences created distance between the members of your family? Has someone been abandoned to suffering because of anger or disapproval by the others? Psalm 38 offers several insights for redeeming the situation.

First, the psalmist who cries out is willing to confess his own sin and foolishness (38:3–5, 18). This is crucial in cases where someone's sickness or suffering is the result of sin. That sin needs to be acknowledged, confessed, and repented of (compare James 5:13–16).

But the psalm offers hope in the certainty that God sees and hears, even if family members cannot or will not (38:15). This hope in the Lord is available not only to the sufferer, but to innocent bystanders as well, such as parents, spouses, or children. By trusting in God's goodness, they can see themselves no longer as victims but as victors.

Finally, Psalm 38 challenges all of us not to abandon anyone to silent suffering in sin and sickness. The psalm may express David's predicament, but it also reminds us of the plight of everyone who has ever been brought low by their own foolishness. Rather than stand aloof from someone with the attitude, "You made your bed; now lie in it," we can draw near with understanding and compassion. Psalm 38 can help us respond to the plea of a lonely sinner, "Remember me."

38:1–5 As in 6:1, David has two concerns. His first concern is the painful distress he feels during the time of God's discipline on his life (32:4). David's second concern is that God might be placing His heavy hand on him in wrath, as He does on the wicked (37:22). my iniquities have gone over my head: David uses expressive language to describe his loss of control: he cannot free himself from the burden of sin (69:5). This is similar to Paul speaking of himself as the “chief” of sinners (1 Tim. 1:15).

38:6 I am troubled: David feels he is carrying an immense load. In this case, the heavy load is guilt.

38:7–12 light of my eyes: As in 13:3, David complains that he is about to lose his vision: probably he means that an oppression like death seems about to overcome him. My loved ones: David expresses sorrow because even those closest to him are leaving him. See Job’s similar experience in Job 2:9, 10.

38:13–17 David is determined, even in the gravest suffering, not to present an opportunity for his enemies to condemn the name of the Lord. In this, David’s silence foreshadows the silence of the Savior Jesus before His accusers (Mark 14:61).

(Heb. yachal) (38:15; 130:5, 7; 131:3; Lam. 3:21–24) Strong’s #3176: This Hebrew word signifies “to wait with expectation.” Almost half of its occurrences are in the Psalms, and it is especially frequent in Ps. 119. Sometimes the idea of hope is expressed with confidence (Job 13:15; Is. 51:5), and sometimes hope is clearly in vain (Ezek. 13:6). The Bible describes Noah as waiting for seven days to send out the dove (Gen. 8:12) and men as waiting to hear the counsel of Job (Job 29:21); but by far the main object of “expectant waiting” or “hope” is God, His word, His judgment, and His mercy (33:18; 119:43; Mic. 7:7). That hope is not misplaced, for the One in whom we hope is completely faithful to His promises (Heb. 10:23).

38:18–20 I will declare: David’s silence is only before his enemies (vv. 13–16); to the Lord he willingly confesses his sins. He expects that the merciful God will forgive and restore him (Ps. 32).

38:21, 22 be not far from me: These words echo the sentiment of 22:1. All that is left for David is to trust in God. In that sense, David was in the right place, for confidence in any person or thing other than God Himself is misplaced trust.

Psalm 39 is a wisdom psalm in the form of a psalm of individual lament. The title indicates that this is a psalm of David composed for Jeduthun. Psalm 39 is unusual in many respects. It speaks of a determination to be silent against foes, whereas most psalms speak boldly against enemies. Moreover, it ends with a request that God leave the psalmist alone, a stance that is remarkably like sections of the Book of Job. The structure of the poem is in four movements: (1) a determination by the psalmist to be silent before his foes (vv. 1–3); (2) a petition to God for help in view of the brevity of life (vv. 4–6); (3) a petition for forgiveness and deliverance (vv. 7–11); (4) a petition for God to leave him alone (vv. 12, 13).

39:1 will restrain my mouth: David determines to be silent in suffering so that he will not speak out foolishly. See 32:3 for another reason to be silent.

39:2–5 Make me to know my end is an appeal to God to deliver the psalmist before his life passes him by (90:7–12). Vapor refers to something that passes quickly, not something that has no meaning.

39:6–8 My hope is in You: David knows that his only chance of deliverance is in God. But he also believes that his trouble has come from God. He is in a quandary. Should he ask for God's help or should he ask God to leave him alone? Unlike most of the psalms of lament, there is noticeable difficulty in moving into a posture of praise. my transgressions: David acknowledges his sin and throws himself on the mercy of the Lord (Ps. 32).

39:9–13 Hear my prayer: David has been silent for a period of his distress (vv. 2, 9) but can remain silent no longer. Here he cries for God not to be silent, but to deliver him. Remove Your gaze: If God is not going to deliver him, the despondent psalmist asks God to just leave him alone. It is rare outside the Book of Job to find language such as this (Job 7:19; 10:20, 21; 14:6). Sometimes the pain of the psalmist was so far from being resolved at the time when he composed his poem that he remained on the edge of despair to the last verse. Yet the fact that God saves those who call upon Him is described again and again in the Book of Psalms (22:21; 118:21)

Psalm 40 is a psalm of declarative praise that moves into a psalm of lament. This psalm is a remarkable example of how troubles and difficulties forced David to depend continually on the Lord. The structure of the psalm is as follows: (1) a report of deliverance (vv. 1–3); (2) instruction to the people to commit their lives to the Lord (vv. 4, 5); (3) a confession about worship (vv. 6–8); (4) a report to God of the fulfillment of the vow of praise (vv. 9, 10); (5) a renewed lament (vv. 11, 12); (6) a set of petitions for deliverance (vv. 13–15); (7) continuing praise in the midst of trouble (vv. 16, 17).

40:1 The Hebrew translated I waited patiently is literally "waiting I waited." The emphasis of this phrase is not really on patience, but on the fact that David waited solely on the Lord. The verb "to wait" expresses a confident trust or faith in the Lord (130:5). David knows that salvation comes only from the Almighty (3:8). The words He inclined to me present the image of the Creator of the universe, the King of heaven, stooping from His throne to save the helpless.

40:2, 3 horrible pit: David writes this poem during a period of terrible stress; he feels as if he is stuck in a pit or swamp. No matter how hard he tries, he cannot get out. But David turns his frustration over to the Lord and trusts in His strength. a new song: The Lord's salvation prompts David to praise God. The music is new because God's salvation is fresh and new to David.

40:4, 5 The proud refers to idolaters who will not bow in humility before the Lord (147:6). Lies refers to idols. Not only are the works of God directed toward the people of faith, but so are His thoughts. He is thinking about us.

40:6 The Lord takes pleasure in those who obediently come to Him with praise on their lips (1 Sam. 15:22, 23). My ears You have opened: The Lord not only gives us ears to hear His word, but also grants us understanding so that we can truly obey Him.

40:7, 8 Behold, I come: David brings his sacrifice, but his focus is on presenting his own life to the Lord (Rom. 12:1, 2). According to the Book of Hebrews, Jesus spoke these words to the Father (Heb. 10:4–6). Delight is related to the word desire in v. 6. What brings pleasure to God will also bring delight to His people.

40:10–12 Do not withhold: Even after the experience of deliverance with which the psalm begins, David has another reason to turn to the Lord in renewed prayer. The Hebrew for your tender mercies (which can also mean “womb”) refers to God’s affection for us. In effect, David is asking the Lord to surround him with warmth and comfort that is practically maternal.

40:13–15 deliver me: David does not ask for forgiveness of sin here (contrast 51:3, 4), but for deliverance from powerful enemies. Aha, aha: David’s enemies are all around him, taunting him mercilessly (35:21).

40:16, 17 The LORD be magnified: With these great words of praise, David encourages others in the community to glorify the Lord (35:27). poor and needy: The psalmist is still in trouble, pleading with God to deliver him anew.

Psalm 41 is a lament psalm. Since it begins and concludes with words of praise to God, it may also be called a psalm of praise. The poem is ascribed to David and speaks of the plight of a person suffering from serious physical illness. Ultimately, it presents the victory of the Savior Jesus over His enemies, especially the great enemy Satan. There are four movements in the psalm: (1) an affirmation of confidence in the Lord's power to deliver the godly from distress (vv. 1–3); (2) a description of David's distress (vv. 4–9); (3) a renewed expression of hope in the Lord (vv. 10–12); (4) a coda of praise marking the end of Book I of the Psalms (v. 13).

41:1 Blessed is the same word that begins Ps. 1. The same word introduces the first and last psalms of Book I (see Introduction). When the verb blessed is used with God as its object (as in v. 13), it serves as a word of praise (103:1, 2). To bless God is to identify Him as the source of our blessings. The poor refers not only to those who do not have enough money, but also to those who suffer illness or misfortune through no fault of their own. For such persons, God is Defender, Deliverer, and Sustainer (10:2, 9; 35:10; 69:33; 109:16; 140:12).

41:2, 3 Blessed on the earth refers to the acts of God's goodness in a person's life, including health, wealth, longevity, spiritual vitality, and harmony with God and people (Prov. 3:1–4). bed of illness: The distress in this psalm is the psalmist's serious physical illness.

41:4 for I have sinned: In the context of the psalm, this is a general acknowledgment of sin and the need for God's forgiveness and restoration (1 John 1:9).

41:5–8 At times, the psalmist's enemies are indicated (3:1), but more often these enemies are left unspecified in the psalms, allowing others to think in terms of their own situations. his name perish: In ancient cultures, for a person not to be remembered was like saying that he or she had never existed. The righteous in Israel hoped that their names would endure after them, that they would have a "great name" (Gen. 12:2). he speaks lies: David charges his enemies with visiting his sickbed on the pretext of mercy but with malice in their hearts.

41:9 Familiar friend describes a close, intimate relationship. The outrage of betrayal by one so close is nearly unbearable (Matt. 26:14–16). The fulfillment of this verse in the experience of Jesus and Judas is remarkable. Not only did the two eat a meal together (Matt. 26:21–25; Mark 14:18–21; Luke 22:21), but Jesus also called Judas a “friend” at the moment of betrayal (Matt. 26:50). Moreover Jesus quoted this verse, noting its fulfillment in Judas (John 13:18).

41:10–12 Raise me up was David’s prayer for healing from the disease that had him bedridden (v. 3). In another sense, these words look forward to Jesus’ resurrection (16:10, 11; 118:17, 18). does not triumph: The failure of David’s enemy to destroy his life was an indicator of God’s pleasure in David’s life. my integrity: These words suggest that it is the righteous person who is suffering in this psalm, not an unrepentant sinner (26:1). before Your face forever: David prays not only for a long life on earth (v. 2), but also for eternal life in God’s presence (23:6). His ultimate hope is to glorify and praise God in His presence forever.

41:13 Blessed: This psalm begins with a blessing of God on the righteous; it ends with the righteous blessing their Lord. The word here for blessed is different from the word in v. 1. Here the word identifies the Lord as the source of our blessing. The word Amen, meaning “surely” and “let it be,” is an affirmation of faith in God. It is simply saying “yes” to God. The repetition of the word parallels the repetition of the word everlasting and expresses enthusiastic agreement with the praise in the psalm.

Psalm 42 and Ps. 43 were probably originally one poem, like Pss. 9; 10. Note that Ps. 43 does not have a superscription and that 43:5 repeats the refrain of 42:5, 11. Apparently a longer psalm was divided into two sections for use in temple worship. As an independent poem, Ps. 42 is an individual lament with a strong emphasis on trust (Ps. 23). The psalm's two movements both conclude with a refrain of encouragement to hope in God (vv. 5, 11), even though the psalmist was in exile far from the temple. The psalm is attributed to the sons of Korah, a musical family in Israel. They descended from the priest who had led an abortive rebellion against the leadership of Moses and Aaron (Num. 16). God's judgment came upon Korah and his companions, but Korah's family continued for hundreds of years to be some of the premier leaders of worship music in Israel. The structure of the poem is as follows: (1) a description of the psalmist's longing for God's presence (vv. 1–4); (2) a description of the psalmist's fear that God might no longer remember him (vv. 5–11).

From Rebels to Praise Singers

The sons of Korah (Ps. 42, title) had an infamous past on which to look back. Their ancestor Korah, of the tribe of Levi, led at least 250 of Israel's most important leaders in one of the worst rebellions against Moses and the Lord during the Exodus. God severely judged Korah's coalition by causing the earth to split open and swallow them and their possessions (Num. 16).

However, Korah's family survived (26:11), and years later his descendants were among the Levites appointed by David to oversee music in the worship of the Lord (1 Chr. 6:37). Their responsibilities included composing, arranging, and performing, and in this connection eleven of the psalms bear the heading, "of the sons of Korah."

The sons of Korah illustrate how a tragic legacy can be overcome. It need not determine the destiny of a family. By honoring the Lord, Korah's descendants became known, not for their ancestor's rebellion, but for their musical responsibilities.

42:1–4 pant: The verb "to pant" is unusually expressive of a spiritual thirst for God. The poet describes his experience of being cut off from the worshiping community. He feels distant from God's presence among His people and he longs for intimacy with God (v. 4). For the believer who lived during OT times, there was only one place where the true worship of the Lord was possible—the temple in Jerusalem. go with the multitude: The psalmist was consumed with thoughts of the worship of God that he had experienced at the temple in Jerusalem among throngs of joyful believers (Ps. 100). Generally the focus of worship in the Book of Psalms is on the community worshiping together (compare Acts 2:40–47; Heb. 13:15, 16).

42:5 Why are you cast down: These words are repeated in v. 11 and 43:5. The psalmist reminds himself that one day he will experience anew the presence of God. In the end, his hope in the Lord will not be misplaced. praise Him: As is common in the Psalms, the poet is not describing an act of private devotion, but of public praise of the goodness of God. This is praise in words and songs that would be repeated in the midst of the congregation (22:22; Eph. 5:19; Heb. 13:15).

42:6 The land of the Jordan and the heights of Hermon refer to the Promised Land, from which the people were exiled.

42:7–11 Why have You forgotten me: The psalmist asks these troubling questions in faith, for he remembers that God is his Rock, his protector and foundation. He cannot help but hope in Him in the middle of difficult circumstances.

Psalm 43 is a continuation of Ps. 42. The original poem was separated into the two psalms we have today so they could more easily be used for worship in the temple. As it stands, Ps. 43 shares features of a psalm of lament and a psalm of trust. The structure of the poem is as follows: (1) a call for vindication from the Lord (vv. 1, 2); (2) a prayer for the psalmist's return to the temple to worship God (vv. 3, 4); (3) a renewed call for hope in God (v. 5).

43:1, 2 Vindicate me is a protest of innocence (Pss. 17; 26; 35). The psalmist takes the stance of one wrongfully attacked. Why do You cast me off: More hurtful than the words of the psalmist's enemies is the sense that God has rejected him (Ps. 13).

43:3, 4 Your light and Your truth: The psalmist asks God for deliverance. See 104:2 for the significance of light; see 100:5 for the significance of truth. Only the "true light" of God could save the psalmist from the lies and darkness all about him. Your tabernacle: More than anything else the psalmist desires to rejoin the worshiping community in praising God (149:1).

43:5 Why are you cast down: These words are the refrain of this and the previous psalm (42:5, 11). In time of doubt and stress, the poet urges his inner being, by the power of God, to keep believing. He knows that one day, by God's grace, he will return to the place of praise to God, the center of worship in Jerusalem.

Psalm 44 is a lament of the community, a collective sigh of the people of Israel for God to help them in a time of great national stress. The psalm also presents an occasion for a rehearsal of God's great deeds in the Exodus, the major saving action of the Lord in the OT period (Ps. 105). This psalm is attributed to the sons of Korah, the descendants of the rebellious priest mentioned in Num. 16. The structure of the poem is as follows: (1) a rehearsal of God's deliverance of Israel in the past (vv. 1–3); (2) a statement of confidence in God the great King (vv. 4–8); (3) a lament of the people (vv. 9–12); (4) a protest of innocence of the people (vv. 13–22); (5) a petition of the people (vv. 23–26).

44:1–3 heard with our ears: God's marvelous intervention in history to deliver the Israelites from Egypt was the cornerstone of OT faith (17:7; 118:16; Ex. 15:6). Each generation of Israelites was obligated to tell the next generation about what God had done for them. The story that they told was not merely a national history, but also a description of the loving character of God (Deut. 8). Your right hand became a slogan of redemption in Israel. You favored them: The selection of Israel as the people of God came by His grace alone (4:3; Rom. 11).

44:4, 5 my King: In this community lament, it is striking that here the speaker is singular. It may be that these words are spoken by Israel's king to the King of glory. As the king of the nation, it was appropriate for him to lead the people in asking for God's renewed favor. through Your name: The king affirms that victory will be won only by God's Spirit.

44:6–12 The words cast us off begin the lament section of the psalm. The army of Israel was not to be regarded as merely a group of warriors—they were the warriors of the Almighty (Ps. 144). Their victories were the victories of God and their defeats were losses that He allowed them to endure. You sell Your people: When the people suffered loss, it was as though God had "sold" them. But God's deliverance of them from suffering is depicted as His purchase of His people—the meaning of the word redemption (v. 26).

44:13–20 we have not forgotten: The people protest that they have not rejected God. The implication is that their troubles would be deserved if they had rejected him. Stretched out our hands refers to a posture of prayer (Ps. 134). They protest that they have not prayed to the idols of the nations, but have been faithful to the only living God.

44:21, 22 as sheep: These words predict another beloved Son of the Most High who would also feel cast off by the Lord (Is. 53:7; Rom. 8:36).

44:23–26 Israel's God does not sleep (121:3, 4; Is. 40:28). The cry to awake is an appeal for God to act on behalf of His people. The cry is based on the people's faith that the Lord will forgive. redeem us: In v. 12, the people suggested that God had sold them; here they ask Him to redeem them—to buy them back for Himself.

Psalm 45 is a royal psalm—a royal wedding song that celebrates human marriage in such a grand manner that the NT writers applied it to the great King Jesus as well (compare vv. 6, 7 with Heb. 1:8, 9). Like many other psalms, this one not only portrays the joy of human marriage, but also describes prophetically the glorious reign of Jesus (Pss. 2; 22; 69). This psalm was composed by the sons of Korah. The structure is as follows: (1) introduction of the "good theme" (v. 1); (2) wedding wishes for the great king (vv. 2–9); (3) wedding wishes for the beautiful bride (vv. 10–15); (4) concluding blessings on the king (vv. 16, 17).

45:1–5 You are fairer: This poem's cultural setting is the opulence of an ancient eastern royal court. The profuse description of the royal groom would be appropriate in that culture. O Mighty One: In the ancient Middle East the king was supposed to be a great warrior. The model in Israel was David, the celebrated champion who defeated the giant Goliath (1 Sam. 17). The term Mighty One is also a messianic title. Your glory and Your majesty can be rephrased as "Your majestic glory." right hand: The victories of the king's hand would be awesome, a symbol pointing back to Exodus and forward to the works of the Savior Jesus.

45:6–9 The words Your throne indicate the messianic direction of the psalm. Here the King is addressed as God, yet it is "God, Your God" who anointed Him. Thus these verses describe the interaction of the Father and the Son, for both are called "God." The writer of Hebrews used these verses to assert Jesus' deity (Heb. 1:8, 9). anointed You: Anointing set aside a particular person for special service to God. In OT times, those who were anointed for special service foreshadowed the Anointed One, the meaning of Messiah and Christ. As symbols appropriate for divine service, the garments of a priest or king had to be clean and luxurious. The king was surrounded by radiant women; his bride the queen was resplendent in her precious golden garments. This is a portrait of heaven, with God as King and the church as His radiant bride (Rev. 19:1–). Ophir, possibly located in southern Arabia or on the east coast of Africa (2 Chr. 8:17, 18), was known in the OT world as a source of fine gold.

45:10–17 O daughter: The beautiful bride forsakes her own family and relationships as she becomes part of the family of her king and husband. worship Him: The bride is to give homage and worship to the great King. robes of many colors: In the ancient world, the beauty of the bride's gowns might be an expression of her family’s wealth, their pride in her, and their love for her.

Psalm 46 as a psalm of trust (see Ps. 23) rejoices in the deliverance that the Lord gives His people in the midst of a fearsome battle or siege. There is reason to believe that Pss. 46—48 form a trilogy that focuses on God's special love for Jerusalem. Psalm 46 was Martin Luther's basis for the Reformation hymn "A Mighty Fortress Is Our God." The poem has three movements, each indicated by the closing word Selah, a musical notation perhaps indicating a musical interlude (vv. 3, 7, 11). The psalm is also called "A Song for Alamoth," a word that may refer to soprano voices. The structure of the psalm is as follows: (1) a celebration of God as our defense even though the earth is moved (vv. 1–3); (2) a celebration of God as our defense even though the nations rage (vv. 4–7); (3) a celebration of God as our defense even when the Lord brings His judgment (vv. 8–11).

46:1 Our refuge and strength may be rephrased "our impenetrable defense." The psalms regularly use imagery of a fortress to describe God. In the ancient Middle East, cities were built on heights with high walls for defense. Yet there was no city and no defensive structure that was impenetrable. However, the psalmist describes here the One who is a sure defense.

46:2, 3 earth be removed: The wording of vv. 2, 3 moves the action to a cosmic level. What if the struggle were not just an ordinary war with ordinary weapons? What if the war involved even shaking the mountains and causing the seas to roar? It makes no difference. God is a refuge for His people against everything actual or imagined.

IN CONTEXT

Tunnel of Gladness

The "river whose streams shall make glad the city of God" (Ps. 46:4) may allude to the tunnel that King Hezekiah built to guarantee a continuous water supply for Jerusalem in times of war (2 Chr. 32:30). The tunnel carried water from the Gihon spring outside the city to a cistern inside the walls. So when invading armies besieged Jerusalem, the unstoppable stream of water made the whole city glad.

Likewise, God makes His people glad through His continuous presence. His protection flows like a river out of His lasting commitment to those who honor Him.

46:4, 5 God is in the midst of her: The people do not have an absentee deliverer, a defense that is only sometimes present. The Lord lives with His people. Consequently, His protection can be counted on.

46:6, 7 The LORD of hosts is with us: These words form a refrain (v. 11). The pairing of the words "the Lord of hosts" with "the God of Jacob" is notable in both this verse and v. 11. This refrain praises the Almighty, the Commander of heaven's armies, for choosing to live with the descendants of Jacob, His people. Who could protect His people better? See 9:9; 48:3 for other uses of the word refuge.

46:8–11 desolations: The picture here is of final judgment (Pss. 1; 110). Be still: The call for stillness before the Lord is not a preparation for worship, but for impending judgment (Hab. 2:20; Zeph. 1:7; Zech. 2:13). God will be exalted. All the earth will bow before Him.

Psalm 47, a royal psalm attributed to the sons of Korah, presents the grand ascent of the King of kings to His throne. The psalm also presents the joy of the people over the fact that the great King's rule means the end of all inequity, warfare, and trouble (Is. 11:3–5). The poets of Scripture knew that God is King as Creator of the world (Ps. 93), that He is King of His people because He is their Savior (Ps. 99), and that He is the coming King in the prophetic future. This last is the focus of Ps. 47. The structure of the poem is as follows: (1) a call to shout in triumph at the coming of the King (vv. 1–4); (2) a call to shout in triumph at the enthronement of the King (v. 5–7); (3) a call to rejoice in the rule of the King (vv. 8, 9).

47:1–3 clap your hands: There are many ways in which the people of God express their joy in Him; one is the clapping of hands in joyful adoration. all you peoples: It is principally the people of God who will praise the great King; but the call for the nations was always a part of the larger picture in the theology of the psalms (Pss. 67; 117). the LORD Most High: The divine name usually translated "the LORD" is buttressed by the term Most High, which speaks of God's power over all nations (7:17; 77:10; 78:17, 35, 56; 82:6; 107:11; Deut. 32:8). Awesome is related to the word for "fear" and suggests reverence for Almighty God (147:11). Great King is the key phrase of this psalm. All kings have derived authority; only one King, the great God of heaven, is absolute in power and righteousness. He will subdue: The promise of the eventual victory of God's people under the leadership of their great King is a basic focus in the Bible (Pss. 2; 110; 1 Cor. 15:24–28). The outcome of the final battle was determined long ago by God.

47:4 The words whom He loves are perhaps the most significant contribution of this poem to our understanding of God's purposes. To love means "to make one's choice in." God had chosen the Israelites to be His holy people and in that way He loved them. In his dialogue with Nicodemus, Jesus explained that God's love extended to all the nations as well as to Israel (John 3:16).

47:5–7 God has gone up: This psalm speaks of an anticipated enthronement of God. As He seats Himself on the throne, all who see Him in heaven and earth shout aloud in triumph. Sing praises: The repetition of this command in vv. 6, 7 is similar to the angelic voices singing of the holiness of God in Is. 6:3. The reason for the call to sing is clear: God is the King of all the earth; He deserves our praise. This psalm speaks of the coming great reign of Jesus when He establishes His holy rule.

47:8, 9 God reigns: We know that God is King over the earth. There are other forces clearly at work, but they function only by His permission. One day there will be an end to all evil, to all acts of rebellion, and to all acts of oppression. The people of the God of Abraham: This is the prophetic picture of the ultimate fulfillment of the Abrahamic covenant (Gen. 12:1–3). One day all the peoples of the earth who have come to faith in God through Jesus will discover that they are one people. They are all the true seed of Abraham, because they, like Abraham, believed in God (Gen. 15:6; Gal. 3:5–8). Then all shields will belong to God; there will be no other power on earth or in the universe apart from the power of God. Greatly exalted comes from the term meaning “to go up,” the same root used in v. 5. God’s ascent to His throne will come with the enthronement of Jesus and His coming rule in the New Jerusalem (Rev. 20).

Psalm 48 unites with Pss. 46; 47 to form three great psalms of praise to God for His kingship and His love for the holy city of Jerusalem. This emphasis on Jerusalem has led many scholars to speak of these psalms as "Songs of Zion." Attributed to the sons of Korah, this psalm calls the people to offer reverent praise to their Lord. The structure is as follows: (1) a celebration of God's greatness in the holy city of Zion (vv. 1–3); (2) a description of the gathering of the kings and the peoples to witness God's rule (vv. 4–11); (3) a celebration of God's greatness in the holy city of Zion (vv. 12–14).

48:1 Great is used often in the Psalms to describe the person of God (21:5; 77:13; 95:3; 96:4; 145:3; 147:5). city of our God: The city of Jerusalem had a particularly dear place in the heart of God's people (1 Kin. 14:21). The city was holy because of the presence of God in the temple.

48:2, 3 The joy of the whole earth: As is strongly established in the Book of Psalms, the purpose of God's work in Israel was to draw all nations to Himself (117:1). sides of the north: This phrasing is likely borrowed from Canaanite poetry. In Canaanite thought, the great gods resided in some remote northern location. For Israel, God's dwelling was the physical city of Jerusalem. The city of the great King: Jesus quoted these words in Matt. 5:35 and identified the city as Jerusalem. God is in her palaces: These words express a prayer for the present and hope for the future. The point is clear: the beauty of the city of Jerusalem comes from the presence of the Lord, who has made His dwelling there.

48:4–7 This section describes from a different point of view the final battle referred to in Pss. 2; 110. Psalm 48 describes the approach and hasty retreat of the errant kings. The connection between this text and Ps. 2 is heightened by the use of an unusual Hebrew word for fear—a term meaning "trembling" or "quaking terror"—which is found in both places (2:11).

48:8 as … we have seen: The people who first sang this song knew the presence of God in temple worship. They knew that they were in the city where God had chosen to establish His blessing.

48:9 We have thought: The verb is an unusual one in Hebrew. It refers to making comparisons and looking for similarities, thinking and considering with discrimination. The point is that nothing can be compared to the loyal love of God.

IN DEPTH

Winds East, West, North, and South

The ancient Hebrews described their climate in terms of four winds determined by the four points of the compass. The east wind (Ps. 48:7) came from the desert and was notoriously violent. Called winds of the wilderness, these blasts were probably what struck the home of one of Job's sons, killing all of his children (Job 1:19). Likewise, an east wind caused by God parted the Red Sea (Ex. 14:21). So it is not surprising that Jeremiah would compare war to the east wind (Jer. 18:17).

Hot and dry, the east wind had the potential to scorch grain and other crops (Gen. 41:6, 23, 27; Ezek. 17:9; Jon. 4:8) and to dry up springs of water (Hos. 13:15). An east wind also brought a plague of locusts (Gen. 10:13).

By contrast, the west wind carried moisture in from the Mediterranean Sea between November and February. A west wind blew away the locusts in Egypt (Ex. 10:19), and rain-bearing wind from the west also ended a severe drought in the days of the prophet Elijah (1 Kin. 18:43–44).

The dry north wind was the coldest. Modern-day Arabs call this wind the Simoom (from samm, "poison"). It can cause headache, fever, and neuralgia.

The gentle south wind "quiets the earth" (Job 37:17). It blew Paul's ship gently (Acts 27:13) until a fiercer wind demolished it. Coming from the highlands of Sinai and Arabia, the south wind blows for about one day at a time during the spring (February to June).

48:10–14 Praising the city of Zion is another way of praising God, whose dwelling was there. To be a guide describes the work of a shepherd (78:52).

Psalm 49, a wisdom psalm attributed to the sons of Korah, has many similarities with Proverbs and Ecclesiastes. The psalm calls for the wise person to realize that there is nothing to fear from the oppressive rich: like animals, they too will die. But the righteous will live forever. This psalm is quite different from a psalm of praise; it is an instruction text set to music. Its structure is: (1) a call for understanding (vv. 1–4); (2) a declaration of the vanity of trusting in wealth (vv. 5–9); (3) a declaration of the worthlessness of possessions after death (vv. 10–12); (4) a description of God's redemption (vv. 13–15); (5) the conclusion that there is no need to fear the rich (vv. 16–20).

49:1–5 Hear this, all peoples: The call for wisdom and understanding goes to all, similar to the calls for universal worship of the Lord (Ps. 117). Dark saying, which may be translated "riddle" or "enigma," refers to a perplexing moral problem: how do the righteous come to terms with oppressive rich people who seem to have no thought for God?

49:6–9 Those who trust in their wealth: As in the teaching of Jesus (Mark 10:24), there is a warning against trusting in wealth, for wealth can achieve nothing of lasting value in this life or the life to come. Nor give to God a ransom: Wealth cannot buy redemption. Pit refers to the power of death in its dark aspect (16:10). Only God has the power to deliver us from death and hell.

49:10 The theme that wise men die is developed in Ecclesiastes. The rich and the poor, the wise and the fool, all have the same fate—physical death.

49:11–20 These verses vividly describe both the power of death and the greater power of God. their beauty shall be consumed: Death is the great leveler. People who have beauty, riches (vv. 16, 17), and power in this world will lose them all at death. They will be stripped of everything except their character or soul. This is why the Scriptures exhort us to pursue character development—God's law, holiness, wisdom, and knowledge—more than anything else. Each use of the word grave in these two verses is a translation of the Hebrew word Sheol, meaning death (16:10). God will redeem my soul: The psalmist trusts in God to deliver him from the power of death.

Psalm 50, a wisdom psalm, is the first of twelve poems attributed to Asaph, one of the music leaders appointed by David. This psalm contrasts the distinctions of the righteous and the wicked in the eyes of God, a constant theme of the wisdom writers. True wisdom in biblical thought is based on the "fear of the Lord," a proper response to the awesome nature of God. In this psalm, God is portrayed as the great Judge (Pss. 96—98). The structure of the psalm is: (1) the praise of God who shines forth from Zion (vv. 1–); (2) a vision of the coming of God, the great Judge (vv. 4–6); (3) the instruction of the great Judge to His people concerning sacrifice (vv. 7–15); (4) the rebuke of the great Judge to the wicked (vv. 16–21); (5) the words of the great Judge on condemnation and salvation (vv. 22, 23).

50:1, 2 The Hebrew text uses the three terms the Mighty One, God, and the LORD as a stunning introduction to this poem. This language suggests a grand display of God Himself in the midst of His people (18:7–9). Out of Zion: The glory of God shines from His sanctuary in Jerusalem.

50:3–6 Our God shall come: This prophetic language speaks of the coming kingdom of God (Pss. 96—98). God Himself is Judge: See 75:7 for a powerful development of this idea. This is the point of this psalm; God is the great Judge. When used of God, the Hebrew word for Judge has connotations of royalty (94:2). Thus this wisdom psalm is also a royal psalm, because it speaks of the coming of the great King who both rules and judges.

50:7–10 not rebuke you: The sacrifices were commanded by God in Leviticus, but the people had difficulty keeping a godly perspective on the nature of sacrifices. every beast of the forest: The people were not doing God a favor by bringing their animals, for everything belonged to Him anyway. He knows every bird and beast.

50:11–15 If I were hungry: The God of Israel does not hunger for food; however, He does "hunger" for righteousness of His people. Call upon Me: Sacrifice in the Bible was for the good of the people. The Lord designated the sacrificial system as a the place when He would shower His mercy on those He loves.

50:16–21 As in the case of 1:4, the attention of the psalm turns from the righteous who need instruction to the wicked who merit judgment. This section announces God's judgment not against the nations, but against the people of Israel who heard but spurned God's word. You give your mouth to evil: God offered truth, but these people chose falsehoods. They had seen the light but preferred to live in darkness (John 3:16–21). your own mother's son: There was no sense of decency remaining in these wicked persons; even normal bonds of family relationships were disregarded.

50:22, 23 In the climax of the revelation of the coming judgment in this psalm, the Lord offers an opportunity to repent and receive forgiveness. This is an indicator of His grace. The Lord wants to save; His warnings are another expression of His mercy.

Psalm 51 is associated with one of the hardest experiences of David's life, the aftermath of his affair with Bathsheba. This is one of several psalms of David in which the title specifies the incident that inspired the poem. For the account of David's sin and Nathan's rebuke, see 2 Sam. 11; 12:1–15. David's response to Nathan was immediate: "I have sinned against the Lord" (2 Sam. 12:13). Sometime later, he wrote this memorable, penitential psalm. The structure of the poem is as follows: (1) a plea for God's mercy in the context of David's confession (vv. 1, 2); (2) an acknowledgment that David's sin was against the Lord (vv. 3, 4); (3) a confession that sin pervades David's being (vv. 5, 6); (4) a series of pleas for forgiveness (vv. 7–13); (5) a vow of praise by the forgiven sinner (vv. 14, 15); (6) a statement on the meaning of true worship (vv. 16, 17); (7) a plea for God to restore the fortunes of the people (vv. 18, 19).

A Positive Brokenness

For King David, there was ultimately only one way to deal with sin: face it, confess it, and be forgiven. Psalm 51 shows him doing precisely that. In total contrast to the pretense of confession practiced by so many today, David's prayer expresses utter brokenness.

What exactly was the sin to which David was admitting? The Bible tells us plainly that he committed adultery with Bathsheba, the wife of Uriah the Hittite, and that when she became pregnant David tried in vain to cover his sin, eventually engineering Uriah's death (2 Sam. 11). Yet Psalm 51 does not mention the adultery, and it only touches upon the murder (51:14). Instead, the main transgression confessed is, "Against You, You only have I sinned, and done this evil in Your sight" (51:4).

David was not evading responsibility for the sexual immorality and murder, but he recognized that ultimately sin is an offense against a holy, righteous God. Even when other people are hurt by our sins, it is God whose standards have been violated. Thus, while sinners owe apologies and restitution to people, they owe contrite confession to God. He alone is able to forgive sins (Mark 2:7).

Statue of David, beloved king of Judah, who poured out his heart to God in sincere repentance and a plea for forgiveness in Psalm 51.

51:1, 2 David's call for mercy is the only appropriate request for a confessing sinner. No sinner should ask for justice, for that would mean judgment and ruin. Mercy and forgiveness is God's gift to the confessing sinner. Even when the Lord forgives, He does not tarnish His just character: confessed sins are covered by the sacrifice of His perfect Son on the Cross (2 Cor. 5:21). The phrase according to Your lovingkindness expresses God's loyal or covenantal love to His people (13:5).

51:3, 4 The months of agony that David suffered because of his guilt are expressed in the striking words—my sin is always before me. See the development of these ideas in Ps. 32. Against You: David had sinned against Bathsheba, Uriah, and the nation he was called to rule. But none of these indictments were as serious as David's offense against God. The first few verses use several different words to describe sin—"transgression," "iniquity," and "sin." The words for forgiveness are all pictorial words: "blot out" (v. 1), "wash," and "cleanse" (v. 2). All these words express the seriousness of sin and the great lengths God goes to in removing our sin. be found just: The Lord deals with sin in two ways: The wicked receive God's just condemnation; the righteous receive His undeserved mercy.

51:5, 6 brought forth in iniquity: Sin was found in David from the beginning; from birth he was inclined towards sin (Rom. 5:12). Inward parts, a rare word in the Hebrew Bible, indicates something clouded over, difficult for anyone but God to see. The Lord's penetrating gaze searches the innermost recesses of a person's mind and heart.

51:7–9 hyssop: Here David refers to the ritual acts of cleansing described in the Law of Moses (Lev. 14:4; Num. 19:6). David repeatedly calls for his cleansing (v. 9). By this, he expresses his profound sense of guilt.

51:10 This verse is significant in two areas, repentance and creation. The verb translated create is the same one used in Gen. 1:1 and refers to what only God can do. David was asking that his heart be renewed, restored, and transformed. God is the only source of such a renewal.

51:11–15 David calls sinners to salvation in this verse. He vows that he will use his experience of God's grace as a renewed motivation to bring others into the knowledge of the love and mercy of God (40:3). my tongue shall sing: David desires to be forgiven for several reasons: (1) for his own peace, (2) for the message of hope that he could communicate to others, and (3) for the praise he would be able to give in the community of the faithful.

51:16, 17 You do not desire sacrifice: The key term here is the verb desire, which means "to find pleasure in." God's pleasure is not in the sacrificed animal, but in the restored person. He demanded sacrifices, even from David; but His pleasure is in the person who comes obediently to Him (Gen. 4:1–7; John 4:21–24; Rom. 12:1, 2). Actions not accompanied by a contrite heart are not acceptable to God (Is. 1:12–20).

51:18, 19 Do good: David declared God's goodness to the whole community in their collective worship (125:4). The Hebrew verb translated pleased is the same verb translated delight in v. 16. God took pleasure in those whose hearts were humble before Him. Their sacrifices were a source of joy.

Psalm 52, a psalm of lament, strongly emphasizes judgment of David's enemies. The title of this psalm specifies the incident in David's life that prompted him to write it. Doeg, an official of Saul, had spied on David when he fled to Ahimelech, the priest at Nob, for provisions and guidance (1 Sam. 21:7). Doeg's report angered Saul so much that he destroyed the priestly family at Nob (1 Sam. 22). This incident must have been disheartening to David. His actions had caused the death of others, and his enemies were determined to destroy him. The structure is: (1) the question of why the wicked boast in evil (vv. 1–4); (2) a proclamation that God will destroy the wicked (vv. 5–7); (3) a vow to praise the Lord (vv. 8, 9).

52:1–4 Boast is related to the word meaning "praise"; however, boasting in evil is no more than a perversion of praise. Mighty is likely used here sarcastically; the only Mighty One is the Lord. The goodness of God is His "loyal love." The contrast is between a wicked man who boasts in evil and the Lord who is constant in His supreme character. Your tongue refers to more than just words. These people used language as a weapon, for they believed that the gods could empower their words to a devastating effect.

52:5–7 God shall destroy you forever: The poet uses the strongest terms to describe divine judgment on those who practice evil. Uproot you from the land of the living refers to death, but not eternal death. The righteous also shall see and fear: This fear is a deepened respect for God and a sense of awe before His throne. Here is the man: The righteous laugh at the wicked because of their foolishness. A reference to man often means man in his strength; but this "man" has no real strength at all. He seeks strength in himself instead of seeking the source of all strength, the Almighty.

52:8, 9 A green olive tree is a symbol of beauty. In Rom. 11, the olive tree is used as a symbol of the Gentiles who are grafted into the root, the people of God or the church. The Hebrew word for mercy is the same term, meaning "loyal love," that is translated "goodness" in v. 1. The Hebrew word for praise is the same word sometimes translated "give thanks" (105:1); it typically refers to vocal and public praise.

Psalm 53 is a recasting of Ps. 14 with only slight differences, particularly in the ending. Its structure is as follows: (1) an announcement of the judgment of the fool (v. 1); (2) the Lord's examination of people (v. 2, 3); (3) the judgment of the Lord (vv. 4, 5); (4) a prayer for the salvation of Israel (v. 6).

53:1 In the Bible, the term fool does not mean mental incompetence, but moral and spiritual insensitivity. The fool is the one who ignores God.

53:2–6 God has scattered the bones: This is a prophetic pronouncement of the final judgment on the wicked. Those who did not fear God will be filled with great fear, for God will come in His glory and power. One day there will be no more wickedness to contaminate the earth or to compromise the people of God.

Psalm 54 is a psalm of lament in which the answer to the prayer is declared before the end of the poem. The prayer's answer may have come through a priest or prophet. The psalmist knew that he was being answered, and he sought immediately to make God's goodness known. Psalm 54 is another of David's psalms in which the title indicates the specific situation that gave rise to the poem (Pss. 51; 52). Twice the people of the Wilderness of Ziph had informed Saul that David was hiding in their region (1 Sam. 23:19–23; 26:1–3). David's distress is understandable; yet from the Ziphites' viewpoint, their actions were warranted. After all, Saul was the king and David was a fugitive. The structure of the poem is as follows: (1) a call for God's help in the midst of persecution from many foes (Ps. 54:1–3); (2) a declaration that God is David's Helper (vv. 4, 5); (3) a vow of praise (vv. 6, 7).

54:1–3 Save me, O God, by Your name: The poets of the Bible knew the significance of God's name even when they did not use it. The people of Ziph probably are indicated by the words strangers and oppressors. David makes the point that they are not pious people. Since he is God's servant, he expects that God will deliver him.

54:4, 5 Helper could also be translated "power." The Lord was David's strength in his time of need. Cut them off is David's curse on his enemies, an imprecation. Even so, David did not take vengeance into his own hands. Only the Lord can take revenge.

54:6, 7 I will freely sacrifice to You: The prayer has been answered, and God is honored. Thus David expresses his willingness to fulfill his vow.

Psalm 55 deals with life and death, deliverance from hell, and the abiding presence of God. It speaks prophetically of the experience of the Savior Jesus. This psalm consists of many short sections, and its choppy quality shows the deep emotion behind it. The structure of the poem is: (1) a call for God to hear in the midst of the distress (vv. 1–3); (2) a wish to escape death (vv. 4–8); (3) a prayer for God's judgment on the wicked (vv. 9–11); (4) the description of a friend's betrayal (vv. 12–14); (5) a renewed prayer for God's judgment on the wicked (v. 15); (6) a prayer for deliverance for the righteous (vv. 16–19); (7) a retrospective on the friend's betrayal (vv. 20, 21); (8) a call for hope in the midst of trouble (v. 22); (9) a concluding statement of confidence in view of final judgment (v. 23).

55:1–3 Give ear to my prayer: The poem begins in a way that is common in the lament psalms. There is a call to God, a reference to the psalmist's distress, and a notice concerning his enemy. David's shock is not that he is in distress again or even that he has more enemies. The great shock is that the enemy is his own friend (vv. 12–14).

55:4–8 David's intense pain can be felt in his strong language. The phrase terrors of death is unusual. The Hebrew word for terror or "dread" is first used in Scripture to describe the horror that Abraham felt in the unnatural darkness that seized him as God was about to come near (Gen. 15:12). The word also described the horrors that would fall on the people of Canaan when the Lord gave the land to the Israelites (Ex. 15:16). To strengthen this feeling, David speaks of a "trembling fear" and an overwhelming horror (Ezek. 7:18).

55:9 David calls for God's judgment on the wicked; he renews this call in vv. 15, 23.

55:10–14 Here is the reason for David's terrible pain in this psalm. It was not an ordinary enemy who had risen up against him; it was his companion, his confidant and friend. The one who betrayed him was not only a close friend, but a person with whom David had worshiped the Lord.

55:15 In rage, David cries: Let death seize them. His words are directed against the wicked generally, and not personally against the one who had distressed David (vv. 13, 14). David could express his emotions to God in prayer, but judgment or revenge was in God's hands (Rom. 12:19).

55:16–19 The words as for me mark a dramatic turning point in the psalm. David reverts to a stance of faith; He declares his trust in the omnipotent Lord. God will hear: David reminds himself of the great acts of deliverance that God has done on his behalf in the past and the work that God will continue to do in the future. In a similar way, we should also remind ourselves of God's faithfulness in times of distress.

55:20 He has put forth his hands: David turns to describe of his former friend, now his enemy (vv. 13, 14). He had been completely taken in by the man's lies.

55:21–23 To anyone who has experienced grief or desolation, the command to cast one's burden on the LORD is refreshing. The Lord is the one constant in life (v. 19) and the one true friend (27:10). He can always bear the burden.

Psalm 56 is a psalm of lament. This poem of David has the same setting as Ps. 34—the flight of David to Achish at Gath. In Ps. 34, Achish is referred to as "Abimelech," his royal designation. The fact that two of David's psalms are tied to this one event demonstrates how devastating the experience was to David. Cut off from all he had known, David tried to find refuge among the Philistines. When they turned on him, he nearly lost his life. He escaped by pretending to be insane (1 Sam. 21:10–15). This psalm was sung in corporate worship, for it is addressed to the "Chief Musician" and is set to the tune "The Silent Dove in Distant Lands." The structure of the poem is: (1) a cry to God who alone is David's help (vv. 1, 2); (2) a confession of trust in God (vv. 3, 4); (3) a description of the work of David's enemies (vv. 5–7); (4) a confession of why David trusts in God during his time of distress (vv. 8–11); (5) a vow to praise the Lord (vv. 12, 13).

56:1 Be merciful to me: David cries out to God because of his overwhelming sense of loss during his time as a fugitive in a foreign land (1 Sam. 21:10–15).

56:2–4 I will trust are words of abiding confidence, even in times of distress. Alternating passages of pain and faith are a characteristic of the lament psalms (Ps. 13). I will praise His word: This insert is also found twice in v. 10. The idea of what can flesh do is repeated in v. 11 and is developed more fully in 118:6. These words are also an OT basis for the apostle Paul's confidence expressed in Rom. 8:31.

56:5 All day they twist my words: In lament psalms, the poet typically complains about lies, the misuse of language, and deceitful speech (Ps. 12).

56:6–11 You number my wanderings: The psalmist is confident that God has a particular interest in his every pain, even his every tear. He also knows the great truth that comes from the meaning of God's name, that the Lord is for us. See 118:6, 7 for a further development of this idea. I will praise His word: The double insert of this shout of praise shows the psalmist's great enthusiasm for the praise of God. In God: The poet repeats the words of v. 4 as a refrain of confidence.

56:12, 13 Vows made to You: The poet takes very seriously His determination to praise the Lord. You have delivered my soul: Here is the psalmist's report of deliverance. In the congregation of believing people, David rejoices in the Lord.

Psalm 57 is another of David's poems in which the title gives the specific setting of the psalm. The narrative of David's life indicates that he twice hid in caves—once in Adullam (1 Sam. 22:1–5) which was the setting of Ps. 142, and once in En Gedi (1 Sam. 24:1–7), the setting of this poem. In En Gedi, David spared Saul's life even though Saul had become an easy target. While pursuing David, the king had entered a cave to relieve himself. It so happened that he chose the very cave in which David was hiding. Rather than killing Saul while he had the chance, David cut off a piece of the king's garment. David later repented even of that act against Saul. This psalm is one of four that were set to the tune "Do Not Destroy" (Pss. 58; 59; 75). The structure of the poem is as follows: (1) a call for mercy in the midst of calamities (vv. 1–3); (2) a confession of trust in the midst of trouble (vv. 4–6); (3) a determination to praise God in the midst of the people (vv. 7–11).

IN DEPTH

Lessons in Music

The Book of Psalms is the hymnal of ancient Israel. The psalms are ancient lyrics preserved with occasional musical notations. Most of these musical notations are found in the superscriptions or titles. For instance, many are directed “To the Chief Musician” (Pss. 51—62). Others call for musical accompaniment. For example, Ps. 4 calls for stringed instruments, Ps. 5 for flutes, Ps. 6 for the eight-stringed harp, and Ps. 8 for the instrument of Gath. The titles sometimes specify the tune to be used, such as of the Son” in Ps. 9 and “The Lilies” in Ps. 45. In this way the superscriptions contain hints of the musical nature of the psalms.

The psalms present a balanced picture of the use of music in worship. In particular, the first three verses of Ps. 33 are instructive. As v. 1 suggests, the purpose of godly music is to rejoice in the God who has given us new life. As the psalmist notes with his directive to the “righteous,” this type of praise can come only from those who have been cleansed by God’s grace and renewed by His Spirit. Indeed the psalmist describes this praise from the righteous as “beautiful,” for God enjoys receiving praise from His people. For this reason, worshipful music is always directed “to Him” (vv. 2, 3). That is, God is always the audience for the music performed in His name.

What kind of music can we present to God? The psalmist describes a variety of instruments, such as the harp and the instrument of ten strings, that join the human voice in giving praise to the Lord. But his exhortation to sing “a new song” (v. 3) is not merely a call for new music and new hymnals. The phrase new song means to sing to God with a renewed sense of wonder at all He has done for us. The worship of God should never degenerate into something that we just do; we should always approach God with rejoicing. With the phrase play skillfully (v. 3), the psalmist exhorts us never to approach our worship with a casual attitude. We are to “play skillfully” because we are playing to the Lord, and we must offer Him only our best. But skill is not the only criterion of worship music, for the psalmist’s final exhortation in v. 3 is to play “with a shout of joy.” Since

God always considers our attitudes, genuine joy in the presence of our caring Lord is required for music to be truly worshipful.

57:1–3 The opening cry be merciful to me is similar to many in the lament psalms, but here it is followed immediately by a confession of trust in the Lord. in the shadow: The picture of hiding under the wings of a mother bird is a familiar theme in the Psalms (91:1–4). Here the psalmist vows that he will pray only to his God, for God alone can deliver him from trouble. The Hebrew word for performs is translated "will perfect" in 138:8; the point is that God acts on behalf of His servant.

57:4–6 The psalmist's foes are like lions prowling about for prey. Be exalted: In the midst of his distress, the psalmist shouts his praise to God (v. 11). One of the ways in which God exalts Himself is by graciously delivering the needy. They have prepared a net: The psalmist is like a bird that is easily caught; yet by God's mercy, his enemies will fall into their own pit.

57:7 Near the end of his life, Paul was able to say that he had kept the faith (2 Tim. 4:7). With the words my heart is steadfast, David is assuring God of much the same thing: he has remained faithful to the God who has provided for Him from the beginning.

57:8–11 I will praise You: As is common in the Psalms, the conclusion is a vow to praise the Lord. Such praise would be centered on the Lord's saving acts. In this poem, the praise of the Lord revolves around His mercy and truth (86:15). The words of v. 11 serve as a refrain, a repetition of the words of praise in v. 5.

Psalm 58, an imprecatory psalm, might have been provoked by a very strong attack on David. This is one of the four psalms set to the tune "Do Not Destroy" (Pss. 57; 59; 75). It has four parts: (1) a description of wicked judges who wreak havoc on the earth (vv. 1, 2); (2) a description of the wicked who continue in evil (vv. 3–5); (3) a prayer for divine vengeance against the wicked (vv. 6–9); (4) a promise that the righteous will be vindicated (vv. 10, 11).

58:1, 2 You silent ones is a derisive term for the wicked judges. Although they were merely humans, they were behaving as though they had divine power. wickedness … violence: Instead of establishing righteousness, these wicked judges were producing havoc. They thought they had all power in the earth. But they would soon learn that God "judges in the earth" (v. 11).

58:3–5 The effects of the wicked in powerful places are as deadly as the effects of poisonous snakes that are out of control. The word charmers refers to those who have the ability to "control" the behavior of snakes; but in this case, not even the equivalent of charmers could control the destruction and evil that resulted from wicked people in high places.

58:6, 7 In 57:4, the wicked are described as having powerful teeth, as though they were carnivores, eating the righteous alive. Here David asks God to shatter their teeth, symbolizing the destruction of the power of the wicked over the poor and defenseless (3:7).

58:8 The ancient Israelites desired children so much that a live birth was considered extremely precious. Alternatively a stillborn child would cause great sorrow.

58:9 In this verse, David speaks of the certainty of divine judgment. Before your pots can feel: It takes some time for a pot to boil. But the judgment of God will come suddenly—even before a pot would feel the heat. as with a whirlwind: The image speaks of sudden destruction. As in His living and burning wrath may also be translated "As He lives, so real is His anger."

58:10 The destruction of the wicked brings sadness at the thought of the waste of human dreams, lives, and hopes. But there is great joy for the righteous in the recognition that the Savior King has won the victory (Rev. 19:11–21). There is also joy in knowing that wickedness will no longer anger the Lord of the universe (68:3). Justice will be established forever.

58:11 a reward for the righteous: See 1 Cor. 3:11–15 for further development of this theme. in the earth: This is the fitting arena of divine judgment, for the wicked judges thought they possessed all authority on earth (v. 2).

Psalm 59, a psalm of lament, contains strong assurance of the final judgment of the wicked. The superscription refers to the story found in 1 Sam. 19:9–17: David escaped Saul's anger with help from his wife Michal. She showed unusual heroism and great devotion to David—actions that resulted in a strained relationship with her father Saul. Psalm 59 has four parts: (1) a prayer for deliverance (vv. 1–5); (2) a confident hope (vv. 6–10); (3) a renewed prayer for deliverance (vv. 11–13); (4) a renewed hope (vv. 14–17).

59:1, 2 The repetition of the phrase deliver me is for emphasis, meaning "to bring one out" of trouble and distress. The verb translated defend means "to set on high" or "to place out of reach of trouble" (91:14). Save me: This is the most common of the Hebrew verbs for salvation. It suggests "to give room to" or "to expand an area to breathe."

59:3, 4 they lie in wait: Enemies become like wild animals on the hunt or enemy soldiers lurking along one's paths. Not for my transgression: There were times in David's life when he knew that he was suffering because of sin in his life (Ps. 32). There were other times when he believed himself to be innocent of sin, but still he was hounded by wicked persons. Here he shouts his protest aloud: through no fault of mine. He was guilty of no wickedness that would cause such merciless attacks on him.

59:5 David's call for the Lord to awake is another way of asking God to pay attention to his plight (7:6; 35:23; 44:23; Is. 51:9). To ensure God's reception of his bold shout, David uses the "full name" of God: LORD God of hosts, the God of Israel. The Commander of the armies of angels is also the Protector of His people. Do not be merciful: The righteous constantly experience the mercy of the Lord, but His mercy is not extended to those who constantly oppose Him. The wicked transgressors were those who engaged in constant acts of treachery.

59:6, 7 A dog in the ancient Hebrew culture was considered a semi-wild scavenger, not the beloved pet of our own day. Who hears: Like those described in Pss. 9; 10, the wicked here believe that they will face no punishment for their evil. They are profoundly mistaken (75:7, 10; 92:6).

59:8 But You: This is a complete turnaround in the psalm—from thoughts about the wicked to an acknowledgment of the reality of God in human affairs. shall laugh … in derision: The wording is the same as in 2:4 (Job 9:23; Prov. 1:26). There is the pleasurable laughter of God in joy with His people (147:11; Zeph. 3:17). But this is the laughter of contempt.

59:9 Wait can also mean “watch.” The enemies of David had come to watch for him; but David was determined to “watch” for God. His Strength may also be translated “My Strength” or “O My Strong One.” The noun my defense means “a high place of refuge” and is related to the verb in v. 1. The same word is used again in vv. 16, 17 (62:2).

59:10 My God of mercy: The term mercy is sometimes translated “loyal love” (13:5). The Lord is the “God of my loyal love.”

59:11 This verse begins the second round of the petition in the psalm. The imprecation or curse in this verse is unusual. Instead of asking for the destruction of the wicked, the psalmist asks for them to be scattered, to be made fugitives. This would be a constant reminder of the consequences of evil.

59:12, 13 The repetition of this verbal phrase consume them is similar to the repetition of the phrase deliver me in vv. 1, 2. that God rules in Jacob: The idea is similar to 58:11.

59:14–17 But I: The words of these verses capture the positive thrust of this psalm. David sings with joyful abandon of his relationship with God, despite the presence of wicked persons. There are two verbs translated I will sing; together they capture the idea that singing in the name of the Lord is a wonderful act of faith (Ex. 15:2).

59:17 You, O my Strength is repeated from v. 9. In God, the believer finds strength, defense, and mercy. This psalm ends in a grand manner with bold faith in the living God.

Psalm 60, a psalm of community lament (Ps. 80), expresses David's great faith in the eventual victory he would find in the Lord. In this psalm, we hear the voice of God breaking into the poem itself and pronouncing His judgment on David's enemies (vv. 6–8; Pss. 12; 75; 87; 91). Since the tone of the psalm is military in nature, it is possible that this poem was used in military training. Along with training in weapons and tactics, David gave ongoing instruction to his soldiers about how to trust their Lord. See 144:1; 149:6 for further examples of psalms in military training. The heading and content of this psalm add additional information to the account in 2 Sam. 8:3–8. The campaign of David and his general Joab against Hadadezer, the king of Zobah, did not succeed at first. This psalm describes the feelings of David and his army at the time of their defeat. But it also records their confident expectation that they would eventually succeed, something celebrated in the heading of the psalm and confirmed in 2 Sam. 8. The psalm has four movements: (1) a lament of the people when they experienced defeat (vv. 1–3); (2) an expression of confidence and a prayer for deliverance (vv. 4, 5); (3) the voice of God giving assurance of ultimate victory (vv. 6–8); (4) an expression of confidence in the Lord (vv. 9–12).

60:1–3 David accuses God of having broken them down. This is a poetic description of an otherwise unknown defeat of the armies of Israel in a battle that was part of the campaign against Aram of Zobah and Mesopotamian allies (2 Sam. 8). The defeat was so startling that it caused the people of Israel to feel as though God had made the earth tremble, a metaphor for devastation. wine of confusion: The defeat sent the people reeling; they could not understand how it could have happened.

60:4, 5 a banner: Despite the recent defeat, the people still had reason to hope in a final victory for Israel over its foes. The term beloved (127:2; Is. 5:1; Jer. 11:15) is particularly endearing. God had a reason to act on behalf of His people: He loved them.

60:6–9 At this point in the poem, God speaks (75:2–5, 10; 91:14–16). The Lord affirms that He is in charge, that the land belongs to Him, and that He will give victory to His people. In His holiness can also mean "in His holy place." I will rejoice: It gives God pleasure to grant His people success. Shechem and the Valley of Succoth represent regions west and east of the Jordan River in the central parts of the land. Gilead and Manasseh are also regions east and west of the Jordan; Ephraim and Judah are regions in the north and south. The Lord was asserting His sovereignty over the entire land of Israel. Moab … Edom … Philistia: These traditional enemies of Israel were also enemies of God. The Lord would not allow them to disturb His people.

60:10 Is it not You: The very One the people thought had cast them off (v. 1) would lead them to final victory.

60:11, 12 Ultimately, true help—the Hebrew word means "salvation"—comes only from God. we will do valiantly: As the title records, this was what happened. David's general Joab led the battle, and under God's hand Israel's enemies were soundly defeated. This psalm presents a strong encouragement to all believers who are presently experiencing difficulties in their lives: When the help of man proves useless, often God dramatically provides strength and power so that our boast is solely in Him.

Psalm 61, a royal psalm attributed to David, has elements of lament (Ps. 13) and trust (Ps. 23). In this psalm, the king of Israel points to the great King who is to come. The title includes the words "On a stringed instrument" (see the titles of Pss. 4; 6; 54; 55; 67; 76). The psalm has four parts: (1) a petition to God (vv. 1, 2); (2) an affirmation that God is David's refuge (vv. 3, 4); (3) an affirmation that God provides (vv. 5–7); (4) a vow to praise God (v. 8).

61:1 Hear my cry is classic language of a lament psalm. David calls on the Lord to hear the prayer of the troubled believer (5:2, 3; 17:1; 55:2; 66:19; 86:6; 142:6).

61:2 From the end of the earth: David describes his sense of being far from God's presence in his time of need. His prayer is that he might be brought back to the rock that is higher than he. The imagery of God as a Rock for the believer was introduced by Moses (Deut. 2:4) and is developed elsewhere in the Psalms (62:2; 71:3; 91:1, 2; 144:1).

61:3 The idea of God as one's shelter or refuge is seen in a number of passages in the Psalms (14:6; 46:1; 62:7, 8; 71:7; 91:2, 9; 94:22; 142:5). Such verses present the psalmist's strong affirmation of the protection and deliverance to be found in God.

61:4 I will abide implies strong determination. It is used of a worshiper in God's house in 15:1. Elsewhere, the psalmist compares himself to (1) an everlasting guest in the tent of the Lord (Ps. 15) and (2) a chick who has complete trust under its mother's wings (63:7; 91:4).

61:5 The pronoun You is emphasized in this verse as David celebrates the work of God in his life and in the life of his people. the heritage: God had given the nation to David for him to rule responsibly. These words also refer to the greater reality of the Savior King who would receive the nations as His inheritance to rule forever. who fear Your name: This is standard language describing biblical piety. To fear is to hold the name of God in awe and wonder, in worship and obedience (147:11; Ex. 20:20).

61:6, 7 The terms many generations and forever refer to David's long rule but more literally prophesy the eternal rule of Jesus, the King of kings. Mercy and truth together mean "loving loyalty" (see John 1:14 for an equivalent expression: "grace and truth"). Psalm 23 presents the believer pursued by God's "goodness and mercy" (23:6); but here the king is guarded by God's loving loyalty.

61:8 My vows refers to the vows of praise to God mentioned in v. 5 (22:22–26; 66:13; 76:11).

Psalm 62 is a wisdom psalm that eloquently urges silent confidence in the victory of God over all enemies because salvation is found only in Him. Jeduthun in the superscription was the chief of one of the choirs in the temple (1 Chr. 9:16) whose descendants founded a temple choir (1 Chr. 16:41, 42). The superscription "To Jeduthun" is also found in Pss. 39; 77. This psalm consists of seven brief sections: (1) a statement of confidence in God (vv. 1, 2); (2) a direct challenge to the wicked (v. 3); (3) a description of the ways of the wicked (v. 4); (4) a renewed statement of confidence in God (vv. 5–7); (5) a direct challenge to the righteous (v. 8); (6) a further description and warning of the ways of the wicked (vv. 9, 10); (7) a final statement of confidence in God (vv. 11, 12).

62:1, 2 In these two verses, David declares his complete dependence on God. silently waits: David expresses silent resignation before the sovereign will of the living God. My defense is from the word also used in 59:9, 16, 17. not be greatly moved: See the development of David's confidence in God in the wording of v. 6.

62:3 How long: David addresses his tormentors directly, expecting that they will soon be judged. attack: The word means to threaten or shout at someone.

62:4, 5 wait silently: A different Hebrew word is used here, but the concept of v. 1 is restated. My expectation may also be translated "hope" (71:5).

62:6, 7 Verse 6 is a restatement of v. 2, but strengthened by dropping the word greatly. Verse 7 restates v. 6. My salvation and my glory may be rephrased "my glorious salvation."

62:8–10 Trust: David addresses the righteous (contrast v. 3) with his lesson of reliance on God (40:3). What is true for David (v. 7) is extended to all in the believing community.

62:11 once, Twice: It is a convention of wisdom literature to use a number and then raise it by one (Prov. 30:11–33). The point here is that David has heard the message with certainty.

62:12 Mercy can be translated "loyal love," the covenantal love of the Lord (13:5). to each one: God is the true Judge; He will repay and reward every person (Eccl. 12:13, 14).

Psalm 63 is a royal psalm with elements of the psalms of trust (Ps. 23). The brief biographical note in the title "when he was in the wilderness of Judah" possibly refers to an incident during the period when Saul was chasing David (1 Sam. 22–24). The pattern of the psalm is as follows: (1) a search for a renewed sense of God's presence (vv. 1, 2); (2) a confession of David's faith in God (vv. 3–5); (3) an expression of confidence in the Lord even during the lonely night watches (vv. 6–8); (4) a prediction of the end of David's enemies (vv. 9, 10); (5) a renewal of David's confession of trust in God the great King (v. 11).

63:1, 2 O God, my God: The opening words indicate faith in God, but they also suggest a time of trouble (22:1). thirsts … longs: The poet is away from the place of God's worship and feels the distance keenly (42:1, 2). The sanctuary had been at Nob (1 Sam. 21:1), and it was there that David had sought the presence of the Lord. Later it was moved to Jerusalem (76:1, 2).

63:3–5 The psalmist expresses his joy in knowing God and his determination to continue praising God throughout his life. Lovingkindness may also be translated "loyal love" (13:5). Praise is a vocal, public act in the Psalms (Heb. 13:15). bless … hands: Praise (the meaning of bless here) and raising the hands in worship are often associated in the Psalms (134:2). To lift the hands to the Lord expresses dependence on Him, coupled with an acknowledgment of His power, wonder, and majesty (77:2). be satisfied … with joyful lips: In coming to the Lord in praise, the poet finds the refreshment he has sought (v. 1).

63:6 From his bed, David continues to fix his thoughts on God (77:6). night watches: The Israelites counted three watches to the night. Evidently David is having difficulty sleeping, and he directs his thoughts to worship. Meditate means "to speak" about the things of God or to fill one's mind with the knowledge of God (1:2; 77:12).

The Shadow of God's Wings

One of David's favorite symbolic expressions was the word-picture of sitting in the shadow of God's wings (Ps. 63:7; compare 17:8; 36:7; 57:1; 61:4; and 91:4). The wings of a bird were a symbol of protection, defense, and refuge. For example, faced with a forest or range fire, a mother grouse or prairie chicken would gather her chicks together under her wings, settle down, and let the flames sweep over her. If necessary, she would die in order to save them. After the fire, the chicks would crawl out from under their mother's burnt body. They enjoyed life and safety because of her sacrificial devotion.

In a similar way, David was shielded from numerous attempts on his life, especially by King Saul and later by his own son Absalom. David knew by experience what it meant to have nothing standing between him and death but the gracious protection of God.

The Lord still offers the same refuge and protection today. For one thing, having voluntarily died on the Cross for our sins, He can deliver us from the penalty of sin (Rom. 5:6–10). Furthermore, He watches over His children with diligent care (Heb. 13:5–6; 1 Pet. 5:7). Thus we can rely on a God who loves us and acts on our behalf when we cannot help ourselves.

63:7, 8 in the shadow of Your wings: See 91:4 for this expression of faith in God. Your right hand: The same power of God that delivered Israel from Egypt (Ex. 15:6) would support David—and all other believers in their daily life (74:11).

63:9, 10 David predicts the destruction of his enemies. They will be driven to barren places where only jackals, wild dogs of the desert, roam.

63:11 The king refers to David. When he finally became king, David would find his true pleasure in God. Everyone who swears by Him refers to those who believe in the Lord.

Psalm 64 has elements of lament (Ps. 13) and imprecation (Ps. 137), but it appears to be basically a wisdom psalm. It contrasts the righteous and the wicked, compares their destinies, and is itself a "meditation" (v. 1). The structure of the poem is: (1) an appeal for protection from the wicked (vv. 1, 2); (2) a description of the evil activities of the wicked (vv. 3–6); (3) an expectation of the defeat of the wicked by God (vv. 7–9); (4) a description of the joy of the righteous (v. 10).

64:1 The initial cry of the psalmist expressed with the verbs hear and preserve resembles the psalms of lament (Ps. 13), but the term my meditation suggests that this is a wisdom psalm. This observation is confirmed in the rest of the psalm, which contrasts the destiny of the wicked with that of the righteous, a theme of wisdom psalms. In other passages the term meditation has the idea of "complaint" (55:2; 102:2; 142:2). But in this psalm the word indicates contemplation, for David contemplated the wicked and their end (73:17).

64:2–6 The arrogance of the wicked in their plots against the righteous is a continuing theme in the Psalms (Pss. 9; 10; 12). Who will see: The wicked do not know, or do not care, that there is One who sees (73:11), and who will repay (75:7).

64:7–10 The joy of confident trust in God cannot be overstated. By placing our problems into God's hands, we can rest in His sovereign will for our lives. Concerns about the future can be cast aside, for the Lord controls our future and has good plans for us (Rom. 8:28). All the upright in heart is another designation for the righteous or "the blameless" (v. 4). Their glory is their exuberant praise to God (63:11).

Psalm 65 is a wisdom psalm and more particularly a creation psalm (as Ps. 19). It celebrates rainfall, sharing the mood of Ps. 104 in this regard. But this is also a prophetic psalm, although it is not always recognized as such. The prophetic element is signaled in the first verse, the vow of praise yet to be paid—that is, all creation is waiting to praise the Lord when He finally appears in glory (Rom. 14:10, 11; Rev. 19:5). The psalm has five movements: (1) a vow of praise yet to be performed (vv. 1–3); (2) a blessing pronounced on the redeemed (v. 4); (3) a celebration of God's power that extends throughout the earth (vv. 5–8); (4) a celebration of God's provision of rain (vv. 9, 10); (5) a celebration of God's coming blessings in the year of His goodness (vv. 11–13).

65:1 Praise is awaiting You: There is still a vow of praise to be performed (v. 3). In the background of this psalm is an idea not far from that of Paul in Rom. 8:22, the groaning of creation for its release from the curse brought on it by humanity's fall (Gen. 3:17). The point of the psalm is twofold: (1) Every good rain and every full harvest is a blessing from God, showing His delight in His creation. (2) A day of God's goodness is coming in which good rains and harvests will be greater than ever before.

65:2, 3 atonement: David speaks of a coming day when sin will be dealt with fully, when redemption will be completely paid. This took place in the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ (Eph. 1:7).

65:4 shall be satisfied: In other psalms, David expresses his desire to live in the presence of God (27:4, 5). The fulfillment of this desire in David's day came through the sacrificial services of worship in Israel.

65:5–8 The awesome power of God at creation in the beginning (Job 26) will one day be seen anew in the restoration of all things. noise of the seas: God's power over the "dark powers" of the seas is a regular theme in the royal psalms (Ps. 93).

65:9, 10 You visit the earth: Rainfall is seen here as a gracious visitation of God. This is in keeping with the provisions of God's covenant with Israel (Deut. 28:12). These words have some fulfillment every time the rains bring productivity to the earth.

65:11–13 Your paths: The picture is of wagon tracks across the heavens, where the "cart" of God's mercies sloshes abundance on the earth below. they also sing: The "singers" here are the pastures and the valleys. The coming of God's kingdom to earth will be a magnificent time of productivity (67:6). This is the vow that remains to be performed (v. 1).

Psalm 66, a psalm of praise, offers significant contributions to our understanding of the values of biblical worship. In the course of the psalm, the poet offers descriptive praise, praising God for who He is and what He does, as well as declarative praise, praising God for specific answers to prayer. The structure of the psalm is as follows: (1) a call for all the earth to join in the celebratory worship of God (vv. 1–4); (2) an enumeration of reasons to worship God (vv. 5–7); (3) a call for the peoples to join the psalmist in descriptive praise of God (vv. 8–12); (4) the psalmist's decision to participate in holy worship (vv. 13–15); (5) declarative praise of God (vv. 16–19); (6) a final blessing of the Lord (v. 20).

66:1, 2 As in 100:1, the call is not only for the people of Israel, but for peoples of all the earth to join in the praise of the living God, the Most High (Pss. 87; 96; 117). Sing out the honor of His name: The Lord is pleased with music that praises His glorious name (Ex. 15:2). The Lord's name describes His character, so honoring God's name is honoring God Himself (Ex. 3:14, 15).

66:3, 4 How awesome: The works of God are designed to bring a sense of awe to people (19:1, 2). In this context, submit means "to cringe" before God. The term translated worship means "to kneel" or "to bow down." The opening verses of this psalm present a call and an expectation that one day all the earth will worship God, with a particular focus on the glory of God's name.

66:5–9 To bless God is to identify Him as the source of our blessing (103:1, 2). you peoples: The call is to all the nations of the earth (vv. 1, 4, 5). God's preservation of His people is one of many reasons to bless Him.

66:10–15 Your house refers to the temple in Jerusalem where God lived among His people. During periods of distress in his life, the poet made vows that when God brought him out of distress, he would publicly acknowledge God's deliverance (40:1–3; 61:5, 8; 76:11). Each of the sacrifices would be accompanied by the heart attitude of the true worshiper (John 4:23, 24). The psalmist speaks very personally of his intent to bring abundant sacrifices in his worship of God.

66:16–19 You who fear God refers to those who respond in awe and wonder to the Lord (v. 4). iniquity: Among the things that can block effective prayer is ongoing sin in a believer's life (Ps. 32). But the psalmist here confesses that God has heard. The psalmist appeals to the "peoples" in vv. 8, 9; he calls out to believers in vv. 16–19.

66:20 The concluding words of the poem are an affirmation of the psalmist’s blessing of the Lord (v. 8) based on his realization of God’s continuing goodness in his life.

Psalm 67, a psalm of praise, serves as a marvelous invocation and doxology in worship. The poem calls the nations of the world to praise God, to join Israel in honoring the Creator. There is: (1) a call for God's blessing for the purpose of world evangelization (vv. 1, 2); (2) a call for the nations to bless the Lord in view of His righteous judgments (vv. 3, 4); (3) a call for the nations to bless the Lord in view of His coming kingdom (vv. 5–7).

67:1, 2 cause His face to shine: In the language of the Aaronic benediction (Num. 6:24–26), the psalmist calls for God to smile on His people (Ps. 80). From the beginning, God had intended to bring His blessing to all nations, in fulfillment of the provisions of the Abrahamic covenant (Gen. 12:3). This passage anticipates the thrust of world mission that is found in the NT (Matt. 28:18–20; Acts 1:8). The point in this psalm is clear: May God bless His people Israel in such a manner that the message of God's way would become known throughout the earth.

67:3, 4 Let the peoples praise You: God's desire is for all people to praise Him, for He is their Creator and their Provider (2 Pet. 3:9). This should also be the desire of God's people.

67:5–7 yield her increase: As in the prophetic aspect of Ps. 65, the coming of God's kingdom on earth will be marked by a magnificent increase in production. The curse on the land (Gen. 3:17–19; Rom. 8:22) will be lifted in "the year of God's goodness" (65:11).

Psalm 68 is based in part on the Song of Deborah in Judg. 5. It speaks with great power of the glory of God. The first and last verses of the psalm (vv. 1, 35) capture its essence. The title refers to it as both a “Psalm” and a “Song,” indicating its musical nature. The structure of the psalm is as follows: (1) a call for God to rise in judgment against the wicked (vv. 1–3); (2) a call for the people of God to praise Him for His wonders and mercies (vv. 4–6); (3) a review of the works of God on behalf of His people (vv. 7–14); (4) a celebration of the city of God and His saving works (vv. 15–20); (5) an anticipation of the final victory of God over all His enemies (vv. 21–27); (6) an anticipation of the worship of God by the peoples of the earth (vv. 28–35).

IN CONTEXT

Blessings to Africa

With the relocation of the ark of the covenant to Jerusalem—the occasion for which Psalm 68 may have been composed—the Israelites must have felt that they were finally coming into their own as God's people. They were settled in the Promised Land. They were led by a good and righteous king. The Lord was their God, and His presence was assured as the holy ark was brought to Zion.

But in the midst of the celebration, David reminded his people that God's blessings would eventually extend far beyond Israel and its immediate circumstances. Nations throughout the world would learn about the Lord and come to worship Him (Ps. 68:32). These would include even such warlike peoples as the Egyptians and Ethiopians (68:31; 2 Chr. 14:12) who, during the days of the Israelite monarchy, were vying for power.

The promise of Psalm 68 was at least partially fulfilled in the first century A.D. when the treasurer of Candace, queen of Ethiopia, came to Jerusalem. After worshiping during the feast of Pentecost, he started out on his way home when he met a Christian named Philip. Philip explained to him the way of salvation in Christ, and the treasurer believed and was baptized as a Christian (Acts 8:26–40).

In this way, the message of Jesus reached into Africa. In fact, many modern-day Christians in Ethiopia view the treasurer's conversion as the beginning of their spiritual heritage. Through him, they feel directly linked to David, who foresaw the day when Ethiopians would "stretch out{ their} hands to God."

68:1–3 Let God arise … flee before Him: The presence of the wicked on the earth is an assault on God's holiness and a constant threat to the righteous. Only God's mercy compels Him to delay His judgment (75:2). But when God awakes, His enemies will be scattered; they will disappear like smoke. Let the righteous rejoice exceedingly: The joy of the righteous will be great when there is an end to all evil (58:10).

68:4 Extol Him who rides on the clouds: A well-known description of Baal was as "the rider of the clouds." Here the title is stripped from the supposed "god" Baal and given to the living God of Scripture. The fact that the Lord is the Rider of the clouds indicates that He is the One who brings rain and controls the powerful forces of a storm (147:8, 9, 15–18). YAH is a shortened form of the divine name Yahweh (Ex. 3:14, 15). There is a significant emphasis on the name of God in this section (122:4; 135:1–3).

68:5 The Lord is not limited to clouds and storms; He also meets the needs of the helpless. For all people, He is in His holy habitation, dispensing justice.

68:6–10 The poet describes the work of God on behalf of His people in poetic terms that recall the Exodus events and draw on the Song of Deborah (Judg. 5:4). The language of this section is also an expansion of the description in v. 4; this is the march of God as the true God of the Storm.

68:11 The term translated word refers to a command rather than a revelation. The command was that God's works would be made known among the peoples. Those who proclaimed it translates a feminine participle. Thus the people who made the proclamation were women, most likely the women who gave praise to God under the direction of Miriam (Ex. 15:20, 21).

68:12–14 The Almighty is the name Shaddai, a title that refers to the majesty and strength of the Lord (91:1). The scattering of kings refers to the early battles won by Israel during the wilderness period and at the time of the conquest of the land of Canaan.

68:15, 16 Bashan was a very fertile area northeast of the Sea of Galilee, a part of the former territory of Og. It is possible that the connotation of Bashan as a place of plenty is transferred poetically to Jerusalem in these verses, for it was only in Jerusalem that the Lord had sworn that he would dwell.

68:17, 18 When God delivered His people from Egypt, He brought them out with great treasures from the Egyptians (Ex. 12:35, 36). These gifts were used by the people of Israel to build the tabernacle (Ex. 35) that the LORD God might dwell there.

68:19, 20 This section is a benediction, a blessing on the Lord, for His daily mercies in the lives of the people of faith. The God of our salvation is a great title for the One who saved Israel from Egypt, who saved Israel from their sin, who continues to save His people in their daily lives, and who will glorify His people in the future.

68:21, 22 The Lord is the Victor over the enemies of His people. None shall escape, whether near—Bashan—or far—in the sea. Like grapes they will be crushed, and justice will finally be served (58:10) 68:23–28 The procession of God could refer to one of three things: (1) carrying the ark of the covenant through the wilderness during the time of the Exodus; (2) God leading as the Commander of His armies in Israel; (3) the grand procession of the Savior King as He comes to establish His reign on earth (Rev. 19:14–21). Timbrels, or tambourines, often played by women, were used for both sacred and secular occasions. Associated with dance, they suggested joy (81:2; 149:3; 150:4; Judg. 11:34; 1 Sam. 18:6, 7; 2 Sam. 6:5; Is. 30:32). The fountain of Israel is a poetic term for the people as they rise to praise God. little Benjamin: The role of Benjamin, one of the smaller tribes, was significant. Saul was from this tribe, and the city of Jerusalem was located within its borders.

68:29, 30 Kings … presents: The term presents means "gifts offered in homage." Royal guests came to Solomon with gifts (1 Kin. 10:1–10); but the ultimate prophetic fulfillment of this verse was in the kings who came to Jerusalem to bring gifts to the infant Jesus (Matt. 2:1–12). One day all kings will show their obedience and humility before Jesus, the great King (2:10–12; 76:11). Egypt, Assyria, and Canaan may be indicated by the phrases the beasts of the reeds, the herd of bulls, and the calves of the peoples. The point of these verses seems to be general submission to the royal house in Jerusalem.

68:31–35 The psalm ends with a celebration of the presence of God in the midst of His people. This section looks forward to the reign of Jesus the Savior King (Zeph. 3:14–17). Him who rides on the heaven of heavens is a development of the phrase found in v. 4. The Lord's voice is the thunder; God is the true God of storm (77:16–20) and Creator of the universe. When all things are considered, there is nothing in the universe that can be compared with God. Thus the poet says You are more awesome than Your holy places.

Psalm 69, a psalm of lament, is more specifically a protest of innocence. This highly messianic psalm presents a remarkable description of the suffering of Jesus Christ. Whereas Ps. 22 describes Jesus' physical sufferings, Ps. 69 focuses more on His emotional and spiritual suffering. Yet like Ps. 22, this psalm was written by David approximately a thousand years before the events it describes. Both psalms begin with the sufferings of David but have their full meaning in the sufferings of Jesus. For these reasons, the apostles in the NT acknowledge that David was a prophet of God (Acts 2:30). Its structure is as follows: (1) a cry for deliverance that expresses the psalmist's weariness (vv. 1–3); (2) a description of the psalmist's enemies (v. 4); (3) a lament that expresses the psalmist's sense of alienation (vv. 5–12); (4) a cry for deliverance from the mire (vv. 13–18); (5) a lament that expresses the psalmist's reproach (vv. 19–21); (6) a petition for God to bring His judgment on the wicked (vv. 22–28); (7) a determination to praise the Lord (vv. 29–36).

69:1–3 I sink in deep mire: The opening words of this psalm of anguish use the strong image of a person about to drown—not just in deep waters, but in muck (40:2). This powerfully descriptive language expresses extreme mental anguish. I am weary: As a drowning man might exhaust his voice entirely, so David is worn out from praying and crying out to the Lord (6:6).

69:4 hate me without cause: These words describe David's experience in a difficult period of his life. It seems that his foes are innumerable; but more devastating to him than their number is the fact that he has not caused their attack. Any attack is difficult; an unprovoked attack is intolerable. Yet these words also are prophetic of the sufferings of Jesus (35:19; 109:3–5; John 15:23–25).

69:5–12 zeal for Your house: Like Phinehas in Num. 25, David describes himself as a zealot for the house of the Lord. Jesus' cleansing of the temple was a fulfillment of these words (John 2:17). When I wept: Even the piety of David has become a reason for his enemies to chide him. Those who sit in the gate: The elders of the cities looked with contempt on David; similarly, many of the elders of Jerusalem held Jesus in disdain.

69:13–19 The words deliver me out of the mire tie the psalm together; compare the words of vv. 1–3. Hear me: This renewed plea to God is based on the character of the Lord; His lovingkindness or loyal love, and His tender mercies compelled David to keep looking to the Lord for deliverance.

69:20, 21 for my thirst: At one point during Jesus' suffering on the cross, He was offered vinegar to soothe His thirst (Matt. 27:34; Mark 15:23; Luke 23:36; John 19:28–30).

69:22–28 Pour out Your indignation upon them may refer to the Lord's judgment on His foes in this lament over Jerusalem. The words of v. 25 were fulfilled in Judas Iscariot. See Acts 1:20, in which the words of this verse are joined to the words of 109:8.

69:29–36 The phrase I am poor refers to a brokenness of spirit and sense of worthlessness caused by the assaults of the wicked. The poor in the psalms become a portrait of the Savior, illustrating the magnitude of Jesus' humility (described by Paul in Phil. 2:5–7). I will praise: David praised God in exuberant joy when the Lord saved him from the depths of despair. All humble people, especially those who suffer the indignities brought about by the wicked, will join in praise and joy before God their Savior.

Psalm 70, a psalm of lament, is a reprise of 40:13–17. The description of the poor and needy was such a necessary element in the encouragement of people enduring troubles that this section was selected for individual use as a freestanding poem.

70:1, 2 Let them be ashamed and confounded: David prays that those who rejoice in his misery will be proven wrong in their assumption that the Lord is unable to help His people. In this way, the Lord's deliverance of David will result in God's name being glorified—both by the joy of God's people and the shame of His enemies (vv. 3, 4).

70:3–5 The last three words of the psalm do not delay indicate the near-desperation of David. The cry echoes David's plea in v. 1 for the Lord to "come quickly" to save him. Even in panic-stricken despair, David does not forget to praise His Lord. He reminds Himself that the Lord is his only source of strength, help, and deliverance.

Psalm 71 is a psalm of lament with a major focus on the psalmist's trust in God. The psalm alternates between expressions of desperate need and resolute trust in the Lord. In this interplay, the psalmist models the way believers should react to suffering. A believer should completely trust the Lord in a difficult situation, but at the same time cry out to Him for deliverance. The poet describes himself as an old man who has trusted in God for a long time (vv. 9, 18). In his great time of need, he asks God to be faithful to His servant. The structure of the psalm is as follows: (1) a confession of the psalmist's resolute trust in God (vv. 1–3); (2) petitions for God to deliver the psalmist from trouble (vv. 4–6); (3) a determination to praise God even in the midst of trouble (vv. 7, 8); (4) petitions for deliverance (vv. 9–11); (5) a call for judgment on the psalmist's enemies (vv. 12, 13); (6) a commitment to trust and praise God (vv. 14–16); (7) a renewal of the psalmist's petitions based on his experience of God's faithfulness (vv. 17, 18); (8) a renewal of trust in God (vv. 19–21); (9) a determination to praise God (vv. 22–24).

71:1 The theme of the psalm is stated in this verse. On the basis of resolute trust (61:4; 91:3), the psalmist asks that he never be put to shame. Trusting in God is never foolish (4:2; 119:31).

71:2, 3 in Your righteousness: The psalmist is concerned not only with his own plight but with the character of God (vv. 15, 16, 19, 24). The psalmist's point is that God could display His righteousness by answering the needs of the psalmist, whose life had been lived in constant trust in God. strong refuge: The Hebrew words mean literally "rock fortress." The Lord is the only source of continual protection for the psalmist.

71:4 The Hebrew root of deliver me means "to cause to escape" (17:13; 37:40; 144:2). After asking for deliverance, the poet reasserts his strong faith in God, calling Him his hope and his trust, the One who has sustained him from his birth (22:10). He prays in faith, not allowing his circumstances to cause him to doubt the goodness of God.

71:5–7 a wonder: The poet declares that the work of God in his life has made him a special sign to the people, similar to the great miracles of God through Moses and Aaron in Egypt (Ex. 7:3; 11:9).

71:8–11 The poet uses familiar images in the psalms of lament (Ps. 13) to encourage God to respond to his need. in the time of old age: The psalmist has trusted in God his entire life (v. 6); it would be sad if he were dismissed by the Lord late in life (v. 18). Not only was the psalmist's own life and comfort at stake, but so was the reputation of God. If the enemies concluded that God has forsaken him, then the reputation of the Lord would be tarnished in the world.

71:12, 13 do not be far: These words evoke the language of 22:1, 19. confounded: The language of this verse is imprecatory (Ps. 137); the poet calls for justice and vengeance against his enemies, for they are in fact enemies of the living God (v. 24).

71:14–16 I will hope: The Hebrew text has an emphatic pronoun meaning "as for me," bringing determination to the poet's words. The Hebrew verb translated hope describes a confident expectation that God will intervene and deliver (147:11).

“wonderous works”

(Heb. pala) (71:17; 107:8; 118:23; 119:27) Strong’s #6381: The core meaning of this word is “to do something extraordinary.” In reference to people, the word is used to describe an action or understanding beyond the normal capacity of humans (Deut. 17:8; 30:11; 2 Sam. 13:2; Prov. 30:18) or beyond normal obligations (Lev. 22:21; 27:2; Num. 6:2; 15:3, 8). However, the highest sense of the word is reserved for God alone, especially in the Psalms in which it occurs most frequently and always in reference to God (72:18; 136:4). God is wonderful in counsel; nothing is too marvelous for Him (Gen. 18:14; Is. 28:29). His wondrous works are cosmic (107:24; Job 37:14), national (Ex. 3:20; Is. 29:14), and personal (31:21; Job 10:16). Not everyone understands them (106:7; 78:32), but the Bible exhorts believers to remember these wonderful works of God and publicly praise Him for them (96:3; 105:2, 5; 1 Chr. 16:9, 12, 24).

71:17, 18 youth … old and grayheaded: The poet has trusted in God all his life. In his old age, he faces a crisis. He fully expects that God in His righteousness (vv. 2, 15, 16, 19, 24) will respond favorably to his request to deliver him and preserve him from shame (v. 1). For his part, the psalmist will continue to praise the Lord.

71:19, 20 The poet speaks of the great things that God had done, for which He is worthy of praise. He also speaks of the great and severe troubles that he has experienced at God’s hand, and from which he seeks relief. Depths of the earth is a metaphor for the psalmist’s despondency (40:2); he feels as though he has already dropped headlong into a pit.

71:21–23 The poem concludes with a bold vow of praise, in confident expectation that the psalmist’s prayer will be answered. The poet praises God with the lute, but also with his lips. At the same time, his inner being, his soul, is filled with praises to the living God.

71:24 brought to shame: The psalm comes full circle with the word shame. The poet begins by asking the Lord to prevent him from becoming shamed (v. 1), and he ends the poem with a declaration that the wicked have been shamed. The Lord has answered his prayer; He has protected His righteous servant.

Psalm 72, a royal psalm, is one of two psalms (Ps. 127) ascribed to Solomon, the son of David. King Solomon might have arranged David's psalms in something like their present order, then appended his own psalm to the group (v. 20). This psalm is intensely messianic, speaking in ideal terms of the coming of the great King. On the basis of the ideals of ancient Middle Eastern royalty, the psalm calls for a good king to govern Israel under God's blessing. Ultimately this King is the Savior Jesus. The psalm has the following structure: (1) a call for a reign of judgment (vv. 1–4); (2) anticipation of a reign of righteousness (vv. 5–7); (3) a vision of a universal reign (vv. 8–11); (4) a vision of a reign of compassionate justice (vv. 12–14); (5) a prediction of a reign of great blessing (vv. 15–17); (6) praise for the God who will establish this glorious reign (vv. 18–20).

72:1–7 Fear You is an expression of wonder, awe, reverence, worship, and obedience. He shall come down: The great King is pictured as the gentle rains of God's blessing on the earth. His reign will lead to true peace, the state of things as they really ought to be.

72:8–12 The promises of God to Abraham included a promise that his descendants would have dominion over the land of Canaan (Gen. 15:18–21). These verses expand the geographical dimensions to include the entire earth. The River refers to the Euphrates—a distant, significant waterway that many Israelites hoped would become the extent of their kingdom. The glorious coming King will have the river as a near border; His territory will extend to the ends of the earth. No one will escape the power of His reign, not even those in the wilderness. lick the dust: The King's enemies will have their faces to the ground in forced submission to His majesty. Tarshish and Sheba were the most distant places known to the Israelites; they suggest distances beyond Solomon's imagination. As Solomon had received gifts from the queen of Sheba (1 Kin. 10:1–10), so he predicted that the coming King would receive gifts from rulers all over the earth.

72:13, 14 This section emphasizes the work of the King on behalf of the poor and needy. precious shall be their blood: The blood shed by the needy points to the blood the Savior shed on the Cross (Heb. 12:24). No wonder Jesus finds the shed blood of others to be precious.

72:15–17 The promise of life in the words He shall live is a messianic theme (16:10, 11; 91:16; 118:17, 18), for the coming Savior is the only One who grants true life (John 11:25). gold of Sheba: This is a reference to v.

10. The name of the great King will be regarded as the greatest name in the universe; Paul speaks this way of Jesus' name in Phil. 2:9–11.

72:18, 19 These magnificent words of benediction mark the conclusion of the psalm, as well as the conclusion of Book II of the Psalms. The repetition of the word blessed, the focus on the name (as in 89:16), and the double Amen all indicate that this psalm was used in the worship of God in His temple.

72:20 The prayers of David: The superscription of Ps. 72 attributes the psalm to Solomon. It is possible that Solomon wrote this poem in honor of his father David at the end of an early edition of the psalms so far collected. Other psalms were added later to this original collection.

Psalm 73 is a psalm of trust with some features of the wisdom psalms. the psalm is unusual in that it tells a story about the psalmist's struggle with envy, doubts, and his faith in God. But through his struggles, the psalmist Asaph learned to trust in God. The structure of the poem is as follows: (1) the temptation to be envious of the wicked (vv. 1–3); (2) a description of the wicked (vv. 4–14); (3) the realization that the end of the wicked is the balancing factor (vv. 15–20); (4) the psalmist's regret over his uncertainty (vv. 21–24); (5) a renewed resolve to trust in God alone (vv. 25, 26); (6) the destruction of the wicked (v. 27); (7) a renewed trust in God (v. 28).

73:1–4 In the opening verses Asaph describes the crisis of faith he experienced. He begins with one of the basic elements of biblical theology, that God is good to Israel (100:5; 106:1; 107:1). But then he confesses that he almost stumbled when he became envious of the success and wealth of the wicked.

73:5, 6 Asaph observes that the attitudes and actions of the wicked seem to place no constraints upon them. They appear not to have trouble. Their pride and violence are not hidden but are displayed like jewelry. They fulfill their lustful appetites and boast about their wicked accomplishments.

73:7–12 Asaph describes the apathy about God characteristic of the wicked, who had concluded that God—if there was a God—was disengaged from people's lives. Asaph is bothered by the fact that with this aberrant view of life the wicked are still able to enjoy life, drink their fill, and live at ease. Thus the psalmist feels that his own acts of righteous living are without meaning or purpose.

73:13–18 untrue: Asaph realizes that if he continued on this path, he would be abandoning the faith. He finds the issue painful to consider until he comes to a new sense of enlightenment in the sanctuary, the temple in Jerusalem. He rediscovered something he probably knew but had not really considered: the prosperity of the wicked will not last. Their wealth will have no value in the next life.

73:19 Asaph remembers that the wicked are just a step away from disaster. In a moment they could find all of their wealth valueless and their pleasure vanished as they face an eternity separated from the presence of their Creator.

73:20–24 Asaph was grieved because of his own lapse of faith (vv. 1–3). In the manner of a wisdom psalm, he speaks of his own foolishness. like a beast: An animal has no sense of eternity and a divine perspective. The poet was making an animal-like decision when he began to wonder about the wicked (vv. 1–3). But God had never left him, even when he struggled with doubts. And afterward: What helped the psalmist gain a proper perspective on this life was the afterlife. The righteous will have the glorious privilege of living with God forever.

73:25–28 The contrast between the words shall perish and draw near to God explains the heart of the psalm. There are those who may enjoy great wealth and notoriety today, but nothing they have or do will last forever. Therefore, Asaph concludes he has put his trust in the Lord GOD. Only those who place their trust in God will find eternal life and eternal peace.

Psalm 74 is a lament psalm of the community (as is Ps. 80) and a powerful presentation of Hebrew poetry at its best. The poem describes God's actions in the past and the desire of His people for Him to act in the present. In some ways, Ps. 75 may be regarded as the Lord's answer to the difficult questions of Ps. 74. This is one of eleven psalms attributed to Asaph (Pss. 50; 73–83). The outline of the poem is: (1) a community lament over a foreign invasion (vv. 1–8); (2) a community complaint that there appears to be no hope (vv. 9–11); (3) a recounting of God's historic victories against evil powers (vv. 12–17); (4) a petition for God to remember His covenant and deliver His people (vv. 18–21); (5) a call for God to act on His own behalf against His enemies (vv. 22, 23).

74:1, 2 O God, why is a classic lament in the Psalms (13:1). The invasion of a foreign power into Judah and Jerusalem had devastated the people. The foreign invader is viewed as an expression of the anger of the Lord. The principal call of the psalm is for the Lord to remember His people and the foolish ridicule of their enemies (vv. 18, 22). In his appeal to God the poet uses a series of endearing terms to describe the people of God: the sheep of Your pasture, Your congregation, the tribe of Your inheritance, and this Mount Zion. The psalmist also focuses on the loving actions of God for His people in the past: You have purchased, You have redeemed, You have dwelt. In the context of God's past faithfulness to the people He has chosen, the poet calls upon God to deliver His people in their time of need (vv. 20, 22).

74:3–10 Lift up Your feet is a call for God "to get up and walk" to see what is going on. The worst part of the enemy invasion was the desecration of the temple in Jerusalem. Several terms are used to describe this holy place: the sanctuary, Your meeting place, and the dwelling place of Your name.

74:11 The poet calls on God to fight against the enemy, to extend His right hand to protect and deliver the people as He had during the Exodus (63:8; Ex. 15:6).

74:12 The Lord is King by virtue of His creation of the earth (Ps. 93). He is King because of His special relationship with Israel (44:4; 99:1–3). And He is the coming King who will reign over all (96:13; 97:1–6; 98:6–9). from of old: The poet recalls the ancient victories of the Lord over the dark forces in a poetic recasting of the events of creation. Salvation here refers to God's deliverance of earth from the dark forces represented by the waters and serpents (vv. 13–15).

74:13 the sea … the heads of the sea serpents: In Canaanite mythology, the sea and its serpents joined together as enemies of Baal. Supposedly Baal was victorious over these enemies and subsequently became king. The poets of the Bible use the language of Canaanite myth to describe the victories of God in the formation of the earth, in the deliverance of His people from Egypt, and in future battles (77:16–20; 93:1–5; Is. 27:1; 51:9, 10). The division of the waters described in Gen. 1:6–8 is viewed as a battle in which God was victorious over both sea and serpents.

74:14 One of the enemies of Baal was the sea monster Lotan. In Hebrew literature this figure became the Leviathan. The name speaks poetically of various evil forces over which God has ultimate control and victory. Eventually the Leviathan became a symbol for Satan (Is. 27:1) who is "the dragon, that serpent of old" (Rev. 20:2). In this context, the people refers to beasts.

74:15 the fountain: The Lord gave water to the people of Israel in the wilderness (Ex. 17:5, 6; Num. 20:8–13). mighty rivers: He also enabled His people to cross over the Red Sea (Ex. 14) and the River Jordan (Josh. 3).

74:16, 17 In His great works of creation (Gen. 1) God established His rule over day, night, light, and the sun. In addition, He established the seasons and set borders, a reference to the limitations He placed on the waters (Prov. 8:27–29). Asaph's argument is that since God is in control, why was He allowing chaos in Israel?

74:18–21 Three times in this poem the poet calls upon God to remember (vv. 2, 22). In addition to appealing to the honor of God's name (v. 10), the poet uses endearing terms for God's people who are in distress: Your turtledove, Your poor, the oppressed, and the poor and needy. These were the people with whom the Lord Himself had chosen to make a covenant.

74:22, 23 The phrase plead Your own cause refers to a legal complaint and is often used by the prophets in contexts of impending judgment on Israel (Mic. 6:1). For the third time in this poem (vv. 2, 18), God is asked to remember His stake in Israel and His need to defend His own reputation against foolish people.

Psalm 75, a grand psalm of praise (Ps. 100), contains a lively interchange between the people, the psalmist, and the Lord. For other psalms in which the Lord speaks, see Pss. 12; 75; 87; 91. In some ways this psalm may be regarded as God's answer to the questions presented in Ps. 74. The structure of the psalm is based on its varied speakers: (1) the people's praise of God for the sense of His presence (v. 1); (2) God's announcement of His sovereign determination to judge the earth at the proper time (vv. 2–5); (3) the people's declaration that God is the true Judge (vv. 6–9); (4) God's declaration of His intention to bring final judgment (v. 10).

75:1 Thanks indicates public acknowledgment of God. Your wondrous works speaks of the actions only God can perform, those that instill a sense of awe on the part of His people. Your name is near: God Himself is ready to intervene on the part of His people.

75:2 When I choose the proper time: God will not be rushed—not even by His people. Uprightly indicates the fullness and perfection of God's justice.

75:3 The earth … dissolved: In times of great stress, it may seem that the world is falling apart (60:2). God's response is I set up its pillars firmly. God has not abandoned His people, nor has He given up His authority.

75:4, 5 On the basis of God's determination to wait until the "proper time" (v. 2), there are strong warnings to boastful and wicked people who misinterpret God's delay and think there will be no judgment. The horn is an ancient symbol of strength. The wicked strut around like powerful animals, brandishing symbols of power with no thought of God. But the power of the wicked is feeble compared to the strength of the Almighty (v. 10).

75:6, 7 The words God is the Judge establish the fact that He is the true ruler of the universe (50:6; 58:11). He puts down … exalts: As Daniel declares in his prayer (Dan. 2:20–22), God is sovereign in the world's affairs.

75:8, 9 This is not a cup of blessing, but of the Lord's wrath. The biblical image of wine and judgment goes back to Jacob's blessing on Judah (Gen. 49:11) and is referred to in Christ's judgment as depicted in Rev. 19:13–15.

75:10 The psalm concludes with the words of God. Here God depicts the contrasting fates of the wicked and the righteous. horn: The wicked have proudly lifted up their horn (vv. 4, 5) by boasting in their strength. The Lord will take away the very strength in which they have boasted.

Psalm 76 is a psalm of praise with a strong focus on the fear of God. The psalm has four movements: (1) a celebration of the center of worship in Jerusalem (vv. 1–3); (2) a celebration of the victories of God against His enemies (vv. 4–6); (3) a description of the fear of the earth at the anger of God (vv. 7–10); (4) an exhortation to the righteous to worship the Lord (vv. 11, 12).

76:1–3 The word translated tabernacle is literally a "lair," like that of a great lion. Salem is the shortened form of the name Jerusalem.

76:4–6 more glorious and excellent: Nothing in all the universe or in all eternity can ever be compared with God (77:13). His glory and beauty are unsurpassed and His power is unassailable. Chariot and horse refers to the defeat of the army of Pharaoh (Ex. 14; 15).

76:7 The repetition of pronouns You, Yourself is for emphasis: Only the Almighty is to be feared. For the righteous, the fear of God is a response of awe, wonder, adoration, and worship. For the wicked, the fear of God is terror, for there is no escape from Him (14:5).

76:8–10 judgment to be heard: In God's victories over the enemies of His people, word of God's glory and justice would spread to the entire world. Even the wrath of men will praise God because any anger against God is utterly futile. As Paul writes, "For who has resisted His will?" (Rom. 9:19). A person's futile hostility to God will only result in a demonstration of God's power and a subsequent glorification of His name. See the Lord's response to Pharaoh (Ex. 11:9).

76:11, 12 The psalmist instructs the righteous in the true worship of the sovereign Lord of creation. Make vows: These are vows of praise, sacrifice, and faithful living (61:5, 8; 66:13; Heb. 13:15). As one might bring presents to a king (72:10), so the righteous should bring their gifts to God—the ultimate gift being the dedication of their lives to the service of God (Rom. 12:1).

Psalm 77 is a psalm of a troubled believer. It is marked by a sense of inward trouble and reflection. Key terms in the psalm are the verbs “to remember” and “to meditate.” The outline is as follows: (1) a cry to God (vv. 1–3); (2) doubts (vv. 4–6); (3) a question: Has God forgotten? (vv. 7–9); (4) focus on the goodness of God (vv. 10–12); (5) remembrance of the incomparability of God (vv. 13–15); (6) remembrance that God is Lord of the sea (vv. 16–20).

77:1, 2 stretched out: Asaph was in such need that he held his hand out before the Lord throughout the night (63:4; 134:1, 2). All the while, he groaned and complained as he remembered God. What he knew of God contrasted with what he was experiencing. The more the psalmist thought about these things, the more troubled he became.

77:3–6 You hold my eyelids open: Asaph could not sleep (63:6). Through the night he thought about his situation and his past (vv. 4–6), but most importantly he turned to God. First he cries out to the Lord in anguish (vv. 7–9). But then his focus changes; he reminds himself of the power of God and all the miraculous things the Lord has done (vv. 10–20).

77:7–9 Wondering if God is finished with him, Asaph asks if the Lord will ever show mercy to him again. Each of the verses presents painful questions; perhaps none as difficult as the one in v. 9: Has God forgotten to be gracious? Asaph was at the depths of despair.

77:10–13 I will remember the works of the LORD: Asaph made a conscious decision to turn from his pain and focus his thoughts on the person, works, and wonders of God. His first focus is on the incomparability of God. Who is so great a God as our God? With this question Asaph reminds himself that the living God cannot be compared to any other god or power. This wondrous God demonstrated His power in a variety of ways, but especially in the redemption of Israel from Egypt.

77:14–18 Asaph now turns his thoughts to God’s sovereignty over the powers of the sea, His control over the waters and the depths (74:12–15; 93:1–5). Moreover, the Almighty controls the skies, for a storm as depicted in these verses is merely a response to His strength. Your arrows is a poetic description of lightning.

(Heb. ‘or) (18:28; 76:4; 77:18; 97:4; Job 33:30; Eccl. 8:1) Strong’s #215: This Hebrew word is the common word meaning “to give light.” The author of Proverbs likens the life of the just to the light of the sun (Prov. 4:18). For one’s eyes to be lit means that one has been revived or has received wisdom or understanding (13:3; 19:8; 1 Sam. 14:27–29; Ezra 9:8). The common prayer request that God would cause His face to shine upon someone was always, except for one possible early exception (Num. 6:25), a petition that God would grant mercy from distress (31:16; 67:1; 80:3, 7, 19; 119:135; Dan. 9:17). In the present passage, as elsewhere, the light is from the glory of God’s presence, which is to be reflected by His people (Is. 60:1–3; Ezek. 43:2). One day, the light of the sun and moon will be completely replaced by the light of God’s glory (Is. 60:19, 20; Rev. 21:23; 22:5).

77:19 This verse presents images of God as the Lord of the storm (vv. 16–18) and the sea, walking on the waters. The term great waters may be rephrased “many waters” (18:16; 32:6; 144:7). The point is that the waters are no threat to God, for they are merely another pathway for Him to walk.

77:20 God is Lord of His people. He is the Shepherd who leads His flock, as He has done from the time of Moses and Aaron. Lost in contemplation of the greatness of God, the poet seems thoroughly distracted from his pain. He does not mention it again, not daring to compare it to the greatness of the Almighty.

Psalm 78, a wisdom psalm, relates the early history of Israel in a dramatic poetic alternation between reports of the faithfulness of God to His people and of their periodic outbreaks of stubbornness, willfulness, and rebellion against Him. Only Ps. 119 is longer. With his great command of Scripture, Asaph expresses an intense desire that the present generation not repeat the failures of so many past generations. The structure of the poem is as follows: (1) the lesson of the past works of God in Israel's history (vv. 1–4); (2) an exhortation for each generation to teach the next (vv. 5–8); (3) the rebellion of the people of Ephraim (vv. 9–11); (4) God's marvelous salvation of Israel in the Exodus (vv. 12–16); (5) the people's complaints (vv. 17–20); (6) God's anger against the ungrateful people (vv. 21–25); (7) God's judgment through the quail (vv. 26–31); (8) the continuing unbelief of the people (vv. 32, 33); (9) the people's remembrance of God's true character and God's remembrance of the people's weaknesses (vv. 34–39); (10) God's faithfulness and the people's unfaithfulness (vv. 40–55); (11) Israel's sins during the period of the judges (vv. 56–64); (12) God's victory over Israel's enemies (vv. 65, 66); (13) God's choice of Judah, Jerusalem, and David (vv. 67–72).

78:1, 2 The psalmist uses the vocabulary of the wisdom school to establish himself. My law is the familiar word Torah. The wisdom writers use this word to connote insight; their instruction is always in accord with the "instruction" of Moses (Prov. 1:8; 3:1; 4:2). The terms parable and dark sayings or riddles indicate sayings with "deeper meanings" or "teachings with a point" (Prov. 1:6). With the words my people the psalmist shows himself to be one with them even though he stands over them as their teacher.

78:3, 4 Asaph explains that the teaching was designed to be passed from one generation to the next, so that each generation would contribute to the praises of the LORD. The phrase His strength and His wonderful works means "His extraordinarily wonderful works."

78:5, 6 The testimony God established was a lasting procedure, a means whereby one generation would pass on to the next the need to know the Lord. the generation to come: The psalm will make the point that the generations had not handed on the teaching as they should have.

78:7, 8 Because their fathers did not believe in God, the present generation needs to be different from their predecessors.

78:9 Asaph's first illustration of the faithlessness of previous generations is taken from an incident in which the people of Ephraim rejected God. The poet may be referring to Ephraim's conflict with Jephthah (Judg. 12:1–7).

78:10–16 The poet celebrates the marvelous things God did for Israel in delivering them from Egypt, especially at the crossing of the Red Sea (Ex. 14), the signs of God's presence with His people (Ex. 13:21), and the bringing of water from the rock in the wilderness (Ex. 17:1–7; Num. 20:1–13).

78:17, 18 The Hebrew word translated rebelling here is translated provoked in two other places in this poem (vv. 40, 56). food of their fancy: This derisive language is used to describe the outrageous ungratefulness of the Israelites as they clamored for food and water in the wilderness.

78:19–28 God's anger against His people centered on their lack of faith and trust in Him, evidenced by their contempt for the manna He gave them. The poet refers to God's manna as the bread of heaven and angels' food. The Israelites audaciously rejected the food of angels.

78:29–31 For He gave them their own desire: People of true faith will seek God's will and respond in grateful praise. Self-centered people will simply complain and suffer the result.

78:32, 33 In spite of this: The poet says that the people had suffered enough from their ingratitude to have learned the lesson of faith. Unfortunately, they had not learned. So God determined that they would not enter the land of Canaan but would spend their days in futility.

78:34–37 The people tended to remember the true character of God only when pressed to do so by His judgments; but God always remembered (v. 39) the frail nature of the people. The image of God as a rock is found in Moses (Deut. 32:4) and is developed elsewhere in the Psalms (61:2; 62:2, 7; 91:1, 2; 144:1). God as Redeemer is the Savior, who rescued Israel from Egypt just as He also delivered them from their sins (19:14; Is. 41:14; 44:6). The title Most High God emphasizes the majesty and power of God. God surpasses all powers, all creation, and nothing can be compared to Him. It is utter folly for a person to shake a small fist at the Most High. This title is found three times in this psalm (vv. 17, 35, 56); it is also found in 7:17; 9:2; 18:13; 21:7; 46:4; 50:14; 56:2; 57:2; 73:11; 77:10; 82:6; 83:18; 87:5; 91:1, 9; 92:1; 107:11.

78:38 full of compassion: The awesome transcendence of the Lord is complemented in this section (v. 35) by an emphasis on His compassionate mercy.

78:39–42 The verb translated provoked here is used three times in this psalm (rebelling in v. 17; v. 56). Even though God had showered blessings on His people, they provoked Him with their contempt and ingratitude. The Holy One of Israel (89:18) is a phrase particularly favored by the prophet Isaiah (Is. 1:4; 5:24).

78:43–55 This section is a poetic retelling of the way God helped Israel in Egypt and during the wilderness years. Verses 43–51 recount the ten plagues of Ex. 7–12, and vv. 52, 53 speak of the deliverance of Israel at the Red Sea (Ex. 14). Verse 54 speaks of the experience at Mount Sinai, and v. 55 summarizes the conquest of the land of Canaan.

78:56 Tested and provoked may be rephrased "thoroughly provoked." The title Most High is used three times in this poem (vv. 17, 35), as is the Hebrew word for provoked (vv. 17, 40). The two words emphasize the seriousness of the Israelites' action; they were rebelling against their Creator, the Ruler of the entire universe.

78:57–67 A different Hebrew word from the one used in v. 56 is used for provoked here, but it conveys the same idea. High places refers to the places where the Canaanites worshiped Baal and other fertility gods. Carved images were fertility symbols from Canaanite cults. The reference to Shiloh places this period of Israel's apostasy in the latter period of the judges (1 Sam. 1:3). His strength and His glory are unusual ways of speaking of the ark of the covenant, which was lost to the Philistines during the battle of Aphek (1 Sam. 4:1–11). At this time the suffering of the people was acute, including even the deaths of priests (1 Sam. 4:17, 18).

78:68–71 The choice of Judah over the other tribes and of Zion over other cities is explained only in terms of God's sovereignty and love. The description of the sanctuary suggests that this psalm was written after Solomon's temple was built.

78:72 The words of praise for David in v. 72 are very close to 1 Kin. 9:4, suggesting some connection between the two passages. The shepherding attributed to David is an ideal; it will be fully realized in the Savior King, Jesus, the true Good Shepherd (Ps. 23; John 10).

Psalm 79, a lament of the community (Ps. 80), was written in response to an attack on the city of Jerusalem and the sacking of the holy temple. In these respects this psalm is similar to Ps. 74. It is possible that the event behind the psalm was the destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians; however, it may have been an earlier, less final devastation. The development of the poem is as follows: (1) a lament for the devastation of Jerusalem (vv. 1–4); (2) a call for God to punish the enemies of Judah and Jerusalem (vv. 5–7); (3) a plea for forgiveness and deliverance (vv. 8–10); (4) a prayer for God to help His people and judge their enemies (vv. 11, 12); (5) a vow of praise in anticipation of the Lord's deliverance (v. 13).

79:1 the nations have come: The words of this section are quite similar in tone to 74:1–8. Your holy temple: It is not clear whether the destruction described in this verse was what the Babylonians did in 586 B.C. The ruin of Jerusalem—it was in heaps—may indicate an invasion of the land prior to its total destruction.

79:2–4 The lament over the dead defenders of Jerusalem is similar to the words of Jer. 7:32–34; Lam. 4:1–10. reproach … derision: The wording is very close to 44:13.

79:5 The question how long is a standard element in the lament psalms (13:1, 2; 80:4). The question is based on the Lord's eternal character. Since God is eternal, Asaph asks, will He be angry forever?

79:6, 7 Pour out Your wrath: An imprecation or curse on one's enemies is often found in the psalms of lament (Ps. 137). Vengeance is left to the Lord, but such a call for vengeance is based in part on the covenant provisions God had established with Abraham. God had promised to curse those who cursed Abraham's descendants (Gen. 12:2, 3).

79:8–10 The appeal is based on the character of God as expressed by His name (Ex. 3:14, 15; 6:2, 3). Another basis for the poet's appeal is the international reputation of God (42:10). If God delivered the Israelites, His power would be demonstrated to all the nations.

79:11, 12 Groaning may also be translated crying. Your power refers to the powerful, outstretched arm of God that had delivered Israel from Egypt (Ex. 6:6). Reproach refers to an insult or taunt (74:10, 18, 22).

79:13 Sheep of Your pasture describes the Israelites. God's care for the Israelites was so great that they were called His sheep (77:20; 95:7; 100:3). The people vowed to bring thanks, or public acknowledgment (35:18; 105:1), and praise to God.

Psalm 80, a lament of the community, has especially powerful imagery. The psalm is marked by two metaphors for Israel in its relation to God: (1) the flock of the Good Shepherd; (2) the vine of the True Vinedresser. Both of these metaphors are used by Jesus of His people in the NT (John 10; 15). This is one of Asaph's psalms (Pss. 50; 73—83) and is set to the tune "The Lilies" (Pss. 45; 69). The structure of the poem is as follows: (1) a call for the Shepherd of Israel to restore the distressed (vv. 1–3); (2) a complaint concerning the Lord's anger against His people (vv. 4–7); (3) the metaphor of a vine (vv. 8–13); (4) an appeal for God to return, revive, and restore Israel (vv. 14–19).

80:1, 2 O Shepherd of Israel is reminiscent of the teaching of Ps. 23 and points forward to the teaching of John 10. God's pattern is to lead His people as a shepherd might lead a flock. between the cherubim: In the Most Holy Place, the ark of the covenant was topped by the mercy seat on which were two cherubim, heavenly symbols of the throne of God (Ex. 25:22). shine forth: After Moses had been in close proximity to the Lord, his own face was transformed by a resplendent glow (Ex. 34:29–35). Here the appeal means that the Lord should make His presence known in a saving manner. The tribes Ephraim, Benjamin, and Manasseh may be representative of the whole nation. Ephraim was in the north; Benjamin was where Jerusalem was located; Manasseh was partly across the Jordan.

80:3 Cause Your face to shine is reminiscent of the priestly benediction, "The Lord make His face shine upon you" (Num. 6:25).

80:4, 5 Since their request for deliverance has seemed to go unanswered, the people ask whether God's anger is directed even against their prayer. The phrases bread of tears and tears to drink refer to the manna and water that God provided for Israel in the wilderness. The idea is that God had given the people of past generations nourishing food; but the people of this generation have only their tearful despair.

80:6–11 God's bringing the Israelites from Egypt to Canaan is compared to transplanting a vine. The vine grew phenomenally, so that it filled the land and reached to the Mediterranean Sea and the Euphrates River. These expansions of the Lord's vine occurred during the reigns of David and Solomon.

80:12 But then there came a dramatic change. The Lord broke down her hedges—that is, He removed Israel's protective walls. Israel became weak, subject to all kinds of assaults.

80:13–17 Look down from heaven: The appeal is for the heavenly Vinedresser to observe the sorry state of His vine. The Hebrew word translated visit can describe a gracious visit of the Lord (65:9) or a visit in judgment. Of course, the prayer offered is for a merciful visit from Israel's Protector. The appeal is for God to use His right hand (Ex. 15:6) to restore what He had planted. The Hebrew term for vineyard is used only here in the Bible; it literally means "root-stock." Branch means "son"; it is the same Hebrew word translated son of man in v. 17. The nation of Israel was God's own son (Ex. 4:22).

80:18, 19 Revive us is a call for new life from God's Spirit. We will call upon Your name: In response to God's work of deliverance, the poet promises renewed praise centered on the name of God.

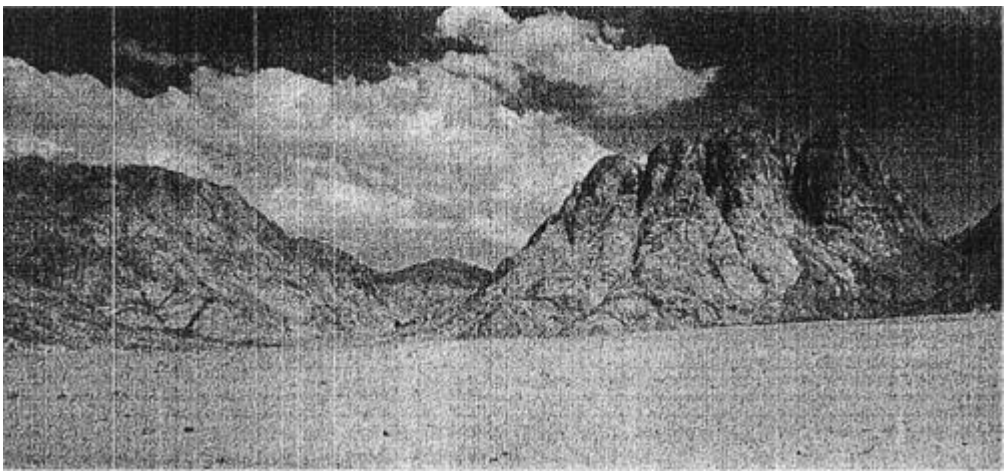
Psalm 81 begins as a psalm of praise and becomes a psalm of admonition (Ps. 50), in which the voice of the Lord Himself is heard (Ps. 75). The structure of the poem is as follows: (1) a call for the people to praise the Lord (vv. 1, 2); (2) a command for the people to celebrate the New Moon festival (vv. 3–5); (3) the Lord's report of His deliverance of His people (vv. 6, 7); (4) the Lord's admonition concerning idolatry (vv. 8–10); (5) the Lord's description of Israel's failure to obey Him (vv. 11, 12); (6) the Lord's lamentation of Israel's failure to obey (vv. 13–16).

81:1 Sing aloud … Make a joyful shout: The energy level of this psalm is similar to that of other psalms of praise (33:1–3; 35:27, 28; 66:1–4; 95:1, 2; 100:1, 2). The use of voices and instruments to praise God is a standard element of joyful worship in the Psalms (Pss. 149; 150).

81:2–5 The New Moon festival is mentioned in association with the Feast of Trumpets (Num. 29:6). Regulations for this festival can be found in the instructions to the Levites during the time of David (1 Chr. 23:31) and Solomon (2 Chr. 2:4). This psalm seems to be a basic instruction on the festival. a statute … a law … a testimony: The language and regulations of this passage are as solemn as any in the Torah. The basis for the New Moon festival was the salvation of Israel from Egypt. a language: As in 114:1, there is a disdain for the history, culture, and language of Egypt.



Mount Sinai (right), where God appeared to Moses and delivered the Ten Commandments in an act of self-revelation. The psalmist refers to this historic event in Psalm 81:6, 7.

81:6, 7 his shoulder … His hands: This is a poetic way of describing how God delivered His people from the Egyptian taskmasters (Ex. 1). I answered you: The Lord's appearance to Moses on Mount Sinai was God's great revelation of Himself (Ex. 19; 20).

81:8–10 The phrase translated I will admonish you is also found in 50:7, where it is translated "I will testify against you." The basic stipulation of the first commandment is repeated: there must be no foreign god among the Israelites (Ex. 20:3). God's great description of His own saving work for the Israelites is quoted from Ex. 20:2. Then the Lord invites His people to open their mouth so that He can meet their needs (v. 16).

81:11–16 The people's resistance to obeying God led to their punishment. God identifies the root of the people's problem as their own stubborn heart. They wanted to follow their own ways and refused to listen to God.

Psalm 82 is a wisdom psalm. The structure of the psalm is as follows: (1) God’s call for the judges of the earth to appear in the heavenly assembly (vv. 1, 2); (2) God’s review of His commands to the judges of the earth (vv. 3, 4); (3) God’s hearing of the complaint of the oppressed (v. 5); (4) God’s announcement of His judgment on the judges of the earth (vv. 6, 7); (5) the prayer of the people of the earth for divine justice (v. 8).

IN DEPTH

“Gods”: Demons or Judges?

Psalm 82 presents modern readers with a puzzling reference to “gods” (Ps. 82:1, 6). We know that the ancient Israelites believed in one God. So what are we to make of this enigmatic allusion to other “gods” (Hebrew, elohim, “mighty ones”)?

Two main suggestions have been proposed in answer to this riddle. One is that the “gods” mentioned here are demons, fallen angels who not only oppose God but harass human beings. The Book of Job tells of two occasions when “sons of God” met with the Lord, and Satan sought permission to oppress Job (Job 1:6–12; 2:1–7).

The second suggestion is that the “gods” are actually corrupt human judges who were either honored with or took upon themselves the title of “mighty ones.” Some believe that they issued their rulings in the names of certain pagan gods in order to claim more authority for themselves.

Neither suggestion is without problems, but the second better fits the description in Psalm 82. The point of Psalm 82 is that ultimately all authorities are accountable to God. He is their final Ruler and Judge, as He is of the whole earth. He measures the integrity of those to whom He has delegated power according to their treatment of the poor, the fatherless, the afflicted, and the needy.

82:1, 2 The congregation of the mighty refers to an assembly before God. As a wisdom writer, the poet Asaph uses the language of Job 1, Ps. 110, and Is. 6 as a teaching device to present a morality tale. Asaph describes the wicked judges of all time gathering before God and His angels to give an accounting of themselves. Gods: The Hebrew word may refer to the true God or to false gods. Here it is the judges of the earth (v. 6). Asaph uses this honorific term sarcastically to express his contempt for the evil judges. judge unjustly: The unrighteous judges had perverted their calling, which was to represent God Himself by establishing justice on the earth.

82:3 God expects all judges to administer true justice. do justice: These words summarize the teaching of the Law and indicate God’s basic desire that the defenseless would find a haven of justice in the courts.

82:4, 5 They do not know is the collective sigh of oppressed people of all ages. Wicked judges act as if they did not care about their official responsibility or the judgment they will face for abusing it. All the foundations of the earth are unstable: In 11:3, the taunt of the wicked is that the earth's foundations are destroyed. This is said to be untrue, for God is still in control. In this psalm, however, the situation is deemed unstable because of the profound wickedness of the judges.

82:6, 7 die like men: Jesus quoted these verses in His exchange with the religious authorities who wanted to stone Him for declaring Himself to be the Son of God (John 10:31–35).

82:8 Arise, O God: In view of the overwhelming disaster that wicked judges have created, the poor and afflicted of all time call out for the true Judge, God Himself to come. Their cry will not go unheeded. The righteous Judge is coming, and He will establish justice (96:13; 98:9).

Psalm 83 is a psalm of lament in which particular attention is given to the wicked. The curse that Asaph utters against the wicked puts this psalm in the category of the imprecatory psalms. When we read the strong words in this psalm, we need to keep in mind that the intent of the psalmist Asaph is to vindicate the glory of God. The psalm's structure is as follows: (1) a call for God to speak out in judgment on the wicked (vv. 1–4); (2) a recital of the acts of the wicked (vv. 5–8); (3) a recital of God's acts of judgment in the past (vv. 9–12); (4) a call for God to judge the wicked (vv. 13–18).

83:1 Do not keep silent: Calls for God to awaken, to rouse Himself, to turn and look, and to speak, are all ways the psalmists prayed for God to act. They believed that God as the Holy One would root out all evil. What they did not always recognize was that God's delay in judgment was an expression of His mercy.

83:2, 3 Asaph feels revulsion against the enemies of the Lord. He hates what God hates (101:6–8). The attacks of the wicked are not only against God, but also against the people of God.

82:4 let us cut them off: God's attitude toward those who plots the destruction of His people is clear: His curse will rest on them (Gen. 12:2, 3). Asaph here is simply praying that God would act according to His promises.

83:5–8 consulted together: Throughout history, many nations have conspired to bring about the ruin of Israel and Judah. All such endeavors are condemned in this psalm. against You: In conspiring against the people of God, the wicked actually resist God Himself. The tents of Edom: The place names in this passage refer to nations on the borders of Israel and Judah. The Hagrites may have come from Arabia (1 Chr. 5:10, 19, 20). The people of Gebal may have lived in a mountainous region south of the Dead Sea; alternatively, Gebal may have been another name for Byblos, a city near Tyre.

83:9–12 Asaph recites God's great victories against the formidable foes of Israel. God's victory at Midian was accomplished through Gideon (Judg. 7). God's victory over Sisera was accomplished through Deborah and Barak (Judg. 4; 5). The same God who had battled Israel's enemies in the past would fight all those who might oppose His people in the future.

83:13–15 In a culture in which remembering a person was very important, an ultimate curse would have been to regard a person's memory as whirling dust or windblown chaff.

83:16–18 Shame is the opposite of dignity, an attribute of the righteous (25:2; 97:7). seek Your name: Asaph's first call for God to shame Israel's enemies is redemptive—that the nations might hear, feel shame, repent, and seek the face of the Lord. Yet if they continued in their wicked path, they would face further confounding and would one day face God in judgment. The title Most High is often used in the Psalms to speak of God's control over all the nations of the world (47:2; 78:35; 97:9).

Psalm 84 is one of the psalms of Zion. These psalms celebrate God's presence in Jerusalem, the city where His temple was built. Today it is not necessary to go to Jerusalem to draw near to God, for God is near those who trust in His Son (Matt. 28:18–20). This psalm was composed by the sons of Korah (Pss. 42; 44–49; 85; 87; 88). There are six movements: (1) the expression of the desire to be at home in Zion (vv. 1, 2); (2) the blessings of being at home in Zion (vv. 3, 4); (3) the blessings of those who make pilgrimages to Zion (vv. 5–7); (4) a prayer for God's attention in Zion (vv. 8, 9); (5) the joy of being at home in Zion (vv. 10, 11); (6) the blessing of trusting in God (v. 12).

84:1, 2 Tabernacle is used here as a poetic term for the temple that was built by Solomon. longs … faints: For a similar expression of a psalmist's desire for the Lord's presence, see 42:1, 2. the living God: All other "gods" are nonentities; but He who created the universe, who chose Israel as His people, and who provided salvation for the world, lives forever in great glory.

84:3, 4 sparrow … swallow: By describing the approach of birds to the courtyards of the temple, the poet expresses his own great joy. Blessed, the same term used in 1:1, means "O, the great happiness of."

84:5–7 The phrase whose heart is set on pilgrimage refers those who make their way to the temple not out of obligation, but out of a wellspring of joy. The Valley of Baca, or "Valley of Weeping," refers to the various difficulties that one might face on a pilgrimage. The person on a pilgrimage might discover that the once-dark valley is filled with springs, rain, and pools—all signs of God's blessing. strength to strength: As one nears the temple, the rigors of the journey become tolerable, for the joy of the approaching arrival strengthens the soul.

84:8 LORD God of hosts, literally the "God of armies," speaks of God's transcendence. The hosts are the angelic armies of the heavens. This title is balanced by the phrase God of Jacob, referring to the covenant relationship God established with the patriarchs of Israel.

84:9 The two phrases our shield and Your anointed both point to the same person, the king of Israel (89:3, 4). Each person who was anointed in the OT foreshadowed the coming Anointed One, the Messiah.

84:10, 11 a day … a thousand: Nothing in the pilgrim's daily experience can be compared to a day spent in the worship of God in the holy temple. a doorkeeper … dwell in the tents: The role of a menial servant in the house of his God is more desirable than a life of luxury with those who practice wickedness. Sun and shield means “splendid shield.” Grace and glory may be rephrased as “glorious grace.” Whereas the anointed king was a “shield” (v. 9), the greater Shield is God Himself. No good thing will He withhold: This is the observation of a wise and righteous person; time after time, God gives good gifts to His people.

“sun”

(Heb. shemesh) (84:11; Josh. 10:12, 13). Strong’s #8121: The Hebrew word for sun most often refers to the celestial body that illuminates the earth (136:7, 8). The idiom “before the sun” may describe an action done openly or in public (2 Sam 12:12). The sun is also a biblical symbol for righteousness (Mal. 4:2) and even a title for God in the Psalms (84:11). Many of the ancients worshiped the sun, moon, and stars (2 Kin. 21:3; Ezek. 8:16). But the psalmist understood that the sun, moon, and stars worshiped God because He created them (148:3). In the new creation, there will be no need of the sun because God Himself will be an everlasting light to the people (Is. 60:19).

84:12 This lovely psalm ends as it began in the words O Yahweh of hosts (v. 1); this is termed an inclusio, a frame for the poem.

Psalm 85 is a prayer for restoration that is rooted deeply in trust in God. The setting for the psalm appears to be the restoration of the people of God following a great catastrophe—perhaps the Babylonian captivity. With this psalm, the people prayed for a revival of their spirits and a renewal in their land. The ultimate fulfillment of their prayer would be in the coming glorious kingdom of the Savior Jesus. This is one of the psalms composed by the sons of Korah (Pss. 42; 44–49; 84; 87; 88). The development of this psalm is in four sections: (1) a celebration of God's favor on the land (vv. 1–3); (2) a petition for restoration and revival (vv. 4–7); (3) an expectation that God will act soon (vv. 8, 9); (4) a description of the restoration (vv. 10–13).

85:1 You have brought back the captivity may refer to the return of the exiles from Babylon. But it also may be a more general reversal of fortune (14:7).

85:2–7 God of our salvation may be rephrased as "our Saving God." Your anger: The first section of this psalm already says God's anger has turned away from the people (v. 3). Yet until the restoration is complete, the people still feel the effects of God's wrath. This suggests an understanding that the people's troubles were due to their own sin disciplined by God. revive us: The people prayed for their own welfare and for renewed ability to praise God. Mercy may also be translated "loyal love."

85:8, 9 The speaker here may be a priest expecting to hear a direct revelation from the Lord. Such a revelation would be consistent with God's character. Peace suggests wholeness, fullness, things as they ought to be. The word saints is related to the term translated mercy in v. 7; these are people who reflect the love of God in their own lives. not turn back to folly: God's blessing would continue only as long as the people remained faithful to Him. His salvation can describe any act of mercy on the part of God.

85:10–13 The words mercy and truth often appear together in the Scriptures to express one concept (25:10; 61:7; 86:15; 89:14). Here they are viewed as separate entities that come together, in the same way that righteousness and peace have kissed. The union of God's mercy and truth and His righteousness and peace describes the way things ought to be, or the state of peace spoken of in v. 8. The blending of the ideals of truth and righteousness in v. 11 suggests a vision of the kingdom of God (Is. 11). The fact that the word righteousness appears three times in the last four verses of this psalm alludes to the holiness of the coming kingdom of God and the sinlessness of the Savior and King who will rule over it.

Psalm 86 is a psalm of lament in which David expresses grave concerns about his lowly state, as well as joy in the God who alone is merciful. This poem is the only one in Book III of the Psalms that has David's name in the title. The structure is as follows: (1) a call for God to deliver David from distress (vv. 1–5); (2) a call for God to hear David's prayer (vv. 6, 7); (3) a statement that there is none other like God (vv. 8–10); (4) a petition for God to teach David about Himself so that he can praise Him forever (vv. 11–13); (5) a comparison of the assaults of the wicked with the character of the Lord (vv. 14, 15); (6) a renewed call for God to show His goodness to David in his distress (vv. 16, 17).

86:1–5 Bow down Your ear: As in 31:2, David uses a dramatic phrase that captures the grandeur of God on high and David's humble position on the earth below. Here the phrase I am holy does not speak of the transcendence of God, as in Is. 6:3. Rather it speaks of the faithfulness and godliness of a righteous person who, by God's grace, is living in accordance with God's law. It is another way that David describes himself as a servant of the Lord. Rejoice: God rejoices in those who serve Him, and His servants find their joy in Him.

86:6, 7 give ear: The verb is derived from the noun "ear." It means "make with the ears," a strong term to be used as a parallel term for the more expected verb "to hear." Often it is used for man (or nature) to listen to God (Is. 1:2), but sometimes as here it is used by man in an appeal to God to listen. There is a condescension of God in the very fact that He allows His servants to speak to Him in this manner.

86:8, 9 Among the gods: The ancient nations took their sense of identity in part from their ties to their supposed gods. When the nations found out that their "gods" did not exist, they would have to acknowledge that the Lord alone is God. Here David envisions other nations worshiping the true God and thus anticipates the missionary thrust of the NT (Ps. 117; Matt. 28:18–20).

86:10–13 Teach me Your way: David asks the Lord to teach him so that he will be able to praise God in the midst of the congregation. Mercy is the "loyal love" of the Lord. depths of Sheol: David describes the Lord as mercifully delivering him from certain death (9:17; 116:3, 4).

“truth”

(Heb. ‘emet) (86:11; 1 Kin. 10:6; Esth. 9:30) Strong’s #571: This Hebrew term signifies truth that conforms to a standard—either to created reality or to God’s standards. Truth is often associated with mercy, especially God’s mercy (57:3; 117:2; Gen. 24:49). This word is also frequently used in the context of legal language: In secular contexts it is used in speaking of witnesses and judgments (Prov. 14:25; Zech. 8:16), while in religious contexts it is used in reference to the law and commandments of God (119:142, 151). Truth is precious, and its absence was lamented by the Prophets (Is. 59:14; Jer. 9:5; Hos. 4:1). God desires truth in the inward parts of His people (15:2; 51:6); thus it is the basis of a lifestyle that pleases Him (25:5, 10; 26:3).

86:14 The Psalms consistently describe God as the enemy of the proud and the friend of the humble (138:6; 147:6).

86:15 The phrase abundant in mercy and truth is a precursor of the NT phrase “full of grace and truth” (John 1:14). The Lord upholds the truth so that He can mercifully free those caught in falsehoods.

86:16, 17 save the son of Your maidservant: The idea here may be that since David’s mother was a pious woman, the Lord ought to save David from his lowly state (116:16).

Psalm 87, a psalm of Zion, is also an intensely evangelistic psalm that anticipates the NT mission to present the gospel to the entire world (Matt. 28:18–20). This psalm is one of the collection from the sons of Korah (Pss. 42; 44–49; 84; 85; 88). It has three movements: (1) a description of God's love for the city of Zion (vv. 1–3); (2) a description of the citizens of Zion coming from all nations (vv. 4–6); (3) a celebration of God's salvation (v. 7).

87:1 His foundation: God Himself established Zion or Jerusalem as the center of true worship. He ordained Solomon to build a temple there so that He could live among the Israelites (1 Kin. 6:13). Zion is holy because of God's declaration (1 Kin 11:13), His promise, the worship given Him there (1 Kin. 8:14–66), the future work of the Savior there (Matt. 21:4–11), and the future rule of the King there (Rev. 21).

87:2, 3 God has a special love for the place where His name is worshiped. The gates of Zion are the conspicuous entrance to the city. The verb loves includes the idea of choice (Deut. 6:5) as well as emotion. God chose Jerusalem; and He also has an enduring affection for the city. City of God may also be translated "city of the True God."

87:4 I will make mention: In this verse, God Himself speaks. Rahab is a symbolic name for Egypt (Is. 30:7) that has negative connotations. It alludes to the arrogance of the Egyptians. This is not the Rahab of Josh. 2:3–11, whose name is spelled differently in Hebrew. Babylon was the proverbial seat of apostasy and idolatry (Gen. 10:10). To those who know Me may be rephrased "as those who know Me." Thus the verse anticipates a time when foreigners would know and worship the living God. Among those who came to Zion to worship the Lord were people from Egypt, Babylon, Philistia, Tyre, and Ethiopia. At the time of the writing of this psalm, perhaps in the later period of Hezekiah's reign, foreigners were worshiping God in the temple along with Jews.

87:5 And of Zion: Despite their foreign heritage, the people who worshiped God were considered as having been born in Zion. Thus this psalm anticipates the NT teaching of the second birth (John 3). The title Most High is used particularly with reference to God's power over the nations (47:2; 78:35; 82:6). shall establish her: Zion would become the place where more and more people from other nations would come to worship the living God. This is prophetic of the coming of the gospel of Jesus, the spread of that gospel, and the culmination of the gospel in the rule of the Savior King (Is. 2:1–4).

87:6 The LORD will record pictures God making a register of the people of the nations. All believers will find their true identity in the Lord, to whom they will offer their worship in Zion.

87:7 The singers and the players are called to celebrate together the joy of the Savior God. The image of springs indicates salvation, which is found only in the Lord (Is. 12:3). This anticipated the salvation that God would offer through Jesus Christ (Titus 2:11).

Psalm 88 begins as a psalm of lament but never comes to the resolution of trust and praise that is the hallmark of those psalms. Thus Ps. 88 can be considered a psalm of complaint, a development of the lament portion of the psalms of lament. The title ascribes the psalm to the sons of Korah (Pss. 42; 44–49; 84; 85; 87), more specifically to Heman the Ezrahite. Heman is identified in 1 Kin. 4:31 as a gifted wise man, and in 1 Chr. 15:16–19 as one of the musically gifted Levites who ministered in worship during the time of David. The term Ezrahite may mean “native born.” The name of the tune perhaps means “A Dance of Affliction.” The structure is: (1) an opening prayer for deliverance (vv. 1, 2); (2) Heman’s impending death (vv. 3–5); (3) a complaint about the Lord’s attack on Heman (vv. 6–8); (4) God’s delay in coming to the aid of Heman (vv. 9–12); (5) Heman’s desperation as he senses no deliverance from the Lord (vv. 13–18).

Why Is Psalm 88 so Sad?

Psalm 88 ends on a note of utter loneliness, as the psalmist feels cut off from loved ones and friends (v. 18). It may be that the troubles he was experiencing had isolated him from his community. However, it may also be that his troubles were largely the result of acquaintances who had turned away from God to spiritual darkness.

That was certainly the case for Heman the son of Joel, who some scholars identify with Heman the Ezrahite (title), the writer of this psalm. Joel was the son of Samuel the judge (1 Sam. 3:1), but he thoroughly rejected that great leader's godly ways. Samuel appointed Joel and his brother as judges in Beersheba, a city at the extreme southern end of Judah, perhaps where they could do the least harm. But in the end they did great harm, as their wickedness prompted the elders of Israel to demand a king. Over Samuel's objections, the king selected was Saul (1 Sam. 8:1–9; 10:23–25).

If Heman the son of Joel was indeed the composer of Psalm 88, his background may shed light on why this psalm is so dark and plaintive.

88:1, 2 Even in the midst of despair, Heman confesses his faith in God's saving goodness—O LORD, God of my salvation (vv. 9, 13). cried out … my cry: This language of desperate weeping is not unusual in the psalms of lament. The Hebrew word for cried indicates a loud scream. The psalmist's appeal for God to listen—incline Your ear—has the same wording as in 86:1.

88:3–5 Grave here is the familiar word Sheol (86:13), which is often linked with the term pit as a symbol of death (30:3; 143:7; Prov. 1:12; Is. 14:15; 38:18). Heman feels so near to death that he describes himself as adrift among the dead.

88:6–8 Heman feels as though he were in the lowest pit and the deepest darkness. His most vexing problem, however, is his belief that God has brought this trouble on him. put away … from me: Not only does he feel troubled by God; he is also alone, separated from all of his friends.

88:9 Verses 9 and 13 are a reprise of v. 1. Heman continues to pray. Even though his eyes are strained and bloodshot from constant weeping, he continues to call out to the Lord for salvation.

88:10–16 The context of these verses is the worshiping community in Jerusalem (Ps. 6). If God allows Heman to die, Heman's voice will never again be heard in the temple giving praise to God. The word translated place of destruction is also found in Job 26:6; 28:22; Prov. 15:11; 27:20.

88:17, 18 In this psalm, Heman renews his complaints from earlier sections. However, he does not come to any resolution. As a person adrift at sea is aware only of the engulfing water, so Heman knows only the terrors of his life, which he believes come from the Lord. Loved one: In v. 8, Heman describes himself as removed from his friends; now he says his friends are removed from him. At the close of the psalm, Heman still feels alone, even though the psalms consistently describe a Lord that hears and answers those who call on Him (28:6).

Psalm 89 begins as a psalm of praise but ends as a psalm of lament. It celebrates God's covenant with David (2 Sam. 7) and then laments how David's descendants had not remained faithful to the provisions of that covenant (2 Sam. 7:14). Yet even in the face of unfaithfulness, this psalm reaffirms God's faithfulness to His covenant and its ultimate fulfillment in David's greater Son, the Messiah (vv. 33–37). The title attributes the psalm to Ethan, who was also known as Jeduthun (1 Chr. 25:1, 3, 6). The structure of the psalm is: (1) praise to the Lord for His everlasting covenant with David (vv. 1–4); (2) a celebration of God who established His covenant with David (vv. 5–18); (3) a review of the covenant with David (vv. 19–37); (4) consternation at a time of national distress (vv. 38–45); (5) a complaint to the Lord to provoke Him to remember His covenant and restore the fortunes of His people (vv. 46–51); (6) an appendix of blessing (v. 52).

89:1, 2 The mercies of the Lord in this psalm center on the covenant He made with David, promising him an eternal dynasty (2 Sam. 7). Mercy, which may be translated "loyal love," refers to the exact words of God's promise to David (2 Sam. 7:15). The Lord had promised that His mercy would always rest on David's son.

89:3, 4 Ethan quoted God's words to David in 2 Sam. 7. David is referred to as My chosen and My servant (v. 20)—names that describe his intimate relationship with the Lord (2 Sam. 7:7). Your seed … your throne: God had promised David a line of descent and an enduring throne (2 Sam. 7:12, 13).

89:5, 6 All praise in heaven and earth belongs to God, who is incomparable. No one, not even the supposed gods, can match His strength and love. This is the point of the question, Who in the heavens can be compared to the LORD? The Hebrew phrase for the sons of the mighty may mean "sons of gods" or "heavenly beings." The reference could be to other supposed gods or to angels, members of the heavenly court (Job 1:6.).

89:7–10 Rahab is a title for Egypt (87:4). The sea and Rahab refer to God's great victories: in the beginning, His control of His creation; in the historic past, His victory over Egypt; and in the future, His complete triumph over Satan, sin, and death (Is. 27:1; 51:9). The psalmists regularly assert God's complete control of creation (24:1). Nothing can challenge God's majestic rule over the entire universe.

89:11, 12 The strong control of creation by the living God is asserted regularly in the psalms (24:1). He is victor over all His creation; there is nothing that can challenge His authority, power, or majestic rule.

89:13, 14 God is the great Deliverer; He brandished His arm and hand in delivering His people from Egypt (Ex. 6:6; 15:6). Righteousness and justice means "utter righteousness." Mercy and truth may be rephrased as "unbreakable loyalty."

89:15–18 Blessed, the same word used in 1:1, means "manifest happiness." To exalt the horn of the people (75:4, 5; 92:10; 132:17) means to give them power and eventual triumph. The Holy One of Israel (78:41) is the title Isaiah uses to describe God, following his experience of God's holiness in his memorable vision of God's throne (Is. 6).

89:19 The psalm recounts God's remarkable intervention in the life of David and the specifics of His covenant with David. Your holy one: David had been singled out as holy to the Lord. Yet his beginnings were not spectacular, for he was from the people: he had been an ordinary shepherd (2 Sam 7:18). In these respects and in many others, David was a type, or a divinely intended portrait, of the Savior. In a similar way, Jesus came from humble origins as the son of a carpenter. Yet He was the Holy One, the Son of the Most High.

89:20–23 These verses use highly poetic language to describe God's promise of protection for His king. Since the king was so closely allied with the living God, an attack on David (or his successor) was tantamount to an attack on God.

89:24, 25 My faithfulness and My mercy: The usual order of this common phrase is reversed here (vv. 1, 2). But the point is the same: God will remain true to His word and demonstrate His love to His servant. sea … rivers: The possible reference here is to Israel's expansion of its borders. But note the language used to describe God's control over creation (vv. 9, 10). The Lord is extending to His servant the authority He has over creation.

89:26–33 Father … firstborn: This wording is derived from God's covenant with David (2 Sam. 7:14). seed … throne: These words are repeated from v. 4 (v. 36; 2 Sam. 7:12, 13). his sons: The provisions of the Davidic covenant in 2 Sam. 7 included the discipline of errant sons.

“law”

(Heb. torah) (1:2; 89:30; 119:97; Ex. 24:12) Strong’s #8451: Although usually translated law, the noun torah is derived from the verb yarah, meaning “to teach,” and should be understood as carrying the idea of “instruction.” The term can refer to any set of regulations, such as the instructions of parents (Prov. 1:8) or of a psalmist (Ps. 78:1). But usually the word refers to God’s law. The writer of Ps. 119 expressed great love for God’s law, because it led him to wisdom and righteousness (119:97–176). In the NT, Paul also praised God’s Law because it pointed out his sin and made him realize his desperate need for a Savior (Rom. 7:7).

89:34–38 The words my covenant I will not break and the wording of v. 35 are strong, so as to assure the reader that the will of the Lord is quite settled in this matter. The people might become faithless, but God cannot deny Himself. In spite of errors, rebellions, sins, and apostasies in the lives of many of the kings of Judah, God is determined to complete, fulfill, and accomplish His grand plan for David’s dynasty (2 Sam. 7:1–24).

89:39 After the long recital of the details of the Lord’s covenant with David and God’s sworn statement that He would not revoke it (v. 35), the psalmist questions whether the covenant had really been honored. Most likely the occasion of this psalm was the defeat of Israel’s armies, accounting for the psalmist’s strong sense of consternation before the Lord. With the repeated use of the pronoun You, he addresses his complaint directly to God. You have renounced the covenant of Your servant: As in the case of Ps. 60, the military defeat that likely sparked this psalm was a temporary situation; a victory was still to come. Nonetheless, the poet presses his claim to God: This is the covenant that the Lord has established, that He has sworn Himself to uphold.

89:40–45 As a result of the military defeat, the people were despondent and disillusioned. The psalmist voices their feelings and thus allows the process of healing to begin, even as the people wait for their deliverance from the Lord.

89:46–48 The psalmist now gives the first of two complaints. The first is that God seemed to be unaware of how little time the people have to finally realize victory. Unlike God (90:1, 2), the life span of His people is quite ephemeral (90:3–6).

89:49–51 The writer complains that God has not been keeping His promises to David (2 Sam. 7:1–24). As a result, His people are experiencing undeserved reproach from their enemies. There is no resolution to this psalm; it ends with the people, the king, and the psalmist in distress. Yet the inclusion of this psalm among the praises of Israel suggests that God did answer this prayer of His beleaguered people, just as He did in the case of Ps. 60.

89:52 This verse is an editorial addition to Ps. 89, the concluding line of praise for Book III of the Psalms.

Psalm 90 is a psalm of lament in which the community complains of God's judgment and the brevity of life. But even in the midst of sorrow, the people acknowledge the security they have in the Lord and pray for renewal. This is the only poem in the Book of Psalms attributed to Moses, who wrote two other poems recorded in the Pentateuch (Ex. 15; Deut. 32). Psalm 90 has four sections: (1) an affirmation of the security of a life lived close to the Lord (vv. 1, 2); (2) a complaint about the brevity of life (vv. 3–6); (3) a complaint about God's judgment on His people (vv. 7–12); (4) a prayer for restoration (vv. 13–17).

90:1, 2 Lord here is not God's personal name (Ex. 3:14, 15), but a Hebrew word celebrating His majestic authority. The word suggests a title similar to "my Supreme Master." Dwelling place refers to the Lord as the "refuge" of His people (71:3; 91:9). in all generations: Throughout history, people have found the Lord to be their refuge in life.

90:3 The turn in this verse is alarmingly abrupt. One would have thought from the opening words of this psalm that it was a psalm of trust (such as Ps. 23). But this is not the case! The key to the psalm is found in vv. 11, 12; see there. return: Based on the words of Genesis 3:19, here the poet rues the words of God that call a life to return to dust. See the pun on this word in v. 13.

90:4, 5 Even if people lived a thousand years, they would pass away like a watch in the night. A thousand years may seem long at the time, but not in comparison to God's eternal existence. Grass sprouts after the spring rains, but wilts quickly in the heat—almost in a single day.

90:6, 7 wrath: The allusion is to the anger of God against the unbelieving Israelites in the wilderness (Num. 13; 14). An entire generation spent their lives wandering in the wilderness because of their unbelief and rebellion.

90:8–10 seventy … eighty years: The point here is not to set a maximum, but to present a context for the brevity of human life. No matter how long people live, it is inevitable that they will fly away to death.

90:11, 12 These verses are the key of the psalm. Moses had experienced a sufficient measure of God's anger (Ex. 32; Num. 14:11–25; Deut. 3:23–28). teach: What Moses needed was a new understanding of the meaning of his own life. number our days: This is more than just having a sense of mortality; it means valuing the time we do have by using it for eternal purposes.

90:13, 14 Moses uses the word return in v. 3 to refer to God's call for his death. Here he asks God to return for a renewed sense of life. compassion … mercy: Moses is asking God for new meaning in his life in the days that remain.

90:15 glad … afflicted: The pain of living can be modified by a sense of God's presence. This is a remarkable verse, showing tremendous insight into what some call "the human condition," but expressed in the context of biblical faith.

90:16, 17 Your work … Your glory: Moses asks God to give him a sense of lasting meaning in life, something that will continue to the next generation. The same idea is expressed in the words the work of our hands. Beauty refers to the "pleasantness" of God.

Psalm 91, a psalm of trust, does not identify its author. The psalm is sufficiently similar to Ps. 90, a psalm of Moses, that it might also be by him. Alternatively, the experiences and ideas of Moses could have been used by an anonymous writer. This poem has a very strong messianic thrust, and God Himself speaks in vv. 14–16 (Pss. 12; 60; 75; 87). The development of the psalm is in four main sections: (1) a confession of confidence in the Lord (vv. 1, 2); (2) assurance that those who trust in the Lord need not fear evil (vv. 3–8); (3) promises of God's protection to the coming One (vv. 9–13); (4) a description of the Lord's protection of the coming One (vv. 14–16).

91:1, 2 in the secret place: The person who trusts in God is the one who lives close to Him. The title Most High emphasizes God's majesty (92:1) and is parallel to the term Almighty, a translation of the divine title Shaddai. Together the terms Most High and Shaddai speak of God as a mountain-like majesty, in whose presence there is a "secret place" or a shadow. My refuge and my fortress may be rephrased as "my secure fortress."

91:3 fowler … pestilence: The images of a bird trap and various types of disease are a general description of dangers that might come to helpless people.

91:4 His feathers … His wings: God is described as a mother hen under whose wings the psalmist can come for refuge (61:4; 63:7). Shield and buckler indicates complete protection from all harm. God is an all protective shield for the believer.

91:5, 6 The interplay of words for night and day in these verses indicates the universal nature of God's protection. Terror, arrow, pestilence, and destruction together refer to evil in general.

91:7, 8 A thousand … ten thousand: Like the Israelites in Egypt who were spared the danger that touched their neighbors (Ex. 9:26; 10:23; 11:7), believers in the Lord are protected from any assault. look … and see: The punishment of the wicked is as sure as the deliverance of the righteous.

91:9, 10 In vv. 14–16, God describes directly the same person addressed by the psalmist in vv. 9–13. This person is the coming One. My refuge is the same word used in v. 2. Dwelling place is the same word used in 90:1. Most High: The psalmist indicates that the coming One's faith in God is the same as the psalmist's.

91:11–13 His angels … a stone: These words were used by Satan to tempt the Savior (Matt. 4:5, 6). the lion and the cobra: The animal and snake imagery in this verse pictures all kinds of evil that might threaten the coming One. The Father will protect Him no matter what the danger.

91:14 The verb used here for love is not the usual Hebrew word for love. It has the idea of "holding close to," even "hugging tightly in love" (Deut. 7:7; 10:15). He has known My name speaks of an intimate, experiential knowledge of the Father (John 1:18).

91:15, 16 The promises of Yahweh are to deliver the Coming One (v. 15), and to grant Him long life (v. 16). These words are a promise of the Father for the resurrection of the Son, and for the provision of His subsequent everlasting life (16:10, 11; 72:15; 118:17, 18). The salvation provided for the Coming One is not justification (as He is just in His person), but deliverance from death in the Resurrection (as in 118:21). Thus, Psalm 91 concludes in a dramatic manner, a direct promise from the Father to the Son concerning His ultimate victory over death itself (1 Cor. 15:20, 21).

Psalm 92, a psalm of descriptive praise (see Ps. 113), celebrates the person and work of God in an exuberant way. The psalm also includes several wisdom themes. The title is unusual in that it attaches the designation “for the Sabbath day.” The poem has four brief sections: (1) an encouragement for the people to respond to God in praise and worship (vv. 1–4); (2) a celebration of the wisdom of God in bringing judgment on the wicked (vv. 5–9); (3) an acknowledgment of the mercy of God who has established the believer’s present life (vv. 10, 11); (4) an anticipation of the mercy of God that will continue in the life to come (vv. 12–15).

92:1–5 The wording of this section has similarities to Pss. 33:1, 2; 147:1; 149:1. To give thanks means “to give public acknowledgment” or to praise God verbally in a public setting (35:18; 105:1).

92:6 A senseless man … a fool: In contrast to the limitless wisdom of God is the shallow nature of the fool (14:1).

92:87–89 You, LORD, are on high forevermore is the central shout of this psalm of descriptive praise (113:4). The Lord’s eternality is contrasted with the brevity of the lives of His enemies. Because of God’s patience, He allows evil to occur (2 Pet. 3:9)—but He will not allow it to flourish forever.

92:10 My horn you have exalted (75:4, 5; 89:17, 24; 132:17) is a figure of speech for the psalmist’s eventual triumph, the celebration of the psalmist’s strength. I have been anointed with fresh oil is not just a general statement of God’s interest in the poet, but a prediction of the coming One, the Lord’s Anointed.

92:11–15 The language of this section speaks of God’s continuing blessing on the believer not only in this life but also in the life to come (Ps. 23). The tree image recalls the words of 1:3.

Psalm 93, a royal psalm, focuses on the reign of God over the earth, making use of a distinctly Canaanite perspective. The psalmist denies Baal and shouts exuberantly in praise of God. God is King of the universe. What are humans compared to Him? God is King of heaven. What are the gods compared to Him? God is King of all. To whom may He be compared (Is. 40:25)? This focus is one of the most impressive ideas in the Bible. The structure of Ps. 93 is as follows: (1) the establishment of the reign of God as King of creation (vv. 1, 2); (2) the celebration of the stability of God as King of creation (vv. 3, 4); (3) the acknowledgment of the excellent nature of God (v. 5).

Royal Psalms

Some of the most inspiring psalms are the royal psalms. These are psalms that celebrate God as King. It is amazing that the first time Scripture refers to God as King is in one of the oracles of Balaam, the pagan seer who was blind to spiritual reality until God confronted him (Num. 23:21). Once God was revealed as the Great King, the psalmists made much of that fact.

The reign of God in the Psalms is presented against the cultural backdrop of Canaanite thought and religion. The Canaanites regarded their chief deity El as king of the gods. But according to Canaanite mythology, El's rule was attacked by Baal, a god of storm and fertility. He defeated a number of the followers of El. These were the gods Yamm (the god of the sea), Lotan (a sea monster), and Mot (the god of death). Baal himself was mortally wounded in this conflict and Anat, the wife-sister of Baal, was associated with his resuscitation. With this victory, Baal became king. But there was always a lingering question: How long would Baal rule? How long would his enemies remain defeated? Could not Lotan surge anew and threaten Baal's position? The Canaanites who believed in these stories lived their lives on the brink of a heavenly catastrophe. Their gods were fragile; they were easily established and easily deposed.

It is against this background that the words of Ps. 93 obtain their force. The living God is the King from the beginning of time; He is no recent claimant to power (vv. 1, 2). As King, He exercises authority over all. He does not have to fear a resurgent sea (vv. 3, 4). Not only is the Lord omnipotent, but He is truthful and holy, unlike any of the gods of the Canaanite imagination (v. 5).

In general, the royal psalms speak of the Lord as King in three different ways. He is King over creation, for He is the Creator (74:12–17). He is King over the Israelites (44:4), for He is their Savior. And He is the coming King, for He will eventually judge everyone (47:7, 8). Sometimes in people's minds God's kingdom is narrowly identified with the coming glorious rule of Jesus: God's present reign over creation is ignored. But sometimes the opposite is true. God's present rule can be emphasized so much that Jesus' coming is disregarded. The royal psalms consistently balance these two ideas: “The Lord reigns” (93:1), but the Lord is also coming to establish His permanent rule (24:9).

93:1, 2 The LORD reigns is the key of the royal psalms (96:10; 97:1; 99:1). The language girded Himself with strength describes the victor of one-on-one combat. God is dressed in the garments of victory. This is a celebration of God as the Creator. cannot be moved: There is no power on earth or in the universe that can wrench control of the earth from God. from of old: Unlike Baal, who was a recent “upstart” in the myths of Canaan, the rule of God is from antiquity. The living God is eternal.

93:3, 4 The floods: Baal was supposed to have been victorious over the waters; thus, this section of the poem is a continuing refutation of Baal worship while it joyfully celebrates the power of God. The LORD … is mightier: The Creator King is infinite in power; no force in the universe competes with Him.

93:5 While this psalm uses language resembling the worship of Baal to emphasize the greatness of God (Ps. 29), it also glorifies God with praises never attributed to Baal. None of the accolades of Baal speak of his testimonies. But God is superior to Baal, for He is faithful to His word. He is the gracious God who speaks to His people; He is the holy God of Scripture who is approached by His people; and He is the eternal God whom we worship, as did the people of ancient Israel.

Psalm 94 is a royal psalm, since the phrase “Judge of the earth” (v. 2) is equivalent to “King” (50:4–6). The righteous call for the divine Judge to punish evil in the world (82:8; 96:13; 98:9). Psalms 93—99 are a splendid set of psalms focused on the eternal reign of God. The order of the psalm is as follows: (1) a call for the Judge of the earth to punish the wicked (vv. 1–3); (2) a description of the senseless acts of the wicked (vv. 4–7); (3) a chiding of the wicked concerning their ignorance of God (vv. 8–11); (4) a blessing on the righteous (vv. 12–15); (5) a prayer for God’s intervention in the psalmist’s life (vv. 16–19); (6) a prayer for God’s defense of His own purposes (vv. 20–23).

94:1–3 Even when the poets call out for divine vengeance, they recognize that God decides when to exercise His wrath and judgment. God’s Law clearly states that vengeance belongs to Him (Deut. 32:35). How long will the wicked triumph: This question is based on a concern for the glory of God. How long would the wicked defy God? The answer, of course, is in God’s mercy. The Lord may delay this judgment, but in His own timing He will come to establish true justice (2 Pet. 3:9).

94:4–6 The Psalms often describe the wicked in terms of their evil speech (Ps. 12). They slay the widow and the stranger: The Israelites had been commanded to comfort widows and orphans and to welcome strangers as long as those strangers obeyed the Law of God (Ex. 22:22). Thus the wicked were brazenly disobeying God’s commands.

94:7 the LORD does not see: As in the description of the wicked in Psalm 10:11, these wicked persons are oblivious to the reality of God, scornful of His interest, derisive of His nearness. They shall rue these words and actions.

94:8–11 The command to understand is for fools to abandon their foolishness. Surely, the poet argues, the Creator of the earth is not deaf, nor is the Fashioner of the eye blind. Although idols do not have real eyes and ears (115:3–8), the God of heaven does see and hear. The LORD knows: The difference between the thoughts of God and the thoughts of human beings is beyond comprehension. The thoughts of man apart from God are futile or “quickly passing.”

94:12 Blessed is the man: This beatitude uses the word with which the Book of Psalms begins, a term meaning “manifest happiness.” These words are very similar to the ideas of 1:2.

94:13, 14 Pit is one of the words used as a synonym for Sheol (16:10). Digging the "pit" is a way of describing the preparations for the final judgment of the wicked (Rev. 20). will not cast off His people: God will not forget His people any more than He will forget or deny Himself (2 Tim. 2:13).

94:15 judgment will return: This verse seems to describe the way that the truly righteous will return to the Lord and to their walk with Him even after a time of disobedience. That is, those who truly know the Lord will be attracted back to Him; those who are not His may appear to belong, but in time will show that this is not the case.

94:16–19 Who will rise up for me is an appeal to the Lord who alone is the sure defense of the believer. settled in silence: The psalmist exclaims that if the Lord had not delivered him, he would have died. As in v. 6, if the psalmist had died, his voice would no longer be able to praise God in the temple. The comforts of God extend from His hearing the call of the righteous to His meeting their needs even when they are not aware of them.

94:20–23 Throne of iniquity is a description of the wicked who have great power. The holy Lord cannot tolerate evil in His presence. The LORD … shall cut them off: Final judgment will one day come to the wicked.

Psalm 95 places particular emphasis on the worship of God, making it a worship psalm. But it is also a royal psalm because of the way it acknowledges God as the great King (v. 3). The psalm has three movements, each reflecting a "mood" of the worshiping community: (1) the worship of God in a mood of celebration (vv. 1–5); (2) the worship of God in a contemplative mood (vv. 6, 7); (3) the worship of God in obedience (vv. 8–11).

95:1–5 Oh come: The psalm begins with energy and delight at the prospect of worshiping God in the temple (Ps. 100). The use of the psalms in worship is indicated in this passage. In His hand refers to God's control over all that He has made.

95:6, 7 Each of the key verbs in this sentence describes a physical posture of humility before the Lord. The Hebrew word translated worship means literally "to prostrate oneself." When bow down, kneel, and worship occur together as in this verse, they amplify each another and call for a reflective, humble approach to God. Worship is joyful and can be done with abandon (vv. 1–5); but at other times worship may be quiet reverence of the Almighty (Ps. 134). people of His pasture: These words seem to be an inversion of the wording of 100:3, expressing the loving care the Father has for His children.

95:7–11 The third movement of this psalm is a call for obedience in worship and a reminder of God's judgments in past times on people who did not take Him seriously. The entire section is quoted in its entirety in Heb. 3:7–11, with a notable introduction: "Therefore, as the Holy Spirit says" (Heb. 3:7). This phrase reminds us that the words of the psalms, which are the response of the worshiping Israelite community, are also the oracles of God.

95:8 The word rebellion is literally "Meribah," a word that would remind the Israelites of the times they had doubted the Lord's provision for them (Ex. 17:7; Num. 20:13). The event of Meribah was the rebellion of the first generation at Kadesh (Num. 14). By refusing to enter Canaan, the entire generation of Israelites lost their opportunity to enjoy the promises of God in the land of blessing.

Psalm 96, a royal psalm, is part of the set that begins at Ps. 93. This psalm emphasizes world mission, specifically the prophetic fulfillment of the mission provision of the Abrahamic covenant (Ps. 67). The structure of the poem is as follows: (1) a call to praise God (vv. 1–3); (2) a celebration of God the Creator (vv. 4–6); (3) a celebration of God the King (vv. 7–10); (4) a celebration of God the Coming One (vv. 11–13).

96:1–3 Among the nations is a bold declaration that one day the message of God's mercy will be known the world over. One day the message of God's salvation will be known among all peoples. This declaration depends on God's promise to Abraham that through his descendants all nations of the earth will be blessed (Gen. 12:1–3). It also anticipates Jesus' command to his disciples to spread the news of God's goodness to a desperate world (Matt. 28:18–20; Ps. 67).

96:4–6 The mention of other gods in v. 4 is clarified by the words of v. 5: these gods are merely idols. Honor and majesty may be rephrased as "majestic honor." Strength and beauty may be rephrased as "beautiful strength."

IN CONTEXT

Dismissing the "Gods"

Hymns of praise in the ancient Near East often declared the god being praised to be superior to all other gods. The Bible occasionally uses that kind of language, but more often goes beyond it and says that Yahweh is the only God.

One way of dismissing other gods was to say they were only statues. The supposed "gods of the peoples" are nothing more than the inanimate idols themselves (Ps. 96:5). Yahweh is declared the true deity because only He created the world—"the Lord made the heavens" (96:5). All other gods are impotent and unworthy of adoration; they should be ignored. People who could mistake stone, metal, or wood for a real god are foolish.

A second way of dismissing other gods was to leave open the possibility they existed, yet maintain that they had no serious power and therefore were not to be taken seriously. The prophet Jeremiah, for example, says that other gods did not create the world and will therefore cease to exist (Jer. 10:11). Their insignificance is stressed by their being placed lower than Yahweh in divine authority.

In this way the Hebrew poets were able to adapt the usual language of Near Eastern hymns into the worship of Yahweh. To Israel and Judah, only Yahweh mattered. The other deities either did not exist or were so meaningless that whether they existed was irrelevant. Yahweh was "to be feared above all gods" (Ps. 96:4).

96:7–9 families of the peoples: The allusion to the Abrahamic covenant continues (vv. 2, 3; Gen. 12:1–3). One day, the praise of God will come gladly from people of all nations. Give to the LORD: The words of vv. 7–9 are quoted from 29:1, 2, with the substitution of "O families of the peoples" for "O you mighty ones."

96:10 The LORD reigns is the key phrase of the royal psalms (93:1). It was the countercultural cry of ancient Israelites in a world that believed that gods could rise and fall. In contrast, the living God remains Ruler for all eternity. He shall judge: This verse answers the cry of the oppressed peoples of world history. God will restore justice (82:8; 94:1–3).

96:11–13 Let the heavens rejoice: This poem calls for all of creation to respond to the coming of the King of glory. He is coming … He is coming: Like the echo of approaching footsteps, the words echo each other. judge the world: See 98:9 for similar words; see Rev. 19—20 for their fulfillment.

Psalm 97, one of the series of royal psalms (Pss. 93—99), has a particularly apocalyptic tone in its description of God's final judgment on the wicked before He establishes His great kingdom. The structure of the poem is: (1) a call for the praise of God the King (v. 1); (2) a vision of the coming judgment of the wicked (vv. 2–6); (3) a prophetic statement about the end of idolatry (vv. 7–9); (4) a promise of great joy for the righteous (vv. 10, 11); (5) a call for the praise of God the King (v. 12).

97:1 The LORD reigns is the key phrase of the royal psalms (93:1). The earth as a whole and its smallest parts—the isles—join together in rejoicing at the prospect of God's reign on earth.

97:2 Clouds and darkness may be rephrased "impenetrable clouds," an indicator of the final judgment and God's awesome power (Joel 2:2; Zeph. 1:15). Righteousness and justice may be rephrased as "absolute righteousness." The foundation of God's coming judgment will be His integrity; His judgments will be correct.

97:3–6 fire: The psalmist uses the imagery of the storm god Baal to describe God's judgment. This poetic language attempts to describe the final judgment of God upon the earth before He establishes His kingdom.

97:7, 8 The continuing practice of idolatry throughout world history is a grave offense against the Lord. Such behavior will finally end in shame and terror (14:5). Worship Him: Anything that serves as an object of worship will one day bow before the true God (115:4–10).

97:9–11 To hate means to reject; to love means to choose. Since both are an expression of the will and not merely an emotion, the Bible commands both love and hatred. Light is sown: The picture is that of someone sowing seed, with the seed being light and joy. This speaks of the restoration of the earth (Ps. 110).

97:12 rejoice: The psalm begins and ends on a note of rejoicing.

Psalm 98, one of the set of royal psalms that includes Pss. 93—99, is an exuberant psalm of praise This poem shares the same joy as Ps. 96. The outline is as follows: (1) a call to praise God as the Savior (vv. 1–3); (2) a call to praise God as the King (vv. 4–6); (3) a call to praise God as the coming Judge (vv. 7–9).

98:1–2 The term marvelous things is used only to describe the actions of God in the Bible. The right hand of the Lord is a way of referring to His great salvation of Israel from Egypt (Ex. 15:6; Deut. 4:34). The phrase is like a slogan for the Lord's redemption (118:15, 16). sight of the nations: God's salvation was designed to be a witness to the nations (Deut. 4:6).

98:4–6 above all gods: From time to time in the psalms, there is a tacit admission of the existence of other gods, only to allow the assertion that none of the supposed gods may be compared to Yahweh. idols: In this psalm, the admission of other gods in v. 4 is cut to the quick with the words of v. 5. Indeed, here is one of the great word plays in the Bible. The term translated idols is a pun on the regularly used word for God. Here the word is elilim, a word that sounds suspiciously like elohim (God). But this word is a compound plural of the Hebrew term for "nothing"! The gods of the nations are "nothings." made the heavens: And Yahweh, the God who is, has created all that is. What great praise this is! honor and majesty (v. 6): These words form a hendiadys (25:8), as do the pair "strength and beauty" in the next colon. The resultant pairs, "majestic honor" and "beautiful strength" are beautiful descriptions of the great King.

98:7, 8 In Canaanite thought, the sea represented a dark deity. In the Psalms, the sea is a part of creation that God completely controls (Ps. 93). The clapping of the hands of the rivers and the rejoicing of the hills represents the praise of creation at the establishment of God's kingdom on the earth.

98:9 He is coming: This verse and 96:13 answer the call for justice found at many points in the Psalms. The coming of the Judge is a reason for joy. At last the Lord will put an end to cruelty, evil, and injustice.

Psalm 99, the last of the set of royal palms that began with Ps. 93, praises God as the King of His people. The psalm has three movements, each ending with the words "He is holy:" (1) praise to the Lord in the greatness of His glory (vv. 1–3); (2) praise to the King in the justice of His rule (vv. 4, 5); praise to the Lord who answers the prayers of His people (vv. 6–9).

99:1, 2 The cherubim are the angels most closely related to the glory of God. Two gold cherubim graced the mercy seat of the ark of the covenant (Ex. 25:18–22). Let the earth be moved: Since God is the great King, the stability of the earth depends on Him; He can shake the world to demonstrate His power over it (Matt. 24:29). great in Zion: The holy temple in Jerusalem was the earthly structure for God's heavenly presence. But His reign extends throughout the entire world.

99:3 awesome name: The name of God is a blessing and comfort; it also evokes awe and wonder. Holy means to be "distant" or "distinct from." This is the principal Hebrew word used to describe the transcendence of God (113:4–6).

99:4, 5 The footstool of the Lord is sometimes said to be the earth (Is. 66:1); but more specifically, Zion is the Lord's footstool (132:7; Is. 60:13). When the Israelites came to the temple in Jerusalem to worship, they pictured themselves as being at the feet of the Creator.

99:6 The psalmists worshiped God by recalling His saving acts to their predecessors. Moses is mentioned by name in the Psalms several times (77:20; 103:7; 105:26; 106:16, 23, 32), as is Aaron (77:20; 105:26; 106:16; 115:10, 12; 118:3; 133:2; 135:19). This psalm is the only one to mention Samuel by name. He answered: The inference is clear—the Lord heard their prayers and did not remain silent. Since God answered the prayers of our ancestors, surely He will continue to answer the prayers of those who call upon Him.

99:7–9 His holy hill: As in 2:6, the site of Zion is "holy" because of the presence of the Lord. This holy hill is also His "footstool" (v. 5).

Psalm 100 is a psalm of descriptive praise that follows a set of royal psalms (Pss. 93—99). Perhaps the ancient editors felt that the royal psalms demanded the response of worship provided by this psalm. The phrase “A Psalm of Thanksgiving” refers to public acknowledgment of the Lord.

“psalm”

(Heb. mizmor) (The titles of Pss. 98; 100; 103; 143) Strong’s #4210: The Hebrew word mizmor is derived from the verb zamar “to make music.” The word occurs only in the Psalms, in 57 of the psalm headings. It may designate a praise song or possibly a song accompanied by a certain type of instrumental music. In 34 psalm titles, mizmor follows the phrase “To the Chief Musician,” perhaps indicating that the psalms were typically songs accompanied by instruments. Frequently the author of the psalm is also identified, such as the sons of Korah (Pss. 48; 84), of Asaph (Pss. 50; 82), and especially of David (Pss. 23; 29; 51).

100:1, 2 The Hebrew verb for make a joyful shout is a highly charged command for public praise. The command is addressed not just to Israel but to all the earth. The Israelites were to be a people who would attract the nations to worship God. with gladness: Joyful abandon was not the only mood of worship in ancient Israel (Ps. 95), but there was great emphasis placed on it.

100:3 The words the LORD, He is God reflect the great confession of faith in Deut 6:4–9. To know that the Lord is God is very similar to the command to “hear” in Deuteronomy. And not we ourselves is sometimes read “and His we are.” sheep of His pasture: An inversion of these words can be found in 95:7.

“thanksgiving”

(Heb. todah) (The title of Pss. 100; 69:30; 100:4) Strong’s #8426: The Hebrew word todah is derived from the verb yadah. In its simplest form, yadah means “to throw” or “to cast,” and common forms of this verb mean to “acknowledge,” “confess,” or “praise.” Thus todah is an “acknowledgment” or “confession,” either of one’s own shortcomings (Josh. 7:19–21) or of God’s goodness (100:4; 107:22). Another meaning of todah is “thanksgiving offering,” which was an optional sacrifice made to express thanks to God (Lev. 7:12–15; 22:29). Psalm 100 is a typical psalm for use when giving such an offering, praising God’s righteousness in contrast to the people’s sin (as in Ps. 51:14) and confessing God’s greatness through singing (as in Ps. 147:7).

100:4 Enter: The commands of vv. 1, 2 are reiterated. The people of the Lord may actually come into His presence and bring Him worship that pleases Him. Be thankful is a command for public expression of praise (106:1).

100:5 the LORD is good: The shout of the goodness of God in this verse is buttressed by an appeal to His mercy and His truth. The Hebrew word for truth comes from the root meaning “to be established” or “to be confirmed.” From this root also comes the word amen, meaning “surely” or “truly.” God’s goodness is based on His loyal love and His truth.

Psalm 101 is a royal psalm. David the king declares his purposes and asks for God's help in maintaining righteousness. This brief psalm has a tone of strong judgment, indicating a desire not only to preserve the innocent and protect the needy, but also to maintain the reputation of God against the attacks of His foes. The outline of the poem is: (1) a determination to praise the Lord (v. 1); (2) a determination to behave wisely (v. 2); (3) a determination to abstain from wickedness (vv. 3–5); (4) a determination to discriminate between the righteous and the wicked (vv. 6–8).

101:1, 2 Mercy and justice may be rephrased as "gracious justice." There is a harshness to the tone of the psalm that might emphasize the justice element of this phrasing; but underlying the justice is God's "mercy" or "loyal love." Behave wisely means to act with skill. The strong form of the word indicates intense determination, not just a passing desire.

101:3, 4 The Hebrew expression for wicked implies utter worthlessness. The phrase I hate indicates utter rejection (5:5). David hated what God hated and loved what God loved. not know: The Hebrew verb for "to know" here has the idea of experience or intimate relationship with something or someone.

101:5–8 David made a covenant with his eyes (Job 31:1) to observe the righteous and sustain them in their walk. Alternatively, his eyes were also directed against the wicked. the evildoers: Elsewhere, this Hebrew phrase is rendered workers of iniquity (14:4).

Psalm 102, a penitential psalm, has an unusual inscription. The title describes a person in distress but does not name him. The structure of the poem is: (1) a cry to the Lord for deliverance (vv. 1, 2); (2) a description of the groaning brought about by guilt (vv. 3–7); (3) a description of suffering that results from the laughter of enemies (vv. 8–11); (4) praise to the Lord who rises to answer prayer (vv. 12–17); (5) praise to the Lord who stoops to the needs of His people (vv. 18–22); (6) a petition to the Lord to renew the strength of His servant (vv. 23–28).

102:1 In its entreaty for the Lord to hear, the beginning of the psalm reflects a pattern of lament (13:1, 2). The next section (vv. 3–7) reflects a pattern of penitence (32:3–5).

102:2, 3 my days are consumed: This description of the psalmist's sense of his own frailty is matched by the words of 144:4, "like a passing shadow."

102:4–8 The psalmist names birds—a pelican, an owl, and a sparrow—who live in distant, lonely places. The psalmist felt isolated, alone, and vulnerable, an isolation intensified by the harsh ranting of his enemies, who deride him for his decision to trust in the Lord.

102:9–12 Shall endure may also be translated "sits enthroned." God is King forever. He is gracious, loves His people, and promises to favor them. With these words of praise, the psalmist expresses his hope that God will deliver him.

102:13–15 The psalmist anticipates a time when the Lord will reign over all the nations (Pss. 96—98); but his prayer is for God's answer to his own cry for deliverance.

102:16–19 The psalmist realizes that the Eternal One has stooped from heaven to meet his need, that the King of kings has come to his aid. His joy is such that he wants people who have not yet been born to learn what God has done.

102:20–28 midst of my days: The psalmist remembers his troubling experiences and contrasts the brevity of his own life with the eternity of God. Of old: God is eternal and His works are from ancient times. The writer of the Book of Hebrews applies these words of creation and eternality to the Son (vv. 25–27; Heb. 1:10–12).

Psalm 103, a wisdom psalm attributed to David, is also a psalm of praise. The poem begins with the psalmist speaking in the singular (v. 1), but then moves to include the community, both angels and people (vv. 20–22). The structure of the psalm is: (1) praise of the Lord for His many benefits (vv. 1–5); (2) praise of the Lord for His ongoing mercy (vv. 6–10); (3) praise of the Lord for His transcendent glory and gentle care (vv. 11–14); (4) a comparison of the transitory nature of humanity with the everlasting rule of God (vv. 15–19); (5) a call for heaven and earth to bless the Lord (vv. 20–22).

103:1 To bless the LORD is to remember that He is the source of all our blessings. The psalmist blesses the Lord with his entire being (146:2).

103:2–5 heals all your diseases: There are godly people who suffer illness, despite repeated prayers for healing. Even though God is not bound to heal every disease, every healing does come from Him. Who satisfies your mouth: In addition to being a healer, God provides food as well as other blessings (111:5). His mercy enables the believer to rise up like an eagle (Is. 40:31).

“soul”

(Heb. nephesh) (11:5; 103:1, 2; Lev. 26:30; Is. 1:14; 42:1; Jer. 5:9; 15:1) Strong’s #5315: This Hebrew word occurs more than 750 times in the Bible. It has quite a number of meanings, but most of them can be reduced to the following four categories: (1) life or the life force, especially in connection with blood (Gen. 9:4, 5; Lev. 17:11, 14); (2) one’s soul or the immaterial being, the seat of intellect and emotion (42:1, 2; 86:4; 1 Sam. 1:10; 2 Sam. 5:8; Prov. 23:7; Song 1:7); and (3) an individual or person (84:2; Gen. 2:7; Judg. 12:3; Ezek. 18:4). Originally the word probably referred to the breath (Job 41:21). The Bible typically considers a person as an interconnected whole. This is why the Bible tells us to love God with all our heart, soul, and strength—in other words, with our entire being (Deut. 6:4, 5; Josh. 22:5).

103:6 God is for the helpless and the oppressed. He is not unfair, for He is the One who will restore justice to the earth.

103:7 made known His ways to Moses: God blessed His servant Moses in a special way by revealing the Law to him. His acts: During the Exodus and the wilderness wanderings, God acted on the Israelites’ behalf. He saved them from Pharaoh’s army, provided them with water and food, but most importantly revealed the Law to them.

103:8–14 The LORD is merciful: This is a basic description of God in the OT (86:15; Ex. 34:6, 7). If God dealt with us according to our sins, no one could stand before Him (130:3). There is no way to compare the divine with the mortal; the mercy of God is greater than the heavens. He removes our sins completely (Mic. 7:19) and cares for His people as a good father cares for his children. The fact that God remembers who we are and how He made us is another mark of His mercy, for we are dust.

Wild flowers near Jerusalem, in the Kidron Valley. The psalmist probably had flowers such as these in mind when he spoke of the fleeting nature of life (Ps. 103:15, 16).

103:15 as for man: The transitory nature of our lives is a regular feature of the thinking of the writers of the psalms; as with all thoughtful people, they were amazed at the brevity of life and its fragile nature. Our lives are as short-lived, it seems, as a spring flower that is beset by the summer wind.

103:16–19 Mercy may be rephrased as "loyal love." God's anger is for a moment (v. 8); His loyal love is forever. His blessing is on those who keep faith with Him (147:11). His throne: The Lord is King of all and King forever. His rule is the only rule that matters.

103:20–22 Bless the LORD: The poet began the psalm with a call to his own inner being to respond with praise to God (v. 1); he concludes the psalm with a call to heaven and earth to join him in joyful praise.

Psalm 104, a wisdom psalm, is also a creation psalm (Ps. 19). It is an exuberant poetic recasting of Gen. 1, a joyful celebration of the world as the creation of God. The poetry of the psalmists and the prophets often reflects upon God's work in creation. The structure of the poem is: (1) praise for God's great creation (vv. 1, 2); (2) the creation of the heavens (vv. 3, 4); (3) the creation of the earth (vv. 5–9); (4) the waters of blessing (vv. 10–13); (5) the fullness of the earth (vv. 14–18); (6) the patterns of life (vv. 19–23); (7) praise for God's great creation (vv. 24–26); (8) an acknowledgment that all life is dependent upon the Lord (vv. 27–30); (9) a prayer for God's glory (vv. 31, 32); (10) a personal response to God (vv. 33–35).

104:1, 2 God is Spirit (John 4:24), and descriptions of Him vary through the Bible. One strong description of Him is light (1 John 1:5). Here light is described as the garment that enfolds His wonder. The first act of God in Genesis was the command for light (Gen. 1:3).

104:3, 4 beams of His upper chambers: With these poetic words, the psalmist alludes to the heavenly dwelling place of God, a place beyond human understanding. makes the clouds His chariot: Idolaters used similar language of Baal. The psalmist strips Baal of these honors and applied them to the living God (Ps. 93). Angels are also spirit beings; they may appear as flames of fire (Is. 6:2).

104:5–7 You who laid the foundations of the earth is a poetic way of describing how God created the heavens and the earth. The deep is the same term used in Gen. 1:2. At Your rebuke: The poet recalls that God brought dry land from the watery abyss in Gen. 1:9, 10. The word of God is referred to as a "rebuke" or a "thundering."

104:8, 9 A boundary is a regular theme in wisdom literature (Prov. 8:29). God's control over the turbulent waters (Ps. 93) is proof that He, not Baal, is the true Sovereign.

104:10–13 the springs: From the exalted stance of vv. 1–9, the poem now descends to the levels of valley springs and drinking donkeys. All is lovely, all in the blessing of God's great care (147:8).

104:11–15 vegetation: The basis for this section is Gen. 1:11–13, the creative acts of God on the third day. Here the psalmist indicates the specific purpose of God's creation: to provide for the needs of human beings. Wine, oil, and bread—staples of everyday life in Israel—are blessings of God to enrich life.

104:16–18 trees and hills each have their place in the divine ecology for manifold animal life. A Christian response to these verses includes a concern for animal habitat and the environment all about us. Such things God takes pleasure in; how may we ignore these altogether?

104:19 seasons: The events of the fourth day of creation are reviewed here (Gen. 1:14–19). The point is that God has established the patterns of life.

104:20–24 The Hebrew wisdom writers looked at the world with a sense of wonder and reverence because it reflected the wisdom of its Creator.

104:25, 26 References to the sea in the psalms are generally in the context of Canaanite ideas. The Canaanites said that Baal controlled the powerful gods of the seas. But the psalmist asserts in the face of this falsehood that God created the waters and everything in them—even Leviathan, the great sea monster (Job 41).

104:27–30 These all wait: All creation depends on the Creator for birth, life, and sustenance. Even death is controlled by the Sovereign One.

104:31 God continues to rejoice in His creative work on earth (Prov. 8:30, 31). The Lord considered His creation “good” from the beginning (Gen. 1:31), and His pleasure in it remains.

104:32–35 my meditation: The poet wants to respond properly to God’s creation. Bless the LORD echoes the beginning of the psalm (v. 1).

Psalm 105, a psalm of praise (compare Ps. 113), focuses on the positive experiences of Israel in their early history. Contrast Ps. 106, which reviews the same period of history but with an emphasis on the faithlessness of the people. This poem celebrates God's faithfulness to His covenant with Abraham in the lives of His people. The people needed to remember to be faithful to God, who had never forgotten to be faithful to them. The structure of the poem is: (1) a call for praise to God (vv. 1–6); (2) God's covenant with Abraham (vv. 7–12); (3) the early experiences of God's people (vv. 13–15); (4) the experience of Joseph (vv. 16–22); (5) the experience of Israel in Egypt (vv. 23–25); (6) the great deliverance from Egypt (vv. 26–36); (7) the great provisions (vv. 37–41); (8) God's promise to Abraham (vv. 42–45).

Looking Back

Perhaps your pastor gives an annual report of your church in which he points out some of the ways in which God has been faithful to the congregation over the previous year. In a similar way, Psalm 105 takes a look back at Israel's history in order to praise the Lord for honoring His commitments to the Hebrews' ancestor Abraham.

The occasion for which this psalm was originally composed may have been one of the religious festivals, possibly the Feast of Tabernacles (Lev. 23:33), but more likely the Festival of Weeks or Pentecost (Lev. 23:15–21). The former celebrated the Lord's help during the Israelites' Exodus journey, when they resided in tents (or "tabernacles"). The latter was to show thanksgiving to God for the annual harvest.

Psalm 105, along with other psalms recalling Israel's history (for example, Pss. 78, 106), encourages God's people today to formally celebrate the promises that He has made and fulfilled for us. The habit of looking back at His gracious acts can stir up joy for today and new hope for the future.

105:1–6 The psalmist calls to memory what God did for His people in fulfillment of the covenant with Abraham (Gen. 12:1–3; 13:14–17; 15:13–21; 17:7, 8; 26:3, 4; 28:13–15). Remember is the key idea of the psalm: the psalmist wanted to remind God's people of His goodness.

105:7 His judgments: God's actions against the Egyptians (Ex. 6:6).

105:8 The psalmist assured his audience that even if they did not remember, God does remember. He remembers: The words of the original promise to Abraham set out the Lord's obligation in strong terms (Gen. 12:1–3). These ideas are reinforced by the dramatic encounter with Abraham in Gen. 15. In the story of the binding of Isaac in Gen. 22, the Lord undertakes an irrevocable oath of obligation (Gen. 22:16–18).

105:9–15 When they went: This section is an overview of the history of Israel, probably written after the return of the exiles from Babylon (Ps. 147). This is not a necessary conclusion, but it appears likely. The major theme of the poem is God's faithfulness to His people in their early history.

My anointed ones: The parallel term My prophets suggests that these are the leaders of Israel—the kings and priests.

105:16, 17 The experiences of Joseph occupy a long section of the Book of Genesis (Gen. 37—50). Here Joseph's story is recounted as poetry and song.

105:18–25 Israel also came into Egypt: The descent of Israel to Egypt accomplished two things: they were spared from starvation during the period of great famine; they were kept from assimilation by the people of Canaan until they were large enough to be a cohesive people on their own. He turned their heart: When the time was right, God directed the attitudes of the Egyptians to turn on His people, to afford their redemption.

105:26–42 The psalmist recites the history of the plagues to demonstrate the Lord's power. The plagues took place within time and space; they were the action of God with humans in the real world. But the verses of this psalm are not historical prose; they are a poetic version of the events that capture the horror of it. The order of the plagues is not followed strictly, and only eight of the plagues are mentioned (Ex. 7—11).

105:43–45 with gladness: This poem celebrates the joy of the Lord in His acts of deliverance. gave them the lands: The psalm was probably composed after the exile in Babylon. A celebration of God's gift of land would have been a tremendous source of encouragement to the people who had just returned to the land.

Psalm 106, a wisdom psalm, rehearses much of the same history covered in Ps. 105. The two poems are companions, although their perspectives are different. Psalm 106 emphasizes the rebellion of the people despite the unflagging goodness of God. If Ps. 105 is about remembering, Ps. 106 is about forgetting—specifically God's people forgetting His mercies. This is a psalm of praise (as is Ps. 105), in that it calls for the praise of God despite the short memories of His people. The structure of Ps. 106 is: (1) a call to praise God (v. 1); (2) a report on the status of the present generation (vv. 2–15); (3) a recitation of the works of God on behalf of earlier generations (vv. 16–43); (4) a concluding appeal (vv. 44–47); (5) words of praise to conclude Book IV of the Psalms (v. 48).

106:1–5 Oh, give thanks to the Lord: The words of v. 1 and the general language of praise in v. 2 connect this poem with Ps. 105 as a set (105:1, 2). Possibly both psalms were written by the same poet and were designed to go together, since this psalm builds on the theme of remembering. Remember me seems to be a personal prayer based on the recitation of Israel's history in Ps. 105.

106:6 We have sinned with our fathers: The confession of sin comes without warning. This is a psalm of community penitence. The connection of the present generation to the sins of the fathers is ominous. Would the present generation have to suffer the misfortunes and judgments that God brought upon their fathers?

106:7–12 God knew that His people would be faithless repeatedly, yet He saved them for His name's sake. The crossing of the waters of the Red Sea was not mentioned in Ps. 105 but is included here. Then they believed: The people were often faithless; but they had moments of true faith and performed actions of true praise.

106:13–16 They soon forgot: These words contrast dramatically with the emphasis of Ps. 105, which may indicate that the two psalms were written by the same poet and designed to go together. He gave them their request: Several times God gave the people what they thought they wanted, but with the gift came His judgment on their sin.

106:17 The rebellion of Dathan and Abiram is described in Num. 16.

106:18–23 The story of the gold calf is recorded in Ex. 32. changed their glory: In exchange for the living God, the people accepted an image of an ox.

106:24 The fact that they despised the pleasant land is regarded as a result of their unbelief and rejection of God's good gift. God's judgment (Num. 13; 14) was fully deserved.

106:25–30 Baal of Peor refers to the incident described in Num. 25, following the encounter of Balaam and Balak at Moab. However, this psalm adds a new detail to the story: eating sacrifices offered to the dead. Phinehas, one of the great champions of God in the OT, is celebrated in this poem. As Abraham's faith was accounted to him for righteousness (Gen. 15:6), so was the action of Phinehas (Num. 25).

IN CONTEXT

Ancestor Worship

The deification of ancestors was common throughout the ancient world. The mythological texts from Ugarit (1400–1200 B.C.) make reference to "rulers" in the netherworld who formerly had been monarchs in the human realm. These deceased humans were treated as minor deities, having religious feasts held in their honor. Even in ancient Palestine, the excavations of graves have sometimes uncovered tubes built into the ground so that communication and food could be delivered to the deceased.

Ancestor worship is not common in the Bible. There is one Canaanite practice mentioned, however, by which famous or important dead persons had become deities of the underworld. The psalmist reports that the Israelites "ate sacrifices made to the dead" (Ps. 106:28). The practice is associated with the "Baal of Peor" incident, indicating that the Israelites encountered the custom as they moved toward the Promised Land.

The Law of Moses made it unacceptable to treat any human as a god, whether living or dead (Ex. 20:2; Deut. 26:14). The Israelites who engaged in the regional religious belief of eating sacrifices for the dead were considered to have turned away from the one true God and "provoked Him to anger" (Ps. 106:29). To honor the memory of one's ancestors was desirable, but such honor must not pass over into worship.

106:31–33 Waters of strife is a reference to Meribah (95:8; Num. 20:1–13). Here the sin of Moses is called "speaking rashly." In Num. 20:12, God specifically identified Moses' sin as dishonoring Him before the people by not trusting Him. By not following God's command "to speak" to the rock, Moses had not modeled proper obedience and respect for God's command.

106:34–39 God's judgment on Israel in Canaan was a result of the Israelites' failure to destroy the peoples. If the Canaanites had been driven out of the land, the people of Israel might never have succumbed to the idolatry that marked their existence for hundreds of years. Instead, the Israelites learned to worship the Canaanite idols. They participated in the worst aspects of their religion and played the harlot against God their Redeemer.

106:40–46 The wrath of the Lord must be viewed in the context of His long-standing mercy and forbearance. There was a long history of rebellion in the face of His gracious provision before God became enraged. Yet even in the midst of His wrath, God's merciful nature was evident. He remained faithful to His covenant with His people even during their rebellion.

106:47 The words of appeal save us are buttressed with the words O Lord our God. Though the people had been faithless, the Lord was still their God. If they would return to Him, they would have a home in His mercy and a promise of eventual triumph.

106:48 Blessed be the Lord God of Israel: This verse is an addition to Ps. 106 that forms the concluding verse of Book IV of the Psalms. It is a beautiful liturgical call for the people together to bless their faithful God.

Psalm 107, a wisdom psalm, shares the form and many of the same themes as Pss. 105 and 106. The fact that this psalm begins Book V of the Psalms, however, suggests that it may not have been written as a companion psalm to the previous two psalms. Psalm 107 reviews God's actions in the experiences of His people, using illustrations not found in the narrative of the Pentateuch. The psalm begins and concludes with appeals to trust in the "loyal love" of God. The structure of the psalm is: (1) a celebration of God's enduring loyal love (vv. 1–3); (2) affirmation that God meets the needs of those who wander in the wilderness (vv. 4–9); (3) assurance that God delivers those in exile or in prison (vv. 10–16); (4) a declaration that God saves the foolish who call to Him (vv. 17–22); (5) God's salvation of those caught in storms (vv. 23–32); (6) God's provision for those in barren lands (vv. 33–38); (7) an affirmation that God multiplies peoples who are diminished (vv. 39–42); (8) a call to rediscover the loyal love of God (v. 43).

107:1 Oh, give thanks to the Lord: The beginning of this psalm links it to the two preceding poems (105:1; 106:1). The key point of this psalm is that God's mercy endures forever. He is always willing to restore those who call on Him.

107:2–9 They wandered in the wilderness: This may refer to the historical experience of Israel in the desert of Sinai. It also can apply to any group of dispersed Hebrew people away from the mercies of God. Oh, that men would give thanks to the Lord: These words are a refrain throughout the psalm, exhorting the reader to thank God for His mercy (vv. 15, 21, 31). He satisfies: This is the point that every generation of believers needs to remember. We will never discover anything more satisfying than the Lord, who will meet all our needs.

107:10 Those who sat in darkness refers to prisoners. Those who know the Lord will call out to Him in their distress, even though it may have been their own rebellion that caused the distress. The mercy of God is demonstrated in His acts of deliverance, acts that call for renewed praise to Him for His goodness.

107:11–17 Fools is a harsh word that emphasizes moral failure (Prov. 1:7; 15:5). These people deserved the trouble they suffered. Yet they too may call upon the Lord, and He will deliver and restore them.

107:18–32 those who go down to the sea in ships: The words make us remember the idyllic description in Psalm 104:26; here the situation is not so pleasant. The people who are at sea find themselves in the storms and powers of the ocean over which they have no control. They suffer terribly (vv. 26, 27), and, as people in trouble everywhere, they cry aloud to the Lord (v. 28). Then God steps in, calms the storm and delivers them (v. 29). Why then do men not praise Him? (vv. 31, 32). Part of the answer may be seen in the failure really to focus on what God is like. The reward of practicing truth is the ability to discern good and evil and to make right decisions about our circumstances and environment (Heb. 12:13, 14).

107:33–35 He turns rivers into a wilderness: Because of the people's sinfulness, God may bring curses on the land and afflict people with harsh circumstances in order to drive them back into His loving arms (1 Kin. 17:1–7). turns a wilderness into pools of water: When His people cried to Him for assistance, God restored the fertility of the land (Deut. 30:1–10; Ruth 1:6).

107:36–42 when they are diminished: The poet now describes general upheavals. God is at work lowering the mighty (vv. 39, 40) and elevating the poor (v. 41). The question still remains: Why do people not praise the Lord?

107:43 Whoever is wise: There is no wisdom apart from centering in and responding to the love of God. The psalmist exhorts the readers to review God's history of delivering those in trouble, and to praise His great love.

Psalm 108, a psalm of trust, reveals the assurance a person can have when the Lord is his or her God. The psalm is actually a medley of two other psalms of David. Verses 1–5 are from 57:7–11, and vv. 6–13 are from 60:5–12. Since David is the author of both of these psalms, the verses of this psalm may be ascribed to him as well, even if the arrangement may have been the work of an anonymous editor. As this psalm shows, there was considerable reworking of some parts of the Book of Psalms so that the psalms could be used in the varying circumstances of temple worship.

108:1, 2 I will awaken the dawn: The psalmist wanted to sing to the Lord before the sun rose. The prospect of a sleepless night did not deter him from praise and thanksgiving.

108:3–13 The remarkable fact about the words I will rejoice is that they are spoken by God. The Lord has pleasure in delivering His people and giving them victory: He celebrates His deliverance of them.

Psalm 109, a psalm of lament, pays particular attention to the psalmist's enemies. As a result, this poem may also be regarded as an imprecatory psalm. The structure is: (1) a call for God not to be silent in the midst of the attacks from the psalmist's enemies (vv. 1–5); (2) a call for God to bring judgment on the wicked (vv. 6–20); (3) a call for God to come to the aid of the innocent (vv. 21–29); (4) a determination to praise the Lord (vv. 30, 31).

109:1–3 The call to not keep silent is a regular feature of the lament psalms. fought against me without a cause: The psalmist declares his innocence and insists that his enemies have rewarded his prayers with evil, his love with hatred.

109:4–8 Set a wicked man over him: Here the psalm takes a decidedly negative tone. The description of the wife of the enemy becoming an impoverished widow and the children becoming beggars seems particularly harsh. However, the psalmist directs these strong requests to the Lord; he does not actually take the sword into his own hand. He may feel compelled to vent his anger in words, but the psalmist understands that vengeance itself belongs to the Lord. let another take his office: These words (along with the words of 69:25) are quoted in Acts 1:20 as having been fulfilled in the replacement of Judas Iscariot.

109:9–16 Let the iniquity of his fathers be remembered: Although the psalmist's words may seem extremely hostile, he is simply asking that his enemy's evil actions be judged. The poor are not those without wealth so much as those without protection or defenders.

109:17–21 The poet asks for action that would befit God's name, a name associated with righteousness (23:3). His appeal is to God's mercy or "loyal love." The poet describes himself as a wasted, hollow shell of a man, as in 22:6–8. The intensity of the psalmist's attacks on his enemies can be explained in part by the intensity of his own afflictions, as described in these verses.

109:22–27 That they may know: Even in the psalmist's intense emotional state, he wants to see the name of God defended, proclaimed, and honored. The Psalms always lead to the praise of God, even from the depths of desperate circumstances.

109:28–31 The poet makes his vow of praise for the deliverance he knows that the Lord will provide. This vow to praise God is a characteristic of many of the psalms. He shall stand at the right hand of the poor: See 142:4 for a description of God as a shield at one's right hand.

Psalm 110, a royal psalm, is one of the most directly messianic of all the psalms. It should be read in conjunction with other messianic psalms such as Pss. 2; 24. Jesus Himself identified David as the writer of this psalm, as the title also indicates. Jesus' interpretation of this psalm is crucial for unlocking the psalm's meaning (Matt. 22:41–45; Mark 12:35–37; Luke 20:41–44; compare Peter's exposition of the psalm in Acts 2:34–36). The interpretative key to the psalm lies in the identification of "my Lord" in v. 1. Jesus asserted that in v. 1, David was speaking of someone greater than himself. Since no ordinary son of David could be greater than him, "the Lord" of v. 1 refers to the coming Messiah, God's Son. Hence this psalm describes a conversation between God the Father and God the Son (v. 1), in which the Father grants the Son royal and priestly honors. The structure of this brief psalm is as follows: (1) God's command to the Son to sit at His right hand (v. 1); (2) God's command to the Son to rule in the midst of His enemies (vv. 2, 3); (3) God's appointment of the Son to be a priest forever (v. 4); (4) God's description of the battle the Son must wage to win His kingdom (vv. 5–7).

IN DEPTH

Messianic Psalms

For the Christian, perhaps nothing in the Psalms is more compelling than the prophecies that the book contains concerning the Lord Jesus Christ. Psalm 2 speaks of His coming reign; Ps. 22 describes His crucifixion; Ps. 16 speaks of His resurrection; Ps. 110 pictures the Savior at the right hand of the Father in heaven and as a Priest according to the order of Melchizedek. These and other celebrated passages have led many to speak of a category of messianic psalms.

Many psalms are messianic because they point forward to Jesus Christ. Some psalms are directly prophetic (Pss. 2; 110). Others prophetically foreshadow events related to Christ (compare the description of a wedding of a King in Ps. 45 with Heb. 1:8, 9; Rev. 19:6–8). But almost all the psalms point forward in some way to the coming Messiah and His eternal reign of righteousness (1:1–3; 41:9). For example, the words of 6:8, “Depart from me, all you workers of iniquity,” do not seem to have a messianic thrust to them. Yet they are messianic, for Jesus is recorded to have used these very words in His prophetic pronouncement of the final judgment (Matt. 7:23). This indicates that David’s experience recorded in Ps. 6 was in some manner prophetically linked to the experience of Jesus. In fact, David’s language in the psalms regularly suggests the language of the great King to come—that is, Jesus Christ. Consider the words of 7:8: The Lord shall judge the peoples; Judge me, O LORD, according to my righteousness, And according to my integrity within me.

These words are David’s protest. Suffering without cause, he cried out to God to clear his name. But David, though innocent of the specific charge, was not innocent of every charge. There is only One whose innocence is absolute, whose freedom from sin is complete. Jesus is the One who can be judged on the basis of His righteousness alone. He alone could say these words without flinching, for these words depict His character.

The suffering of the poor (as in Ps. 13), the unjust attacks upon the righteous (as in Ps. 7), the idealization of justice (as in Ps. 15), the portrait of the righteous person (as in Ps. 1), the images of royalty (as in Ps. 45), even the pronouncements of curses on one’s enemies (as in Ps. 6) are all motifs of the Messiah in the Psalms. Jesus is the coming One; many of the psalms are in fact His songs.

110:1 The LORD is the Hebrew name Yahweh and refers to God the Father. to my Lord: According to Jesus' interpretation of the passage (Matt. 22:41–45; Mark 12:35–37; Luke 20:41–44), this is a reference to the Son of God in heaven in the presence of the Father. David himself confesses the Son to be his Lord, that is, his master or sovereign. at My right hand: This position of high honor beside the Father was given to the Savior upon His resurrection and ascension (Acts 2:33–36; 1 Cor. 15:20–28; Col. 3:1; Heb. 1:13). The Savior's placing His feet on His foes depicts the utter defeat of the enemies of Christ. Paul too describes this complete victory of Jesus (1 Cor. 15:25, 26; Eph. 1:22, 23).

110:2, 3 Rule: The Father commands the Son to take His kingdom back from His enemies. The outcome of this final battle was determined long ago (47:3). your people: The description in vv. 2, 3 of the people who join the coming King in His great battle accords well with that in Rev. 19:14. From the womb of the morning describes the volunteer army in their robust and fresh vigor; they are ready for a holy battle.

110:4 priest: David himself had performed some priestly functions, especially when he led the worship surrounding the arrival of the ark of the covenant (2 Sam 6:12–19). He even exercised some authority over the priests by supervising the Levites (1 Chr. 23:1–6). But here David envisions God appointing the coming Messiah to be a priest (Heb. 7). This was a source of confusion for Jews, as evidenced by the questions the NT Jews had about the Messiah. Some Dead Sea Scrolls give evidence that more than one Messiah was anticipated. According to Scripture, the Messiah would be a descendant of David (Is. 9:7), but this prophecy presents Him as a priest. This might seem to be a contradiction because true priests had to be descendants of Aaron. The solution to this problem is that the Messiah was a priest by divine declaration—not human descent. Melchizedek is first mentioned in Gen. 14:18–20. He was a true priest of the Most High God, unrelated to Abraham and who lived hundreds of years before Aaron. He became a prototype of the Messiah, whose priesthood was not based upon connection with the line of Aaron, but was by divine decree (Heb. 5:5–11; 6:20; 7:1–28).

110:5–7 The Savior King is in battle (vv. 2, 3), and the Father is His shield at His right hand (16:8; 142:4). God the Father assists the Son in the battle. execute kings: The rule of the King will be absolute, dramatic, and forceful. dead bodies: This image is elaborated in Rev. 19:19–21. He shall lift up the head: As the great Victor, the Son will hold His head high in triumph over all His enemies (3:3).

Psalm 111, a wisdom psalm, also serves as a psalm of praise. This psalm and the next are written as acrostics. The structure of Ps. 111 is: (1) a determination to praise God in the midst of the congregation (v. 1); (2) a description of the praise of God for His wonderful works towards His people (vv. 2–9); (3) a concluding word tying the nature of true wisdom to the fear of the Lord (v. 10).

111:1 I will praise the LORD: The psalm begins in the standard manner, following the opening "Hallelujah." The determination to praise Yahweh is from his heart and before the congregation.

111:2–9 The distinctive message of this section of the psalm is an appreciation of the works of the Lord for the way they cause the psalmist to glorify God. Creation calls attention to the Creator (19:1–6; 104:1–35). Gracious and full of compassion may be rephrased as "wonderfully gracious." Faith understands food and all other provisions as gifts of God. redemption: The psalmists constantly look back to the Exodus, but they also speak of that which was still to come—redemption in the Savior Jesus.

111:10 The fear of the Lord describes an obedient response of wonder and awe before the Most High God.

Psalm 112, a wisdom psalm, is very similar to Ps. 111; together they form a matched pair of acrostic poems. The structure of the poem is: (1) a determination to praise God (v. 1); (2) the praise of God based on His works with His people (vv. 2–9); (3) the defeat of the wicked (v. 10).

112:1 Praise the Lord: Like Ps. 111, this psalm begins with the Hebrew word hallelujah. It then picks up where Ps. 111 left off. Blessed, a word meaning "one who is manifestly happy," is the same term with which the Book of Psalms begins.

112:2–9 His descendants will be mighty: Compare the blessings of vv. 2, 3 with the strong curses placed on the wicked in 109:6–13 to see the vivid contrast the Psalms make between the destinies of the wicked and the righteous. This black and white distinction is characteristic of the wisdom writers in Israel. The description of the good man in v. 5 is similar to the description in Ps. 15. The horn is a symbol of power. When used of a righteous person, it speaks of prominence and a lasting sense of worth in his or her life.

112:10 Here as in Ps. 1, the contrast between the righteous and the wicked is sharp and uncompromising. The desire of the righteous will prevail (v. 8), but the desire of the wicked will perish.

Psalm 113, a psalm of descriptive praise, begins and concludes with the words “Praise the Lord!” (in Hebrew, hallelujah). This psalm and Ps. 114 are regularly recited at the Passover Seder, a celebratory meal before the serving of the dinner. Pss. 115—118 are recited following the dinner. The structure of Ps. 113 is: (1) an exhortation to praise the name of the Lord (vv. 1–3); (2) a celebration of the transcendent glory and abundant mercy of the Lord (vv. 4–6); (3) illustrations of God’s grace (vv. 7–9).

IN DEPTH

Passover Psalms

One of the most effective ways to teach spiritual truth is through song. Likewise, memories are often passed on most effectively through music. Aware of this, the ancient Hebrews composed Psalms 113—118 to be sung around the supper table during Passover.

The first two of the group were sung before the meal and the other four afterwards. Each of the psalms commemorated some aspect of the escape of the Israelites from their bondage to Pharaoh and the Egyptians (Ex. 12—15), and for that reason they are sometimes referred to as the Egyptian Hallel (Hallel means "praise"; compare Ps. 113:1). Jesus and His disciples probably sang these psalms at their last meal together in the Upper Room (Matt. 26:30; Mark 14:26).

The themes of these six Passover psalms are: Psalm 113: Praising God for releasing the downtrodden.

Psalm 114: Escaping from Egypt.

Psalm 115: Praising God together as a people.

Psalm 116: Thanking God personally and giving oneself to Him.

Psalm 117: Calling non-Jews to praise God.

Psalm 118: Recalling God's steadfast, enduring love.

113:1–3 The name of the Lord refers to the person of God. In biblical times there was a close association between a person's name and his or her identity. The name symbolized the person. Therefore, praising the name of God centers one's thoughts on God's character. The rising of the sun is the east and its going down is the west. The verse does not mean at every time, from dawn to dusk, but in every place, from east to west, the name of God is to be praised.

113:4–6 high above all nations: Unlike the man-made gods of the ancient Middle East, the Lord is not limited to a certain tribe or territory. He is sovereign over all; He is Most High (7:17; 47:2). glory above the heavens: Not only is God supreme over all nations, His glory cannot be contained in the universe. His glory is not only beyond the universe, it is beyond the capacity of human language to fully describe. Perhaps this explains Paul's response to his visit above the heavens (2 Cor. 12:1–4). The rhetorical words who is like the Lord present the incomparability of God (Is. 40:25). Who humbles Himself: God draws near to us.

113:7 The poor might try to eke out their existence by scratching at rubbish heaps outside the city wall, that is, out of the dust. God's care for the poor and needy is a special interest in the Psalms. In this psalm we see a marvelous picture of salvation. While we scavenge about for significance, God's mercy in Jesus makes us citizens of heaven.

113:8, 9 No image better conveys human emotional suffering in biblical times than that of the barren woman. In that time and culture, a barren woman was without significance and without joy. Note that God stoops down to bring her the joy for which she craves—happy children. Salvation is like that. Not only does God fill us with significance, but also with joy.

Psalm 114 celebrates Israel's deliverance from Egypt. There is a light, lively spirit to this poem that balances the heavier pacing and stronger theology of the first song of deliverance in Ex. 15. This poem is recited with Ps. 113 at Passover before the dinner is served. This psalm has three movements: (1) a celebration of Israel's redemption from Egypt (vv. 1, 2); (2) a characterization of Israel's enemies (vv. 3–6); (3) a celebration of the Lord who redeemed Israel (vv. 7, 8).

114:1, 2 The newly freed slaves left Egypt still refusing the strange language of their long-term captors. With this slight, Israel affirmed that true values in life were not to be found in the "glories of Egypt," but in the presence of the Lord. sanctuary: This verse anticipates the NT sense of God living among His people rather than in a shrine (Ezek. 37:26, 27; 2 Cor. 6:16–18).

114:3–6 The sea and the Jordan, the mountains and the hills, all appear as frightened animals before the awesome presence of the Lord, who is not mentioned until v. 7.

114:7 tremble: At once we are arrested by the symbol of God's presence. While the sea and the Jordan, the hills and the mountains may gambol, people need to be startled. His judgment will be against errant man.

114:8 God not only delivered His people from Egypt, He also provided for their needs by bringing water from a rock (Ex. 17; Num. 20). Water was a physical blessing, but also a spiritual symbol of His salvation.

Psalm 115, a community psalm of praise, focuses on the glory of the Lord in the salvation of His people. Several sections of this psalm are used in Ps. 135. This poem has five movements: (1) a glorification of the Lord who alone deserves praise (vv. 1, 2); (2) a comparison of the false gods and the true, living God (vv. 3–8); (3) a litany of trust in the Lord (vv. 9–11); (4) a litany of blessing in the Lord (vv. 12–15); (5) a glorification of the Lord (vv. 16–18).

115:1, 2 Not unto us: People have a natural tendency to divert to themselves glory that belongs to God. This psalm redirects the glory to its proper focus, the Lord Himself. The Gentiles, who do not know God, are prone to insult believers in times of testing when God's activity is not apparent (42:3).

115:3, 4 Like the prophets (Is. 40; Jer. 10), the psalms are derisive toward the idols of the nations. The psalmist denies any reality to the false gods created by people (135:15–18). In contrast to these "gods" that have to be carried about, propped up, and coddled, Israel exalted the God who is in heaven and who does whatever He pleases. He is the only God who can demand our worship.

115:9–11 On the basis of the confession of the reality of God, the psalm commences a litany that encourages trust in God alone. With this litany the choir leader would exhort first Israel, then the house of Aaron, and finally all who fear the LORD to trust God. The refrain proclaims God's protective care over them: He is their help and their shield.

115:12–15 A second litany focuses on God's blessing. Not only is He the only God who is trustworthy, He also desires to bless all those who trust in Him.

115:16–18 The plural heavens may refer to the dwelling place of God (2 Cor. 12:2). The dead: As in 6:5, this is not a theology of death, but of praise. It is the work of the living to praise God. When anyone dies, that voice is lost from the living choir. Praise the Lord: Many of the Passover psalms (Pss. 115—117) conclude with word hallelujah, the Hebrew for "praise the Lord."

Psalm 116, a messianic psalm, is one of the Passover psalms (Pss. 113—118). This psalm most likely was recited by Jesus on the night of His arrest, the night He celebrated Passover with His disciples (Luke 22:15). The structure of the poem is: (1) a declaration of the psalmist's love for the Lord (vv. 1, 2); (2) an experience on the brink of death (vv. 3, 4); (3) praise for God (vv. 5–7); (4) the psalmist's deliverance from death (vv. 8–11); (5) a vow of praise to the Lord (vv. 12–14); (6) a reflection on the psalmist's deliverance (vv. 15–17); (7) payment of his vow of praise to the Lord (vv. 18, 19).

116:1, 2 The wording of I love the Lord in Hebrew suggests deep excitement and emotion. He has inclined His ear to me: As in 40:1, these words speak of the love of God: He bends from His place of glory to meet the needs of His people.

116:3–5 Pains of death describes the psalmist's harrowing experience of suffering that brought him seemingly to the brink of death (86:13). These words point prophetically to the Savior's anguish on the Cross (Matt. 27:27–35).

116:6 In this context, simple means innocent, clean, or untarnished. In the Book of Proverbs, the word usually means naive or untested (Prov. 1:22).

116:7–10 Paul quotes the words I believed, therefore I spoke in 2 Cor. 4:13, 14 as proof of the scriptural hope of the resurrection of the Savior Jesus. The belief in v. 10 is the hope, articulated in v. 9, that the psalmist would walk in the land of the living.

116:11–13 With the phrase what shall I render, the psalmist vows to praise God in an audible and public manner among the people of faith. At Passover this psalm is read after the meal, immediately following the third cup of wine, called the cup of salvation. How appropriate that this Passover psalm would call to mind God's cup of salvation the very night that the Savior was betrayed (Matt. 26:27; Luke 22:14–22).

116:14–17 The psalmist declares that he is God's servant. As Jesus demonstrated in the Upper Room celebration of the Passover, every true follower of Christ must become a servant. Just as Jesus the Son of God became a servant to His disciples and washed their feet, so every believer needs to serve others (John 13:1–17). The words of the psalm were prophetically fulfilled when they were sung by Jesus on the night before He was crucified. The term thanksgiving basically means “public acknowledgment.”

116:18, 19 I will pay my vows: These words are evidently the concluding words of the psalmist, declaring his intention to make good on his promise to bring his offering of praise to the temple court.

Psalm 117 is a descriptive psalm of praise. It is the shortest psalm and has a simple structure: (1) a call for the nations to praise God (v. 1); (2) an enumeration of reasons for the nations to praise God (v. 2).

117:1 Laud, which means "to speak well of," nicely parallels the term praise, which means "to be excitedly boastful about." The Hebrew word for Gentiles means all people except Jews; the word for peoples speaks of smaller groups of people, along ethnic and language lines.

117:2 Merciful kindness, or "loyal love," refers to God's faithfulness to His covenant promises to His people. The reason the nations are to give praise to God is found in His relationship with Israel. Praise the Lord: The concluding Hallelujah is an appropriate shout of triumph in God's mercy.

Psalm 118, a psalm of declarative praise, is the climax of the group of psalms called the Passover psalms or Hallel psalms, after the Hebrew word for praise, hallel. Hallelujah comes from this word. These psalms were probably sung by the Savior on the night before His death. The structure of the poem is: (1) a call for the praise of God in the community of the redeemed (vv. 1–4); (2) a report of confidence in the Lord (vv. 5–9); (3) a report of God's deliverance in a time of trouble (vv. 10–14); (4) the praise of the Lord by the righteous (vv. 15–18); (5) the declaration of the psalmist that he would enter the gate of the city to praise the Lord (vv. 19–21); (6) the picture of the rejected cornerstone (vv. 22–24); (7) the shout of "Hosanna" by the people in praise of God (vv. 25, 26); (8) the continuing determination of the psalmist to bring his praise to the Lord (vv. 27, 28); (9) the renewed call for the praise of God (v. 29).

118:1, 2 The liturgical instruction let Israel now say appears from time to time in the Psalms (Pss. 124; 129). This psalm was recited in antiphonal responses. The refrain praises God's mercy: His mercy endures forever.

118:3–8 The idea of distress in these psalms is a picture of constraint, constriction, or lack of room. Even when surrounded by impossible circumstances, the believer can proclaim the Lord is on my side. And if so, what can man do to me? See 56:4, 9; 94:17. If our trust is in the Lord's strength, we do not have to fear the reprisals of our enemies. confidence in princes: Although relying on other people is part of living, our ultimate trust can only be placed in the Lord God. Even powerful rulers are limited by their own mortality (146:3).

118:9–11 The poet feels that he is alone and that the whole world is arrayed against him. The words I will destroy them are used three times in vv. 10–12; the repetition is for emphasis and finality. Even though the psalmist is completely encircled by his enemies, he knows that God will help him triumph over them.

118:12–14 You pushed me: Translated literally, the Hebrew phrase means "pushing, you pushed me to make me fall." But the Lord helped me: Compare Paul's words in 2 Tim. 4:17, 18. Deliverance always comes from God. The Lord is not only our Helper, but also our strength and song. These words are a quotation from the "Song of Moses" (Ex. 15:2); they are also quoted in Is. 12:2. The God who delivered the Israelites by dividing the waters of the Red Sea was ready to deliver the psalmist from trouble.

118:15–17 The voice of rejoicing: The psalmist summons the people of God to join him in praise, just as in the days of the Exodus from Egypt. The slogan of redemption, the right hand of the Lord, is again a quotation from the Song of Moses (Ex. 15:6). It depicts God using His limitless strength to save the psalmist. I shall not die: The poet describes a near-death experience, as in 16:9–11.

118:18–21 Open to me the gates: The poet draws on the wording and imagery of Ps. 24. There is only One who can enter the gates of the Lord of His own accord—the perfect King of glory. gate of the LORD: It is possible that the literal reference is to the gate of Jerusalem, the city of God —or even to a gate of the temple. Jesus declared that He was the gate or door leading to salvation (John 10:9).

118:22 The Savior is pictured as a discarded stone that is then reused as the most significant stone of all, the chief cornerstone. This potent imagery depicts Jesus' rejection by many (Is. 53:3; Mark 8:31; Luke 9:22; 17:25). Jesus elaborated on this prophetic verse with the parable of the vineyard owner. In this parable, the rejection included the murder of the owner's son —a reference to God's only Son (Mark 12:1–12). But even though the Savior was rejected, He was elevated to the right hand of God (Acts 7:56). Only God could do this marvelous and unexpected work. The cross, the symbol of Jesus' rejection, has become the symbol of our salvation (1 Cor. 1:18; Heb. 12:2).

118:23–26 The words save now in Hebrew are more familiar in the transliteration "hosanna." These words are so significant that if the children had not shouted them aloud (Matt. 21:16) when Jesus entered Jerusalem, the stones would have had to shout them (Luke 19:40). The words blessed is he who comes are the words the people used to bless Jesus on his triumphal entry into Jerusalem (Matt. 21:9; Mark 11:9; Luke 19:38). As God's only Son, Jesus is the One who comes in the name of the LORD; He is the One who reveals God the Father (John 14:8–11).

118:27 God is the Lord: It is possible (and the fulfillment nearly demands this) that the words of this verse may have been recited by the disciples at the table with the Lord. They would have affirmed that God is their Savior and that He has sent His Light (who is Jesus). In their call for the sacrifice to be bound, they unwittingly would have called for the drama to proceed which would bring about their—and our—redemption.

118:28 You are my God: If the words of v. 27 were recited by the disciples, these words would come from the Savior. He is now about to leave the sanctuary of the celebration of the Passover Seder in the Upper Room. He will cross the Kidron, climb the Mount of Olives, pray in the Garden, then face His enemies in the power of the Lord.

118:29 The closing words call the community to end the psalm as it began (v. 1)—with praise for the goodness and love of the Most High God.

Psalm 119, a wisdom psalm, is the premier song about the Torah (Ps. 19). It celebrates the Word of God in a way that is almost exhaustive. This very lengthy poem is an acrostic: For each of the twenty-two consonants in the Hebrew alphabet, there are eight verses beginning with that letter. Within the psalm, eight words for God's Law occur again and again: law; testimonies; promise; precepts; statutes; commandments; judgments; word. The psalm uses the full meaning of all these words as it elaborates on the application of the Law of God to both daily life and Israel's destiny. The Law is specific and general, directive and restrictive, liberating and opening, gracious and solemn—it is as complex as the Lord who gave it. The Law is never considered a curse; it is always seen as a gift from God. The cumulative effect of this lengthy celebration of the Word of God is impressive: the psalmist cannot stop praising God for His mercy and goodness in providing His people with instructions for living.

119:1–8 Then I would not be ashamed: Shame always follows transgression. In order to escape shame, we must be vigilant and constant in obeying the Word of God.

119:9 How can a young man cleanse his way? The word rendered his way (Heb. orach) signifies a track, a rut, such as would have been made by the wheel of a cart. A young sinner has not beaten a broad path, but rather has transgressed again and again in the same manner, creating a sinful rut. How shall he escape? By taking heed to Your Word. Heeding the Word of God leads to a godly lifestyle. Ignoring the Word of God leads to a godless rut.

119:10, 11 With my whole heart: Because the psalmist has sincerely and genuinely sought the blessing of God through obedience to His Word, he prays that God would not permit him to deviate accidentally or deliberately from his commandments.

119:12–16 I have rejoiced in the way of Your testimonies: The psalmist has taken more delight in the doctrines of God's Word than he has in the dollars of the world. I will meditate on Your precepts: That which we have laid up in our hearts and upon which we have meditated ceaselessly will never be forgotten.

119:17–20 I am a stranger in the earth: Since the psalmist is not native-born but a sojourner here, he needs the road map of God's commandments in order to find his way back to his home with God.

119:21–24 As he winds his way through life, the psalmist had been slandered by even the rulers and captains of this world. He paid no attention to the calumnies and barbs hurled at him, but rather found comfort and solace in meditating upon the Word of God. Your testimonies also are my delight. When the world went one way, the psalmist went the other as counseled by God's Word.

119:25–29 My soul clings to the dust: When in a state of depression, the psalmist recognized that his soul had adhered to the dust as if he were already dead and buried. Reading, meditating, and obeying the Word would raise him to life and health again.

119:30–32 I have chosen the way of truth. The psalmist contrasts himself with those who have chosen the way of lying (v. 29). By choosing the truthful path, the psalmist has had to cleave or cling steadfastly to the testimonies of God. Therefore, he prays, O LORD, do not put me to shame.

119:33–40 Teach me, O LORD, the way of Your statutes. If there is an underlying theme to this psalm, surely this is it. The psalmist is convinced that if the Lord will but teach him His law, I shall observe it with my whole heart.

119:41–48 God had pledged that He would grant mercy and salvation to all His faithful servants (Deut. 28:1–13). Armed with that promise, the psalmist was confident that he would be able to answer for him who reproaches me. Still, he recognized that it was God Himself that would put the word of truth in his mouth and thus prayed that God would not remove it when he was reproached. The goodness and mercy of God exhibited in answered prayer was enough to cause the psalmist to determine, So shall I keep Your law continually.

119:49–52 Remember the Word to Your servant. As the psalmist requests Yahweh to remember His promises to the faithful, he reminds Yahweh that he himself has remembered the very principles of God's government. It is the Word of God that brings him comfort in my affliction. Though the proud laughed at him in derision, nevertheless I do not turn aside from Your law. Having found comfort in the Law of God, the psalmist knew that there was no reason in turn aside from that Law when he was ridiculed.

119:53–69 The word indignation signifies a burning tempest or desert storm. Here it signifies the mental anguish that came over the psalmist when he contemplated the fate of the wicked who had forsaken God's Law.

I remember Your name in the night, O LORD. To the one who delights to keep God's Law, God will give more grace to keep it. There is never a time in which it is improper to turn to God and meditate upon His name. His name, and it alone, will calm the mental anguish caused by the vision of horror from all that awaits those who forsake God's law.

119:70–72 Their heart is as fat as grease, i.e., insensitive to spiritual things. Nonetheless, the psalmist is convinced that the law of Your mouth is better to me than … gold and silver.

119:73, 74 that I may learn Your commandments: Here is an acknowledgment from the psalmist that he has his existence from God. He reasons that since God has fashioned him, He will also teach him.

119:75–80 Fully aware that the judges of God are righteous, the psalmist recognizes that it is by those judgments that in faithfulness You have afflicted me. After affliction there was need for divine comfort. Let Your tender mercies come to me.

119:81 My soul faints for Your salvation. The psalmist is committed that regardless of the circumstances that cause him to faint in soul (not in body), he would continue to place his trust in the Word of God.

119:82, 83 like a wineskin in smoke: The simile here is very vivid. In the ancient Near East bottles were commonly made of animal skins and covered with dust and smoke. They were unsightly. This is a striking picture of the psalmist's own spiritual state. He had waited for the Lord to come and in spirit had become dried up by the pressure placed upon him.

119:84–88 Your Word is settled in heaven: Because of its perfect author, precise inscription, and permanent habitation, the Word of God is unsurpassable, undeniable, and unchangeable.

119:89–96 The wicked wait for me to destroy me, we must not again seek salvation but simply consider Your testimonies. When we look confidently to the Word of promise and daily trust the provision of God's grace, we are testifying not only to our salvation by God's grace but also to the face that Your Word is settled in heaven (v. 89).

119:97–104 The heavenly design of God's Word is not to confuse, camouflage, or cover over the kernel of truth, but to reveal the Word as truth.

To Show the Way

In OT times people used small lamps to furnish artificial light. Ancient lamps were essentially small ceramic bowls that were customized during construction to have a "nose" on one edge. The purpose of this extension was to hold a wick. Wicks of cloth were laid in the nose and extended into the oil in the lamp's bowl.

The light produced was not brilliant but necessary for finding one's way. In Psalm 119:105 the writer compares God's word with a lamp. While the light from that word does not blind the eyes, it does point the way for its hearers.

119:105–112 I hate the double-minded: Simple dislike of evil is not sufficient for the man of God; perfect hatred against all manner and degree of evil is. Such hatred prompts the psalmist to say, Depart from me, you evildoers. There is no fellowship between light and darkness.

119:113–122 Be surety for Your servant for good: The word surety (Heb. 'arab) means a pledge with which something is obtained, the full result of purchase to follow.

119:123–130 It is the entrance (lit, opening), i.e., the unfolding or unveiling, of the words of God that give light to the darkened soul. That which the human mind cannot comprehend by itself is comprehended through the aid of the Spirit of God.

119:131–133 The word direct (Heb. kun) means to make firm, to walk without halting. If no iniquity is to have dominion over us, our steps must be established by the Word of God.

119:134–144 Even though trouble and anguish had taken hold upon the psalmist, nevertheless he delighted in the commands of God; for the righteousness of Your testimonies is everlasting. His simple prayer to God is that Yahweh may give him full understanding of His commandments, their depth, their breadth, and their exceeding excellence.

119:145–149 So intense was his prayer that he confessed, I rise before the dawning of the morning. Before the light broke through the shadows of night, the psalmist was already prevailing upon God in prayer. My eyes are awake through the night watches: The Jews, like the Greeks and the Romans, divided the night into military watches instead of hours. Accompanying the prevailing prayer of the psalmist was a meditation in the Word of God. Prayer and reading the Word preceded the dawning of the day and continued unto the watches of the night. That is the secret of getting a hold on God.

119:150–162 The psalmist could rejoice in the Word of God as one who finds great treasure. The riches of God's Word only come to those who have disciplined themselves to battle the enemies of time, apathy, and irregularity with regard to the reading of God's Word.

119:163–176 I long for Your salvation: It was the delight of the psalmist to meditate in the Law of God because he had received God's salvation. His soul had been made alive by God's Spirit, and it was now his responsibility to praise the living Lord. Like a lost sheep: This is a frequent figure in the Scriptures. Lost sheep never find their own way back to the shepherd; and thus, having admitted his depravity and person sin, the psalmist's final prayer is, seek Your servant. Thus, he ends his psalm with a note of dependency upon the grace of God.

Psalm 120 is the first of a group of psalms called the Songs of Ascent (Pss. 120—134). This group of hymns was likely used by pilgrims making their way to Jerusalem to worship the Lord during the three annual national feasts—Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles (Lev. 23). As pilgrim families made the arduous journey to the holy city for festive worship, they would use these psalms as encouragement along the way. It is also possible that once they arrived in Jerusalem, they would sing these songs anew as they drew near the temple, reenacting their journey and affirming God's blessing on their path. Ps. 120, a psalm of lament, focuses on the lies of the wicked that affect the righteous. The structure of the psalm is: (1) a report of deliverance and a prayer for help (vv. 1, 2); (2) a taunt of the adversary who attacks with lies (vv. 3, 4); (3) a lament concerning life in a hostile environment (vv. 5–7).

120:1–3 lying lips: In the context of these psalms, the lying lips belong to those who assault the believers for their trust in the Lord (40:4). You false tongue: As in Ps. 12, the poet is distraught at the seeming power of the words of the wicked.

IN CONTEXT

Meshech and Kedar

Lamenting the fact that he was seemingly surrounded by warmongers, the psalmist compared his neighbors to two tribes renowned for their fierce, warlike ways—the people of Meshech and Kedar (Ps. 120:5).

The Meshechites were presumably descended from Meshech, a grandson of Noah through Japheth (Gen. 10:2; 1 Chr. 1:5). They were said to trade in slaves and copper (Ezek. 27:13), and may have invaded the Near East from the north. Often associated with the tribe of Tubal, they were infamous for their violence (32:26).

The tribe of Kedar, whose name may mean "black" or "swarthy," were Ishmaelites (Gen. 25:13; 1 Chr. 1:29). As nomads in the desert area to the east of Israel, they controlled the caravan routes between Palestine and Egypt, tending large flocks (Is. 60:7) and, it was said, living in black tents. One of Nehemiah's enemies may have been a king of Kedar.

120:5–7 This section of the psalm reveals the intensity of the psalmist's distress—woe is me. His environment was hostile even to his faith. Meshech and Kedar are random examples of the pagan peoples among whom the psalmist had to live. I am for peace: This may have set the stage for believers to make their pilgrimage to Jerusalem. In Zion they would be among the people of God. In Jerusalem they would hear the words of truth. In the temple they could pray for the peace of God (122:6; 125:5; 128:6).

Psalm 121 a psalm of trust (Ps. 23), is the second song of ascent. Ps. 120 sets the stage for the Israelites' journey to the Holy City; this poem is a song "for the road." The psalm may also have been designed for antiphonal response, like Pss. 118; 124; 129; 134; 135; 136. The structure of the poem is: (1) an affirmation that help is from God (vv. 1, 2); (2) a word of praise to God, who does not slumber (vv. 3, 4); (3) a word of praise to God who keeps His people (vv. 5, 6); (4) an affirmation that God will protect His people during their journeys (vv. 7, 8).

121:1, 2 The words lift up my eyes dramatically picture a traveler approaching the city of Jerusalem. On first sight of the city walls and the temple, the singer asks rhetorically where help is to be found. The answer is the strong affirmation: Help comes from the Lord.

121:3–7 He will not allow: It is possible that several sections of this brief poem were recited back and forth by small groups of pilgrims; there is an antiphonal quality to these verses (also Ps. 124). will not slumber: On the long journey to Jerusalem the people would have to stop and sleep, yet they would still be cared for by God. The language of confidence in this psalm indicates that it is about the psalmist's trust in the living Lord, his Protector. The phrase nor the moon indicates that at no time is God "off duty." The Keeper of Israel is always present.

121:8 and even forevermore: In what appears to be an antiphonal response to the words of vv. 6, 7, the poem concludes with a renewed affirmation of God's ongoing protection in this life and the life to come (23:6).

Psalm 122 a psalm of Zion, is the third song of ascent. This poem describes the joy of the pilgrim on arriving at Jerusalem to worship God. This is one of four songs of ascent attributed to David (also Pss. 124; 131; 133). The structure of the poem is as follows: (1) a description of the pilgrim’s joy in coming to Jerusalem (vv. 1, 2); (2) a description of the beauty of Jerusalem (vv. 3–5); (3) a prayer for the peace of Jerusalem (vv. 6–9).

Seeking the Good of All

Psalm 122 is another song of praise on the theme of Mount Zion, site of the temple in Jerusalem. Pilgrimages to the house of the Lord were not only a regular obligation for the Israelites but joyous occasions as well. The march through the city gates and uphill to the temple complex was spiritually uplifting and communally bonding.

But one of the defining moments of this worship experience was a prayer for the peace and prosperity of Jerusalem (Ps. 122:6–9). This was actually an intercession for everyone involved in the life of the Holy City. It was essentially a request for God's blessing on the decision makers in government and their policies and programs.

But the pilgrims' concern for Jerusalem did not end with prayer. They also pledged to seek the city's good (122:9). This suggests that believers today do well to pray and work for the good of their own cities, in such a way as to benefit all the people of their communities. By promoting "peace within the walls" and "prosperity within the palaces" (122:7), God's people will be fulfilling Paul's admonition to "do good to all, especially { i.e., not only} to those who are of the household of faith" (Gal. 6:10).

122:1 I was glad: The Hebrew verb for laughter and delight is used to describe the attitude of the pilgrim who arrives in Jerusalem to worship the Lord. The joy of the pilgrim in this psalm contrasts strongly with the sorrow of those who were not able to come to worship God, because of personal (42:1–3) or national exile (137:1–3).

122:2 within your gates: There is an almost childlike enthusiasm in these words; a sense of near unreality pervades the mood (see also the joy of discovery in 48:12–14).

122:3 The visitor is overwhelmed not just by the buildings of Jerusalem, but by the fact that the city was the place for the worship of God. Where the tribes go up: This refers to the three annual feasts of ancient Israel (Lev. 23), as well as to any time that an individual or family needed to worship the Lord in the Holy City.

122:4 The Testimony of Israel may refer to the ark of the covenant (Ex. 16:34). To give thanks means "to make a public declaration" or "to give public acknowledgment" (105:1). The people of God would praise God for His goodness in their own lives. Their vocal praises would accompany their offerings of animals, grain, wine, and oil.

122:5 thrones: Jerusalem was not only the central place for worship, it was also the site where civil judgments and decisions were made. Religious and civil issues were closely intertwined in the Law of God.

122:6–9 peace of Jerusalem: In the process of praying for the good of the city, the people came under God's blessing. It is God's desire for the city to have peace (125:5; 128:6). True peace will only come when the Prince of Peace returns to establish His rule (Ps. 98). Because of the house: The determination of the pilgrim to seek the good of Jerusalem was based on the fact that the site was the central location for the worship of the Lord and the place God had chosen for Himself (1 Kin. 11:36).

Psalm 123 an individual psalm of lament, is the fourth song of ascent. This brief poem has two sections, as follows: (1) an affirmation that the people's eyes are fixed on the Lord (vv. 1, 2); (2) a petition for the Lord to direct His attention to His people (vv. 3, 4).

123:1, 2 who dwell in the heavens: The temple was considered God's dwelling place (132:5, 13, 14); yet the Israelites also knew that the One who made the heavens did not live in buildings made by hands (113:4–6). As the eyes: True servants fix their eyes on their masters; similarly, our eyes should be fixed on God. The more we look to the Lord, the more we become like Him (2 Cor. 3:18). Not being distracted by the other things of this life causes us to win in the race of life (Heb. 12:1, 2).

“mercy”

(Heb. chanan) (102:14; 123:2; Ex. 33:19; Is. 26:10) Strong’s #2603: This term signifies an act of graciousness to someone in need, from a person of superior rank or circumstance. The writers of wisdom literature frequently commend showing mercy to the needy (112:5; Prov. 14:21, 31; 28:8). But most of the references to mercy in the Bible have to God as the direct agent of mercy. The Scripture records God’s mercy being sought on numerous occasions, often using the phrase familiar from the psalms of lament, “Have mercy on me” (4:1; 6:2; 25:16; 51:1; 86:16). God shows His graciousness in many ways, including the prevention of harm, the bestowal of family and possessions, and the communication of divine law (119:29, 124; Gen. 33:5, 11; 2 Kin. 13:23).

123:3, 4 The people who prayed for God’s mercy had to endure the contempt of their neighbors. Perhaps they were being mocked for their resolute faith in God at a time when it seemed that God was not answering their prayers.

Psalm 124 a psalm of declarative praise, is one of four songs of ascent attributed to David (Pss. 122; 131; 133). This psalm was likely designed to be read aloud as an antiphonal response (118:1–4; compare Pss. 121; 129; 134; 135; 136). The structure of the poem is: (1) a call for the people to confess God's deliverance (vv. 1–5); (2) a blessing on the Lord for His deliverance (vv. 6–8).

124:1, 2 The LORD who was on our side amplifies the meaning of the divine name of God (Ex. 3:14, 15). The wording of the Hebrew text is even more dramatic: "The Lord was for us." The priests may have spoken the words let Israel now say as encouragement for the people to rehearse aloud their national experience (Ps. 129).

124:3 swallowed us alive: The poet describes his enemies first as ravenous beasts, then as raging waters; but God has defeated them all. As in other psalms, the reference to raging waters has a double source—the story of creation and the Canaanite myths concerning evil gods who were believed to be water deities (Ps. 93).

124:4, 5 waters: As is common in the Psalms, the references to raging waters has a double source, the story of Creation and the Canaanite background of evil gods who were believed to be water deities (Ps. 93).

124:6, 7 Blessed be the Lord: Blessing God means identifying Him as the source of our blessing (103:2). as prey: The animal imagery of the enemies (v. 3) continues in this praise of God. The image of a helpless bird that has escaped a trap is common in the Psalms (11:1–3).

124:8 our help is in the name: The centrality of the name of God, Yahweh, is affirmed at many points of these Psalms. It is in His name that God reveals that He is for His people (the point of v. 1, above). The words who made heaven and earth are similar to the words in 121:2; 134:3. These liturgical phrases were recited by the worshiping community during their journey to Jerusalem and when they arrived for corporate worship.

Psalm 125 a psalm of trust (Ps. 23), is also a song of Zion. This anonymous poem is the sixth song of ascent. The structure of the poem is as follows: (1) a celebration of God's protection of the righteous (vv. 1, 2); (2) a declaration that the power of the wicked cannot endure (v. 3); (3) a prayer for the upright (v. 4); (4) a curse on the wicked and a call for the peace of Israel (v. 5).

125:1, 2 As in the other songs of Zion (Ps. 48), there is a deep belief in the invincibility of the city of Jerusalem because of the Lord's choice of Mount Zion (1 Kin. 11:36). Likewise, the psalmist proclaims that those who trust in the Lord will endure. the mountains surround Jerusalem: Jerusalem is built on one of seven mountain peaks in the region. The mountains provide some protection for the city, since any invading army would have to march through arduous and dangerous mountain paths. Yet the city's true protection comes from the Lord.

125:3 The scepter of wickedness is a symbol of the power of evil. This verse recalls the Lord's promise that the gates of hell will not prevail against His church (Matt. 16:18). In this way, God in His mercy protects His people from participation in evil.

125:4 do good: Such is what we expect from God on those who are His own; His expectation in us is righteousness (51:18).

125:5 The phrase workers of iniquity is often found in the wisdom psalms (14:4); the Lord will oppose those who do evil. peace: The psalm concludes with a prayer for God's peace to rest on His people. The same prayer appears at the close of Ps. 128; it may be a shortened version of the priestly benediction recorded in Num. 6:24, 25.

Psalm 126 a song of Zion, is the seventh song of ascent. The distinctive element of this poem is that it comes from the time of the restoration of Jerusalem following the Babylonian captivity (compare Ps. 137). The mood of this psalm is one of sweet joy following the sorrows of long separation. The structure of the poem is: (1) a description of the return from captivity (vv. 1–3); (2) a prayer for God to complete the process of return (v. 4); (3) a comparison of the return from captivity to a long-delayed harvest (vv. 5, 6).

126:1–3 The return from Babylonian captivity had been anticipated for so long that it seemed like a dream to the returnees. Some of the people had waited an entire lifetime. The joy of the people could not be contained; their praise to God was unstoppable. The mood of this section is one of laughter and joy, of rejoicing in God's salvation (Is. 12).

126:4 The people who returned were a small percentage of those who had been exiled. Bring back is the beginning of the prayer that God would complete the restoration of His people to their land. Ultimately, this is a prayer for the coming of Jesus, who will complete God's work among His people.

126:5, 6 The people of Judah had gone to Babylon in tears. Yet their sorrow reaped tremendous rewards; the Lord came to the rescue of His humbled people (34:18; Is. 66:2; Matt. 5:4). Upon their return to Jerusalem and Judah, they were reaping a harvest of rejoicing.

Psalm 127 a wisdom psalm and the eighth song of ascent, is one of only two psalms attributed to Solomon (the other is Ps. 72). The structure of the poem is: (1) an exhortation about the vanity of an endeavor in which the Lord is not active (vv. 1, 2); (2) a celebration of the value of an endeavor in which the Lord is glorified (vv. 3–5).

127:1, 2 With the words unless the Lord builds, the psalmist asserts that life lived apart from God is not worth living, a view that this psalm shares with the Book of Ecclesiastes. Even building a house is useless if the Lord is not in the process. The phrase the bread of sorrows captures the essence of those removed from a sense of the Lord in their lives. The food that should give them strength for life and a zest for living only maintains them in their miserable state.

127:3–5 children are a heritage: Children are God's gifts (128:3). Like arrows: In ancient times, having many children was regarded as a symbol of strength. This was particularly true in an agricultural economy, since the extra hands of children increased the productivity of the farmer. A full quiver was a mark of God's blessing. The blessing of a home in ancient times gave a person a measure of pride in the community. The gate was the place where the elders of the city met and where citizens would convene (Ruth 4:1–12).

Psalm 128 a wisdom psalm, is also a psalm of Zion. Like Ps. 127, this poem addresses God's blessings in the home and family. The feasts of ancient Israel were family affairs. As families made their way to the holy city for the annual festivals, they would encounter other families and mutually celebrate the goodness of God in their lives. Psalm 128 is the ninth song of ascent. The structure of the poem is as follows: (1) a blessing on the righteous (v. 1); (2) a description of the blessing (vv. 2–4); (3) a prayer for the blessing (v. 5); (3) a blessing on the community (v. 6).

128:1 The word blessed describes the happiness of those who trust in the Lord and do His will (127:5). who fears the Lord: The fear of God is an attitude of respect, a response of reverence and wonder. It is the only appropriate response to our Creator and Redeemer.

128:2, 3 labor of your hands: There is a reward in work and a satisfaction in labor that is a blessing of God (Eccl. 3:9–13). Your wife: This psalm focuses on the godly man in ancient Israel. Bearing children was a mark of God's blessing on his wife. His children were regarded as precious provisions, like olive plants, in his home (127:3–5). In that time more children meant more people who could work in the fields and increase the general welfare of the family.

128:4–6 The Lord bless you: This is the psalmist's prayer for the man who desires for his own family the blessings described in the psalm. children's children: This priestly prayer of blessing includes a desire for longevity and for happy posterity in the land. Only when God grants His peace on His people will the ideal conditions of family life be realized. Therefore, whoever prays for the blessing of God on a family also prays for the blessing of God's peace on the community as a whole (122:6–9; 125:5).

Psalm 129 a psalm of trust (Ps. 23), has its roots in the psalms of lament, for those psalms contain a section proclaiming trust in the Lord. The psalm has an antiphonal quality, calling for response and counter-response (compare 118:1–4; 124:1–5). This is the tenth song of ascent. Its structure is as follows: (1) a rehearsal of the afflictions of Israel (v. 1–3); (2) an affirmation of the victory of God (v. 4); (3) a condemnation of the wicked who have afflicted Israel (vv. 5–8).

129:1–4 Many a time: The psalm begins with a liturgy of suffering, as the people of God acknowledge that throughout their history in the land they have been under constant assault by various peoples. With the words let Israel now say, the priest calls for the people to rehearse their history aloud (124:1). The plowers plowed: This imagery of the brutal treatment they suffered was especially vivid in an agrarian setting. Even in the midst of such cruel circumstances, the Lord was righteous. He remained faithful to His promises to His people and He fought for them.

129:5–8 those who hate Zion: This begins the imprecation or cursing of the foes of Jerusalem. Shame is the intended end of the wicked (35:26). This is not just a desire for their embarrassment but for complete humiliation before the Lord. as the grass on the housetops: Sod was sometimes used on the roofs of houses. After a spring rain, there might be grass growing on the housetop. But this was not grass that flourished; it soon withered under the summer heat. The curse here is strong: May the enemies wither as quickly as rooftop grass.

Psalm 130 is a penitential psalm. Its placement following a psalm of imprecation (Ps. 129) is fitting. After all, a person might take such joy in the destruction of the wicked that he or she no longer would consider his or her own heart before the Lord. This psalm is the eleventh song of ascent. The structure is as follows: (1) a call for God's mercy (vv. 1, Ps. 2); (2) a recognition of God's forgiveness (vv. 3, 4); (3) an expectation of God's forgiveness (v. 5, 6); (4) a call for God's mercy on all (vv. 7, 8).

130:1, 2 The poet shouts aloud to God from the depths of his own despair (Pss. 32; 51). In this case it was not enemies who were plowing his back (129:3), but his own sense of sin that was eating at the depths of his soul.

130:3, 4 God does not mark or keep count of our sins. Through the sacrificial system and ultimately in the provision of Jesus Christ, God dismissed His people's sins altogether (Mic. 7:19); He does not keep track —as an accountant would—of their sins. The grace of God in His provision for forgiveness is not to be taken lightly (Rom. 6:1, 2). The truly forgiven sinner realizes the magnitude of God's grace, remains grateful for Jesus' sacrifice for sins, and lives in the fear or awe of God (Ps. 128).

130:5, 6 I wait … I do hope: In these two verses, the poet repeats five times that his hope is in the Lord. This was a confident expectation in the God who is always faithful to His promises.

130:7, 8 The psalm moves from the experience of an individual to that of the community. After proclaiming his own hope, the psalmist exhorts the community of Israel to hope in the Lord. God is not only capable of delivering the individual, He also delivers the community of believers who hope in Him (131:3). He shall redeem: In the OT, the redemption of God's people refers to God's deliverance of His people from Egypt and from all other national foes, as well as to God's forgiveness of sins through the sacrificial system. The final redemption of all God's people came only in the death and resurrection of the Lord Jesus Christ (Gal. 3:13).

Psalm 131 a psalm of trust, is one of four songs of ascent attributed to David (also Pss. 122; 124; 133). The structure of the poem is as follows: (1) a statement of humility (v. 1); (2) a portrait of trust (v. 2); (3) a call for hope (v. 3).

131:1 my heart is not haughty: David presents himself with genuine humility, a delicate balance between self-abasement and arrogant pride. From the life of David we know that he was not always able to keep this balance. But it was his desire, and at times—by God's grace—a reality in his life.

131:2, 3 Like a weaned child: The image is that of a child who is no longer unsettled and discontented, but one who is at peace and trusting in his mother, who is there to comfort and to meet his needs. The words hope in the Lord recall 130:7.

Psalm 132 a royal psalm, is the thirteenth song of ascent. Like Ps. 89, this poem reflects in poetry God's covenant with David (2 Sam. 7), in which He promised David a royal house—a promise that would be fulfilled in the coming of the great Savior King. It is possible that this psalm was written late in Israel's history, after the exile in Babylon. This would explain the people's call for God to remember His covenant with David. With no king on the royal throne of David, the people had great reason to call upon God to remember His promise. Psalm 132 is the longest of the songs of ascent and is sometimes classified as a messianic psalm. Its structure is as follows: (1) a call for God to remember His covenant with David (vv. 1–5); (2) the expectation of the fulfillment of the promise (vv. 6–9); (3) a prayer for God's kingdom to come (v. 10); (4) a recitation of the promise yet to be fulfilled (vv. 11, 12); (5) an elaboration of God's covenant with David (vv. 13–18).

132:1 If this psalm was written during the postexilic period, the words remember David have a significant meaning. During the years between the return of the people to Jerusalem and the birth of Jesus, there would have been a growing desire on the part of godly people for the Lord to restore David's kingdom in fulfillment of the Lord's promise.

132:2–4 The Mighty One of Jacob is a rare designation for God. Identical or similar expressions are found elsewhere in the Bible only in Gen. 49:24 and the Book of Isaiah (Is. 1:24; 49:26; 60:16). a place: The poet recalls David's desire to build a temple for the Lord (2 Sam. 7:1, 2).

132:5 a place: In these words, the poet recalls the desire of David to build the temple for the Lord (2 Sam. 7:1, 2). The poetic reworking of the narrative stories of Scripture is an old art in Israel (Judg. 4, 5).

132:6–9 Ephrathah refers to the region of Bethlehem (Ruth 1:2). The temple in Jerusalem was regarded as the footstool of God, whose dwelling is in heaven (99:5). In the context of this psalm, the call arise, O Lord is a prayer for God to fulfill His covenant promise to place a great king on David's throne (v. 1).

“shout for joy”

(Heb. ranan) (51:14; 132:9; Is. 35:6) Strong’s #7442: This Hebrew word means “to utter loudly,” with the vast majority of references being to shouts of joy or hearty, joyful singing (35:27; 59:16; 71:23). Twice the term is used of the summons of wisdom and once for the boisterous clamoring of a drunk (78:65; Prov. 1:20; 8:3). About half of its occurrences are in Psalms and about one fourth are in Isaiah. This word is associated with many terms for joy in the OT (32:11; Is. 49:13; Zech. 2:10). It is used to summon the heavens, the Gentiles, and most frequently the people of God—collectively and individually—to rejoice in God’s blessings (33:11; Deut. 32:43; Is. 44:23; Zech. 2:10). Our loud rejoicing in the Lord is based on His greatness and His goodness to us (5:11; 145:7; Lev. 9:24; Is. 12:6).

132:10 Do not turn away: Based on God’s promise to David (2 Sam. 7), the psalmist calls for God to fulfill His word to send His Anointed. This is a clarion call for the coming of the Savior King, Jesus.

132:11, 12 The words the Lord has sworn are a poetic recasting of the central words of the Davidic covenant in 2 Sam. 7:8–16 (89:3, 4, 26–29). The ultimate fulfillment of these words is in Jesus Christ, the Son of David (Luke 1:32, 33; Acts 2:30). your sons: The promise to David was specific in terms of God’s intended blessings on faithful sons, His chastening of wayward sons, and His ultimate fulfillment in the anticipated coming Son.

132:13 God’s choice of the Davidic line was also a choice of Zion as His dwelling place.

132:14–16 my resting place: God’s decision is to make Zion the place of His eternal dwelling place on earth (Heb. menuha, “a place of rest”). What choice words these are, and what condescension they suggest. He whose dwelling is beyond the heavens (113:4–6; 123:1), comes near His people to live among them (Zeph. 3:14–17), and to bless them with His presence (132:15, 16).

132:17 This verse celebrates God’s covenant to send His Anointed One (v. 10). The words horn and lamp speak of the Messiah’s authority and righteousness (Is. 11:1–5). His crown: The Messiah’s kingdom will be established forever (Is. 9:7); His enemies will not withstand Him (Ps. 2).

132:18 His crown: The kingdom will be established forever (Is. 9:7); His enemies will not withstand Him (Ps. 2).

Psalm 133 is one of four songs of ascent attributed to David (Pss. 122; 124; 131). With its emphasis on the unity of the believers, this poem anticipates Jesus' prayer in John 17. The structure of the psalm is as follows: (1) a portrait of the beauty of unity (v. 1); (2) the blessing of unity (vv. 2, 3).

133:1, 2 Good and … pleasant may be rephrased as "great delight" or "good pleasure." There is a sense of serene wonder in these words describing the unity of God's people. like the precious oil: Priests were anointed with a fragrant oil as a symbol of God's blessing on their holy office (Ex. 30:22–33). This psalm pictures the oil in such large quantity that it flows from the head to the beard to the garment of Aaron, who represented the priests of God. When God's people live together in unity, they experience God's blessing.

133:3 like the dew of Hermon: This high mountain to the north of Israel received such large amounts of water that it seemed to be a source of moisture for the lands below. Similarly, the blessings of God flow to His people. the blessing: The intent of God is for the good of His people in this life and in the life to come. The people of Israel rarely achieved the level of unity—or the level of blessing—that the poem describes. Ultimately, this is a portrait of the kingdom of God. One day there will be the spiritual unity of God's people that this poem describes.

Psalm 134 concludes the songs of ascent. This psalm was likely read as a responsive poem of praise (Pss. 118; 121; 124; 129; 135; 136). The structure of this brief poem is as follows: (1) the blessing of the priests by the people (vv. 1, 2); (2) the blessing of the people by the priests (v. 3).

134:1, 2 To bless the Lord is to identify Him as the source of all blessing (103:2). In this context, servants of the Lord refers to the priests of Israel who conducted their ministry at all hours in the temple (135:1, 2). The idea behind this blessing was that the people who had come to worship at the temple were getting ready to go home. They had come for a great festival but had to return to their regular work and routine. However, the priests remained at the holy temple. It was their continuing worship of the Lord that allowed God's blessing to continue on the nation as a whole. Lift up your hands: One of the standard postures for prayer in biblical times was to stand with hands stretched out toward heaven (1 Tim. 2:8).

IN CONTEXT

The Old Testament View of Death

Death is a universal dilemma. In one ancient Near Eastern story, the Gilgamesh Epic, the hero Gilgamesh is suddenly struck by the pain of death, when his friend Enkidu dies. Gilgamesh then begins a long journey in search of the secret of eternal life. Even when he finds it in a thorny plant, it is stolen from him, and Gilgamesh concludes that seeking immortality is useless because all must die.

The Israelites had a unique focus on the here and now. While the Egyptians prepared elaborate tombs, including paintings and figures that would supposedly benefit the dead one, the Hebrew Scriptures stressed the importance of living life to its fullness because death was the end of human activity. Hebrew wisdom offered this advice: Find joy in the daily rounds of life, "for there is no work or device or knowledge or wisdom in the grave where you are going" (Eccl. 9:10).

Death was often equated with a kind of sleep. Thus the psalmist uses the phrase the "sleep of death" (Ps. 13:3). When the kings of Israel died, we are told, they went to sleep or "rested" with their fathers (1 Kin. 2:10; 11:43; 14:31).

The Hebrews described death with visual imagery as the abode of the dead. A person who dies goes to Sheol (sometimes translated as "hell," "grave," or the "pit"), which clearly represents the grave (Job 21:13; Prov. 7:27). In Sheol there is no human activity, not even the praising of the Lord (Pss. 146:3, 4; 115; 17). Or as the author of Ecclesiastes wrote, "For the living know that they will die; but the dead know nothing" (Eccl. 9:5).

Death was not to be dreaded; it was the expected, normal end of life. Indeed, death was considered good for the person who was "full of years" and had reached "a good old age" (Gen. 25:8; Job 42:17).

134:3 Bless you from Zion may have been the grateful response of the priests to the people, their own blessing on the people from the holy temple.

Psalm 135 a psalm of descriptive praise that recalls ideas and motifs from several earlier psalms, may have been composed after the exile in Babylon. The psalm presents God's saving works during the Exodus and contains a scathing attack on idolatry, taken from Ps. 115. The beginning and ending of this poem are written in the pattern of liturgical praise. The structure is as follows: (1) a call for the priests to bless the name of the Lord (vv. 1–4); (2) praise for the Lord who alone is the great and active God (vv. 5–7); (3) praise for the Lord's saving deeds (vv. 8–12); (4) praise for the Lord's saving name (vv. 13, 14); (5) contempt for the ineffective and powerless gods of the nations (vv. 15–18); (6) a call for the people to bless the name of the Lord (vv. 19–21).

135:1–5 you servants of the Lord: This psalm begins with a call for the priests of Israel to praise God in the temple (134:1, 2). The endearing term special treasure is used only here in the Psalms (Ex. 19:5; Deut. 7:6; 14:2).

135:6, 7 Whatever the Lord pleases: These words are adapted from 115:3. The words lightning for the rain appear to be a citation of Jer. 10:13, indicating that this psalm was written after the exile in Babylon The point of this section is clear: God is active in all creation. Conversely, the gods of the nations are impotent (vv. 15–18).

135:8 firstborn of Egypt: Like Ps. 78, this psalm rehearses the saving events of the Exodus, culminating in the events of the Passover (Ex. 12:12). The defeat of Egypt was solely the work of the Lord. Israel was merely His instrument; the battle belonged to Him (Ex. 15:3).

135:9–14 God's saving actions established His reputation. Because of them, His name and His fame spread throughout the world. He will have compassion: As in Ps. 147, those who faced the hardships of restoring themselves in the land needed to know of God's continuing promise of mercy (Ps. 132).

135:15 The idols of the nations: This verse is a citation from 115:4–8. It is a devastating satirical attack on pagan idolatry. The people who returned from Babylon had had their fill of the worship of idols; at long last, the people of Israel were ready to worship the only true God.

135:16–21 To bless the Lord is to identify Him as the source of all blessings (103:2) and to be grateful for all that He has given. This section is a sustained liturgy for the people to encourage one another to praise the Lord.

Psalm 136 is the quintessential psalm of descriptive praise. The worship leader, perhaps a priest, would read the first part of each verse. The people would then respond with their praise centering on the mercy of God: "For His mercy endures forever." This psalm, known as the "Great Hallel," was often recited in the temple as the Passover lambs were being slain. Some include Ps. 135 and the psalms of ascents (Pss. 120—134) in the "Great Hallel." The pattern for the psalm is: (1) a call for the people to praise the Lord (vv. 1–3); (2) praise for the Lord who is the great Creator (vv. 4–9); (3) praise for the Lord who is the great Deliverer (vv. 10–22); (4) praise for the Lord who remembers His people forever (vv. 23–25); (5) a concluding call for the people to praise the Lord (v. 26).

136:1, 2 Give thanks means "to give public acknowledgment"; it is one of the principal words for praise in the Psalms (35:18; 105:1; 122:4). Mercy, which may also be translated "loyal love," is the most significant term used in the Psalms to describe the character of God. His mercy is "forever"; it is part of His eternal character. God of gods: The poet uses Hebrew superlatives to proclaim the Lord as the Supreme Deity.

136:3–5 In the OT, the term great wonders is used exclusively for the awe-inspiring actions of God. God's creation of the universe is the grand display of His wisdom. The heavens give a clear presentation of the glory of God (19:1–6). Romans 1:20 teaches that God's "invisible attributes" are clearly seen through the things He has made.

136:6–13 struck Egypt: The poet refers to God's great acts of deliverance in bringing Israel from Egypt at the dawn of Israel's redemption (Pss. 78; 105; 135:8–12). strong hand: This is a slogan of redemption (118:15, 16; Ex. 15:6). It has been said when God created the universe, it was the work of His fingers (8:3); but when He battled for the salvation of His people, it was with His strong right hand. divided the Red Sea: God brought Israel across the Jordan by dividing its waters, then used the same waters to destroy the pursuing army of Egypt.

136:14–20 The poet's recital of Israel's history includes the capture of the lands east of the Jordan, including the territories of Sihon and Og (Num. 21). The result was the gift of the land of Canaan to the people of Israel.

136:21–23 It is possible that the words remembered us suggest the return of the people of Judah and Jerusalem to their land following the Babylonian captivity. Like Ps. 135, Ps. 136 may have been written after the Exile.

136:24–26 Oh, give thanks: The psalm ends as it begins, with celebration of God's continuing faithfulness to His people Israel and a call to thank Him for His goodness.

Psalm 137 a song of Zion, is also a particularly impassioned imprecatory psalm. Although no author is named, the psalm clearly shares with the Book of Lamentations the despair of those who suffered the destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians in 586 B.C. This troubling psalm is one of deeply felt emotion. Its pattern is as follows: (1) weeping in Babylon at the memory of the destruction of Zion (vv. 1–3); (2) longing for Jerusalem and the restoration of song in praise of God (vv. 4–6); (3) desiring reprisals against Edom and Babylon for their destruction of Jerusalem (vv. 7–9).

By the Rivers of Babylon

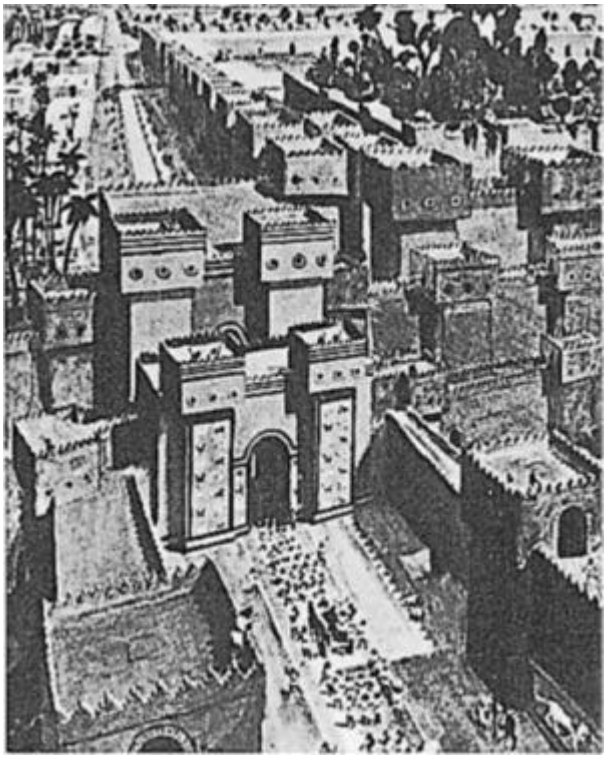
Psalm 137 summarizes the question that perplexed not only the exiles of Judah in Babylon, but all of the Jews who were quickly being dispersed throughout the ancient world: How can we worship and serve the Lord in a foreign land? (Ps. 137:4).

Cut off from their homeland, they were without their magnificent temple. They had no king to guide them, no high priest to offer sacrifices, no ark of the covenant to signify God's presence. Spiritually speaking, they were cast adrift in the world without their familiar landmarks to guide them.

No wonder the people of Judah sat down and wept by the rivers of Babylon (137:1). Asked by their captors to sing songs of Zion, all they could think about was how their beloved city was now laid waste (137:3). Consequently, they sang a song—but not one that was expected. They sang a sorrowful, vengeful song calling for curses on the Babylonians who had destroyed Jerusalem (137:8) and on the Edomites who had celebrated the city's fall (137:7).

However, despite the sentiments expressed in this psalm, several positive things resulted from the Jews' dispersion. Lacking a temple, they invented the synagogue (Mark 1:21). They also collected their writings, which eventually led to the canonization of the OT. And because they were forced to learn new languages and adapt to foreign cultures, they eventually translated the OT from Hebrew into Greek, the common language of Christ's day.

Thus necessity became the mother of invention for the Hebrews. Many such gifts from the Lord came into the world because God's people were forced to "sing the Lord's song in a foreign land."



Painting of Babylon, the pagan city where citizens of Israel were held captive during the exile. Psalm 137 reflects the Israelites' longing for their homeland and the city of Jerusalem, referred to as "Zion" (Ps. 137:1–6).

137:1–4 Babylon was one of the great empires in world history. When this psalm was written, the Jews were living there in involuntary exile. we wept: The emotions of the psalm are clearly indicated. The memory of Zion was painful for those in a foreign land (42:1–3). hung our harps: Making joyful music to the Lord in a foreign land was so difficult that the captives refused to make music at all. They took the words of their captors as taunts.

137:5, 6 If I forget you: It is difficult for the modern reader to appreciate the love for Zion among the people of OT faith. As we observe regularly in the Psalms, this love was not just for a place but for its function in their lives. It was in Jerusalem that the temple had been built. The place was holy because of God's presence there (2:6).

137:7 Remember, O Lord: After speaking with great passion about his own remembering and forgetting (vv. 4–6), the psalmist calls upon the Lord to remember the abominable actions of the people of Edom in the day of Jerusalem's trouble (see Ps. 129 for a similar sentiment). Raze it: The men of Edom leered and jeered as Jerusalem was shamefully leveled.

137:8 O daughter of Babylon: We have noted that the corresponding phrase, "Daughter of Zion," is better rendered "Daughter Zion" (see note at 9:14). That is, Zion does not have a daughter; she herself is God's "daughter," a term of great endearment. Is it possible, then, that in this place the words "Daughter Babylon" are used in a sarcastic manner? Zion is the Lord's daughter, not Babylon. She may be the offspring of some god, but not of the Lord.

137:9 Happy is the same term of blessing that begins the first psalm (1:1; 146:5). The blessing would come on the army that finally destroyed the wicked city of Babylon, that had itself been used as a tool of judgment in the hands of Almighty God (Hab. 1:12–17).

Psalm 138 is a psalm of declarative praise attributed to David. The mood of this psalm contrasts strongly with that of Ps. 137. Its structure is as follows: (1) a declaration of praise to God because of an overwhelming answer to the prayer of the king (vv. 1–3); (2) a prophetic vision of a future time in which all kings of the earth will join in the praise of God (vv. 4–6); (3) a determination to continually trust in God (vv. 7, 8).

138:1, 2 As in many psalms, the poet begins his praise with a determination to involve his whole being (146:1). Before the gods: David is so confident in his faith in the Lord that he is determined to take the name of God into foreign territory. Your holy temple: The use of the word temple does not rule out David as the author of this or similar poems (15:1). The Hebrew term is a general one that would fit whatever building was in use in David's day. The term was also proper for later readers and singers of this psalm when the actual temple had been built.

138:3–6 David, as a king who believed in God, looked forward to a day when all the kings of the earth would share his experience. great is the glory of the Lord: This is another way of expressing the reality of the living God. regards the lowly: God comes to the humble because they will have regard for Him. Conversely, He distances Himself from the proud (86:14; 147:6).

138:7, 8 Though I walk: The poet is well aware that new troubles will confront him. He has confidence that God, who has blessed him in the experience of this psalm, will continue to bless his path. perfect: The same Hebrew verb is translated "perform" in 57:2. The point of the word is that God acts on behalf of His servants. Your mercy, O Lord, endures forever: This is a slight rewording of the refrain in Ps. 136.

Psalm 139 attributed to David, is a wisdom psalm of descriptive praise. This mixture of wisdom and praise is not uncommon in the Psalms (Pss. 145; 146). This poem describes the attributes of the Lord not as abstract qualities, but as active qualities by which He relates Himself to His people. The structure of the psalm is: (1) a description of God's intimate knowledge of His servant (vv. 1–6); (2) a celebration of God's presence with David (vv. 7–12); (3) a celebration of God's creation of David from the moment of conception (vv. 13–16); (4) a declaration that God's thoughts toward David are innumerable (vv. 17, 18); (5) a prayer for the punishment of God's enemies (vv. 19–22); (6) a prayer that God might search and lead David (vv. 23, 24).

139:1–5 You have searched me: God is active to search and test His servants. He knows our motives, desires, and words before they are expressed. In short, He knows His servants completely. But as v. 5 makes clear, the purpose of His intimate knowledge of His servants is protective and helpful, not judgmental and condemning.

139:6 such knowledge: Here the poet gasps aloud at the wonder of the intimate relationship He has with God, and God with him. It is simply too much to comprehend; the human mind with all its ability is no match for the mind of God!

139:7 There are two different ways in which the words where can I go can be understood. One is that David wanted to flee from the presence of God, but could not. The second view takes the words as a celebration of God's mercy, that there was no place in all creation where David, the servant of God, would find himself separated from God's presence.

139:8, 9 heaven: The language is exuberant, expressive, and expansive. The point is clear, there is no place so high, so deep, so far, or so near that the servant of the Lord might find that there is a distance from God.

139:10–12 Your hand: The wording of v. 10 seems protective, suggesting that the psalm speaks of God's helpful presence. darkness: Here David stretches his imagination to the brink. Darkness refers to death or the "pit"(16:10). This is an expansion of the words of v. 8, "If I make my bed in hell." David suggests this as the one place in the universe where God would not be present. But even though God is opposed to all darkness, God would turn the darkness into light in order to find His servant David. As in 18:7–12, the Lord would overturn the structure of the universe to save the person who worshiped Him.

139:13–16 You formed my inward parts: David affirms that the work of God in his life extended back to his development in his mother's womb. You covered me may also be translated as "You wove me together," a description of the work of God creating the person in the mother's womb. I am fearfully and wonderfully made might be rephrased as "I am an awesome wonder" (Ps. 8). skillfully wrought: The development of the fetus was something quite mysterious to the ancients. To them, it was as though the fetus were being developed in the middle of the earth. The Hebrew word my substance indicates the embryo. in Your book: The idea is that the life of a person, and the structure and meaning of that person's life, are all established from the beginning by God.

139:17, 18 Your thoughts: Not only are the works of God in the life of the person of faith a thing of constant marvel, but so are the thoughts of God. They are directed toward the believer. They are more than can be numbered. If one were to attempt to count them, one would fall asleep. And the morning light would find God still near, His thoughts still new, and the marvel unexplainable.

139:19–21 slay the wicked: David desires a world in which there is no more evil, no more distraction, no more destruction. The enemies of God are David's own enemies because his life and thoughts are so closely tied to the Lord.

139:22 perfect hatred: These words may seem to be an oxymoron to some, but the idea of an enemy of God is so abhorrent to the psalmist that he faces such enemies as they really are.

139:23, 24 Search me, O God: These words are similar to those of 19:14. David asks God to examine his thoughts and purge him of sin so that he might enter into everlasting life.

Psalm 140 a psalm of individual lament ascribed to David, is particularly concerned with the wicked. David's desire for the judgment of the Lord to come upon the wicked identifies this poem as an imprecatory psalm. The structure of Ps. 140 is as follows: (1) a petition that David be delivered from the wicked (vv. 1–3); (2) a petition that David be kept from the wicked (vv. 4, 5); (3) a confession of trust in the Lord (vv. 6–8); (4) a prayer for the punishment of the wicked (vv. 9–11); (5) a declaration that the Lord will deliver the afflicted (vv. 12, 13).

140:1–3 Deliver me: David cries out to the Lord for deliverance from the wicked, who continually harm the innocent. The words violent men are repeated in v. 4. The word violent describes people who are harsh and ruthless, who plan the destruction of the righteous. They are purposefully evil and will be satisfied only if they can participate in the destruction of God's people. But God is always ready to deliver His precious ones from their grasp.

140:4, 5 from violent men: These words are repeated from the second colon of v. 2. The word "violent" (Heb. hamasim) describes people who use harsh language, who behave in ruthless manners, who use acts of violence, who wield terrible weapons. In this psalm, the violent people are those who have set as their purpose the destruction of the righteous.

140:6–9 With the words You are my God, David confesses his complete trust in the Lord even though he is surrounded by people plotting his destruction. On the basis of his trust, he now pleads with the Lord to deliver him.

140:10 Let burning coals fall upon them: Here David recalls the judgment of Sodom and Gomorrah (11:6; Gen. 19:12–29) and asks God to use this particular judgment on his enemies.

140:11–13 The cause of the poor and the afflicted is of special interest to the Lord. He promises to uphold and comfort them (41:1; 72:4; 109:31; Luke 4:18; 6:20).

Psalm 141 an individual psalm of lament, is ascribed to David. In this case no particular event is cited as the cause for David's distress. Because this poem records David's desire for the judgment of his enemies, it falls into the category of the imprecatory psalms also. The structure is: (1) an introductory cry to the Lord (vv. 1, 2); (2) a prayer for a guard over David's mouth (vv. 3, 4); (3) an acceptance of righteous rebuke (v. 5a); (4) a vision of the punishment of the wicked (vv. 5b–7); (5) a statement of confidence in the Lord (vv. 8–10).

141:1, 2 Lord, I cry out to you: David asks to be heard as he prays in the assembly of the righteous. As the smoke and aroma of incense rises to the Lord as something sweet and compelling, so David desires that his prayer will not be ignored. The lifting up of my hands: With this impressive gesture David is asking God to pay attention to his plea.

141:3, 4 Set a guard: This is a prayer for wisdom, for restraining evil language, and for knowing the correct words to speak. David wanted to avoid any act of impiety, irreverence, or even idolatry; he did not want to offend God with anything he said.

141:5–7 With the words let the righteous strike me, David expresses his willingness to accept the judgment of the righteous; what bothers him is the instruction and judgment of the wicked. against the deeds of the wicked: As in Ps. 140, the wicked have brought David to his state of distress. He envisions a day when the wicked will be destroyed—their power will collapse and justice will reign in its place.

141:8–10 In light of the wicked's strength, it is easy for us to fix our eyes on, or worry about, the wicked. It is also natural to focus on ourselves: we either become self-absorbed in our difficulties or exalt ourselves in our victories. But David fixes his eyes only on the Lord (2 Cor. 3:18; Heb. 12:2, 3).

Psalm 142 a psalm of individual lament ascribed to David, provides a specific reference for the setting of the poem. The term the cave may refer to one of two occasions on which David hid from King Saul in a cave. One occurred in En Gedi (Ps. 57; 1 Sam. 24); the other at Adullam (1 Sam. 22:1, 2). The second may well be the setting for this poem of deep anguish. This was a time in David's life when it appeared that he was totally alone. In fact, he began to doubt whether even God was truly for him. But as the superscription indicates, David turned to the Lord in prayer. The structure of the psalm is: (1) David's cry for help from the cave of his despair (vv. 1, 2); (2) David's lament of distress that no one was on his side (vv. 3, 4); (3) David's confession of trust and petition for deliverance (vv. 5, 6); (4) David's vow of praise when God delivered him (v. 7).

142:1, 2 I cry out: There is a significant emphasis on the vocal and desperate nature of David's lament in this psalm. With my voice may also be translated "aloud."

142:3–5 In the midst of his distress, David makes his preliminary confession of trust—God knew his path from the beginning. Look on my right hand: With enemies on every path, David screams aloud to God that he is defenseless. The armed soldier in ancient Israel probably would have had his spear or sword in his right hand and his shield in his left. The shield of one man would protect the right side of his neighbor. David cries that there is no one on his right side; He expects to find God there (3:3, 4). You are my refuge: In the midst of his pain, David renews his confession of trust that somehow God must be near. He then pleads with God to deliver him from his foes.

142:6, 7 The cave that was intended as a place of refuge has become a place of confinement—a prison. The psalm ends with a vow that when God would deliver him from his awful experience, David would bring renewed praise to God in the worshiping community. Even though he is still in the midst of his distress, David is able to conclude with a prayer of faith: You shall deal bountifully with me.

Psalm 143 a psalm of individual lament ascribed to David, is similar in tone to other psalms of distress, particularly Ps. 6. Some scholars categorize Pss. 6 and 143 as penitential psalms. The structure of Ps. 143 is as follows: (1) a presentation of great personal distress (vv. 1–4); (2) a longing for former days of delight (vv. 5, 6); (3) prayers for deliverance (vv. 7–12).

143:1–3 David asks God not to bring him into judgment, yet he does not confess his sins as in Pss. 32; 38. no one living is righteous: This is not so much a confession of sin as an observation that everyone is sinful. in darkness: The biblical metaphor of light and darkness begins in Gen. 1:2, 3. To live in darkness is similar to being in the pit (v. 7); this is the reason for the parallel to those who are already dead (Job 10:21, 22).

143:4–6 the days of old: This is similar to 42:4, in which the psalmist remembers rejoicing in temple worship in times gone by. spread out my hands: This was one of the traditional postures for prayer in biblical times.

143:7, 8 the pit: Without a renewed sense of God's presence, described by the words, Your face, David believes that he is as good as dead. in the morning: Often in the psalms there is an expectation that an answer from God might come with the morning light (5:3; 30:5; 130:6).

143:9, 10 Your Spirit is good: This is a rather unusual statement of praise to the person of the Holy Spirit in the Hebrew Bible (Neh. 9:20).

143:11, 12 for Your name's sake: The requests of the psalmists are often tied to various character traits of God. When we pray "in Jesus' name," we pray both in the authority of His name and in the character it represents. I am Your servant: To be a servant of the Lord is a position to which even kings might aspire. Since there is no greater Lord, there is no greater position than to be aligned with His purposes.

Psalm 144 a psalm of descriptive praise with overtones of lament and petition, is ascribed to David. This poem is similar to Ps. 18 in that it describes the salvation acts of the Lord in terms of great heavenly phenomena. It is also possible that this psalm was used in the training of the army (as was Ps. 149). Warfare in ancient Israel was tied closely to the worship of God. Deliverance from the enemy was not just a task for tough soldiers, it was a matter of active piety. The structure is as follows: (1) a confession of praise to God the great warrior (vv. 1, 2); (2) a description of the frailty of human beings (vv. 3, 4); (3) a description of the saving acts of God (vv. 5–8); (4) a determination to praise the Lord (vv. 9, 10); (5) a call for God's continual deliverance of His people (vv. 11–15).

144:1, 2 The Lord my Rock is often used in the Psalms to describe God as the fortress of His people. At times, the word is translated strength (18:1). David found in the Lord the protection and preparation he needed in times of battle.

144:3, 4 what is man: This is a quotation from 8:4, but without the stunning answer presented in 8:5. Here the rhetorical question is used to speak of the frailty of humans who are in need of God's help. passing shadow: The sense of human frailty is illustrated dramatically in these words (102:2, 3).

144:5 bow down Your heavens: We understand language like this to be an exuberant use of terms for effect. Nonetheless, we may come to these words (which remind us of the descriptions in 18:7–12); we may call this the language of apocalyptic epiphany. The idea of God coming near is a concept of such power that the poets do everything they know to do to give us a sense of this awesome idea.

144:6 The lightning of the Lord is a symbol of His judgment (97:4). Here David celebrates God's righteous judgments, which he prays will be exercised against his evil foes.

144:7–10 I will sing a new song is David's vow to respond to God's deliverance with renewed worship and praise (149:1). David: It is rare for these poems to mention the psalmist by name (18:50). David's use of his own name indicated to later generations that this psalm arose out of actual experiences in his life.

144:11 lying words: The principal lie of the enemy was that the Lord could not save His people (Ps. 12).

144:12–15 The image of pillars seems to indicate health, beauty, and dignity. barns: Agricultural productivity was possible only in times of peace and would be meaningful only in times of national freedom. Happy is often translated “blessed” (1:1). Its use twice in v. 15 is dramatic. The happiness that David describes refers both to external well-being—in such a state—and to internal peace—whose God is the Lord.

Psalm 145 a wisdom psalm, is also a psalm of declarative praise. The poem is written in the form of an acrostic, with one verse for each letter of the Hebrew alphabet. The structure of the psalm is: (1) a focus on the greatness of the Lord (vv. 1–3); (2) an expectation of the ongoing praise of the Lord (vv. 4–7); (3) a focus on the character of the Lord (vv. 8, 9); (4) an expression concerning the kingdom of the Lord (vv. 10–13); (5) an acknowledgment of the grace of the Lord to all (vv. 14–16); (6) a focus on the righteous grace of the Lord (vv. 17–21).

IN FOCUS

“extol”

(Heb. rum) (30:1; 34:3; 145:1; Ex. 15:2; Is. 25:1) Strong’s #7311: The Hebrew word translated extol here is one of the many Hebrew words for praise in the Psalms. The specific meaning of this word is “to hold high” or “to esteem greatly.” In contrast to King David’s praise of the Lord as the exalted One (2 Sam. 22:47; Ps. 99:9), Lucifer’s downfall came in trying to exalt himself above God (Is. 14:13). Thus in a negative sense, the word rum can mean “haughty” (2 Sam. 22:28). The psalmist’s strong determination to honor and esteem God in 145:1 is indicated by the highly energized verb he employs in this passage, a verb which indicates a command directed to himself.

145:1–3 The familiar words great is the Lord express God’s grandeur in the universe and remind us of how small we are in His presence. The fact that frail humans are used to praise God is a marvel to the psalmist.

145:4–6 One generation … to another: The expectation is that the message of God’s wonder and mercy will be known throughout the land and will be taught for generations.

145:7 The word memory may refer to the divine name of God. The Hebrew term for memory is translated “memorial” in Ex. 3:15.

145:8 God had described Himself as gracious and full of compassion (Ex. 34:6, 7; Num. 14:18). David uses God’s own words to praise Him for His merciful character (86:5, 15; 111:4; 112:4).

145:9–13 All Your works echoes the words of 19:1–3. All that God has made bears the marks of His wonder (111:2). They shall speak: The task of the righteous is to declare the works of the Lord to all people. an everlasting kingdom: Because the rule of God is eternal, the message of His wonders needs to be delivered to all people in the present time.

145:14 The words upholds all who fall describe the ongoing actions of God on behalf of the needy in a way that may suggest that these words are absolute and invariable. Yet the same people who sang the songs of praise also cried out to the Lord with the psalms of lament. In a world in which life is tough, the psalms delight in affirming that God is good and that there is no limit to His power, His love, and His concern for His people. The psalms celebrate each example of God’s saving mercy and each example of

His grace. Time after time, instance after instance—the whole becomes a beautiful tapestry of His ongoing grace.

145:15–17 The pairing of righteous and gracious is a powerful demonstration of the character of God. His righteousness leads to His discriminating judgment; His grace leads to His saving works and forgiving actions. God both preserves and destroys based on His infallible insight into human intent and purposes.

145:18–21 My mouth: David resolved to be faithful in praising the Lord (146:1), but he also saw his praise as one part of the praise of all creation—that is, all flesh.

Psalm 146 a psalm of descriptive praise, is part of the grand pinnacle of praise in this book of praises. Each of the last five psalms begins and ends with the Hebrew word “Hallelujah!” This final set of praise psalms forms an exuberant ending to Israel’s orchestrated responses to the wonder of God and His gracious works on their behalf. Psalm 146 also shows some similarities with wisdom literature. The structure of the poem is as follows: (1) a call for a life of praise to God (vv. 1, 2); (2) a warning against putting one’s trust even in good people (vv. 3, 4); (3) a blessing on the one who finds help in God (vv. 5–7); (4) a description of the wonderful works of God in the lives of His people (vv. 8, 9); (5) a call to praise God the great King (v. 10).

146:1, 2 My soul is another way of speaking of one’s inner being and is often used as a substitute for the pronouns “I” or “me.” while I live: The poet makes a strong vow to praise the Lord for the rest of his life.

146:3 in princes: The point is that even the best of people are not adequate help in times of terrible stress. Even princes are mortal, and are not able even to help themselves (118:9). In contrast is the individual who finds ultimate help in God who lives forever (vv. 5–7).

146:4–6 Happy indicates a deep and abiding pleasure, a manifest joy. This is the proper description of one whose help and hope is in God. Who made heaven and earth: Creation themes pervade the hymns of Israel (Ps. 104); here the point is that the Creator of the universe is the One who comes to the aid of the righteous.

146:7 who executes justice: The descriptive phrases in v. 7 remind us of the praise of God in Psalm 103:3–6 and Psalm 107:8–10. These are the regularly recurring acts of God in response to the needs of His people (113:7–9).

146:8, 9 the eyes of the blind: In these two verses there is a special focus on the gracious actions of God on behalf of the impaired, the helpless, the lonely, and the needy (38:6). But the way of the wicked: The contrast in God’s treatment of the righteous and the wicked is as pronounced in this psalm as it is in other psalms (1:4, 6; 147:6).

146:10 The Lord shall reign forever: The Bible presents several dimensions of the rule of God: He is King as Creator (Ps. 93); He is King as Savior of His people (Ps. 99); and He is King as the Coming One (Ps. 98). This verse speaks of God’s present and eternal reign rather than specifically of His coming rule at the end of time. Praise the Lord: The use of the Hebrew term hallelujah at the end of the psalm balances its use at the beginning.

Psalm 147 a psalm of descriptive praise, places a strong emphasis on creation themes. This anonymous poem was likely written following the return of the Jewish people to Jerusalem from the Babylonian captivity (also Pss. 126; 132; 135). The structure is threefold, with each section introduced by a command to praise the Lord: (1) a command to praise the Lord for His restorative mercies (vv. 1–6); (2) a command to praise the Lord for the joy He finds in His people (vv. 7–11); (3) a command to praise the Lord for His Word (vv. 12–20).

147:1 The sentiment praise is beautiful is also expressed in 33:1. The people of God may bring their offerings of praise and worship to the Lord.

147:2, 3 builds up Jerusalem: The few people who had returned from captivity faced an immense task. But they needed to know, as do all subsequent people who do the work of the Lord, that because the work was God's, He would see that it was accomplished. It is a privilege for God's people to be counted as part of the fulfillment of the task, but the glory belongs to Him. He heals the brokenhearted: God's principal work is within the human heart (51:10–12).

147:4–6 He counts the number of the stars: Quoted from Is. 40:26, these words describe the infinite knowledge of God. But the words signify more: God's principal interest is not in stars or insects; God's interest is in His people (v. 11). lifts up the humble: God's greatness may be approached only by the humble; He resists the proud, but He comforts the lowly (86:14; 146:9; James 4:6).

147:7–9 Sing praises: The second movement of the psalm begins with a new call for the praise of God (vv. 1, 12). rain for the earth: A regular part of God's covenantal mercies is the bringing of rain for produce and livelihood (Lev. 26:1–13). More than that, God sends rain on the just and the unjust because of His continuing mercy to all. We may describe the actions of these verses as God's "regular mercies." beast: Jesus describes God's care as extending even to sparrows (Matt. 10:29).

147:10, 11 He does not delight: The enjoyment God finds in His people is greater than any pleasure He may find in horses or runners. Forms of the verb delight and takes … pleasure are found in 40:6–8; 51:16. These are God's responses to true piety; He enjoys people who respond rightly to Him (86:4). To fear God is to be properly responsive to Him in awe and wonder.

147:12 The words praise the Lord introduce the third movement of the psalm. This section was a reminder to the new settlers in the land of promise that God had blessed them in numerous ways. He had given them protection, posterity, peace, and productivity.

147:13–18 His word: The point of this section is that the command of God goes throughout His world; whatever He commands, the creation obeys. As in the celebrative words of Psalm 104; we sense in these words God's enjoyment in His creation. The very term "nature" is too passive a word, too removed from God. "Creation" is that which the Bible writers would understand, for it is responsive to the Creator.

147:19, 20 God's word goes throughout His creation, causing snow, frost, hail, wind, and every other aspect of weather to obey His command. Here He gives His word to His people. Shall we obey as does the wind? Or shall we be the only element of creation that is unresponsive to the divine will? not dealt thus: Israel confessed the unique revelation that it had received from God and acknowledged their unique responsibility. Our responsibility is as profound as Israel's, for we too have heard the testimonies of the Creator through Scripture.

Psalm 148 is a complex psalm. Because of its many references to the creation, it can be labeled a wisdom psalm, and more particularly a creation psalm (Pss. 19; 104). It is also highly charged with praise. Like Ps. 19, this psalm moves from the heavens to the human heart. The structure is as follows: (1) a call for the heavens to give God praise because He is the Creator (vv. 1–6); (2) a call for the elements of the earth to give God praise because He is also their Creator (vv. 7–12); (3) a call for the people of God to give God praise because of His wonder in their midst (vv. 13, 14).

IN CONTEXT

Singing with the Universe

Hymns from Egypt to Mesopotamia are filled with praises to the deity. On the feast day of any given deity, the hymns named the god as the highest god of the pantheon on that particular day. Whether it was a hymn to Amon of Egypt or to Ishtar of Babylon, the singers praised that deity for creating the world, for ruling over the other gods, for unsurpassed wisdom, and for the blessings which the worshipers had received from the deity. Always, the deity to whom the song was directed was called the greatest of the gods.

Such a hymn is Psalm 148, possibly composed for a day set aside as holy to Yahweh. After the Exile this psalm could have been sung daily since, at least in Judah's later years, all days were thought holy to Yahweh. In the hymn, the residents of heaven are joined in their praise of Yahweh by inanimate objects, all of creation from heaven to earth (Ps. 148:7–10). Moreover, the song assumes that all peoples everywhere praise God who created them (148:11, 12). Language and motifs that are used elsewhere in the ancient world for other gods are reserved in Psalm 148 exclusively for Yahweh.

The ancient world understood that one never sings hymns of praise alone, but always with the entire universe. This idea of solidarity with the entire created order was carried over into the early church and still remains a central aspect of Orthodox Christian liturgy.

148:1–6 Praise Him: All of the universe is called to boast of the wonder of God. In this first section, praise is commanded from all aspects of the heavens above, including the angelic hosts. The language waters above the heavens comes from the creation story in Gen. 1:7. He commanded: Genesis 1 describes creation as a spontaneous response to the word of God (33:9; 147:15).

148:7, 8 The focus of the psalm switches to the earth. All hosts above and all creatures below are to praise our great God. great sea creatures: This includes real sea creatures that inspired awe and wonder, as well as creatures of mythology that the Canaanites had made into gods. Israel called on all creatures to praise God—both those that are His creation and those that their neighbors believed to be gods. In this way, every principality and power, every creature known and unknown, was called to worship God. Fire and hail: All natural phenomena are at God's command (147:15–18).

148:9–14 the horn of His people: The people are pictured here as an animal whose strength is in its horn. near: When we consider the meaning of God's holiness (99:1; Is. 6:3), the marvel that He approaches us to mercifully provide for us becomes overwhelming.

Psalm 149 an exuberant call to praise God, was used by the army of Israel as well as by the people in their worship of God. The structure of the psalm is: (1) a call for a new song of praise (v. 1); (2) a call for the joyful worship of praise in the congregation of the Lord (vv. 2–5); (3) a call for the joyful worship of praise in the army of the Lord (vv. 6–8); (4) a concluding shout of praise (v. 9).

149:1 The call for a new song comes at several points in the Psalms (33:3; 40:3; 144:9). These words encourage more than just novelty; they call for freshness and integrity in performing music. in the assembly of saints: One of the primary emphases in the Book of Psalms is that the praise of God is to take place in the center of the worshiping community. Praise unites the people of God (33:1–3).

149:2–5 Maker: Not only is God the Creator of the universe (8:3; 19:1; 104:1–35), He is particularly the Creator of His people (100:3) and their great King (Ps. 93). In the temple of the preexilic period, sacred dance was an integral aspect of worship (150:4). Saints refers to the redeemed who have been made God's people by His grace. The Hebrew word is related to the term meaning "loyal love" (13:5). The saints are those who demonstrate in their lives the characteristics of God whom they serve. on their beds: In some of the festivals of Israel, such as Passover, the people would recline at feast tables as a vivid symbol that they had been redeemed. In the first Passover (Ex. 12), the people were to eat standing, ready to travel. The custom had developed for the people to recline at the table, symbolizing their redemption and enjoyment of God's work in their lives.

149:6–8 two-edged sword: The focus of the psalm switches from the congregation at worship to the army in training. Israel's army was to be the vanguard for the battle of the Lord. Their training was to have a strong component of praise and worship to God.

149:9 the written judgment: It is likely that this is a direct reference to the Law (perhaps Deut. 7:1, 2) in which God decreed His judgment on the peoples of the land of Canaan.

Psalm 150 a psalm of praise, is a development of the Hebrew word hallelujah, meaning “Praise the Lord.” How fitting that this book of praises —the meaning of the name of the Book of Psalms in Hebrew—ends in repeated commands to praise the Lord. The structure is as follows: (1) a call for the praise of God in heaven above (v. 1); (2) a call for the praise of God for His great works (v. 2); (3) a call for the praise of God with all instruments (vv. 3–5); (4) a call for the praise of God from all creatures here below (v. 6).

“praise”

(Heb. halal) (146:1, 10; 147:1; 149:3; 150:1, 6) Strong’s #1984: The verb halal is a common Hebrew word for praise. It may be used to exalt human beauty (Song 6:9), a virtuous wife (Prov. 31:30), or a wise man (Prov. 12:8), but most frequently halal is used to praise God. It often occurs in the imperative, expressing an exhortation or command: “Praise!” (135:1) or “Praise Him” (150:2). The most familiar example of the imperative is halleluyah (meaning “Praise the LORD!”; 146:1; 150:6), a combination of halal and the divine name Yah. The last five psalms present a climax to the praises contained in the Book of Psalms, commanding believers (145:10), the Israelites (149:2), the angels (148:2), Jerusalem itself (147:12), the heavens (148:1), and finally every being that has breath (150:6) to praise the Almighty God, the Creator of the universe.

150:1 in His sanctuary: The intent is for praise to come to God in His dwelling in heaven (148:1–4).

150:2 excellent greatness: This grand phrase (Deut. 3:24) is a splendid way to summarize all that the Psalms present of the wonder of God.

150:3–5 The varied instruments in this section include horns, reeds, strings, and percussion, encompassing many of the instruments known in Israel at that time (33:2, 3; 98:4–6).

150:6 everything that has breath: The very breath that God gives us should be used to praise Him. As long as we live we should praise our Creator (146:1, 2). By His breath God created all things (33:6), and by our breath we should adore Him. The Book of Psalms begins with God’s blessing on the righteous (1:1) and concludes with all of creation blessing its loving Creator.

The Book of Proverbs

EVERYONE KNOWS THE VALUE OF GOOD ADVICE. Listening to those who are wiser than we are gives us the benefit of their hard-won experience. Growing up, getting along with others, and holding a job all would be impossible without guidance from folks who have been there before. The Book of Proverbs gives that kind of help.

But the book is more than a collection of "tips and tricks." It passes on a core of knowledge and experience that God says we must have if we are to live successfully. These proverbs are not merely old sayings that concern people in far-off lands but universal principles that apply to all people of all times. They speak to modern problems as much as to ancient ones because they concern human nature and God's ways. Human nature has not changed since Solomon's time; neither has God's. Only the landscape around us has changed.

Proverbs is cast in Hebrew poetry, a rich pattern of rhetoric that shares with poetry of many cultures a special use of words for effect, sound and sense, vivid imagery, and concise language. In contrast to other types of poetry, Hebrew poets—from the psalmists to the authors of proverbs—use parallelism, the repetition of related thoughts. A common type of parallelism is synonymous parallelism, in which a second line restates the first line in slightly different terms: A good name is to be chosen rather than great riches; Loving favor rather than silver and gold. (22:1) Both lines say nearly the same thing; but the restatement drives the point home. The pattern is: "A is so; so is B."

Antithetical parallelism is also quite common in Proverbs. Here the second line expresses the thought negatively, again reinforcing the positive idea: A prudent man foresees evil and hides himself, But the simple pass on and are punished. (22:3) This proverb contrasts the prudent person with the simple person. The antithesis goes both ways. Each line amplifies and explains the other.

In another type of parallelism the second line completes the thought of the first line. This is called climactic parallelism. An example is: The rich and the poor have this in common, The LORD is the maker of them all. (22:2) The two lines are incomplete without each other.

Finally, many of the proverbs are based on comparisons between two parallel lines. These are the "better than" proverbs: Better is a little with righteousness, Than vast revenues without justice. (16:8) All these examples illustrate the heart of Hebrew poetry: parallelism. Each verse sharpens and heightens the thought by use of restatement, comparison, and building to a climax. These subtle devices draw us in and cause us to see and understand the point of each proverb more clearly.

Solomon's 375 proverbs (10:1—22:16) appear as a large collection with no particular organization to the whole. In places a few sentences on one theme appear together, but other sentences on that theme often appear elsewhere as well. We might expect all proverbs on poverty to be in one section and all on child rearing in another, but these and many other topics are interspersed throughout the collection. Sometimes repeated words or sounds are the link between separate sentences. Or it may be that phrases repeat, suggesting a new linking of ideas.

In addition to the proverbs that stand alone, at the beginning and ending of the book sections of extended instruction appear together (chs. 1—9; 30; 31). These chapters contain some of the same proverbs as the rest of the book, but as units they differ greatly from the main section of Solomon's proverbs (10:1—22:16). Unlike the scattered arrangement of Solomon's main section, these chapters develop themes.

The prologue states the book's purpose and theme (1:1–7): it is to give a course of instruction in wisdom, preparation for life, and the ways of life in God's world. Many topics, such as riches, success, and social relations, appear in other collections of wisdom literature that have survived from the ancient Middle East, but they are treated differently. Israel's contribution to wisdom literature was to place all wisdom in the context of faith in the Lord. The words "The fear of the LORD is the beginning of knowledge" (1:7) set the record straight, so to speak. This is the foundation on which all other wise sayings stand. It is the Book of Proverbs's central idea: fear of the Lord motivates us to obey God's commandments, and obedience to them constitutes true wisdom.

King Solomon wrote many proverbs, more than those that have survived to this day. The title of the Book of Proverbs (1:1) and two collections of maxims within it (10:1; 25:1) identify him as their author.

First Kings confirms this by attributing three thousand proverbs and more than a thousand songs to him (1 Kin. 4:32). In fact, the writer of Kings boasted that Solomon's wisdom exceeded that of all the wise men in the East and in Egypt (1 Kin. 4:30). Solomon's interests and research covered nearly every aspect of knowledge, from zoology and botany to grammar and theology. To think of wisdom in Israel was to think of Solomon, who was granted wisdom by God's gracious gift (1 Kin. 3:12).

Although Solomon was the main writer of the Book of Proverbs (10:1—22:16), some proverbs were written by other writers, and some of Solomon's were not added to the book until after his death. Agur wrote ch. 30, and Lemuel wrote 31:1–9. Moreover, it is not clear whether Solomon wrote the first nine chapters; they may have been contributed by someone else as an introduction to the book. Proverbs 25:1 tells us that a group of assistants to King Hezekiah (who reigned about 729–699 B.C.) compiled and added the proverbs of Solomon contained in chs. 25—29. The Book of Proverbs as we know it may well have been completed during Hezekiah's time, but we cannot be certain, because we have no information about Agur (ch. 30) or Lemuel (31:1–9) besides their names.

Commentary

1:1 The proverbs of Solomon: The prologue to the Book of Proverbs (1:1–7) is in three parts: (1) title (v. 1), (2) purpose (vv. 2–6) and (3) theme (v. 7). The title, “The proverbs of Solomon son of David, king of Israel” (v. 1), may suggest three things: (1) Solomon is the author of the book, (2) Solomon is the one who made the principal contributions to the book, or (3) Solomon is the patron of wisdom in Israel, so his name is honorific in this heading. Since there are other authors (e.g., Agur { ch. 30} and Lemuel { 31:1–10}), and even some of the material from Solomon was edited considerably later than his lifetime (25:1), it seems best to understand the opening words of the book as some combination of the second and third options. Solomon cannot be the author of the complete Book of Proverbs, but Solomon is its most notable contributor and is the model upon which the wisdom ideal was built in Israel.

What Kind of Wisdom?

The purpose of Proverbs is straightforward: "to know wisdom" (Prov. 1:2). It is common to conceive of wisdom as either an advanced form of knowledge or learning, or else as a rare sense of deep understanding and insight. This view of wisdom has a touch of the mystical about it, as if those who possess it had in some way tapped into profound, enigmatic truths from ages past.

However, there is no mystery about the wisdom talked about in Proverbs, nor is it necessarily limited to a privileged few. The wisdom that Proverbs mentions more than forty times and that Ecclesiastes mentions twenty-seven times is the Hebrew chokmah, which means something like "the skill of living." This wisdom is practical, not esoteric. It means that a person knows how to live in a responsible, productive, and prosperous way.

From that standpoint, the wisdom of Proverbs has a lot in common with what we might call common sense, or even "street smarts." It is an understanding of the way the world works. The issue is not so much what one knows intellectually but what one does practically. It is truth applied.

That is why Proverbs deals with so many day-to-day issues of life, especially those involving moral choices and other decisions that affect the future. The wise person (Hebrew chakam) avoids evil and promotes good by observing what others have chosen and then pursuing a course of action based on the outcomes. Thus the Proverbs are not so much promises of God as they are observations and principles about how life works.

1:2, 3 Verses 2–6 explain the purpose of the Book of Proverbs. The verbs to know, to perceive, and to receive refer to the ways we acquire wisdom. Wisdom refers to skill. Instruction could also be translated discipline; it refers to the process of receiving knowledge and then applying it to daily life. A person develops discipline in life by applying words of insight.

1:3 The word for wisdom in this verse is different from the word used in v. 1. This word denotes applied skill, such as that of an artisan or a musician. That is, wisdom affects living much the way the skills of artists affect the practice of their craft. The words justice, judgment, and equity give wisdom, discipline, and words of insight a moral context. Biblical wisdom involves all of life; it involves a change of behavior and a commitment to justice.

1:4 The simple or "naive" is young, inexperienced, and likely to make mistakes. The terms prudence and discretion include the harsh facts of life. A wise person has learned by experience how to distinguish what is true, praiseworthy, and good from what is false, shameful, and bad (Rom. 12:1, 2).

1:5, 6 increase learning: No one finishes the study of wisdom; there is always more to learn. Verse 6 speaks of the lessons that a more mature person gains from the study of a proverb, an enigma, words of the wise, and riddles.

1:7 The fear of the LORD is the most basic ingredient in wisdom. All wisdom depends on knowledge of God and submission to His will. To know something but not to know God overturns the value of having knowledge in the first place. Fools have rejected the fear of the Lord. The term despise packs a strongly negative punch—not fearing God is the same as rejecting wisdom outright (Dan. 11:32; John 17:3).

1:8, 9 The opening words of wisdom's instruction come as an appeal from parents to their son (a generic term for child)—a theme that continues throughout the book. Both father and mother teach.

1:10–14 if sinners entice you: This is the first of several texts in which wisdom teaches by means of a story.

1:15–18 The parents speak words of caution. One step on this precipitous path is a step toward destruction. Spreading a net in the sight of the bird one wishes to trap would be a fruitless task. Yet the fool is less sensible than the bird; he will watch the trap being set and get caught in it anyway.

1:19 It takes away the life: These words conclude the story and introduce a theme that the following passages develop further: the study of wisdom is a matter of life and death.

1:20, 21 The word wisdom is plural but the verb calls is singular. The plural is intensive—it calls attention to the word and heightens its meaning.

1:22–27 Wisdom addresses the simple ones, or "open ones," the naive. These are young people who have not yet made up their minds about life or the direction they will take. Wisdom ridicules those who reject her when they come to face the inevitable judgment of their foolishness (Ps. 2:4). Yet

Wisdom laughs with joy at God’s works and has delight in the people of God (8:30, 31).

1:28–33 I will not answer: When fools despise wisdom, they must face the results of their choice. Their hatred for wisdom arises out of a refusal to fear God (v. 29). Verses 31, 32 pick up the theme of v. 19 from the parents’ instruction: fools bring about their own destruction. Rejection of wisdom will slay them. This dismal warning ends with a promise of life to the few who will listen; they will find safety and ease.

2:1–4 These verses begin the second of the my son passages and tie the concepts of wisdom and the knowledge of God more closely together. On the one hand, wisdom is near and available. Yet it is not easy to embrace.

2:5–8 When a person seeks wisdom, he or she finds it in the fear of the LORD, or the knowledge of God. Those who know God fear (revere) Him. Verses 6–8 resemble the words of a psalm (compare Ps. 91). sound wisdom: Here is another word for wisdom, a word that may be translated "abiding success" or "victory."

2:8–13 The phrase paths of justice (v. 8) contrasts strongly with ways of darkness (v. 13). This contrast introduces one of the dominant themes of Proverbs, the contrast of two roads. Jesus spoke of two roads, one narrow and the other broad (Matt. 7:13, 14). The right road is marked by demands of righteousness, justice, and equity (1:3). These demands come from God's law.

2:10, 11 enters your heart: These words stress the internalization of wisdom. The proverbs do not merely provide knowledge; they provide insight to be learned intimately and practiced.

2:12–15 The way of evil (v. 12) contrasts directly with the way of wisdom. It is characterized by perverse things, by lies and distortion, by twisting and deception, and by darkness and deviousness.

2:16–22 The immoral woman is literally "the strange woman." Adultery was foreign and strange to the ideal of God's law. "Adulteress" also connoted prostitution, because the "foreign women" of the ancient Middle Eastern fertility cults included sexual practices in their worship rituals.

3:1, 2 Law and commands are words that, as in 1:8, draw attention to the connection between wisdom and the Law of Moses. The proverbs are an application of the Law.

3:3, 4 Mercy and truth is an important pair of words in the Bible, describing God's character (Ps. 100:5) and the demands He makes of His people. The apostle John used the Greek equivalent of these words, "grace and truth," to describe Jesus' character (John 1:14).

3:5, 6 The words trust in the LORD echo the command of Deut. 6:5 to love God with all our being. The verb trust is complemented by the verb "lean." Trusting in God is a conscious dependence on God, much like leaning on a tree for support. The idea is reinforced here by the command to acknowledge Him, which means to observe Him and get to know Him in the process of living. In doing so, a person finds time and time again that God smoothes out paths.

3:7–10 The promises in these verses describe general patterns, not rules that have no exceptions. These are the results that often follow a full commitment to God. The command to honor God with wealth and to give to Him from the firstfruits of all income is a part of what it means to worship God. In God's covenant with Israel, fullness of barns and vats was God's blessing, a part of God's covenant promise.

3:11, 12 The discipline of the LORD is the other side of His grace. We should cherish God's correction in our lives, because God disciplines only those He loves (Heb. 12:7–10).

3:13–18 Happy: The beatitudes of Jesus in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5:3–12) work much the way these verses do. The Hebrew term blessed is an explosive word: "O the manifold happiness of" (Ps. 1:1). It implies that God is truly pleased. The person who has discovered wisdom has found a priceless treasure. Adam and Eve were expelled from the Garden and forbidden access to the tree of life (Gen. 3:22–24), but wisdom is another tree of life and will begin to restore the lost happiness of Paradise.

3:19, 20 by wisdom founded the earth: One central theme in Proverbs is the association of wisdom with creation. Chapter 8 is devoted to this theme.

3:21 let them not depart: This verse encourages the son to keep faith with wisdom. The intent is much like that of the Shema (Deut. 6:4–9). It also resembles the basic ideas of Ps. 91 (compare v. 26 with Ps. 91:10–13).

3:22–26 The balance of ch. 3 contains sentences, much like the sentences of the later parts of the book. These sentences are something of a sampler of things to come, but they come now in the context of the blessing on the man who has come to the Lady Wisdom. As we think of these sentences, it is with a sure sense of direction. These sentences are not apart from a theological context. They are centered in the knowledge of God; they are based on the pathway of wisdom. As we read these sentences we will get our bearings for those that begin in ch. 10.

3:27–30 do not withhold good: The sentences of vv. 27–30 relate to the proper treatment of one's neighbor, one of the central teachings of Jesus (e.g., Luke 10:25–37). The point of the teaching of Jesus on relating to one's neighbor was to show mercy (Luke 10:37). Similarly, one is not to withhold good from one's neighbor when one has the power to do otherwise (Prov. 3:27). It is no kindness to withhold payment when one is able to pay (v. 28), and mercy is not found in mercenary plots against peaceful companions (v. 29) or treacherous words (v. 30).

3:31–35 There is no benefit in feeling envy for the wicked, because God detests wickedness. Only a fool would wish to be detestable to God! The section ends with a contrast of God's blessing on the righteous and His curse on the wicked (Gen. 12:3).

“Hear, my children, the instruction of a father” (Prov. 4:1) reflects the close family ties of Bible times and the teaching function performed by the home.

4:1–4 In most of the ancient Middle East instruction in wisdom was primarily a matter of training for the court. The masters were regarded as "fathers" of the students. But in Israel, training in wisdom extended to the home. Instruction of a father implies warmth and affection, as well as a parent's concern and discipline. Verse 1 begins a little like the first parental section (1:8), but the addressee is now plural, my children. As his father had taught him, so the son now teaches his own sons, one generation instructing another. The call for parents to teach the things of God to their children is based on Deut. 6:7 and is reflected in the Psalms (as in Ps. 78:3, 4).

A Parental Responsibility

As modern-day society is quickly discovering, there is no substitute for a solid, stable home life. Where parents are absent, negligent, or abusive, children will probably not learn to cope with the world in a healthy way. For that reason, Proverbs stresses that parents are given to children to impart wisdom (Prov. 4:3, 4). Out of their own seasoning, struggles, and suffering, parents can offer experience and insight that will help the next generation get started on the right course.

God's intention is that both parents are to be involved in their family's learning process. Fathers are to take the lead as sources of guidance and direction, and mothers are to offer governing principles based on God's Word (1:8; 4:1; 6:20). In addition, Prov. 4:3, 4 implies that grandparents play a role, largely through the parenting they have done with the parents of their grandchildren.

In this way, a family is to "train up a child in the way he should go" (22:6). That is the gift that the home gives. The child might not appreciate that gift until he is older, but parents are urged to give it nonetheless. Indeed, they cannot afford not to.

4:5–7 Verses 5–9 present an impassioned plea from the father to his sons to get wisdom whatever the cost. The presentation in these early chapters of Proverbs follows the pattern: statement, restatement, embellishment. By making generous use of creative restatement, the ideas come through all the more strongly. Particularly striking are the words of v. 7: Wisdom is the principal thing. The word principal is translated "the beginning of" in 1:7, but here it has the force of "first in importance."

4:8, 9 These verses emphasize the supreme value of wisdom. The person who holds wisdom in highest esteem and embraces it fully will be exalted and honored; its very presence becomes an ornament of grace and a crown of glory. These metaphors are compelling calls for a heartfelt response (1:9; 3:3).

4:10–19 These verses present a renewed appeal from father to son to walk in the way of wisdom and to avoid the path of the wicked at all costs. The contrast of the two paths is profound. The way of wisdom is straight, unencumbered, and safe. The way of the wicked is tortuous, hazardous, and marked by violence. One road is a path of light, the other of darkness; one leads to promise, the other to a stumbling destruction.

4:20–27 This section demands constancy of heart and purpose, honesty in speech, steadiness of gaze, and a right goal in walk and life. Setting off on the path of wisdom is no casual thing. Much of this chapter reiterates and refines the themes found in chs. 1—3. The emphasis on virtue prepares us for the frightening warnings of ch. 5.

5:1–6 Chapter 5 returns to the theme of the immoral woman (2:16–19). This passage speaks strongly for marital fidelity against any and all pressure to the contrary. If you want to preserve discretion, heed these words, lest your feet go down to death.

5:7–14 The Bible teaches elsewhere that temptation in general is unavoidable, but some temptations should be avoided at all costs. A wise son knows this and will not go near an immoral woman. The apostle Paul's instruction to Timothy to flee youthful lusts (2 Tim. 2:22) teaches the same theme. Involvement with such sin dishonors and consumes all who fall into it.

5:15 In an arid country like Israel, a well was a prized possession and a privilege to be cared for. So was (and is) a spouse. Drink water is an oblique reference to sexual union (9:17), and from your own cistern is a clear call to marital fidelity—one man, one woman, together in marriage. The writers of the Bible sometimes speak of salvation as a spring (Is. 12:3); to call one's spouse a spring of water was a term of endearment (Song 4:15).

5:16, 17 Then he turns the tables a bit. How would it be, the teacher asks, if his own wife were to become the "strange woman" for other men? Should his springs flow down the streets? his waters be in the public squares? "No!" the teacher says. Let these waters be yours alone, not something you share with strangers (v. 17).

5:18–20 The words rejoice with the wife of your youth comprise a command and an encouragement to find pleasure in the mutual joy of married love. Indeed, pleasure in the marriage bed is blessed by God (Song; Heb. 13:4).

5:21–23 the eyes of the Lord: Here is the clincher: what one does in secret is never secret to God. The path of adultery is the course of ruin. A life of folly ends in bitter death. The secret path of an evil man is an open scandal in heaven; it ends in the loneliness of a private hell.

6:1–5 These verses warn against putting up surety (11:15), or cosigning a loan. This does not mean we should never be generous or helpful if we have the means, only that we should not promise what we cannot deliver. In Solomon's day, a cosigner who could not pay could lose all he had and be reduced to slavery besides. Even though laws differ today, inability to pay a debt is still a form of bondage and can be a serious problem.

6:6–11 This passage warns against the trap of laziness. The sluggard, or lazy person, is held captive to leisure. He can learn all he needs to know by studying the ant, a humble creature that busies itself with storing food during the summer against the winter that lies ahead. Like the ant, a wise person works hard. By contrast, the lazy person is addicted to sleep and has lost all interest in work (26:13–16).

6:12–15 A wicked man is a troublemaker. Unlike the sluggard, whose only desire is another place to nap, the troublemaker cannot wait to cause more problems or to get into more mischief. Unlike the sluggard (v. 6), he is too busy, though he is doing the wrong things. He delights in bringing dissension. But like the sluggard, he does not realize that calamity awaits him.

6:16–19 This passage is a numerical proverb (30:15–31) that describes seven things that the LORD hates. The use of numerical progression—six, even seven—in these proverbs is a rhetorical device that embellishes the poetry, provides a memory aid, and builds to a climax. It gives the impression that there is more to be said about the topic. The progression involves not just the numbers but also the words that describe God's response; the word hates progresses to abomination. The word abomination is the Bible's strongest expression of hatred for wickedness (compare Lev. 18:22). In a list of this type, the last item is the most prominent. Thus, the reader knows that causing discord among brethren (v. 14) causes God's greatest disapproval. Contrast the blessing of God on brothers who live together in peace (Ps. 133:1).

6:20–24 This passage links the teaching of the father with that of the mother (1:8). The mother's instruction should be bound about one's heart and neck, a constant companion and a trusted guide—just like God's Law (compare Deut. 6:4–9; 11:18–21). lamp … light: Compare Ps. 119:105.

6:25 eyelids: Seductive glances.

6:26 The contrast emphasizes the utter devastation an adulteress brings into a man's life. Compared to the confusion a prostitute creates, an adulteress consumes the very life of her victim.

6:27–35 steals to satisfy: This passage does not condone theft. It merely contrasts theft, which can be an understandable course of action, with adultery, which never makes sense. Throwing away one's commitment to one's lifelong companion is pure folly. For the ancient Israelites, marital fidelity was a mark of one's fidelity to God.

IN CONTEXT

The Penalty for Theft

Under the OT Law, a thief was ordinarily required to make restitution of twice the value of the loss. However, Proverbs indicates that if someone stole because he was hungry, he had to repay sevenfold, even if it meant losing his house and property (Prov. 6:30, 31). What accounts for this higher penalty?

The answer may be that the Law made numerous provisions to prevent poor people from starving. These included: • The third-year tithe (Deut. 14:28, 29).

• Gleaning (Lev. 19:9, 10).

• The release of debts in the Sabbatical year (Deut. 15:1–3).

• The temporary sale of real property (Lev. 25:23–34).

• Mandatory charity loans (Deut. 15:7–11) at zero interest (Ex. 22:25).

• Voluntary indentured service (Lev. 25:39–55).

In light of these policies, there was no excuse for someone to steal in order to eat (unless the society failed to carry out these policies).

However, it is worth noting that each of these provisions involved a form of charity, and many people resist accepting charity for a variety of reasons such as pride, embarrassment, or a desire for independence. Perhaps the penalty of sevenfold restitution was intended to punish this prideful rejection of help.

7:1–5 The problem of immorality (2:16–19; 5:1–23; 6:20–35) does have a solution: Keep my commands … as the apple of your eye. People should guard wise words as instinctively as they protect the pupil of the eye. God cares for His people with the same diligence (Deut. 32:10).

7:6–13 The young man who gives in to the immoral woman is described as simple, a term that pegs him as naive, inexperienced, and devoid of understanding (1:4; 9:3). He has no idea how foolish he is. He thinks he makes his way to the woman, but she in fact seduces him.

7:14–21 All the adulteress does is perverse. She audaciously begins her proposition by talking about her supposedly righteous actions that day. Since the offerings she presented to the Lord were fellowship or peace offerings, she could bring part of them home for a feast before the Lord. But here she presents the offering as a feast for the young man she plans to entrap. Her preparations and her words of invitation might pass between a wife and husband and be honored by God. But in her mouth these words become evil. She overcomes her target's fear by assuring him that her husband will not come home and discover them together.

7:22, 23 The passage here uses several unflattering metaphors to describe how a young fool falls into immorality. The phrase as a fool to the correction of the stocks could be translated "as a stag prances into captivity." The idea is that the young man is oblivious to his fate. Such a fool has no idea how foolish he is.

7:24–27 Now therefore, listen: The chapter ends in an epilogue (vv. 24–27) in which the lesson is driven home: Stay away from such a one! She is deadly, and has a great many victims.

8:1–11 Chapter 7 focused our attention on the fool and the traps that catch him; ch. 8 shifts to wisdom. It is a hymn of praise about how wonderful wisdom is. Does not wisdom cry out: Wisdom wants to reach everyone and therefore broadcasts her message publicly, unlike the immoral woman, who uses privacy and deception to achieve her goals. Wisdom's words can be trusted, and her offers of grace are beneficial. Her words of truth contrast with the lies of wickedness 7:21–23; wisdom will deliver on her promises; she is not a tawdry tease. What wisdom offers is of inestimable worth, far more valuable than silver and gold; no gems or other desirable things may be compared with it (a similar expression is found in 3:14, 15).

8:12, 13 The words I, wisdom, dwell with prudence introduce the second section of this passage about the excellence of wisdom (vv. 12–21). Again in this context we see wisdom tied directly to the fear of the LORD. The offer of wisdom is held out only to those who fear God. Coming to wisdom requires coming to God, and coming to God means turning away from all that God hates—evil, pride, arrogance, misbehavior, and perverse speech. Jesus said that the truth is found in Him (John 8:32).

8:14–21 princes … nobles … judges: Power and authority require the use of wisdom; this is one of its loftiest appeals. What's more, wisdom leads those who follow her to riches and honor (9:1–6). These contrast directly with the shameful fate of the fool (6:33, 35).

8:22–31 This section of ch. 8 describes wisdom's role in creation. The LORD possessed me at the beginning of His way: The Hebrew verb for possessed can mean "brought forth" or "created." Melchizedek used the same word to identify God as creator of the universe (Gen. 14:19). God, who is ever wise, produced wisdom; God, who possesses all knowledge, brought forth knowledge. Wisdom had a beginning only in the sense that God singled it out for special display at that time; insofar as it is one of God's perfections, it has always existed (v. 23). These verses provide part of the background for the NT portrayal of Christ as the divine Word (John 1:1–3) and as the wisdom of God (1 Cor. 1:24, 30; Col. 2:3).

8:30, 31 The term master craftsman speaks of an artisan or of a darling child. Wisdom is both. With wisdom's skill, God created the universe. A proper study of the universe is a progressive discovery of God's wisdom (Rom. 1:20). delight: In her playful, childlike exuberance, Wisdom is a darling child. And her greatest joy comes in the finest of the work of God—the sons of men—that is, humankind.

8:32–36 Now therefore, listen to me, my children: This section is the epilogue of the ch. 8 hymn of praise. It calls everyone to listen. Wisdom offers blessing and life to those who heed her, but cursing and death to those who hate her. Wisdom's gracious invitation is more desirable than anything and an invitation to a blessed life.

9:1 Here is the final contrast between wisdom and folly. Each holds a banquet, one for life (vv. 1–6) and one for death (vv. 13–18). Between the two banquet descriptions is a section (vv. 7–12) that speaks of consequences of the life of wisdom and of the plight of folly. Wisdom has built her house: Here as in 1:20, the term for wisdom is in the intensive plural rather than the singular. It calls attention to itself. seven pillars: The number seven represents completeness, as it often does in Semitic poetry. That is, it is not that there were precisely seven pillars so much as that the house of wisdom was solidly built and substantial in character.

9:2, 3 The meal at wisdom's banquet includes meat and wine and a lovely table (7:14). Freshly butchered meat was a mark of a feast in biblical times. mixed her wine: Wine was a staple in ancient Israel; but when a feast was special, a homemaker would add aromatic spices to the wine, enlivening the bouquet and improving the taste (Song 8:2). This all sets up a contrast with the foolish woman. While wisdom is busy, attending to every detail like a gracious hostess, the foolish woman sits at the entrance of her house with very little to do (v. 14). Wisdom sends her trusted maidens throughout the city, inviting people to come and dine.

9:4–6 Wisdom makes a point of inviting the simple, meaning those who have not yet made up their minds about their course in life (1:4; 7:6). bread … wine: Wisdom promises life. Forsake foolishness: The person who comes to wisdom has nothing to lose but naiveté. Read Heb. 5:14, which speaks of a mature person as one who is able to eat and to enjoy solid food, in contrast to the naive who is able only to drink milk (Heb. 5:13).

9:7–9 A scoffer or mocker is thoroughly set against wisdom (1:22) and scoffs at the things of God (Ps. 1:1). How should a person respond to a mocker? It is best not to respond at all. By contrast, a wise man accepts correction and responds with gratitude to the one who points out his error. A wise person always welcomes constructive criticism; by implication, he or she is also humble (v. 10; 3:7; 11:2).

9:10–12 fear of the LORD: This is the central theme of the Book of Proverbs (1:7). The only appropriate way to approach the holy God is with fear, that is, reverence. The term Holy One is an intensive plural of the Hebrew word for holy: "the most Holy One" or "the quintessence of holiness." for yourself … alone: You will feel the effects of your wisdom or foolishness directly; you cannot escape them.

9:13–18 This section is a parody of vv. 1–6. Like personified wisdom, the foolish woman calls out an invitation. But she is brash, loud, undisciplined, and knows nothing (7:10–12). She cries out in the same words that wisdom has used (compare v. 16 with v. 4), but with a twist: she has no marvelous banquet for her guests, only shabby food, stolen and meager. Though she gets lots of attention, her appeal makes sense only to him who lacks understanding.

10:1 The proverbs of Solomon focus on the wise son, as in chs. 1—9, and contrast him with the foolish son. The term son is generic—the central issue is not that he is a son rather than a daughter, but that he is wise or foolish. The child's behavior affects both parents. Both parents find their joy or sadness in their child who demonstrates skill in life. The tense of the verbs suggests that time after time a wise child gladdens parents, and time after time a foolish child brings distress to parents.

10:2 Treasures: This verse is a warning against presumption on wealth apart from personal righteousness. The wicked may be wealthy but that wealth will not allow them to buy their way past death. In this type of saying, death is something to fear—if one does not know God. That righteousness delivers from death presages some hope of life beyond death.

10:3 This verse speaks of God's gracious provision of food for the righteous and His retributive justice on the wicked. Proverbs such as this emphasize (1) circumstances as they ought to be, and (2) the end of the wicked (Ps. 73:17). They do not necessarily indicate circumstances as they always are, nor what the wicked are experiencing right now.

10:4 slack hand … poor: Proverbs often link laziness with poverty, and hard work with riches, but not always (v. 2). This proverb states the norm.

10:5 Gathers in summer contrasts a skillful person with a shameful person, based on whether he works hard during the harvest season. The description of the second person is particularly critical: "he who snores away during the harvest."

10:6 Blessings: The images this proverb present contrast an aura of blessing hovering over the righteous as against a spew of violence pouring from the wicked.

10:7 In biblical times, a person's name was significant and important. When a person's name was remembered by future generations for good, that person's life was believed to have been of great value. But when the memory of a name rotted away, it was as though that person had never lived.

10:8 The Hebrew verb for will fall means "is ruined" and comes from the same root as the verb will rot in v. 7. This type of poetic parallelism would have delighted the ancient Israelites.

10:9 Many of the proverbs contrast two paths of life. Walks with integrity means conforming to God's Law as a course of life. Choosing crooked paths is willfully to disdain the Law God so graciously provided.

10:10 winks with the eye: Although many proverbs contrast two behaviors, both units of this proverb speak of evil actions. Moreover, the second unit of this verse is identical with the second unit of v. 8; this is a connective link that ties the passage together.

10:11 a well of life: Another of the sentences dealing with the mouth (10:6, 8, 10), this verse presents speech as an outward product of an inward reality. The phrase a well of life is nearly a divine image, a particularly strong antithesis to the word violence.

10:12 Hatred … love: This verse describes interpersonal relationships, not salvation. When people respond in love to each other, they cover over the sins, or offenses, that would otherwise come between them.

10:13 This proverb tells of the positive role that speech can have—that of speaking wisdom. The rod refers to punishment, in this case deserved. The term devoid of understanding comes from the Hebrew idiom "lack heart." The one who "lacks heart" is contrasted with the one who is "wise in heart" (v. 8).

10:14, 15 To store up knowledge is a strong theme in the instruction section of chs. 1—9 (1:1–3; 3:1). This set of verses contrasts the wise person's pursuit of knowledge with the empty talk of a fool. Wealth is like a strong city. In biblical times only walled cities had any defense against enemy armies; likewise, a wealthy person is able to withstand the assaults of others.

10:16, 17 These verses present the doctrine of the two ways: the righteous is on the way of life, but the wicked wander from it. The phrase wages of the wicked is similar to Paul's expression in Rom. 6:23: "the wages of sin is death."

10:18–21 These verses tell of the dangers of speech, particularly lying and slander. The way to avoid these sins is to exercise restraint.

10:22 The tie of wealth with the blessing of the LORD is made explicit in this verse. In this sentence there is Yahweh's provision of a lack of sorrow along with great wealth. Now, there is packaging!

10:23, 24 The word translated sport usually means "joyous laughter" (Job 8:21; Ps. 126:2). At times it means "hollow laughter" (14:13; Eccl. 7:3, 6). Here the proverb uses the word in a completely negative sense. For the fool, wickedness is only a game. He makes up the rules as he goes along; for him losing is only in getting caught. But a person who has understanding takes a longer-term perspective. In the end he gets his way while justice comes upon the wicked.

10:25 The short-lived nature of the wicked is contrasted with the stability of the righteous. As in Ps. 1:3, 4, where the righteous are compared to a tree and the wicked to chaff, so in this proverb the storm blows away the wicked but cannot dislodge the righteous. The everlasting foundation of the righteous is faith in God, much like the waters that nourish the tree of Ps. 1:3.

10:26 The sluggard person is a comic figure in the proverbs. Here the sluggard (Heb., asel) is an irritant to the one who sends him on an errand. He is like the sour taste of vinegar in the mouth, the burning of smoke in the eyes.

10:27 This verse contains the first instance of the phrase the fear of the LORD in chs. 10—22 (1:7, 29; 2:5; 8:13; 9:10). The tie of piety to long life, and of wickedness to an early death, is another common theme in Proverbs (3:1, 2).

10:28 hope … expectation: The righteous have something to look forward to; the wicked do not (v. 24).

10:29 Different people see the way of the LORD differently. Those who are innocent see it as a shelter from the storm and the heat of the day. Those who practice iniquity see it only as a source of terror. The viewer's perspective makes all the difference; the way of the Lord itself remains constant and true.

10:30 This proverb presents a confident hope in the ultimate survival of the righteous and the final judgment of the wicked. In our limited experience, we might see the wicked succeeding and the righteous only struggling to live. But the final judgment (Ps. 73) will reverse their fortunes.

10:31, 32 These verses form another pair of sentences about true and false speech. They may be compared to vv. 11, 13, 20, 21 and James 3. This repetition with variation indicates the significance of truth and falsehood in both ancient Israel and in the modern world as well.

11:1 Dealing fairly with one another is an outgrowth of the command to love one's neighbor as oneself (Lev. 19:18), which in turn is an outgrowth of the central command given to Israel, to love God alone (Deut. 6:4–9). That is why false balances are an abomination to God, a term that refers to stomach-wrenching hatred.

11:2 Many proverbs contrast the arrogant with the humble, as this one does. The Hebrew word for pride comes from a root that means "to boil up"; it refers to a raging arrogance or insolence. The image pictures the presumptuous or arrogant behavior of the godless person. Such behavior always leads to shame.

11:3–6 These verses form a series of proverbs that contrast the results of righteousness and perversity in people's lives. As pride and humility are contrasted in v. 2, so integrity and perversity are contrasted in v. 3.

11:4–6 From time to time the proverbs speak of death as a time of reward and punishment. Riches cannot help with this. Only righteousness has meaning and power beyond the grave.

11:7 As long as a person has life, there is an opportunity for hope. But hope dies when life passes if one has lived apart from God.

11:8 Final issues may be in view in this verse as well; the very troubles from which the righteous escape fall upon the wicked instead.

11:9 The profane man may trash his neighbor by his mouth, just as righteous ones are delivered by knowledge. The negative and positive powers of speech are among the most impressive concepts in these sentences.

11:10, 11 Truly righteous people bring justice to all the inhabitants of a city, and the city experiences true peace—that is, shalom, meaning "things as they ought to be." Many Psalm writers cried for vindication of the righteous and for a cessation of evil (Ps. 69:22–28). For the fate of a city without any righteous persons in it, see the story of Sodom and Gomorrah in Gen. 18:22–33.

11:12 Patience and control are part of wisdom. A person who is devoid of wisdom, who "lacks heart" (10:13), despises his neighbor. But the understanding person knows enough to control his passion and to keep silence (17:28).

11:13 A faithful friend conceals delicate matters that an unfaithful person reveals. "Love covers a multitude of sins" (10:12; James 5:20; 1 Pet. 4:8).

11:14 In modern times as much as formerly, leaders of nations need adequate counsel. So do all individuals. We all need to seek advice from wise and trustworthy people.

11:15, 16 These two proverbs balance each other. The first warns against rashly giving surety or a pledge for a stranger. The second praises generosity; generosity begets honor. One of the greatest virtues is to be freed of possessiveness. The members of the early church gave freely to those in need (Acts 2:44, 45; 4:32–35).

11:17 Yet another verse on generosity presents the good that redounds to the giver. Miserliness, on the other hand, tends to shrivel the cruel person to the size of his own niggardly heart.

11:18 Fraudulent work proceeds from wickedness; good work from righteousness. The righteous earn their wage; the wicked only steal.

11:19 Proverbs such as this remind us that the pursuit of righteousness is a matter of life and death.

11:20 The contrasting concepts of the abomination and delight of Yahweh (11:1) recur here with regard to the contrasting values of perversity and blamelessness of the inner man and his walk in life. It is possible to bring a smile to the Lord in the manner of one's life. It is also possible to prompt his revulsion.

11:21 The term join forces is literally "hand for hand." Collective opposition to God's purposes makes no sense at all (Ps. 2:1–4).

11:22 A golden ring would be ludicrous on a pig's snout. To the ancient Israelites, pigs were unclean and repellent. The immoral person is compared to such an animal, no matter what the outward appearance might be.

11:23 The term desire is used in some of the proverbs in a negative sense (13:12, 19; 18:1; 19:22), but here it has a positive meaning. The righteous desire good.

11:24–27 These proverbs should shape our attitudes toward wealth: it should be shared. Stinginess may lead to poverty. Generosity has the opposite effect. Selfishness is foolish because it only creates enemies and dishonors God.

11:28 This proverb addresses the folly of trusting in riches. The second line can easily be misinterpreted to mean that righteousness always leads to success. The proverb actually addresses a person's attitude toward wealth. It is foolish to trust in riches instead of God.

11:29 Some acts of folly might be thought to be somewhat “iffy,” but to bring trouble on one’s own house is a sure thing. Here is a clear road to ruin, the inheritance of wind. Similarly, a fool is a servant of the wise, not his master.

11:30 As in 3:18, the image of the tree of life denotes the tree in the Garden of Eden (Gen. 2; 3). Righteousness and wisdom are ways of recovering the lost tree of life.

11:31 Here is a how much more proverb, one that argues from a premise to conclusion. Since the righteous will finally find their reward (2 Cor. 5:10), it follows that the wicked, who are defiant toward God and in conflict with His works, will certainly receive judgment.

12:1 The wise person knows that discipline and instruction will bring its own reward. Yet the person who hates a reprimand is stupid, literally "stupid as a cow."

12:2 He will condemn: John's Gospel speaks of one being condemned already because of evil deeds, and deliberately clinging to the darkness even though the light has come (John 3:16–21).

12:3 Contrasts such as the one in this proverb speak of a person's ultimate end; otherwise they would be proven false by countless examples of wicked persons who flourish while the righteous suffer. In the end, the righteous will stand sure, as in the image of the tree in Ps. 1:3.

12:4 Excellent wife, or "noble woman," are the same Hebrew words used in the famous acrostic in 31:10–31. A husband whose wife is like the woman described in ch. 31 should rejoice in her, because her noble character brings him honor.

12:5, 6 Our thoughts do matter. At the very least, they must not be deceitful. A person's thoughts determine what he or she says and does. The words of wicked persons are like a deadly ambush.

12:7 Here the poet says the wicked are no more among us, but the house of the righteous still stands. This means that all wicked persons in our own day, some who may be our antagonists, are living on borrowed time. Their days are numbered; the days of the righteous cannot be counted.

12:8 There is a proper praise that comes to one who displays wisdom, particularly when that wisdom is for the good of others. There is no proper praise of the wicked; their twisted hearts are suitable only for despising.

12:9 A better … than proverb, this verse contrasts a person who is a "nobody" but has a servant with a person who makes a great display but does not even have food on the table. Pretension and arrogance destroy those who indulge in them.

Animals and Their Rights

One of the most complex issues of modern society is the impact that meeting the needs of people has on animals and their environment. Does the Bible have anything to say about this often divisive topic?

One principle that Scripture seems to affirm is that animals do, in fact, have certain God-given rights. For example, the Lord regards a person's care and concern for the life of an animal as righteousness, while cruelty to an animal is an act of wickedness (Prov. 12:10). The point is that animals have a right to be treated with wisdom and kindness, not cruelty. God pays attention to how we treat animals.

However, it is also true that God has given human beings dominion, or authority, over the other creatures (Gen. 1:26). Animals are a resource to be managed and used as humans see fit. Yet people are accountable to God for exercising this dominion. Wisdom, or the "fear of the Lord" (Prov. 1:7), suggests that we treat animals as God their Creator would treat them. For example, we know that God has an interest in the preservation of species (Gen. 7:1–5, 23, 24; 8:1, 17; Luke 12:6). Likewise, He is concerned that farm and work animals be cared for properly (Ex. 23:12; Deut. 22:4).

12:10 This is a proverb that moves from the lesser to the greater, comparing the smallest of the actions of a righteous man with the most grandiloquent acts of the wicked person.

12:11 tills his land: Many proverbs contrast hard work with laziness. Wise people work hard while fools waste time.

12:12, 13 yields fruit … is ensnared: Wickedness hurts the wicked; righteousness helps the righteous (v. 14). This is another way of saying "whatever a man sows, that he will also reap" (Gal. 6:7). The expression the root of the righteous also appears in v. 3.

12:14 Achieving satisfaction will not be because of something exotic or strange; it is by speaking and dealing in righteousness. At this point, the reward of satiety is an abundant reward. The feeling that a job is done well is reward enough for the wise.

12:15 The self-delusion of the fool is notorious. Too rare is the one who seeks advice when he needs it. To seek help is an admission of need, something the fool is never able to request, due to his inflated sense of self.

12:16 at once: Careless words can make a fool out of us, so we are wise to think before we speak. King David showed such restraint (2 Sam. 16:5–12).

12:17 Righteousness and deception are the identifying marks, respectively, of the faithful and the lying witness.

12:18, 19 Many proverbs praise people who speak carefully and truthfully. Speech reflects a person's character. The words of a righteous person are faithful and true (v. 17), and soothe the listener.

12:20 The varied outward expressions of persons come from diversity of hearts. Those who plan evil have deceit in their hearts; those who counsel peace have joy in theirs.

12:21 The fear of harm is only valid for the wicked; the righteous have nothing to fear. Since we know that trouble does come into the life of the righteous, likely verses such as this relate to ultimate reality rather than immediate experience.

12:22, 23 An abomination is something that "nauseates" God (11:20). The term conveys extreme hatred. Thus it is better to remain silent than to have lying lips.

12:24 Anyone who wants to have a position of authority cannot dare to be lazy (vv. 11, 14).

12:25 Anxiety loses some of its force in the face of a positive, encouraging word. Barnabas's encouragement of Paul is a great example of this (Acts 4:36; 9:27; 11:2–30; Gal. 2:1).

12:26 Our friends help to determine who we will become (1 Cor. 15:33).

12:27 Lazy people do work, they just don't finish what they start. The cure for their laziness is diligence—to follow through to the end.

12:28 Fittingly, the last proverb of this chapter speaks again of life and death issues.

13:1 A wise son listens to instruction (10:1, 17) and is better off than the scoffer—the worst kind of fool (Ps. 1:1). Some fools are naive and inexperienced, but open to suggestions; sometimes even those established in folly may rethink their position. But scoffers laugh at righteousness. Such people are impervious to rebuke.

13:2, 3 When speech is what it ought to be, it may become a provision for gain and even a means of living; but when speech is evil, it may result only in an increase of violence. The wise person knows that at times to misspeak may endanger life itself. But for the wicked and the foolish there are no such inhibitions, and no such protection!

13:4 The slothful person is consumed by cravings that are insatiable because they are never realized. The industrious person may achieve his or her goals and find satisfaction.

13:5 The person who hates lying does not merely feel bad about it; he avoids it like the plague.

13:6 In the proverbs, righteousness is portrayed as a friend and wickedness as an enemy (11:27). Wickedness hurts us but righteousness helps.

13:7 rich … nothing: The paradox of greed causing poverty, and of generosity causing wealth, is a recurring theme in Scripture (11:24; Matt. 6:19–21). The point is not how much money you have, but what you do with it.

13:8 A person with great wealth may have to exhaust that wealth to pay a ransom. But a poor man is not likely to come under danger that would demand a ransom payment. Most of the poor might wish to run this risk, but there is some self-protective value in poverty.

13:9 For an ancient Israelite, an oil lamp would be the only source of light at night. Without it, a person had no way of seeing the path in front of him (20:20; 24:20).

13:10 The word pride (11:2) does not refer to self-esteem or to a positive mental attitude, but to arrogance and a refusal to glorify God. Such pride is self-serving and leads to conflict.

13:11 This proverb describes the natural long-term consequences of cheating. People who compromise their honesty to get rich merely postpone the inevitable need to earn their keep. The day comes when their cheating catches up with them, but by then their honest colleagues have become far better at obtaining wealth. Cheating doesn't work anymore, and the wealth of the dishonest is diminished.

13:12 The tree of life (11:30) symbolizes the achievement of a deeply felt desire. It is like coming back to the Garden of Eden.

13:13 will be rewarded: A person can either despise instruction or respond in reverence, understanding that the ultimate Giver of instruction is God. Correction is only for one's good.

13:14 fountain of life (10:11): In an arid land such as ancient Judah, a fountain provided water for oneself and for one's flocks. It was a necessity —a source of life. That is a very strong endorsement for the law of the wise. A fountain was also a picture of salvation (Is. 12:1–3).

13:15 Favor with God and other people—a good reputation—is highly desirable because it ensures that you won't be alone in life. It comes from good understanding. A good reputation was the first qualification listed by the apostles for deacons in the early church (Acts 6:3).

13:16 Many proverbs pit the fool against the prudent person.

13:17 A … messenger who acts wickedly will be discovered and his sentence will be harsh indeed. But a messenger who acts in faithfulness brings healing as he goes. In ancient times it was not unusual for a monarch to lash out against the bearer of bad news. This proverb is a lashing out against a wicked messenger.

13:18 Yet another proverb on the disdain of instruction (13:1), this verse speaks of poverty as the logical result of such intransigent behavior.

13:19 Few things are as sweet as accomplishment. But the folly of the fool is so deeply entrenched that he becomes ill if he leaves his self-destructive path. The term used of his revulsion, abomination, is the same word used of God in other passages (11:1).

13:20 walks with: The selection of friends (12:26) is extremely important. Pressure from peers is much stronger than many people realize.

13:21 Evil is a sinner's enemy (v. 6), not a friend; a pursuer, and not a companion.

13:22 In the Book of Proverbs, wealth is a topic with many themes. Wealth may come as a benefit of righteous living (v. 11; 10:22); but there is no guarantee of this (28:6). Wealth cannot make a person good (11:4), and in the end it matters less than God's favor anyway (11:28). A good man knows this and trusts in God to meet his needs; the sinner tries to acquire and keep wealth and in the end fails.

13:23 One of the first proverbs in this section to deal with injustice, this sentence observes that some who are poor actually might have possessions but have had it stolen from them by lack of justice.

13:24 hates … loves: This is the first of several proverbs on parental discipline. A parent's loving discipline is modeled after God's loving correction (3:11, 12).

13:25 In these sentences, genuine satisfaction is tied to righteousness; abject failure is linked to wickedness.

“foolish”

(Heb. ivvelet) (14:1; 16:22; 17:12; 26:4, 5) Strong’s #200: This Hebrew word signifies an absence of wisdom. Except for two occurrences in the Psalms, this term occurs only in Proverbs, where the foolishness of fools is frequently contrasted with the wisdom of the wise and prudent (13:16; 14:8, 18, 24). Foolishness characterizes the speech of fools and the reactions of the impulsive person (12:23; 14:17, 29; 15:2, 14; 18:13). Foolishness affects the lifestyle of a person, causing his or her heart to fret against God (15:21; 19:3). Indeed, foolishness is often identified with iniquity and sin (5:22, 23; 24:9; Ps. 38:4, 5). Although Proverbs does not hold out much hope for separating an adult fool from his foolishness, the rod of correction is identified as a remedy for children (22:15; 26:11; 27:22).

14:1 A wise woman builds her house; that is, she develops a peaceful setting for family nurture.

14:2 Fears the LORD contrasts starkly with despises Him. Love for uprightness will naturally coincide with love and respect for the most upright One of all, God Himself. Love for perversity will likewise result in hatred for Him. Fear of the Lord as the beginning of wisdom is the central theme of Proverbs (1:7).

14:3 rod of pride: This proverb addresses the dangers of foolish speech and the rewards of sensible speech. The words of the fool shape themselves into a rod that is ready for his enemies to use on him. This proverb calls to mind that many people are their own worst enemy; given enough rope, they prepare a noose for their own hanging.

14:4 clean: A farmer has to put up with some disorder in the barn if he wants the help of an ox. This is not an excuse to be slovenly, but an encouragement to work hard.

14:5 This proverb is a restatement of God's law: "You shall not bear false witness against your neighbor" (Ex. 20:16; Deut 5:20).

14:6 The image of the scoffer returns in this sentence (13:1) as a foil to display the validity of the pursuit of wisdom by those open to receive it rightly.

14:7 The fool is not just a nuisance; he is a hazard to the soul. Folly is not just an unpleasantness; it is a jeopardy to life itself. Hence, the prudent reaction to entrenched folly is to avoid it as one would any danger. Only the fool courts disaster by playing with folly.

14:8 This proverb contrasts prudent and foolish people. Wise people know what they are doing and why they are doing it. They have wise reasons for what they do, based on a knowledge of their choices. Fools, on the other hand, deceive so often that they deceive themselves. They do not know where they are headed.

14:9 The extent of the depths of folly is seen in a mocking of sin and its consequences; this is self-deception of the worst sort. The wise, on the other hand, center on the pleasure of the Lord.

14:10 One of the most significant proverbs on the feelings and responses of an individual is this: no one really knows another's sorrows or joys. Empathy is an approximate art, never an exact science. Yet one is reminded of the words of the wonderful spiritual, "Nobody knows … but Jesus!"

14:12 Only when it is too late does the deluded person discover that he is on the crowded highway to death. The implication is not that he was tricked, but that he relied too heavily on his own "wisdom" rather than turning in humility to God. a way … the way: Many proverbs put their message in terms of two ways—one that leads to life and another that leads to death (16:25).

14:13 Rarely are deep emotions simple; complexities abound within the marvelous entity of human personality.

14:14 A person with a disloyal heart (Heb., sug leb) will be sated with the results of his wicked ways; similarly the good man will be sated with the results of his righteous paths. Good will out, and evil will be judged.

14:15 A characteristic of the naive person is gullibility. A prudent person is careful.

14:16 The phrase fears and departs from evil suggests fear of God (v. 2).

14:17 Both the quick-tempered and those of wicked intent are fools; wise persons shun them so that they are not involved in their folly.

14:18 The contrasts between the naive and the prudent (14:15) continue in this verse. The simple or naive person has a legacy of folly that he thinks is a gift to improve his life. The prudent person finds himself crowned with knowledge; that is, the most attractive thing about the prudent is the wisdom he shares.

14:19 In an ancient walled city, the gate area would normally be the weakest section of the wall. The city engineers of ancient Canaan developed complex structures to fortify this point. Controlling the gate of a city meant controlling the city; submitting at the gate meant an inability to overcome its defenses. In the end, the wicked will submit at the gates of the righteous.

14:20 Another witty proverb (14:11; 12:27), this sentence speaks sardonically of the many friends that money attracts.

14:21 despises … sins: See Lev. 19:13, 17. Jesus identified the command to love others, and not hate them, as second only to loving God (Matt. 22:39).

14:22 One of the most significant pairings of words of piety in the Bible is the phrase translated mercy and truth. Together the words mean "constant faithfulness" or "true loyalty." In the NT, the Greek equivalent of this phrase is translated “grace and truth” (John 1:14) and is used of the Savior Jesus. Those who plot evil know nothing of this characteristic.

14:23 Talking about doing is never the same as doing. Only talking leads to poverty; only in doing is there the profit one seeks.

14:24 This present verse needs to be balanced with some of the more cautionary sentences. One sure thing: folly begets folly, and does so on a quick, sure breeding program.

14:25 We should expect no more from a false witness than deceit (14:5), but we may find that the true witness not only speaks that which is true—he may by his words deliver souls.

14:26, 27 These proverbs interject the central idea of the Book of Proverbs—the fear of the LORD (14:2). The fear of God provides both protection and a fountain of life (13:14; 18:10), an image that recalls the Garden of Eden.

14:28 There is not much to say for a king who has no subjects, except, perhaps, that he is a pretender to a throne. The greater the populace, the more glory to the king.

14:29 The development of a slow fuse is a not a mark of lethargy, but of wisdom. Fools fly off the handle easily and confirm their folly.

14:30 In the same manner in which a sound heart ensures the general health of the whole body, so envy may produce a rottenness in the bones.

14:31 oppresses … honors: The theme of “as you treat people, so you treat God” is central to Scripture (Ex. 22:22–24; Matt. 25:31–46; 1 John 4:20).

14:32 Some of the proverbs describe deliverance from death itself (11:4). The teaching of life after death is not a major teaching in the OT, but neither is it altogether neglected.

14:33 Another witty saying (14:20), this proverb observes that wisdom is not altogether unknown among fools, for she lets herself be known among them from time to time. Yet the true home of wisdom is with the one of an understanding heart. Among such ones wisdom rests. The contrast of an occasional glimpse of wisdom by the fool as against the reposing of wisdom with the understanding person is a delightful expression.

14:34 Righteousness exalts a nation: Although each individual is responsible for his or her actions, the effects extend to the whole community.

14:35 When the servant has done rightly, then the pleasure of the king basks on him. But the king also displays anger and personal animosity against the one who might bring him shame.

15:1 Often it is not so much what we say but the way we say it that prompts such varied responses as acceptance and wrath. For Abigail's gentle words to David when he was angry, see 1 Sam. 25:12–34.

15:2 Another comparison of contrasting uses of speech, this sentence poses the tongue of the wise against the mouth of fools. The one uses knowledge well; the other belches folly.

15:3 That the eyes of the LORD are in every place watching everything chills those who do evil and comforts those who submit to Him (Eccl. 12:14).

15:4 The soft answer of v. 1 is now a soothing tongue, and the hurtful word of v. 1 is now crooked dealing. The former is like a tree of life, taking us back to Eden (3:18; 11:30; 13:12); the other breaks the spirit, recalling the expulsion from the Garden (Gen. 3:23, 24).

15:5 The truly wise person profits from instruction. The term for the prudent in the second part of this proverb means "to be shrewd." Shrewdness can be evil, but here it has the positive sense of "street smarts" (1:4).

15:6 One house is a blessing and the other is ruinous; the reason for this lies in how the house was acquired and how it is being used. The house of the righteous contains great treasure because it is founded on wisdom and a proper response to God. On the other hand, the wicked never gain enough to suit them, and lose what they have because of their deceptive ways.

15:7 People reveal who they are by what they say. The fool cannot help but speak foolishness.

15:8, 9 From time to time the proverbs touch on the subject of worship (16:6). Worship from those who are not contrite or humble is an abomination to God (11:20). From Gen. 4 to John 4 Scripture contrasts good and bad worship (Is. 1:11–15). Verse 9 speaks of yet another abomination to the LORD—the course of life taken by the wicked.

15:10 This proverb promises harsh discipline for any person who forsakes the way of God. That is, discipline comes as a means of correction, not punishment. Only the person who hates correction—the one who stubbornly refuses to listen, time and time again—will die.

15:11 This is a "how much more" proverb (11:31), which impresses on the reader the clarity with which the Lord sees people's hearts. The Hebrew word sheol, translated Hell, in this proverb connotes the fear of the unknown (9:18). When used with the word for Destruction, sheol means

“the mysterious realm of death,” a dark and scary condition. Yet death is no mystery to the Lord. And if the mysterious realm of the dead is known to Him, then surely a person’s heart is transparent to Him. Such arguments from the greater to the lesser appear in both Testaments.

15:12 The scoffer (14:6) is used as a foil or comparison in Proverbs to expose more sharply the character of the wise. Whereas the sluggard is a comic figure in Proverbs, the scoffer is a villain. He delights in scorning the things of God (1:22) and is incapable of responding to discipline (9:7), reproof (9:8), or rebuke (13:1). He cannot find wisdom (14:6) and should be avoided (Ps. 1:1). His basic problem is displayed in his response to correction. He does not learn from it nor does he seek it. The scoffer is adamant in his folly.

15:13 The point of the proverb is a reminder that we are whole persons, not just faces or hearts. What strikes the one will affect the other.

15:14 The person with an understanding heart, another description of the wise, is never satisfied with what he or she knows. The pursuit of wisdom and knowledge are life-long occupations—never fully realized in this lifetime. But fools, not knowing the extent of their ignorance, continue to pursue folly.

15:15 The happy-hearted person of 15:13 returns in this verse—a stark contrast between the perceptions of persons concerning their lots in life. For the cheerful person, life is a continual banquet. For the dour, each day is an affliction of evil.

15:16 Another of the “better than” proverbs (12:9), this one contrasts the net worth of the pauper with the rich in terms of one’s holding or lacking a sense of the fear of Yahweh (14:26, 27). The idle rich may find they are beset with disquietude, while the pious poor may dwell at peace.

15:17 Hatred ruins even the finest feast; love ennobles the simplest fare.

15:18 A wrathful person can stir up strife where there is none; but a person who has a slow fuse—who is slow to anger—soothes contention (v. 1).

15:19 As against the highway of the upright, the path of the sluggard is a thorny hedge, constantly beset with prickly hurts. Because the path is so difficult, the sluggard decides to walk the path on another, easier day. Perhaps the thorns will drop off next Tuesday. Maybe Thursday.

Between Parents and Children

If you come from a home background that left painful memories of childhood, you may find it hard to think kindly toward your parents. Yet Proverbs urges us as children to respect our parents, faulty though they may be. We need not like or approve of everything our parents did (and do), but only a fool despises his parents (Prov. 15:20).

It is important to add that the Bible sees parenting as a partnership between both the father and the mother, in which both are committed to each other and to the child's welfare. That is the ideal, and a child tends to thrive in that kind of home. But whether or not our parents have come even close to fulfilling their biblical responsibilities, they deserve a measure of respect and affirmation.

Proverbs includes a number of principles about how we and our parents ought to relate: • We have life through the union of father and mother (Prov. 4:3; 23:25).

• As children, we have a significant impact on how our parents view their lives and evaluate their significance (10:1; 15:20; 17:25; 23:24).

• How we treat our parents displays our values and attitudes (19:26).

• Disrespect for our parents can have terrible implications for our own life (20:20).

• As our parents grow older, we should give them the gifts of listening and caring (23:22).

• By pursuing wisdom, we not only benefit ourselves but can bring great joy to our parents (23:25; 29:3).

• By pursuing evil and folly, we can be a destructive force in our parents' lives (28:24; 29:15).

• We will suffer greatly if we show no respect for our parents (30:11, 17).

15:20 despises his mother: This proverb is like the fifth commandment: "Honor your father and your mother" (Ex. 20:12; Deut. 5:16). Honoring and listening to parents is a favorite theme of Solomon's proverbs; this collection begins with the same exhortation (10:1).

15:21 The compounding problem of folly is that it feeds upon itself. Where there is folly, there will be delighted fools. Where there is folly, there is also an understanding man who is making tracks in another direction 15:22 The greater the decision, the greater the need for advice. Even wise, capable decision-makers—whether common people or rulers—need counselors (13:10).

15:23 Words are powerful: they can either build up or destroy. Solomon devoted many of his proverbs to the consequences of speech (v. 4; 14:23). Just as foolish words can bring about a person's own destruction (14:3), a wise word can bring joy to all who hear it. The apostle James wrote of the destructive power of words (in James 3:5, 6); the author of Hebrews also exhorted us to encourage one another (Heb. 10:24, 25).

15:24 The fright word hell (Hebrew, sheol, 15:11) is used here as the destination of the fool, but not of the skillful. Whereas the path of folly is on a pronounced slant, descending into the abyss, the path of life points upward to glory and ultimately to God.

15:25 God will bring about justice in the end. To the haughty, God will give a dose of humility. But for the widow, a completely defenseless person in ancient times, God will provide protection. Scripture in many places describes God as a Protector of the defenseless (Deut. 10:18; Pss. 68:5; 146:9; Jer. 49:11).

15:26 Many proverbs focus on what God hates (vv. 8, 9). Evil thoughts, for one, disgust Him. There is no such thing as "private thoughts." We should pray with David that our words and the meditation of our hearts would be acceptable in God's sight (Ps. 19:14).

15:27 The evil of bribes is in a perversion of justice, a distortion that ultimately brings distrust and dishonor to a populace.

15:28 A righteous (wise) person will ponder how best to respond; a wicked (foolish) person will simply bubble out evil. The fool attracts more folly by his behavior, and he is drawn in by foolish companions to wickedness and folly all the more.

15:29 Yahweh withdraws from the wicked, as though from a sense of a bad taste in the mouth or perhaps an unhealthy aura hovering over them. Yet he draws near to others; the prayers of the righteous are always welcome.

15:30 The salvational effects of good attitudes and positive feelings are presented in this verse even more strongly than in 15:16.

15:31, 32 He who disdains instruction despises his own soul: The natural instinct for self-preservation is dangerous when it is time to listen to a necessary rebuke. For the relationship between discipline and wisdom, see 1:7.

15:33 Knowledge alone does not make a person wiser; the fear of the LORD must accompany it. The same is true of honor.

16:1, 2 These verses contrast human limitations with the sovereignty of God. Man can plan, dream, and hope, but the final outcome is from the LORD. Rather than "resign ourselves to fate," we should trust in God. Our loving Lord is in control of our seemingly chaotic situations. Verse 2 elaborates on this theme. In addition to being sovereign, God is the final Judge. All the injustices of this world will be corrected some glorious day.

16:3 The verb commit to is from a word meaning "to roll." The idea is to "roll your cares onto the Lord." Trusting the Lord with our decisions frees us from preoccupation with our problems (3:5, 6).

16:4 This proverb speaks of the creative work of Yahweh in bold, comprehensive fashion. Then the verse encompasses even the wicked as being made for Yahweh's judgmental purpose. As Pharaoh was a foil for his saving work and the vindication of his glory, so the wicked in general are under his utter sovereignty.

16:5 proud in heart: Pride has everything backwards. It takes credit away from the Giver who gives graciously and awards it to the receiver who takes without thanking. That is why God sees it as an abomination, a word that throughout Proverbs refers to God's revulsion (15:26).

16:6 In mercy and truth can also be translated "by genuine piety." Atonement probably alludes to a sacrificial offering, but not apart from a contrite heart (as in Ps. 40:6–8). fear: Respect for God turns a person away from evil (3:7).

16:7 God's pleasure in a person's life may be boundless and may even lead to the benefit of one's enemies. This verse presents the hope of peace with God and man.

16:8, 9 The Book of Proverbs often speaks of wealth as the reward of wisdom and virtue (14:11), but not always. Righteousness is the real treasure.

16:10 This verse begins a section that relates to kings (vv. 10–15). The word divination refers to judicial decisions. Because the nation rested in the king's hands, his first responsibility was to obey God (King Josiah's reform of Israel, 2 Kin. 22; 23). Even the king had to submit to the dictates of justice.

16:11 Honest weights and scales matter to God because God is perfectly true. Falsehood and dishonesty do not merely cheat people, they also offend God.

16:12 A righteous king has as his model the divine Yahweh. A wicked king really has no model in God, and hence no intrinsic right to rule. Ultimately, such proverbs point to the reign of Jesus, as in Is. 9:7.

16:13 Yet another verse in an ideal of kingship (v. 12), this sentence pictures the rule of God from his gracious perspective.

16:14 An all-powerful king may have a consuming wrath that is as formidable as an angel of death to the unhappy offender. But as ferocious as this fury is, it can be appeased by the superior power of wisdom.

16:15 life … his favor: Successfully courting a powerful person's favor is like seeing rain clouds in a dry land. The phrase about the light of the face in this proverb helps us understand Aaron's benediction in Num. 6:24–26.

16:16 One of the "better than" proverbs (16:8), this one contrasts wealth and wisdom in much the same way as was done in 8:10, 11. Lady Wisdom may grant wealth, but she herself is ever better than anything else she might proffer to one who embraces her.

16:17 A highway is a thoroughfare, a metaphor for the way a person lives habitually. An upright person's "highway," or habit, is to depart from evil. He does not compromise; he consistently strives to do good.

16:18 These sentences are unrelenting in their attack on pride. A proud person feels he has no need for God. In fact, Yahweh has no need for the proud.

16:19 the proud: Destructive pride brings down many winners and is contagious.

16:20 The sentence could be read as a comparison: there is a good thing in demonstrating skill in a matter, but there is much more happiness in trusting the Lord. But it may also be taken as complementary: there is blessing in wisdom and there is also blessing in piety, for these are interchangeable ideas. One who is truly wise does trust in Yahweh; one who trusts in Yahweh has shown the finest wisdom. To know wisdom through trust in Yahweh is superior in every way.

16:21 This verse begins a small section of proverbs on the superiority of wisdom (vv. 21–24). Wisdom is never easily gained or quickly achieved; that is why a wise person increases learning.

16:22, 23 Those who possess understanding have access to a fountain of life that constantly renews itself and is available to everyone. The phrase wellspring of life is an image of salvation; water was essential for life in the arid regions of ancient Israel (Ps. 36:8–10; Jer. 2:13). The wise know they are ignorant, so they keep on learning.

16:24 The Hebrew word for honeycomb is also used in Ps. 19:10, 11 with regard to the Word of God. The Israelites saw honey as a healthy food as well as a sweetener. Any comparison to it would connote positive, healthful effects.

16:25 Contrasts of God's way with the way of the wicked figure in the teaching of Jesus as well as the proverbs (Matt. 7:13, 14). This proverb likens the wicked to being on the wrong road. They think they are going the right way, but in the end it leads to death (14:12). Death refers to physical death (1 Cor. 11:29, 30; Rom. 6:23; 8:13; James 1:15; 5:20).

16:26 Hunger is, or ought to be, a powerful motivating force for hard work. In biblical times an able-bodied person who refused to work was not likely to be fed.

16:27–29 These verses all begin in a similar way, describing three different types of wicked people. The word ungodly, or "scoundrel," means "a man of Belial"; this person is a muckraker who uses bad information for evil purposes; he destroys people on purpose. The perverse person starts fights between friends. The violent man uses his power of persuasion to recruit others to join in his attacks.

16:30 Here is one who is so bent on evil actions that one can watch even his facial expressions. He squints his eyes as he considers perversity (same term in v. 28), and he purses his lips as he contemplates wickedness.

16:31 Old age becomes a crown of glory to those who walk the way of righteousness—one of the rewards of pursuing wisdom.

16:32 One of the most favored persons in the ancient Middle East was the military hero. Yet this proverb suggests that one who is slow to anger and who rules his speech is a greater hero than a returning warrior. Controlling one's rage is more impressive than completing a daring exploit (14:29).

16:33 The use of lots in ancient Israel (v. 10) could easily be confused with luck. But when a lot was cast as a means of determining God's will, the people knew it did not fall indiscriminately. God exercises sovereignty over human affairs (16:4).

17:1 The expression a dry morsel means “very little,” especially in comparison to feasting. But the feasting in this verse is tainted by contention. Feasting could also be part of a sacrifice to God, but even such a feast could be ruined by angry disputes between believers.

17:2 Reversals of fortune could happen if the wise servant was sufficiently skillful and the son and his brothers were undeserving. Much of the Book of Genesis describes the rise of an unexpected younger son over his older brother (Gen. 25:23–34).

17:3 The refining of silver and gold is an exacting process, involving skill and considerable heat and stress. The refining work of God on His people often requires stress too.

17:4 This proverb presents the evildoer and the liar as a parody of the wise. As the righteous person listens with care to the instruction of a teacher, so the wicked person listens with care to the ruinous speech of the unrighteous.

17:5 Unprincipled humor at the expense of the unfortunate is an enticement to the wrath of God (14:31). Yahweh will not allow such a person to go unpunished, for in some mysterious way, when a person ridicules the poor he reviles his Maker.

17:6 Only a grandmother or grandfather can appreciate this verse fully. Yet all of us can see its central point: grandparents adore their grandchildren, and children adore their parents. It is this strong bond of family ties that keeps generations together.

17:7 It is a contradiction in terms for a fool to speak well or for a prince to be a liar. It is not becoming for such inappropriateness to exist.

17:8 The value of a gift to the receiver may be incalculable. Value is more than the cost of an item; value is perceived. One who is gifted by an extraordinary gift (Heb., sahad, “gift,” “bribe”) may become successful because of the new sense of worth he has received in this gift. An act of generosity may change a person’s life around. Then again, a gift to the ungrateful may not even be noted.

17:9, 10 The covering of transgression in this sentence is not in the context of sin and salvation vis-a-vis one’s relationship to Yahweh. The intention of this verse is to speak of the interrelations of friends, and the problems that may destroy that friendship. Faults observed and noted may be corrected by the offending party, but the offense produced in the revelation of the fault may break the friendship. Similarly, the breaking of confidences may break confidants apart.

17:11 The proper object for the Hebrew verb "to seek" is the person of God. But the obstinate seeks … rebellion. All the while he is on his disastrous course of action, he finds another is seeking him, a cruel messenger (perhaps the messenger of death).

17:12 Nothing in the woods matches the rage of a mother bear who has been separated from her cubs; yet there is nothing in life more dangerous than the fool in the midst of his folly.

17:13 A perpetual entertainment of evil is granted to one who responds to goodness and kindness with evil.

17:14 A quarrel is like spilled water. It cannot be stemmed once it is released. The wise thing, then, is to dam up strife before it is too late.

17:15 abomination to the LORD (16:5): Since God is a God of justice, He detests those who pervert justice—both those who declare the innocent guilty and those who declare the guilty innocent.

17:16 As in the case of great speech in a fool, so wealth in his hand is a moral outrage. The fool should not be able to purchase what he is incapable to appreciate.

17:17 This proverb lauds faithfulness. Unlike fickle friends (14:20), a true friend is constant, and a real brother helps in times of stress.

17:18 Making a pledge for another person is not wrong, but this proverb does call for caution in such transactions (11:15). The one making the loan may lose his own independence.

17:19 One may love rebellion and exaltation only to find that rebellion leads to more trouble, and that any boasting of strength will be tested. As in the Old West in America, so in ancient and modern times, there is always a faster shooter who is on his way to town.

17:20 From perversion in heart and mind comes perversion in expression. These inure each other so that the person no longer even knows to look for good.

17:21 The foolish child is one of the hardest realities to face (10:1). There is no heartache so grievous as the pain of realizing that one's child is a fool, obdurate to God, and useless in life.

17:22 The role of attitude and feelings in terms of physical health and well-being is only recently being given consideration by standard medical practitioners in the West. This proverb asserts that there is a relationship between attitude and health.

17:23 Like false weights (16:11), skewed justice destroys a culture. A bribe is literally a "gift." In v. 8, the same Hebrew word is translated positively as present, but in this verse the meaning is negative because the purpose of the gift is to pervert justice.

17:24 Wisdom produces a satisfied life. The fool continues searching without finding any satisfaction.

17:25 As in 17:21 (10:1), this sentence amplifies the vexing nature of a foolish child to loving, believing parents. Both the father and the mother suffer. If they suffer apart (and not together), it is likely they will not only lose their wayward daughter or son, but each other as well.

17:26 Only a perverse population would punish the righteous. Like several other proverbs, this one describes what is to be recognized as an outrage.

17:27 Restraint in speech is a mark of wisdom. This cuts against the expectation we have. We usually look for the wise person to speak, not for him or her to listen.

17:28 A complement to v. 27, this sentence speaks of the value of restraint in speech, even in the case of the fool! When a foolish person restrains his or her lips, there may be folks who will regard this person as wise. That view will dissipate quickly when the fool begins to speak. But the illusion will have a chance as long as the fool holds back.

18:1 This proverb condemns any person who isolates himself from the community for selfish reasons. Such a recluse is so intolerant of anyone who disagrees with him that he finds fault with all wise judgment.

Cheap Talk

Some people have a comment to make on virtually every subject. They never say, “I don’t know,” or just listen in order to learn something. They just spout off their uninformed opinions to any willing listener. Proverbs calls such persons fools (Prov. 18:2).

Talk is cheap partly because it is easily available. The Book of Proverbs offers some principles to help us evaluate the worth of our words: • Sometimes the wisest course is to keep quiet. We need to weigh our thoughts and words carefully if we intend to be helpful (11:12; 17:27, 28).

• The one thing we never want to talk about is a confidence with which we have been entrusted (11:13).

• If we know how to use words, we can accomplish noble ends—for example, defusing a heated situation (15:1, 2).

• We need to watch what we say. Our mouth can get us in deep trouble (18:6–7).

• If we give our opinion on a matter before hearing the facts, we will tend to bring shame on ourselves (18:13).

• Talk is cheap, but easy talk can be expensive. Saying the wrong thing at the wrong time can lead to unfortunate consequences (18:21).

18:2 A compulsive talker never listens, only pausing to plan what he will say next. Every speech confirms what a fool he is.

18:3 The verse is a warning against trifling with evil. A person simply does not know what he may be getting involved with when he snuggles up to wickedness.

18:4 wellspring of wisdom: This image is similar to the phrase “a fountain of life” (10:11; 13:14; 14:27; 16:22).

18:5 show partiality: Distortion of justice is all too common; many proverbs condemn it (17:23).

18:6 A mark of the fool is his contentious personality. A battler may be a hero, a protector of persons. But the fool is merely a battler, constantly taunting others for a fight. How he does in the fight is any fool’s guess.

18:7 Well, we needn’t guess; his lips earn him the destruction for which they have called (14:3).

18:8 The words of a talebearer (16:28) are like delicious sweets. Although they are fun to eat, they ruin the person's health. Gossip is fun to listen to, but the stories damage the listener's inmost body, or soul.

18:9 The word slothful means a person who is "known to be slack." It refers to a lazy person (15:19). Destroyer means "lord of destruction."

18:10, 11 The phrase name of the LORD (v. 10) is a way of speaking of God's person. The righteous turn to God for security. Rich people, by contrast, tend to trust in their wealth (v. 11; Luke 12:13–21). safe: God's protection is a prominent theme in Scripture (Ps. 91:1–4).

18:12 The Hebrew word for haughty, ordinarily negative, can also be used positively to mean courage and daring (2 Chr. 17:6). The path to honor, which the proud so covet, is humility.

18:13 Communication skills are not just good interpersonal relations; they are actually moral issues of wisdom and folly. Responding before listening is stupid. It is also disgraceful.

18:14 This proverb affirms the value of coping skills. Sickness can be overcome, but there is no medicine for a broken spirit (15:13; 17:22; Is. 66:2).

18:15 The quest for knowledge is insatiable for the wise. Fools scarcely bother. The wise keep learning; the fool hardly begins.

18:16 There is power in a gift in the opening of a door that is invaluable. Once a person has entered the door, the rest is up to that person. But the door, at least, is open.

18:17 When one hears a story from one person, it seems credible. Then when a cross-examiner comes, the story seems to be significantly different. Everyone tends to present his best case, but not all will be able to withstand questions from the cross-examiner.

18:18 Whenever both sides agree on the method of settling a dispute, that method is a means to peace. The casting of lots was a biblical pattern for assistance in decision-making (16:33). Behind the lots was the sovereign power of God.

18:19 Here is another verse in which the term contentions is used (18:18), but here in the positive aspects of character that quarrels might produce. The strength of the fortifications of a city is less than the offenses taken by a wounded brother.

18:20, 21 stomach … mouth: Inner satisfaction comes from true and good speech. Death and life: The words people say wield great power

(James 3:2).

18:22 favor: Problems in marriage arise from breakdowns in communication or mutual respect, not from some flaw in marriage itself (12:4).

18:23 The poor man petitions out of need and fear, the rich sneers out of a misguided sense of importance. In both there is error. But the error of the poor person is from need; that of the rich is from arrogance.

18:24 This is a difficult verse to translate because of confusion over an ambiguous Hebrew word translated here as be friendly. This translation takes it to mean "to make oneself pleasing" as in 1 Sam. 29:4. To have friends one must be friendly. But the word could also mean "to beat each other up" as in Is. 24:19. Then the verse could be translated, "Sometimes even friends destroy each other, but there is a Friend who loves more faithfully than a brother."

19:1 This proverb, one of the “better than” proverbs (17:1, 10), presents a poor person in a more favorable light than a rich person (28:6). In this case, the poor person’s life is marked by integrity, whereas the successful person has gained his wealth through cheating and deception. The Book of Proverbs does not place a premium on health and wealth. It gives that honor to integrity (3:1–12) 19:2 A number of the proverbs use the phrase not good. This one says that there is no good in a person who is without knowledge; all there is in such a one are feet rushing to destruction. The feet of the fool are always ready to run to ruin (21:5).

19:3 How many times has a person wandered off in self-destructive folly, only to cry out to Yahweh for help to pull him out of his trouble? Time after time God may reach down in grace to extract a fool from his folly. But there is no guarantee that he will always do so.

19:4 This proverb speaks of the effects of wealth and poverty on friendship. It does not describe how friends ought to behave, but how many friends actually do. Like a faithful spouse, a faithful friend is priceless (14:20).

19:5 The need for truth is deeply important to an ordered society. Abuse of truth may not be tolerated if a people is to survive.

19:6 The use of a gift as an entree to gain a hearing is a time-worn grace, built upon a basic human pattern of response. It is clear that both the evil and the good person may use gifts to make their approach to another (17:8; 18:16). The presentation of a gift is not evil in itself, but the one making the presentation may well be evil.

19:7 The behavior of brothers and friends who abandon a friend because of poverty should be contrasted with the true friend in such texts as 17:17; 18:24.

19:8 Ultimately, to find good means to find the Lord in His Word (16:20).

19:9 A slight variation on 19:5, this verse is yet another jab at the evils of bearing a false witness, a breach of one of the Ten Words (Ex. 20:16; Deut. 5:20), and hence a breaking of faith with God and a breach of trust with God’s people.

19:10 The phrase is not fitting might also be rendered “is not a pretty sight” (17:7). For the wrong people to rule is an outrage.

19:11 discretion: Patience and restraint are virtues of wisdom (16:32); rashness and violent outbursts of rage are not.

19:12 The descriptions of a lion's roar and dew on the grass are especially fitting when a monarch has all power. His rage may be violent and unpredictable, his pleasure gracious and restorative. A good king will display rage and spread favor for the right reasons.

19:13, 14 Continual dripping speaks of constant dissension within a family. A prudent wife is a woman who demonstrates wisdom or skill. Finding the right spouse is a blessing from God (18:22).

19:15 The proverbs have no kind words for laziness, the habit of the sluggard (6:6, 9). The proverbs call for mercy and compassion on the poor and the weak, but only contempt for the lazy (v. 17; 10:4, 5).

19:16 Wisdom and folly are life-and-death issues, as is amply demonstrated in the teaching of Prov. 1—9 (e.g., 1:32, 33). Hence, as in 19:8, the pursuit of wisdom is ultimately an act of genuine self-love; the pursuit of folly is an embrace of death.

19:17 Charity to the poor and needy is perceived in this verse as a lending to God. If one is to lend to anyone, then lend to Him. He will repay. Yahweh's concern for the poor is well-attested in Scripture (e.g., Deut. 10:18, 19).

Child Discipline

A popular belief today is that people are basically good. An extension of this belief is that children come into the world as morally pure and pristine creatures who are then "socialized" into harmful, hurtful patterns by parents and society.

The Book of Proverbs, along with the rest of the Bible, presents a very different picture of children and childrearing. Although children are seen as a blessing, they tend toward evil if left to their own nature (Prov. 22:15). For that reason, parents are urged to discipline their youngsters. Neglecting to do so amounts to condemning a child to death (19:18).

Opinions vary as to the best way to discipline children. But disagreements about means must never lose sight of what Proverbs says are the ends involved—to bring a child into adulthood with strong character and the ability to make wise choices (29:15). Whatever the term "rod" means to you as a parent, Proverbs encourages you to use discipline in raising your children (23:13).

Several principles of discipline are found in Proverbs: • A child needs far more than discipline. In fact, discipline is only one part of a much broader home environment required to set a child on the path toward wisdom, self-appreciation, understanding, and humility (2:1–22; 4:3–9; 15:31–33).

• Punishment for wrongdoing is not only corrective but preventive in that it can steer a young person away from more powerful forms of evil and ultimate destruction (5:12–14; 23:14).

• Correction demonstrates love, whereas lack of it is a form of hate (13:24).

• Discipline is intended to purge children of the inherent "foolishness" that the Bible says they have (22:15).

19:18 on his destruction: Refusal to discipline dooms a child's future (13:24).

19:19 Unbridled rage is an act of folly, just as is intemperate discipline. Great rage has a price to pay. Nothing really changes when the hot-tempered person is delivered from his troubles. He will need to be delivered again.

19:20 Wisdom leads to the glorious future; it is a doorway to eternity. In the NT the idea that corresponds to the quest for wisdom in texts such as this is the goal of Christlikeness, to be conformed to His image. Ultimately, to be wise (in the biblical sense) is to be like Christ.

19:21 A wise person commits his or her plans to the Lord (16:3). A person whose plans oppose the Lord (as in Ps. 2:1–3) may actually become God's enemy. But the person whose ways are from God will certainly succeed (16:1, 9).

19:22 The poor person who has integrity has more honor than the successful person who has achieved his station or rank by deception (v. 1). Kindness may also mean "beauty." Faithfulness is beautiful, whereas deception is a disfigurement of character (3:14; 31:18).

“fear”

(Heb. yirah) (9:10, 16:6; 19:23) Strong’s #3374: This Hebrew word signifies awe in regarding what is unknown or potentially dangerous. Sometimes it refers to fear or terror inspired by danger or one’s enemies (Ps. 56:4). More often, it means “reverence,” particularly for God (19:23). The use of this word does not imply that one needs to be afraid of God, but it does demand the appropriate recognition and respect for God’s fearsome qualities, such as His righteous wrath (Ps 5:4–7). The fear of God—that is, the proper respect of God—compels us to abandon our evil ways (16:6) and teaches us wisdom (9:10). Perhaps somewhat ironically, fear of God leads to confidence in this life, for if we have submitted to the Almighty we do not have to fear any other power in this world. No one can harm us because the Almighty is our Protector (14:26, 27; Heb. 13:6)

19:23 This proverb emphasizes the lifelong nature of genuine piety and the abundant rewards that it gives. The fear of the LORD is contrasted with all other pleasures (15:16, 33), because it alone keeps the believer innocent and provides lifelong satisfaction.

19:24 Here is one who is too lazy to keep bringing his hand to his mouth with the food he is eating! So there he slumps, head in the dish, hand at his side (26:15).

19:25 The simple person, the one who has yet to set his or her course in life, can learn by watching the scoffer suffer. The scoffer himself may not learn from his punishment, but anyone who is ready to learn surely can.

19:26, 27 The desire for a good son—or daughter—is the subject of several proverbs (10:1). A child who is abusive to his parents shames them and violates God’s command (20:20; Ex. 20:12; Deut. 5:16). The juxtaposing of this proverb addressed to my son for the first time since chs. 1—9 with that of the abusive son in v. 26 is deliberate. As an abusive son is shameful, so an obedient son is faithful and successful.

19:28 Here is a proverb that ties together the false witness (19:5) and the wicked (the “man of Belial,” 16:27). Such a one mocks (the verb is the same root as the term for the scoffer) at justice, and prates abroad all manner of iniquity.

19:29 Instead of necessarily prescribing physical beatings, this verse may describe the lot of the very stubborn. They bring punishment upon themselves. The verse may be read metaphorically as well as in a plain-literal sense. There is certainly no mandate here for thrashing children unmercifully.

20:1 This chapter begins with a warning against the abuse of wine, or excessive drinking (see this theme more extensively in 23:29–35). A wise person takes the danger seriously. There is no wisdom in drunkenness, only brawling and confusion.

20:2 Apparently this verse of warning against the furious wrath of a king is not unlike the warning against the unpredictable nature of wine when abused (20:1). As wine, so the king; both may be agents for good, yet each can be a destroyer.

20:3 One who is a peacemaker is under the blessing of God (Matt. 5:9). A needlessly contentious person is but a fool. The man of peace has glory; the fool, only shame. Better to avoid the quarrel altogether (17:14).

20:4 Because the lazy man (19:24) does not plow his field on time, he has nothing to harvest (10:5).

20:5 draw it out: The wise of ancient Israel knew something that modern counselors rediscover in their training and experience, that motivation for behavior is complex. A gifted counselor is able to draw out from a person genuine feelings and motivations, just as someone draws water from a deep well.

20:6 The idea here is self-worth as against true worth, an inflated self-opinion as against the true nature of things. We each tend to present the best; but within we may know the worst.

20:7 The freedom and pleasure of integrity are magnified in this sentence (19:8). The idea is one of legacy. The righteous not only live well themselves; they also leave a happy legacy to their children. Conversely, the wicked (the foolish) leave a legacy of despair. A family's faith will engender family traits.

20:8 A good king uses his throne for justice. An evil or a weak king may be short-sighted when it comes to true justice.

20:9 Who can say: This proverb is a rhetorical question. Everyone sins, a theme that Paul addresses at length in Rom. 3:10–23. Anyone who claims never to sin is a liar (1 John 1:8, 9). But those who confess their sin obtain forgiveness (Rom. 4:7).

20:10 The repeated emphasis on crooked weights and diverse measures (11:1) reminds us that cheating is a chronic problem.

20:11 by his deeds: A pattern established early in life may continue to mark a person for his or her lifetime. Even at a very early age, a person's moral character may be revealed.

20:12 This proverb speaks of what the LORD has made. We can use both our ears and our eyes to learn about God's Law (Pss. 40:6; 119:18). They are physical means to getting the guidance we need. Contrast this verse with Moses' complaint of a stammering tongue and God's response (Ex. 4:10, 11).

20:13 Sleep is a gift from God that restores a person's energy and vitality. Yet sleep can also be a matter of excess and laziness. Hard work is necessary to make a living; laziness leads only to poverty (6:6, 9).

20:14 A "sharp buyer" complains how shoddy something is when he makes the purchase, then brags all the way home at what a deal he had made. There is not a moral here, but an observation. There is a lesson here … for the seller!

20:15 This verse is not a comment on the morality of wealth, but a statement about the comparative value of wisdom and money. Wisdom is simply worth more. Thus, being poor and wise is more precious than being rich and foolish (19:1).

20:16 It is foolish to lend to a stranger without securing a pledge, or promise, of repayment (11:15). The Israelites were not allowed to exact such pledges from other Israelites (Ex. 22:25–27).

20:17 afterward: The Scriptures do not say that there is no pleasure in sinning, only that the reward doesn't last (9:17, 18).

20:18 This proverb is a maxim that moves from the lesser to the greater (15:11). We should always think before we act, and serious matters like war require a maximum of forethought.

20:19 It is a form of slander to reveal confidential information. Such a person is a silly chatterer (11:13; 13:3). Loose lips not only sink ships; they ruin friendships as well!

20:20 This proverb is about breaking the fifth commandment, "honor your father and your mother" (Ex. 20:12; Deut. 5:16). The term whoever curses is based on a word that means "to treat lightly, to regard as insignificant." The statement His lamp will be put out in deep darkness is a symbol of eternal damnation.

20:21 at the beginning: Sometimes what seems to be sudden luck turns out to be a dismal turn of fortune. What seems too good to be true often is.

20:22 Because of our limited understanding and imperfection, we are not qualified to recompense evil. Instead we must commit our cause to God, whose vengeance is certain and perfectly just. God says "Vengeance is mine; I will repay" (Matt. 5:38, 39; Rom. 12:17, 19; 1 Thess. 5:15; 1 Pet. 3:9).

20:24 Even a man with great strength does not fully control his steps, his life; his very breath is a gift from God. Since life itself is God's gift, only a fool assumes he knows its full meaning.

20:25 Several proverbs warn against making rash promises about holy things, then withdrawing the promises later (Eccl. 5:1–7). It is better never to vow than to vow and then change one's mind.

20:26 This royal proverb (v. 8) presents discipline as a merciful act. To punish wickedness is entirely appropriate. When the wicked are sifted out and punished with the severity that their crimes demand, all of society benefits. Verse 28 provides the balance to this principle. Ideally, the king in Israel mirrored God's character.

20:27 Here is an association of one's conscience with an activity of God.

20:28 The ideal of the king in Israel was to mirror the character of the rule of God. Ultimately, this ideal of rule would be found in the coming Messiah-King (Is. 9:6, 7).

20:29 Each stage of life has its own advantages. The young have their youth and vigor; the aged have their wisdom (16:31).

20:30 Suffering cleanses. No one wants to be hurt, but God can bring good out of any evil and make us better through hardship.

21:1 A person can look at a river and think that it is following a random pattern, but the water is following the direction of God's hand. So is the king. This world's apparent chaos is God's work.

21:2 in his own eyes: A person's own defense of his life, manner, or way may convince himself, but the final evaluation belongs to God (17:3).

21:3 The proverbs occasionally touch on the subject of worship (15:8; 16:6). This proverb affirms, as do Ps. 40:6–8; Mic. 6:8, and numerous other passages in the Bible, that righteous living is more important than sacrifice (1 Sam. 15:22).

21:4 haughty … proud: See 16:18. The second unit of the verse is difficult to translate. Some versions render the problematic Hebrew word for plowing as lamp.

21:5 Planning typically leads to plenty, and haste to poverty (20:21). It is not wrong to plan, but it is wrong to plan what the Lord has expressly forbidden (16:1).

21:6, 7 Some prosperity is good and some is bad. The difference lies in how one gets it. A lying tongue has a total return of zero.

21:8 The way: This antithetical proverb takes us back to the very beginning of the study of wisdom, the contrast between the righteous and the wicked (chs. 1—9; Ps. 1).

21:9 Ancient Israelite roofs were flat and could be used as a deck or terrace. On occasion people would build a temporary shelter on a part of the roof. Here, the harried husband finds he prefers to live on the housetop rather than below with the nagging words of his wife.

21:10 Here is a person whose passion is evil; hence, he has no compassion for anyone. Wicked persons typically refuse to think of anyone but themselves.

21:11 The fool in this text is the worst sort, the scoffer (19:25); a person who is simple has enough sense to learn from seeing the scoffer punished. The wise always learn, the simple sometimes learn, but the scoffer is a lost cause.

21:12 Here is a verse that is quite difficult to translate. Some versions understand the word "the righteous" to refer to a righteous man or woman who learns from the fate of the wicked. Others understand the term "the Righteous" to refer to God who determines the fate of the wicked. It is likely that the verse does speak of God as the Righteous One, and the unusual expression in the second member describes his judgment as a twisting of the wicked, perhaps a wringing out of the wicked as one might wring out onelaundry.

21:13 cry himself: A person who is indifferent to people in need will find no one helping him when he calls out for help.

21:14 Proverbs 18:16 and 19:6 anticipate the ideas of this verse on the use of gifts to make way for a person, particularly a person of lower station desiring to be received by one of higher station. Gifts speak! And gifts given secretly speak pleasantly against all wrath, and soothe feelings.

21:15 Justice is not a heavy obligation that weighs a person down. For the righteous, promoting justice is a joy. For the wicked there is no joy in justice, nor will there be joy in their final end (10:29).

21:16 The assembly of the dead: The term dead is a frightful one, meaning "shades" (9:18). Death in these verses may speak of physical death rather than spiritual death (as is the case in James 1).

21:17 This verse is not a blanket indictment of wine or oil, any more than it is a charge against laughter. Excess is the issue that condemns the wicked; balance is the goal that animates the wise.

21:18 This difficult verse speaks in terms of final judgment. Ultimately, the righteous person will prevail and the wicked will not prevail. Finally, right will out.

21:19 This verse may have its other side: What a privilege to live at peace with a loving spouse (husband or wife!). See again the positive presentation of 19:14. To single out verses on the nagging wife is to bring a blanket disrepute to women that these verses cannot be said to sustain.

21:20 This proverb contrasts the prosperity of the wise with the poverty of the fool (20:15). The key lies in the way they treat their possessions. Fools abuse or neglect their own property.

21:21 life, righteousness and honor: It is possible that these three ideas go together to mean "a more abundant life." The pursuit of righteousness is its own reward. But added rewards are found in fullness of life, achieving righteousness, and receiving honor. All these things are gifts from the Lord (15:9).

21:22 Wisdom is a more potent force than brute strength, more formidable than a fortress. Therefore, pursue wisdom rather than mere bodybuilding.

21:23 This proverb has a pun on the word "to keep." If a person guards or "keeps" his mouth, he will keep or preserve his soul. The converse of this is seen in the many troubles a person brings on himself by careless speech.

21:24 This proverb applies four different Hebrew words for arrogance to the scoffer (v. 11). The first two words, proud and haughty, mean "profoundly arrogant" (v. 4). The second two, arrogant and pride, mean "boundless arrogance."

21:25 The longing of the lazy man kills him; he is devoured by his own passions because he will not expend the energy to fulfill them. Verse 26 describes further the insatiable greed of the lazy person by contrasting it with the generosity of the righteous.

21:26 This proverb may be paired with v. 25 as a further description of the insatiable lust of the lazy person. Conversely, the righteous is unceasing in his generosity. The lazy waits, and the righteous gives; the lazy has not, and the righteous has much.

21:27 When a wicked person brings a sacrifice, with no intention of changing from his wickedness, this is an abomination (Hebrew, toeba). The abomination is in the eyes of Yahweh (as in 20:10), even though He is not mentioned in the sentence. But worse than bringing a sacrifice with wicked heart is to bring the sacrifice with a wicked intent.

21:28 A large number of proverbs focus on the false witness (19:28). The problem with a false witness is that his lies pervert justice for others. Even if he lies only once, the lie may be circulated by others.

21:29 There is a nice pun in the interplay between the words meaning "a fixed face" and "a fixed way." A wicked man is concerned with facial expression; an upright man is concerned with the course of his life (11:5).

21:30 Usually the proverbs use the word wisdom positively. But in this verse the word is paired with conjurers' tricks. These tricks have no power over God, as Balaam the pagan prophet discovered in his encounter with the Lord on the plains of Moab (Num. 22—24). True wisdom can be found only in God.

21:31 A soldier can do all within his ability to prepare for battle (20:18), but in the end no preparation can override God's power. Victory is in God's hands.

22:1 This proverb points out that a reputation has more value than possessions or wealth. A name cannot be replaced easily, not even with lots of money.

22:2 This sentence eloquently repeats the theme of riches (v. 1): God makes both the rich and the poor. This means that those who favor the rich over the poor (James 2). have not only missed the point of creation, they have insulted the Creator (14:31) 22:3 The term prudent means "shrewd" (a related word is in 1:4). There is no wisdom in being reckless.

22:4 The route to the good life—riches and honor and life (a similar triad is found in 21:21)—is humility (Mic. 6:8) and the fear of God.

22:5, 6 It is prudent to avoid the hooks and snares that line the path of life. A fool is the person who needlessly walks in threatening places, not knowing or caring what a dangerous position he is in.

Train Up a Child

Doubtless 22:6 is one of the most often cited verses of the proverbs of Israel. There are three issues on which debates continue in its interpretation: (1) the meaning of the verb "to train," (2) the intention of the phrase "in the way he should go," and (3) the meaning of the verb "he will not depart" in the second half of the verse.

First, the word "to train" (Heb., hanak) is a term related to the familiar festival name, "Hanukkah," from the Hebrew for "dedication." The word hanak relates to a setting aside for special use, a dedication of a child to the Lord or to the path of God in his or her life. It includes the stimulation of proper responses (perhaps even the creating of a taste for something) and the (initial) guidance on right paths. This is the principal parental task, to receive children as a charge from the Lord, who are then to be dedicated to the way of God in their lives. In this manner, the verse presents the educational principle of readiness, as Paul does in 1 Cor. 3:1–3 (Heb. 5:12).

Second, the phrase "his way" in this proverb is said by some Bible teachers to refer to the natural path of the child, his gifting and interests. The phrase "in accordance with his way" is paraphrased by these teachers as "let him follow his natural bent."There is a great deal of good parental advice in this common view, but it may not be convincing exegesis. The phrase "the path" (or "the way") in the proverbs refers to correct morality in the eyes of Yahweh (15:10). Without further definition, one is hard pressed to say that the phrase "his way" refers to the natural bent of the child. The way of the proverbs is God's way. Likely, the way commended to the child is the way of God and His word.

Another tack taken by some is to suggest that the way of the child is his natural bent to depravity. We may paraphrase: Let a child grow according to his own way, and when he is old, he will be confirmed in wantonness. In this reading the verse is quite negative in tone. This approach can be justified on the basis of "his way," but not with due attention to the verb hanak.

Third, and most significant, the force of the verb "will not depart" is questioned. Many people come to the proverbs without any real sense of the genre of Scripture they are reading. These have absolutized the meaning of this verse, presenting it as some type of promise from the mouth of God. The idea is paraphrased: When the parent has done his or her job correctly, then there is a binding promise of God to spare that parent's child for eternity.

The problem, of course, is that there is no such guarantee in Scripture—in this verse or in any other. These verses are principles, not promises. A godly parent has no guarantee from God for faithful children. Each generation is responsible for its own relationship to God. To be brief: this verse is a proverb; not a promise. The verb in this proverb is imperfect (in the present sense). This verb form means that time after time one will observe the process and be aware of it.

The point of 22:6, then, is to present the task of parenting in a divine balance. The parents do their part and then God does His part. There is no magic; there are no guarantees. But there is at least a sense of participation, of excitement and fulfillment.

22:7 When a person who is poor finds himself or herself indebted to the rich, that poor person is now in a position of being under the rule and dominion of the wealthy person. If the wealthy person is benevolent, then one may escape with little danger. If the wealthy person is a sadist, then the borrower may be reduced to pecuniary slavery.

22:8 The idea of just retribution is significant (21:7). Jesus' teaching on justice reflects the idea in this verse. A person who lives by violence is likely to die violently; a person who lives wickedly should not be surprised if he falls victim to crime (Matt. 26:52).

22:9 The words expressing the idea of generosity in this verse are "a good eye." A good eye observes the needs of others first. A bad eye sees only its own self-interest.

22:10 The scoffer (21:24) should be expelled from the community because his influence is harmful to everyone. The wise know that the scoffer is not a laughing matter, because he is laughing at holy things, at God Himself.

22:11 A person who is marked by purity of speech and heart becomes the confidant of a good king. Compare this proverb with Ps. 15, which describes a person who wants to become a friend of the Lord.

22:12 The eyes of the LORD (15:3; 21:2) are the final arbiters of knowledge and justice. The eyes of human beings are simply not trustworthy. When the king takes his position seriously, he also makes decisions that are proper and upright (20:8).

22:13 The proverbs about lazy people (19:15) provide comic relief by poking fun at how the lazy invent all sorts of excuses for avoiding work and risk. They will do anything to avoid doing anything.

22:14 This proverb takes us back to the immoral woman, or the "strange woman" (2:16). Her mouth is an open pit, destruction to anyone who falls there (9:18).

22:15 The idea here is to encourage a reluctant parent to discipline a foolish child. Folly is like a monster with its grip on the heart. It needs to be expelled.

22:16 The last of the proverbs of Solomon in this collection deals with social justice. Ultimately, all human affairs are in God's hands, even though at times the wicked prosper. God made both the poor and the rich (v. 2) and He will justly determine their destinies (24:12).

22:17—24:22 The phrase the words of the wise marks a new section of the Book of Proverbs. The content changes at v. 17. Three elements distinguish this section: (1) the change from one-verse units to multiple-verse units, (2) section headings that are embedded in the text, and (3) the affinity of this section with ancient Egyptian wisdom texts, particularly the Instruction of Amen-em-opet.

22:17–21 Incline your ear: These introductory words call the reader to pay attention and to prepare to learn about and worship God. The advice emphasizes strongly that a person's trust must be in the LORD.

22:22, 23 Most violations of justice target poor and afflicted people because they are weak and defenseless. But anyone who does this makes an enemy of God, who will plead their cause.

22:24, 25 friendship with an angry man: Whereas the words of vv. 22, 23 are based on Hebrew faith, these ideas are derived from observation of human behavior and interaction. The Book of Proverbs includes both types of insight: revelation of truth about God, and observation of human experience (1 Cor. 15:33).

22:26, 27 If you have nothing: Should anyone give surety for more than he might be able to cover?

22:28 The ancient Israelites regarded respect for the posted landmark as more than a question of private property. They saw it as a basic part of civil life. People must feel a certain sense of public trust and fairness for society to function.

22:29 Excellent work still brings rewards from people and the approval of God. See also Eph. 6:5–8.

23:1–3 A big part of the training of the courtier would be in proper manners at state dinners and formal occasions. The comment on a knife to the throat is prompted by two concerns: (1) rude behavior was to be avoided at all costs, and (2) too many royal dainties would likely make one ill.

23:4, 5 These verses call for moderation in work. Do not overwork to be rich: Although the proverbs discourage laziness (22:13), they also discourage any overworking whose purpose is greater wealth.

23:6–9 bread of a miser: No real fellowship is developed by dining with a person who does mental calculations about what you are costing him while you eat his food.

23:10, 11 their Redeemer is mighty: The tendency of evil people in all ages is to take advantage of the helpless. But the destroyer of persons needs to know that the widow and the orphan have a Redeemer, a protector of family rights—His name is the living God.

23:12 The Hebrew word for instruction can also be translated "discipline."

23:13–16 he will not die … beat him: This language was designed to motivate overly permissive parents, who were afraid of damaging young children with any kind of discipline, or of making rules and enforcing them. There is no call here for abuse. Loving discipline does not destroy rebellious children; it does them a big favor.

23:17, 18 The first proverb here sharply contrasts the vain envy of sinners with the fear of the LORD, the expression of piety that the proverbs repeatedly encourage (1:7). The second gives the perspective that everyone needs: present success—or lack of it—is not the final outcome. There will be a future state fundamentally different from this world. The word hereafter can also be rendered "glorious future" (Num. 23:10).

23:19–23 The drunkard and the glutton have no self-control, and this fact plagues them. Hebrew culture gave a prominent place to eating and drinking, but it had little tolerance for drunkenness and gluttony.

23:24, 25 the father of the righteous: Joy comes to parents who see their children succeed. But when those parents have faith in the Lord, the greatest joy comes from seeing their children be faithful to Him.

23:26–28 The wise men of Israel never ceased warning against the prostitute and seductress (7:24–27). The corruption of character involved in debauchery was considered nearly fatal.

23:29–35 Who has woe: Along with Isaiah's celebrated description of debauchery (Is. 19:11–15), this section is one of the sharpest attacks on drunkenness in the Bible (vv. 19–21; 20:1). The satire is razor sharp and the imagery vivid.

24:1, 2 Do not be envious of evil men: Whereas 23:17, 18 tells about the future to discourage envy of the wicked, this set of verses simply points out how unworthy the wicked are of any admiration at all.

24:3–11 These verses speak with a certain confidence and understanding of life beyond the grave (23:17, 18). This verse is a prayer to God as death approaches.

24:12 according to his deeds: Jesus' words about eternal rewards open and close the NT (compare Matt. 5:11, 12 with Rev. 22:12). Yet Jesus' action on the Cross will deliver those who believe in Him from any condemnation (Rom. 5:18; Gal. 3:18; Rev. 22:17).

24:13, 14 Here is one of the associations in the Proverbs of honey and the honeycomb with wisdom (16:24). Wisdom and its pursuit, while rigorous, is good for the soul and can be pleasant.

24:15, 16 Ultimately the wicked will fall. The righteous can be assured of this not because they are strong, but because they have a Redeemer (23:10, 11).

24:17–22 fear the LORD and the king: The Hebrew text breaks the phrasing: "Fear God, my son, and the king" (Rom. 13:1–7; 1 Pet. 2:17). This proverb relates most fully to the Davidic kings, who were God's regents on earth; one way the ancient Israelites could show respect for God would be to respect the king. But the duty to honor civil authorities still applies to all people of all times (Rom. 13:1).

24:23–34 These things also belong to the wise is a sectional heading that corresponds to the one in 22:17. Verses 23–34 serve as an appendix to the preceding section (22:17—24:22).

24:23, 24 Israel's basic concern with equity in judgment was not unique; but in Israel a concern for equity was tied to God's character. Since God does not show partiality, neither should we.

24:25–27 afterward build your house: The matter of priorities is in view in v. 27. The diligent completion of labor in the fields must precede the building of one's house. Perhaps the starting of family life is in view here, as well. One ought to be certain that a well-ordered life has been established before embarking upon marriage.

24:28, 29 Verse 29 states the "Golden Rule" (Matt. 7:12) in terms of what we should not do. Jesus said this is our most important duty.

24:30–34 The lazy person is judged on the basis of the shambles of his field. From this sorry state of affairs the wise take a lesson. The only concern the lazy have is for a little sleep.

Hezekiah, Preserver of Proverbs

The proverbs collected in Prov. 25—30 reflect important reforms enacted by King Hezekiah of Judah (Prov. 25:1). Hezekiah's father and predecessor, Ahaz, had turned away from the Lord by serving idols and practicing child sacrifice (2 Chr. 28:1–4). As a result, Judah suffered devastating losses to the Assyrians and the Israelites of the northern kingdom.

But when Hezekiah assumed the throne, he removed the idolatrous practices and centers, restored temple worship, and resumed nationwide observance of Passover (2 Chr. 29—31). It was probably during this period that scribes found and copied these proverbs of Solomon, which were later included in the Book of Proverbs.

25:1–5 Silver is valuable only after the impurities have been removed. Similarly, wickedness needs to be removed from a king for his throne to be established rightly.

25:6, 7 Do not exalt yourself: Knowing your place is a recurring theme in the Bible. It is humiliating to be told to remove yourself from a seat of honor. Jesus spoke of the same need for deference (Luke 14:11). Whom your eyes have seen: This phrase reflects the custom in the ancient world of never looking directly in the eyes of a superior until told to do so (Is. 6:5).

25:8–15 hastily to court: In our own litigious age, this group of verses has unusual relevance. Seek to deal with complaints outside the court on a private level or even with an arbiter.

25:16 found honey: Too much of even a good thing can cause illness and distress.

25:17 neighbor's house: The issue is moderation. Too much "neighborliness" becomes an imposition.

25:18–26 The words of Jesus in Matt. 5:43–48 have direct ties to these verses. Coals of fire speaks of God's judgment (Pss. 120:4; 140:10); the idea is that an act of kindness to your enemy may cause him or her to feel ashamed. This is just one way to overcome evil with good (Rom. 12:20).

25:27 much honey: Moderation in good things (v. 16) goes with humility.

25:28 rule: Self-control is a key part of obedience to God (Gal. 5:22, 23).

26:1, 2 snow in summer: A most unlikely happening in Israel. Rain in harvest is not only unusual, but disastrous, because rain at that time would cause the crops to rot.

26:3 rod for the fool's back: The fool has no internal motivation to do anything. He is no better than a brute beast whom someone else has to motivate.

26:4, 5 Some people have called the two proverbs here contradictory, but that is not necessary. The phrase according to his folly appears twice as a play on words with two shades of meaning. On the one hand, it means "avoid the temptation to stoop to his level"; that is, don't use his methods, lest you also be like him. On the other hand, it means "avoid the temptation to ignore him altogether"; that is, respond in some way, or else he will become wise in his own eyes and his folly will get worse.

26:6–11 dog … vomit: A fool does not learn from his mistakes. The apostle Peter cited this verse and applied it to false teachers (2 Pet. 2:22).

26:12 Being haughty is even worse than being a fool. Egotism is the epitome of folly (28:11).

26:13–15 These proverbs about the lazy man have a "can you top this" quality that provides comic relief; the lazy man is the object of many jokes in Scripture. This set of verses includes several (19:15). Each one belittles laziness and the many outrageous excuses people often use to justify it.

26:16, 17 The problem with taking a dog by the ears is that the dog will not like it and probably bite. The same is true of getting involved in another's quarrel. It's an invasion of privacy.

26:18–21 Fires do not burn without fuel; strife, or fighting, works the same way.

26:22 The slanderer looks upon his nasty words as tasty tidbits, delicious morsels of raw gossip. Many people have an insatiable hunger for malicious gossip.

26:23 The meaning of this proverb is not far from Jesus' remarks to His enemies that they were like whitewashed tombs (Matt. 23:27). No amount of painting on the outside changes the value of the rotten interior.

26:24–27 A person who hates says one thing but stores up anger within. He may find that his hatred hurts him, when in his life there is so much falsehood that no one believes him no matter how gracious and truthful he might be at times. revealed before the assembly: When we lament the unfairness of the prosperity of the wicked and contrast our own situation to theirs, we need to keep Ps. 73:17 in mind. Their end will more than compensate them for the evil they have done (Rom. 6:23).

26:28 A lying tongue results from hatred in the heart. It is kindled with the fire of hell (James 3:3–6).

27:1 As Jesus did in His teaching (Matt. 6:25–34), the wise of ancient Israel warned about a concern for tomorrow that overshadows the needs of today.

27:2–5 Let another man praise you: Self-praise is also out of place for the person of wisdom and reveals an insensitivity to the fitness of things. Praise is a comely garment; and though we may desire to wear it, it is always better if others place the garment upon us.

27:6 Correction given in love by a friend is better than insincere acts of affection (Ps. 141:5).

27:7 Those who are full do not appreciate what they have, while to those who are hungry anything tastes good.

27:8–10 from its nest: Straying from home can mean losing security and becoming open to new and powerful temptations (read the parable of the prodigal son in Luke 15).

27:11 This is the first my son proverb in this collection; it is very similar to those in the earlier parts of Proverbs (chs. 1—9). A child who grows up wise confirms that the parents who taught him or her were themselves wise (10:1).

27:12–16 Normally a garment given in pledge was only a symbolic collateral and was returned immediately, but not if the one making the pledge was unreliable or a stranger (20:16).

27:17 iron sharpens iron: A famous proverb, this verse may also be translated as applying to the will: “Let iron sharpen iron, and so let a person sharpen his friend.” The idea is that people grow from interaction with one another.

27:18 keeps the fig tree: This proverb speaks of faithfulness and reward. The word master may refer to God.

27:19 a man’s heart: Thoughts reflect a person’s true character.

27:20–22 Hell and Destruction are used often in the Bible to describe the fearful aspect of death. They are like ravenous monsters. Compare this proverb with the image of Satan as a roaring lion (1 Pet. 5:8).

27:23–27 These verses affirm diligence and describe its practical rewards. The model is that of the farmer who cares for his flocks and herds; if he diligently cares for them, in time they will care for him.

Mosaic of a lion, an animal known for its strength and courage. The writer of Proverbs declared that “the righteous are bold as a lion” (Prov. 28:1).

28:1–3 The wicked flee when there is no cause (Ps. 53:5) because of guilt and the fear of getting caught that goes with it.

28:4, 5 When a person abandons God's law, he or she loses all sense of right and praises the wicked (Rom. 1:28–32). And since true justice is from God, the ungodly have trouble understanding it. This is why the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom (1:7).

28:6 The proverbs balance their words on poor and rich people; they do not assume that godliness leads to wealth or that wealthy people are necessarily godly. As this proverb points out, sometimes we must choose between doing good and getting rich.

28:7 To be a companion of gluttons (23:20, 21) is to break God's law. This is why Jesus' enemies charged Him with associating with gluttons: such accusations were attacks on His faithfulness to God (Matt. 11:19).

28:8, 9 Profit taken by usury is unjust. God will help the poor eventually, at their exploiters' expense.

28:10–13 causes the upright to go astray: These words resemble Jesus' warning against leading his disciples astray (Matt. 18:6). Paul vividly captures this kind of evil: "If anyone defiles the temple of God, God will destroy him" (1 Cor. 3:17).

28:14 Happy is the man is a beatitude (Ps. 1:1) about the person who is in awe of God. The person who never thinks of God faces calamity.

28:15, 16 Like a roaring lion: The oppressive reign of a wicked ruler is compared to the viciousness of attacking animals. Lacking true understanding, these vicious persons fail to recognize that the security of the throne is related to the welfare of their subjects. The ruler who hates such senseless oppression will bring stability and length of days to his reign.

28:17–19 Tills his land is a call to hard work, a promise of reward, and a warning against frivolity or overindulgence in fun.

28:20 A faithful man succeeds. That is, faithfulness to God, not greed, determines success in life.

28:21, 22 To exercise partiality (literally, "to recognize faces") means to judge on the basis of favors or bribes instead of what is right.

28:23 rebukes a man: Constructive criticism has more value than flattery, which aims only to win people's affection.

28:24 robs his father: This proverb condemns breaking the fifth commandment, "Honor your father and your mother" (Ex. 20:12). Respect for parents as a duty is a common theme in the Book of Proverbs.

28:25–28 One of the main causes of strife is pride; trust in God leads to blessing. walks wisely: Security can only come by trusting God, not by relying on oneself.

29:1 The Hebrew phrase for often rebuked is “a man of rebukes.” The judgment on a person who stubbornly rejects God’s correction is swift and final.

29:2–4 The words righteous are in authority can also be translated “righteous are great.” People will always respond to good government and justice. Justice is not served by bribes, nor is good government established that way.

29:5, 6 Spreads a net: Lies entrap liars (10:8). Moreover, the evil one is trapped by his own actions. Both the liar and the wicked are contrasted with the righteous, who run happily because they are innocent of any wrongdoing.

29:7–12 Righteous people are concerned for the poor and help them (22:22); the wicked do not even consider the needy.

29:13, 14 God is responsible for giving life to both the poor man and the oppressor. Jesus attested that God causes rain to fall on the just and the unjust (Matt. 5:45).

29:15–17 The words rod and rebuke both speak of correction or discipline. An undisciplined child shames everyone, especially his or her parents (v. 17). Verse 17 places the burden of correction on the parents. The word translated delight speaks of rich, delicious food (Gen. 49:20).

29:18 Where there is no revelation: The Hebrew word for revelation speaks of revelatory vision, a word from God. Without God’s revelation of the Law, the people flounder. True happiness is discovered within the constraints of revelation, in the counsel of the Savior.

29:19 A servant will not be corrected by mere words: The Septuagint reads “a stubborn servant.” Verbal correction accomplishes little with men who deliberately refuse to obey commands. Sterner measures are needed, for it is only the fear of punishment that alters the resolve of these unprincipled and self-willed persons.

29:20–22 hasty in his words: Even a wise person may become foolish by speaking too quickly. It is better to be silent or to choose words carefully than to speak whatever first comes to mind.

29:23–25 See Ps. 147:6. God raises the humble and puts down the arrogant. Mary praised God for doing this marvelous thing (Luke 1:46–55).

29:26, 27 God controls human affairs. Therefore it makes more sense to seek the Lord first before stooping to seek the favor of human rulers.

Agur and Lemuel

The final two chapters of Proverbs are attributed to men named Agur and Lemuel. Neither of these men are mentioned elsewhere in the Bible. Appearing in both attributions (Prov. 30:1; 31:1) is the Hebrew word massa, which can be translated as “burden” or “utterance,” as it is used by the prophets (Is. 17:1; 19:1). The word might also be the name of a place—Massa (Gen. 25:14; 1 Chr. 1:30). If so, the attributions might associate Agur and Lemuel with a country or a city named Massa. For instance, Prov. 31:1 would begin, “The words of Lemuel, king of Massa, which his mother taught him.”

Even if these teachers are not from a place called Massa, they do not appear to be Israelites. There was no King Lemuel in Israel, and the name “Agur” is not formed in a typical Hebrew fashion. Agur’s name does appear in Sabean inscriptions, and in light of that foreign source, it is interesting that the teachings of Agur include some of the most religiously oriented of all the proverbs in the book.

30:1 An entirely new section of the Book of Proverbs begins with the words of Agur. Like Lemuel (31:1–9), Agur was a non-Hebrew contributor to the Book of Proverbs. He came to faith in the God of Israel in a foreign land. We know nothing about his father Jakeh, but the word translated his utterance may be a place name. Ithiel and Ucal were probably Agur's pupils. Since the back-to-back repetition of the name Ithiel is unusual, some construe the Hebrew letters differently and translate the text "I have wearied myself, O God; I have wearied myself, O God, and am consumed." This would fit the context of the following verses.

30:2, 3 more stupid than any man: Agur means he was at a loss. Similarly, his denial of knowledge of the Holy One is a rhetorical flourish as well (as is seen by comparison with his words of vv. 5, 6). Agur was stating with dramatic irony that he could not explain the puzzle before him.

30:4 This verse gives the riddle that perplexed Agur. The questions are enigmatic. They culminate in What is His name, and what is His Son's name, if you know? At this point, the riddle has no answer. The OT would answer that "His name" is the Lord God, but did not have a name for His Son. This riddle was to remain unsolved until Jesus answered it for Nicodemus (John 3:13). These verses form one of the most straightforward messianic texts in the Bible.

30:5–9 Two things: This was all Agur needed.

30:10 This proverb is unusual in warning against slandering a servant. Slaves in ancient times were often regarded as less than a full person.

30:11–16 Agur wrote about a generation plagued by social ills such as lack of respect for parents, self-righteousness, greed, and selfishness. Ironically, such evils have plagued every generation, not just Agur's.

30:17 mocks his father: The lack of parental respect spoken of in v. 11 leads to this curse. The language is strong and violent, as is the punishment of the one who abuses his or her parents.

30:18, 19 The term translated virgin could also read "young woman" in this context.

30:20 This verse contrasts with the way of v. 19; this way is awful whereas the former is wonderful. The adulterous woman regards her illicit sexual relations without remorse, as if she were finishing a plate of food.

30:21–23 Contrasting with the four wonderful things of vv. 18, 19 are four things that are grievous, an upsetting of order. Three are clear: the servant, the fool, and the maidservant are all in unexpected positions of power. The hateful woman describes the sorry lot of a woman whose husband hates her.

30:24–28 This numerical proverb speaks of four creatures that are small in size but amazing in behavior. Each of these small creatures has a behavioral trait from which wise people can learn.

30:29–33 The proverbs of Agur conclude with warnings against boasting and troublemaking. The phrase put your hand on your mouth means “stop it.” The idea is if you are in the middle of making trouble and suddenly realize your foolishness, stop right then before things get worse.

31:1 This verse begins a new section of material from a non-Israelite source. Some have thought that the name Lemuel, meaning “Belonging to God,” is a pseudonym for Solomon, but this is only a guess.

31:2–7 Lemuel’s mother advised him not to give his strength to women. Often in the ancient world a king would amass a large harem or involve himself sexually with many women. The wisdom of Lemuel’s mother was that such behavior destroys rulers. She likewise advised him to avoid intoxicating drink altogether, so that he could always have a clear enough head to rule justly.

31:8, 9 for the speechless: The duty of a king in the ancient world was to defend the weak, to uphold the helpless. These ideals were rarely realized in that age or even in our own. But one day a King who is the Defender of the helpless will establish his righteous reign (23:10, 11).

IN CONTEXT

The Virtuous Wife

Prov. 31:10–31 is an acrostic poem, in which the first word of each line begins with a successive letter of the Hebrew alphabet. This poem is part of the instruction that King Lemuel's mother gave to teach her son about wisdom (31:1). In describing the "virtuous wife," Lemuel's mother was showing what wisdom looks like when it is lived out in everyday life.

Why is the woman of Prov. 31 more valuable than rare jewels (31:10)? It is because of her wisdom, her ability to live life in a responsible, productive, and prosperous way (Prov. 1:2). The Book of Proverbs often personifies wisdom as a woman (8:1–11), and also describes wisdom as more valuable than any riches (3:15; 8:11).

Thus it is no surprise that the woman of Prov. 31 earns praise in the most public of places, the gates of the city (31:31), which in her day represented a combination of city hall and the marketplace. She is a woman whose hard work brings material rewards (31:13–16, 21, 22). Proverbs promises that whoever seeks and finds wisdom will also find wealth, happiness, honor, and long life. This woman is an example of how those promises are fulfilled.

It is worth noting that this woman pursues what are sometimes thought of as traditional female jobs, such as making clothes (31:13, 19), as well as nontraditional work, such as real estate investment, farming, and merchandising (31:16, 18). Furthermore, her energies are directed not only toward providing for her family and household (31:11, 14, 15, 27), but also toward meeting the needs of people in the community (31:20).

In short, the woman of Prov. 31 is a model, for both women and men, of a way of living that brings fulfillment and contentment. She exhibits a lifestyle of work and love, based on godly wisdom.

31:10–12 Proverbs 31:10–31 is an acrostic poem; each verse begins with a successive letter of the Hebrew alphabet. Some have thought that it continues the teaching of King Lemuel's mother (vv. 1–9), but it may also be an independent, concluding unit. As the Book of Proverbs begins with the Prologue (1:1–7), which gives the goals of wisdom in general terms, so now it concludes with this Epilogue (vv. 10–31), which presents them in a case study. The opening words Who can find position this woman as an ideal. The phrase a virtuous wife speaks of excellence, moral worth, ability, and nobility, not just marital fidelity (12:4). Such a woman is the ideal of wisdom in action.

31:13–15 These verses emphasize both hard work and skill. The woman they describe does things she enjoys, finding her fulfillment in varied tasks. The words she also rises while it is yet night describe her concern for others; she gives of herself to care for her family and servants.

31:16, 17 She considers a field; that is, she buys and sells and builds her own resources. These words are remarkable in light of the many restrictions placed on women in the ancient world.

31:18, 19 her merchandise is good: One of the avenues the woman exploits is a "cottage industry" in which she acts independently.

31:20–22 The virtuous woman works not to get rich, but to give to the poor. She can be concerned for others because she has provided for her family.

31:23 The virtuous woman's husband has a position in the gates as an elder of the city; some of his status comes from his wife's reputation, not just his own.

31:24 Linen garments probably indicates clothing for women.

31:25 The virtuous woman's own clothing is far richer than linen or silk; she is dressed in strength and honor.

31:26, 27 Any woman who opens her mouth with wisdom deserves praise, given all the information on the use and misuse of speech in the Book of Proverbs. A virtuous woman takes care to speak well (James 3:2).

31:28, 29 The virtuous woman is blessed by her family—by her children as well as her husband. The words of v. 29 are the blessing of her husband.

31:30, 31 Charm may be used for good or for evil; it is not necessarily bad. But its good use requires the fear of the Lord—the main theme of the Book of Proverbs.

The Book of Ecclesiastes

———— THE BOOK OF ECCLESIASTES IS ONE OF THE most misunderstood books in the Bible. Christians have tended either to ignore the message of the book or to regard it as the testimony of a man living apart from God. This is unfortunate, for the book asks relevant, searching questions about the meaning of life, and it declares the utter futility of an existence without God. Like all Scripture, the Book of Ecclesiastes benefits and edifies God's people.

Negative descriptions such as "cynical," "fatalistic," or "existential" do not do the Book of Ecclesiastes justice. There is too much evidence of robust cheerfulness throughout its pages. "So I commended enjoyment" (8:15) is a recurrent theme that pervades the book; in fact, the Hebrew words for "gladness" and "being glad" appear seventeen times in Ecclesiastes. The underlying mood of the book is joy: finding pleasure in life despite the troubles that often plague it. Those who fear and worship God should experience this joy; they should rejoice in the gifts God has given them.

Solomon probably wrote this book toward the end of his life, after he had repented of idolatry and his pursuit of foreign wives. Thus the Book of Ecclesiastes is both a monument to Solomon's recommitment to the living God and a guide for others through the pitfalls and perils of life.

In fact, Solomon might have written this wisdom book as a tract for other nations. That would explain why he did not write about the Law, and why he used the divine title Elohim, meaning "Exalted God," instead of the covenantal name Yahweh in the book (Ex. 3:14, 15). Solomon had entertained many dignitaries from other nations, including the queen of Sheba. The queen's questions concerning the basic meaning of life might have prompted him to write Ecclesiastes to teach the Gentiles about the living God and their need to worship only Him. Centuries before, Moses had called for this type of treatise to the pagan nations (Deut. 4:6–8). The nations that had heard of Israel's success needed to know about the living and exalted God who had blessed Israel with wealth and wisdom.

Sometimes it is better to read the end of a book to understand better the direction in which the book is headed. This is certainly true of Ecclesiastes.

The book should be interpreted in light of its conclusion: “Fear God and keep His commandments, for this is man’s all” (12:13). To fear God means to revere, worship, and serve God—to turn from evil and turn in awe to the living God. This was the attitude of Abraham (Gen. 22:12), Job (Job 1:1, 8, 9; 2:3), and the Egyptian midwives (Ex. 1:17, 21). It does not involve dread but instead a proper respect for and obedience to our Creator. Why should we respect and obey God? The Book of Ecclesiastes answers this question in its concluding verse (12:14): God will judge everyone—both the righteous and the wicked. Life cannot be lived with abandon, as if God will not see or remember the deeds of the past. For on the final day, He will call forth all men and women to account for their actions. The admonition to fear God and the expectation of divine judgment are the two great themes that conclude the book and provide an interpretative framework for the rest of it (12:13, 14).

The journey of Solomon to his conclusion “to fear God” is founded on the human search for meaning in life. In 3:11, Solomon eloquently expresses humankind’s dilemma: God has placed eternity in our hearts. A search for true meaning in this life—in money or fame, for instance—will only leave us empty-handed, because our souls yearn for something that will last. Our frustration arises from a hunger to fellowship with our eternal Creator—the only One who can give meaning to our lives. In Ecclesiastes, Solomon takes us on a tour of all of life and concludes that all of it is vanity. Pleasures and riches lead merely to boredom and despair. Only a relationship with the One who created us and continues to care for us will truly satisfy. Troubles and uncertainty will continue to plague us, but even during these times we can find joy in a secure trust in our Father.

The writer says that he was “the son of David, king in Jerusalem” (1:1, 12, 16), words that have led many to assume that the writer was Solomon. Evidence in the book itself points to Solomon: (1) the author had “more wisdom than all who were before” him (1:16; 1 Kin. 3:12); (2) he gathered for himself “silver and gold and the special treasures of kings” (2:8; 1 Kin. 10:11–23); (3) he “acquired male and female servants” in great numbers (2:7; 1 Kin. 9:20–23); (4) he engaged in extensive building projects (2:4–6; 1 Kin. 9:1–19); (5) he developed a great understanding of plants, birds, and natural phenomena (2:4–7; 1 Kin. 4:33); (6) he declared, “there is not a just man on earth who does good and does not sin” (7:20; 1 Kin. 8:46); and (7)

“he pondered and sought out and set in order many proverbs” (12:9; 1 Kin. 4:32).

Nevertheless, some scholars argue that Solomon is not the author. They point to two passages to make their case: 1:12 and 1:16. The past tense of the verb in 1:12: “I … was king over Israel in Jerusalem” may lead the reader to think that the author was no longer king when he wrote this work. But the verb can denote a state of action that began in the past and continues into the present. Hence 1:12 could be translated, “I have been { and am} king.” Also, the phrase in 1:16 suggests there were many kings before Solomon in Jerusalem. Since David was the first Hebrew king in Jerusalem, the argument goes, the writer must have lived many generations after the time of David. Yet we should recall that the history of Jerusalem can be traced to early Canaanite settlements. The kings of Jerusalem may well have included Melchizedek (Gen. 14:18), Adoni-Zedek (Josh. 10:1), and Abdi-Khepa (mentioned in the Amarna Letters), to name just a few. Therefore, it can reasonably be asserted that Solomon is the author of this wonderful but unusual book.

Commentary

1:1 The title Preacher denotes a function or a profession. It literally means “one who assembles” or “one who gathers people together.” Thus the word refers to Solomon as a person who convened an assembly of the wise in order to explore in a formal manner the meaning of life. It might be better to transliterate the Hebrew word Qohelet rather than to translate it, for it seems to be Solomon’s pen name.

1:2 Vanity of vanities: This phrase translates the Hebrew superlative, familiar from such phrases as “song of songs” and “holy of holies.” Here it might express “the ultimate absurdity” or “utter emptiness.” This has led many to conclude that the Book of Ecclesiastes is a negative, cynical book that denies any meaning in life. Others have suggested that this book explains that life apart from God is “utter emptiness.” However, the book itself does not say this, for there is no qualifying phrase such as “except when one is related to God.” Instead, the book clearly says that life itself is “vanity of vanities.” The word vanity means “breath” or “vapor” and thus speaks of life as “quickly passing.” Life is like a vapor; indeed, it is like the thinnest of vapors (the superlative of the word). Wherever we read the word vanity in Ecclesiastes, we should think not of what is “meaningless” but of what is “quickly passing” (v. 14; 6:12). This is one of the key terms in the Book of Ecclesiastes, for it is found thirty-eight times there but only thirty-four times in the rest of the OT. The teaching of the Preacher is to realize that life is a fleeting thing that needs to be savored and enjoyed as a gift from God.

Life Under the Sun

One way to understand the enigmatic Book of Ecclesiastes is to read it as a contrast between two very different outlooks on life—either acknowledging and depending on God, or failing to do so.

Failing to honor God is life "under the sun" (Eccl. 1:3, 9, 14; 2:11, 17), "on earth" (1:4; 5:2; 8:14), and "under heaven" (1:13). It is a life filled with pain, toil, disillusionment, and sadness. By contrast, living life in relationship to God is to live by the "hand of God" (2:24), which leads to harmony and joy (2:26; 3:13; 5:19).

These opposing lifestyles are similar to the contrasting lives that Adam and Eve lived before and after sinning. Originally, all of creation was good (Gen. 1:26–31) and there was no shame between man and woman (2:24–25). But after the first couple's rebellion (3:1–7), the history was filled with pain and toil (3:8–24), murder (4:1–24), rampant evil (6:5–7), drunkenness, shame, and curses (9:20–27), and ultimately worldwide confusion (11:1–9). The world that God had designed for people's good became evil and destructive.

1:3 The senses of the term profit are: (1) "advantage" and (2) "adequate gain." Here it refers to compensation or gains, usually in the commercial realm. The question is: What is left after all expenses are taken into account? labor: Both the noun and the verb carry negative connotations, referring to activities requiring exertion. under the sun: This phrase (also translated as "under heaven" in v. 13; 2:3; 3:1) describes life lived here on this earth, as God has been pleased to place us. In these two verses (vv. 2, 3), the Preacher has established one of his principal ideas: Life may seem pointless because it is quickly passing. It is the burden of the rest of his book to help the assembly of the wise understand how to truly value life because it does indeed pass so very quickly.

1:4 The term generation suggests both the human actors and the natural phenomena as well. With the verb passes away we have the first of a series of antitheses in Ecclesiastes. the earth abides forever: Only God is eternal and everlasting in the fullest sense. But compared to the lives of humankind, the earth abides with little change.

1:5–7 The sun … The wind … the rivers: These three elements of God's creation are seen to be going about in their expected courses, with little change and little effect.

1:8, 9 All things are full of labor: What is true of the sun, wind, and rivers (vv. 5–7) is also true of all other temporal things. The whole world is made up of what could be called "the restless ones." The eye is not satisfied: Here a proverb is quoted describing insatiable appetite (4:8; 5:10; compare Prov. 27:20) in depicting the seeming pointlessness of the courses of natural phenomena.

1:10, 11 If it appears that something new does happen from time to time, it is only because people's memories are short.

1:12 I, the Preacher, was king: There is a shift from the third person of vv. 1, 2 to the first person here. The writer, or perhaps a later editor, returns to the third person in the epilogue, 12:8–14. This is most likely a reference to Solomon as the author of the book.

1:13 under heaven: This is a synonymous expression for "under the sun" (vv. 3, 9); it refers to life as it is lived by people on earth. God: Ecclesiastes does not use the divine title Yahweh, God's covenantal name (Ex. 3:14, 15). Instead, the book uses the word Elohim for God twenty-eight times, a word that stresses His sovereignty over all creation. The wisdom writers often use Elohim when they wish to speak of universal truth instead of truths that are peculiar to God's covenantal relationship to Israel. sons of man: This is a way of speaking of human beings in a very general sense. may be exercised: This verb is used only in Ecclesiastes and means "to be occupied with" or "to be busy with"; it is associated with the noun task (3:10).

“vanity”

(Heb. hebel) (1:14; 2:1, 11; 6:12; 7:15; Ps. 78:33; Is. 49:4) Strong’s #1892: This word basically means “vapor” or “breath,” such as the rapidly vanishing vapor of one’s warm breath in cool, crisp air. With this word, the Preacher described worldly pursuits—such as wealth, honor, fame, and various pleasures—as similar to desperately grasping at air (2:17). It is absurd and useless. Jeremiah used the same word to denounce idolatry as “worthless” (Jer. 18:15); and Job used it to bemoan the brevity of human life (Job 7:16). But the Preacher of Ecclesiastes used the word more than any other OT author. According to him, all of life is vanity unless one recognizes that everything is from the hand of God (2:24–26).

1:14 grasping for the wind: This phrase does not occur in the Hebrew Bible outside of Ecclesiastes. Seven of its nine occurrences (v. 14; 2:11, 17, 26; 4:4, 6; 6:9) follow “vanity” statements. The phrase explains the nature of life according to the Preacher. Life is real but quickly passing; any attempt to seize it is as futile as grasping the wind.

1:15 Solomon is not claiming that there is no use trying to straighten out or change anything. Rather, he explains that no amount of investigating or using the resources of earth will ever straighten out all that is crooked, twisted, perverted, or turned upside down (7:13).

1:16 all who were before me in Jerusalem: This phrase does not rule out Solomon as the author of the book just because he was preceded in Jerusalem as an Israelite king only by his father, David. There were other kings, including Melchizedek (Gen. 14:18) and Adoni-Zedek (Josh. 10:1). The city of Jerusalem had existed for hundreds of years before Solomon became its king.

1:17 It was not wisdom that Solomon judges absurd but rather becoming “more wise” (2:15) and “overly wise” (7:16).

1:18 much wisdom is much grief: For all of wisdom’s other advantages, Solomon confesses that much wisdom and learning are the source of pain, chagrin, and sorrow. It is well known that the very process of learning is an expansion of the awareness of our ignorance. For mortals, an increase of wisdom may only increase pain (12:12).

2:1 The Preacher uses a literary device of conversing with himself as a way of describing his thought processes. mirth: A new test is proposed, following the test of wisdom. It is the test of "joy," or "pleasure."

2:2 Solomon labels the lighter side of pleasure and joy as sheer madness, but even the weightier aspects of laughter cause Solomon to ask if anything substantial is really achieved. As Solomon writes in Prov. 14:13, "Even in laughter the heart may sorrow, and the end of mirth may be grief."

2:3 flesh with wine … heart with wisdom: Here the test is an attempt to balance excess on the one side with learning on the other.

2:4–6 I built myself houses: Solomon worked for thirteen years building "the king's house" (1 Kin. 9:10); then he built "the house of the Forest of Lebanon" (1 Kin. 10:17) and another house for his wife, Pharaoh's daughter (1 Kin. 9:24). He also fortified the cities of Hazor, Megiddo, Gezer, Beth Horon, Baalath, and Tadmor (1 Kin. 9:15, 17, 18). vineyards … gardens and orchards: Solomon's interest in the natural world (God's creation) was prodigious (1 Kin. 4:33).

One Who Had It All

The writer's claim that he had more possessions "than all who were in Jerusalem before me" (Eccl. 2:7) is consistent with reports of Solomon's wealth (1 Kin. 3:13; 10:23). Furthermore, in addition to riches, Solomon possessed extraordinary wisdom (3:12; 4:29–34), which the writer of Ecclesiastes also had (Eccl. 2:9).

The irony is that Solomon, who enjoyed greater wisdom and wealth than any of the Israelite kings, came to great spiritual ruin because of his foolish choices regarding idolatry (1 Kin. 11:1–13). Ecclesiastes does not reflect that spiritual apostasy. However, is it possible that Solomon's disillusionment with pleasure and knowledge, which eventually caused him to "hate life" (Eccl. 2:1–17), might have been a contributing factor in turning his heart to other gods? Scripture does not say. But the tragic fact remains that one of the greatest of Israel's kings had his kingdom come to "vanity" because he forsook the God who had given him all that he possessed.

2:7, 8 Maintaining the various buildings and gardens of the king must have demanded an extensive staff of servants. silver and gold: Solomon's riches were unsurpassed by the kings of the ancient world (1 Kin. 10:14–29). musical instruments: The meaning of the Hebrew term so translated has long been debated. An Egyptian letter found at Amarna contains this word in Akkadian as an explanation of an Egyptian word meaning "concubine."

2:9, 10 my eyes desired: Solomon had limitless ability to fulfill any and all of his desires. labor: One of the Preacher's favorite words occurs here for the third time. It appears in the book about thirty-one times.

2:11 At the end of his grand quest for possessions and experiences, Solomon concluded that it was vanity, or "vapor," a grasping for the wind. That is, even with all he had done and experienced, there was still a sense that nothing lasting or enduring had been achieved.

2:12 madness and folly: This topic was introduced briefly in 1:17. The two words together express a single concept, "senseless folly."

2:13 There is a relative value of wisdom over folly, but both have their limitations (vv. 19, 21).

2:14 the same event: Some versions incorrectly render this Hebrew term, which means "happening" or "event," as the word fate. This is one of the Preacher's favorite words (vv. 14, 15; 3:19; 9:2, 3, 11). Here, the inevitable event is death. Both the wise and the foolish must die.

2:16 no more remembrance: Life in and of itself cannot supply the answers to the ultimate questions being asked here. Death will overtake both the wise person and the fool alike. In that sense, both life and death are cheats.

2:17–19 Such hatred of life is astonishing since the one who finds wisdom also finds life, according to Prov. 3:16; 8:35. But the Preacher's dissatisfaction was related to the quickly passing nature of everything (1:2), including even the good things; they were a grasping for the wind (1:14).

2:20 labor in which I had toiled: This could refer either to all the toil he had undertaken or, more probably, to the "earnings" he had gained.

2:21 The noun skill is found only in Ecclesiastes (v. 21; 4:4) It depicts one who is expert at a craft. great evil: The term evil often has a sense of moral evil; here, however, it may mean "calamity" or "ruin." There is a sense of sadness that runs through this section. Nothing that we gain in this life can be carried on into the life to come.

2:23 his work (i.e., his task).

2:24 This translation, with most interpreters, assumes that the comparative form—better—is to be supplied here, though it is missing in the Hebrew text; it is in agreement with later passages (3:12; 5:18; 8:15). The Preacher concludes that all good is located only in God. eat and drink … good in his labor: This repeated refrain marks one of the central affirmations of Ecclesiastes (vv. 24–26; 3:12, 13; 3:22; 5:18–20; 8:15; 9:7); in the midst of a world of trouble, a believer is able to seize the moment in joy from God. Only God supplies the key to the meaning of life. Without Him, genuine meaning, satisfaction, and enjoyment in life are ultimately elusive. from the hand of God: This figure of speech announces that even such mundane acts as eating, drinking, and earning a paycheck are gifts from God.

2:25 more than I: An alternative meaning of this phrase, "apart from God," may be more appropriate in this context. Believers pray before their meals in order to affirm that God is the great Giver of all good gifts. They can enjoy the food on their plates only when they recognize that fact.

2:26 God gives: One of the words used most frequently in Ecclesiastes to describe God's relationship to individuals is the verb "to give." It appears eleven times with God as subject.

3:1–15 This poem speaks with eloquence of the role of time in the life of the believer. Some regard the Book of Ecclesiastes as describing life apart from God, but clearly this text describes life that is lived in relationship with God. Through these words, the Preacher is not teaching that everything has an opportune time according to which one should choose one action or the other. Rather, he teaches that all events are in the hand of God, who makes everything happen in the time He judges appropriate. Illustrating this comforting assertion, the Preacher turns to fourteen pairs of opposites in vv. 2–8.

3:1 a season … a time: Both words are usually regarded as being specific points in time rather than a continuity of time. under heaven: That is, life "under the sun," the sphere in which human life is lived.

3:2 born … die: The pairs of words in these verses are natural events in human life, and all are under the hand of the living God.

3:3 A time to kill: In the plan of God, there is a time for executing murderers (Gen. 9:6) and for going to war against enemies designated by God. A time to break down: There is a time for dismantling walls, stone buildings, or even nations (Is. 5:5; Jer. 18:7, 9).

3:4 weep … laugh: God's plan includes both sorrows and joys. Believers do not mourn in the same way as unbelievers (1 Thess. 4:13), but we do mourn (Matt. 5:4). Dancing and leaping are natural ways of expressing laughter, pleasure, and joy in the presence of the Lord (Ex. 15:20; Pss. 149:2, 3; 150:4) and in times of personal happiness (Luke 15:25).

3:5 In times of peace, stones were cleared from the fields, allowing for cultivation. In wartime, the rocks were thrown on the fields to make them unusable (2 Kin. 3:19, 25). to embrace: In this context the words describe the sexual embrace.

3:6 to keep … to throw away: There is a period of life in which one wishes to accumulate things for enjoyment and memories; later in life one needs to work out ways to dispose of what has been accumulated.

3:7 When bad news came, it was customary to rip one's garments to show grief (2 Sam. 13:31). When the problem passed, it was just as well to sew the garment back together. silence … speak: See the two contrary ways of responding to a fool (Prov. 26:4, 5).

3:8 In this verse the first part names the positive love first, then the negative hate. The second part uses the reverse order, negative then positive, to end with peace.

3:9 What profit: This is the same question posed in 1:3. The answer here is that all of life unfolds the appointment of God. All the toiling of man cannot change the times, circumstances, and control of events that God has reserved to Himself.

3:10 One of the words that is unique to the Book of Ecclesiastes, task may have a neutral connotation as here (5:3; 8:16) or a negative connotation (something burdensome, as in 1:13; 2:23, 26; 4:8; 5:14).

3:11 All of God's creation is beautiful. The point is that God makes everything that way in its time. From the divine perspective, there is no ugliness in the events of our lives (3:1–8). Eternity in their hearts refers to a deep-seated, compulsive drive to transcend our mortality by knowing the meaning and destiny of the world. Because we are made in the image of God, we have an inborn inquisitiveness about eternal realities. We can find peace only when we come to know our eternal Creator. Even then, we know God only in part (1 Cor. 13:12). from beginning to end: All we see is the micromoment of our own existence in the grand span of eternity. Thus the Scriptures call people to live in robust faith during times of trial and pain; in the grand scheme of things, God will make everything beautiful.

3:12, 13 nothing is better: As in 2:24, the advice of the Preacher is to seize the day in the joy of God. rejoice … enjoy: Biblical faith is a call for joy, even when we live in a wicked world and under terrible stress; this is because we find true joy in the living God.

3:14, 15 God's works have a durable quality to them. As Deut. 4:2; 12:32; Prov. 30:6 advise, nothing may be added and nothing taken away. should fear: The "fear" of God in wisdom literature refers to true piety, not terror (5:7; 12:13).

3:16, 17 The term judgment may also be translated "justice," giving an even more striking contrast to these words. It was outrageous that in the very establishments where people should expect justice, they could find only wickedness. The Preacher warns the wicked judges that God, the final judge, will come, rectify all wrongdoing, and bring true justice. This theme is so prominent in the book that Solomon repeats it in the conclusion (12:14), and he raises it often in the course of his argument (9:1; 11:9).

3:18 tests them: The basic meaning of the verb is "to choose, select, purify, test." Death is the great leveler of all persons. In that regard, humans are no different than animals.

3:19 one breath: The Hebrew expression might be translated “one spirit” or “one wind.” The phrase in this case describes breath as the sign and symbol of life (8:8; Gen. 6:17; 7:15, 22). In this, humanity and animals are alike (but read v. 21). advantage: This word appears only here in Ecclesiastes. It is also found in Prov. 14:23: “In all labor there is profit,” and in Prov. 21:5: “The plans of the diligent lead surely to plenty.”

3:20, 21 All go to one place: Both humans and beasts die and go to the grave. But this is not the end for human beings—they will face eternal life or death. The rhetorical question who knows occurs six times in the Hebrew Bible outside of Ecclesiastes (2 Sam. 12:22; Esth. 4:14; Ps. 90:11; Prov. 24:22; Joel 2:14; John. 3:9) and four times in Ecclesiastes (2:19; 3:21; 6:12; 8:1). People and animals differ; their bodies go back to the dust from which they came, but the human spirit is immortal.

3:22 better: As in v. 12 and 2:24, there is a blessing given to humankind in terms of ordinary pleasures. his heritage: The allotment that God has designated may include material possessions (2:21; 11:2) or the pleasures that come from them (2:10; 3:22; 5:17, 18; 9:9).

4:1 Here is another complaint that threatens the plan of God. So much pain can come to the downtrodden that they may even despair of life (1 Kin. 19:4; Job 3:3–10). Only when the oppressed go into the house of God will they gain perspective for possible recovery (5:1–6; Ps. 73:17). they have no comforter: The absence of anyone to offer comfort only increases the pain and frustration.

4:2 I praised the dead: Being without a comforter is often worse than death itself.

4:3 he who has never existed: So powerfully wrong and so lonely is the suffering of the oppressed that Solomon, with a good deal of poetic license similar to Job 3:3–10, argues that nonexistence could be preferred over existence.

4:4 a man is envied by his neighbor: To the previous obstacles to accepting that God's plan encompasses everything is now added a fourth: the envy and cruel competition found in the world.

4:5, 6 Two proverbs follow. The fool: There are numerous statements in the Book of Proverbs about the self-destructive nature of laziness. a handful: Moderation is preferred to overexertion. In place of the sometimes cruel competition of the marketplace, Solomon recommended: "Better is a little with righteousness, than vast revenues without justice" (Prov. 16:8).

4:7, 8 The problem of sadness and loneliness is another obstacle to accepting the fact that God has a plan that embraces everything. Consider the person who has no family, not even an heir to whom he can leave all for which he has worked so hard. In 4:1 there is "no comforter." In 4:4–6 there is no rest. In 4:8 there is no companion. grave misfortune: This literally refers to an evil or burdensome task (3:10).

Four Benefits of Companionship

People these days often celebrate the myth of rugged independence, praising the self-made, self-reliant individual. Yet whatever feats people may accomplish on their own, far greater achievements are won by dedicated, united teams working together toward common goals.

The writer of Ecclesiastes recognized this. He placed a high value on companionship for four reasons: • Greater productivity. No matter how hard a single person works, he can rarely do as much as two people working together (Eccl. 4:9). A team has to expend far less effort to achieve the same results, and a team can maximize results through increased efficiency.

• Access to immediate assistance. Sooner or later everyone fails. It is only human to do so. But if someone is alone in failure, the results can be devastating—not just to the product, but to the person. However, by working in partnership with others, people have a buffer against failure. It is less likely to occur, and when it occurs, companions are standing by to offer consolation and to help their friend get back on track (4:10).

• Human comfort. The world can be a cold place. It can tear people apart without a second thought. That's why it helps to have companions. They can offer comfort when life is harsh, not necessarily by anything they say, but just by being there (4:11).

• Security. The world can be indifferent, but it can also be dangerous. One need not even go looking for trouble; trouble can come stalking on its own. But wolves tend to attack the solitary sheep, not the entire flock. That's why it makes sense to travel through life in the company of others (4:12). There is safety in numbers.

Have you made the effort to establish a solid, lasting friendship with one or two other people? If not, you are missing out on some valuable benefits that God intended for you. It is not wrong to be alone or to be independent by nature. But all human beings need someone with whom to share themselves. That is how God has made us.

4:9–12 Throughout this section there is an emphasis on the obvious benefits of companions. The intimacy and sharing of life brings relief for the problem of isolation and loneliness. A companion can offer assistance, comfort, and defense. threefold cord: The Preacher uses this proverbial saying to clinch his case about the value of friends.

4:13, 14 Before the Preacher lists the final obstacle (vv. 14–16) to believing in God's good plan, he first places the answer in proverbial form. Popularity, even in the form of royal power, is elusive. In one case, an old king had been born to the throne but becomes so foolish and senile that he cannot discern that his days for ruling are over. In another case, a young man, like Joseph, may rise from prison to take the throne (Gen. 41:14, 37–41).

4:15, 16 those who come afterward: Even the young man who replaces his predecessor will share the old king's fate. Today's hero may become tomorrow's beggar.

5:1 Walk prudently: Literally, this phrase is “guard your feet” when you go to worship God. It means to behave yourself. The idea of righteous behavior is rephrased at the end of the section in the words: “But fear God” (5:7). to hear: As is common in the prophets, there is a warning to be circumspect about sacrifice. God has no pleasure in those who do all the right things for all the wrong reasons (Is. 1:10–15). the sacrifice of fools: As the prophet Samuel warned Saul, “Behold, to obey is better than sacrifice, and to heed than the fat of rams” (1 Sam. 15:22).

5:2, 3 God is in heaven … you on earth: The essential contrast between God’s righteous might and our sinful mortality should cause us to revere the Almighty (v. 7).

5:4, 5 One should not attempt to bribe God with a hasty vow. The first part of this verse is almost identical to Deut. 23:21. See the later example of the lie of Ananias and Sapphira (Acts 5:1–11).

5:6 A priest or prophet or one of God’s angels is the messenger of God who would hear such excuses for unfulfilled vows (Hag. 1:13; Mal. 2:7).

5:7 To fear God, a central theme of the Book of Ecclesiastes, does not mean to be afraid of God (Ex. 20:2). It means to have reverence, awe, and wonder in response to His glory. For the wisdom writers (Job 1:1; Ps. 111:10; Prov. 1:7), “to fear God” means to respond to Him correctly, in true piety.

5:8 province: This term (2:8; Heb. medina, Esth. 1:1) is usually thought to be a Persian word, and hence is used by some to argue for dating the book to the postexilic period. But Solomon was acquainted with many languages and had contacts with a number of nations. His use of “exotic” vocabulary may simply be a demonstration of the remarkable sophistication that was evident in his speech.

5:9 for all … king: All people live by God’s grace in His provision for the earth.

This gold mask of an Egyptian pharaoh represents wealth and extravagance. The writer of Ecclesiastes declared that such worldly possessions do not bring happiness and contentment: "He who loves silver will not be satisfied with silver" (Eccl. 5:10).

5:10 not be satisfied: The topic of an insatiable appetite is addressed for the third time (1:8; 4:8). Desire always outruns possessions, no matter how vast acquisitions may grow.

5:11, 12 There are few things so satisfying in life as sleep following a hard day's work, but the greedy rarely enjoy decent rest.

5:13, 14 Misfortune literally refers to a "worthless task" (compare 3:10).

5:15 naked shall he return: The maxim that "you can't take it with you" is affirmed here (2:21).

5:16 labored for the wind: The wording is similar to “grasping for the wind” (1:14).

5:17 darkness … anger: The frugal lifestyle of the covetous prevents them from enjoying what they do have (contrast 2:24–26; 3:12, 13).

IN FOCUS

“labor”

(Heb. amal) (2:11; 5:18; Ps. 105:44; Jer. 20:18) Strong’s #5999: This noun means “toil,” or work for material gain (Ps. 127:1; Prov. 16:26), but it can also mean “trouble” or “sorrow” (Job 3:10). The effort required for work and human achievement produces “sorrow” and “troubles” in the sense that it can never satisfy the deeper needs of the human soul (6:7). However, when believers recognize that their work is a gift from God, work can become a joy (5:18–20). Our work is part of God’s plan to establish His eternal kingdom. In this sense, we can be assured that our faithful commitment to our work will have eternal consequences and reap eternal rewards (1 Cor. 3:8, 14; 15:58).

5:18, 19 God has separated the gift of enjoying something from the gift of the object itself so that we might be driven back to the Giver.

5:20 keeps him busy: The literal meaning of the verb is debated, but it appears to be a form of the verb meaning “to answer.” God keeps a person occupied and delighted primarily with Himself and then with the gifts He gives. joy of his heart: The Preacher uses the word joy in two ways: (1) “enjoyment,” an internal sense of pleasure (2:10, 26; 4:16; 9:7; 10:19), and (2) “pleasure,” pleasurable actions (2:1, 2, 10; 7:4; 11:9).

6:1, 2 God does not give him power: Prosperity without the divine gift of enjoyment amounts to nothing (5:19).

6:3 Sometimes the achievement of the greatest of goals becomes hollow when there is no decent end to life. stillborn child: Ordinarily a great sadness, the child who does not live is considered to be better off than the person who has lived poorly. If life is nothing more than a meaningless journey to death, then a stillborn is better off, for that child reaches the end of the worthless journey with less pain (vv. 4–6).

6:4–6 That one place is, as 3:20 argues, the grave. If a long life terminates in death with no prospect of anything else, will that life have been worthwhile? Long life without knowing God and without the power to enjoy it is indeed frustrating and useless.

6:7, 8 The Hebrew word for soul can also be translated appetite. If it is meant to parallel the word mouth in the first line, then appetite may be appropriate in this context. Yet the translation soul fits well in the argument of the gift being kept separate from the power to enjoy the gift (5:10).

6:9 The meaning of this proverb is that it is better making do with what we can look on and enjoy than fantasizing about desirable things that are beyond our grasp.

6:10 Whatever happens has been already known, because to name something is to know it (1:9–11). All things are foreknown and foreordained by God (1:9–11).

6:11 How is man the better? The word used for "better" is a synonym for the more common term in Ecclesiastes "profit" (Heb. yitron). The Preacher (Qohelet) does not mean that no one exists in the world, but that in a disputation with God (v. 10), what is to be gained from many words?

6:12 like a shadow: This phrase is a confirmation of the meaning of the Hebrew word translated vanity. Life passes away quickly, like a vapor. what will happen after him: The implied answer is that only God knows what will happen to us after death. Rather than imply that nothing exists beyond the grave, this book teaches that each person's life will be reviewed by God after death.

7:1 A person's death may be better than the day of birth if the name of that person has merited a lasting reputation and influence.

7:2–4 These verses expand upon the idea of v. 1. We may learn more about the meaning of life in the house of mourning than in the house of feasting.

7:5, 6 Burning thorns will provide quick flames, little heat, and a lot of noise, just like the sudden outbursts of laughter among fools; there is more noise than substance.

7:7, 8 bribe: Another form of this maxim is found in Ex. 23:8; Deut. 16:19 (read Matt. 28:11–15; Luke 22:4–6).

7:9 See James 1:19.

7:10 The temptation to glorify the past at the expense of the present must be resisted. The pleasures or advantages of those days may be more imaginary than real.

7:11 Those who find wisdom find life, argues Solomon (Prov. 8:35). Wisdom is as good as an inheritance; in fact, wisdom is even more advantageous or profitable. who see the sun: This seems to be a variation on the more familiar phrase "under the sun."

7:12 The word translated defense literally means "shade" or "shelter," a kind of protection. The Hebrew word translated here as excellence is often rendered profit in Ecclesiastes.

7:13 The crooked that needs straightening (1:15) is the presence of afflictions and adversities in life. Both prosperity and adversity come from the hand of God. For prosperity give thanks, but in adversity reflect on the goodness and comprehensiveness of the plan of God.

7:14 find out nothing: If mortals do not come to know God and His plan, they will not be able to discern anything about life (3:11) or about what will happen after they are gone.

7:15 just man: There are inequities in life that will always be a mystery (3:16–4:3; 8:14).

7:16 Do not be overly righteous: Few verses in Ecclesiastes are more susceptible to incorrect interpretation than these (vv. 16–18). This is not the so-called golden mean that advises: "Don't be too holy and don't be too wicked; sin to a moderate degree." The Preacher was warning instead about pseudoreligiosity and showy forms of worship. The Hebrew verb for "be wise" may be rendered "think yourself wise," and to "be overly righteous" would mean "righteous in your own eyes" (Prov. 3:7).

7:17 Do not be overly wicked, nor be foolish: Perhaps this could be more sharply translated as “Do not multiply{ your} wickedness and do not be a fool—why die before your time?”

7:18, 19 The this that Solomon refers to is the true wisdom that comes from the fear of God. The other is the folly of fools. fears God: True piety in reverence and awe is the best protection against either absurdity.

7:20 not a just man on earth: This language recalls Solomon’s prayer when he dedicated the temple (1 Kin. 8:46; Pss. 14:2–4; 143:2).

7:21, 22 take to heart: At times you may find another doing to you the same harmful thing that you have done to someone else.

7:23 proved by wisdom: The verb means “to put to the test.”

7:24 The theme of wisdom’s inaccessibility also appears in Job 28. The answer to this search for wisdom is that God can find wisdom (Job 28:23–28).

7:25 my heart: Here, as in 2:1, there is almost a personification of the “heart” as the Preacher talks to his heart.

7:26 Wisdom literature is filled with warnings about the loose woman (Prov. 7). However, this is balanced by the Preacher’s praise for a spouse as a gift from God (9:9).

7:27 Adding one thing to the other: The Preacher painstakingly added one thing to another to arrive at a sum total. This verse has the first two of six uses of the verb “to find”

7:28 The truth that all persons are sinners is put in a deliberate exaggeration. Man and woman mean “a good man” and “a good woman.” In the Book of Proverbs, Solomon asked the same question: “Who can find a faithful man?” (Prov 20:6).

7:29 Even though God made everything beautiful (3:11) and made human beings upright (Gen. 1:31), Solomon’s search for the “sum” had failed. Yet humankind’s search for wicked devices and intrigues had succeeded wonderfully.

8:1 The idiom “to cause one’s face to shine” (read the Levitical blessing of Num. 6:25) is an image of a person who is stable. Out of the depths of experience and understanding, that person is able to enjoy life and build up others.

8:2, 3 Subjects are obligated by an oath of allegiance to render their obedience to “the powers that be” (Rom. 13:1–5). not … stand for an evil thing: Even before a king, evil is to be resisted (Acts 5:29).

8:4, 5 What are you doing: This same question is asked of those who pretend to be able to rebuke God (Job 9:12; Dan. 4:32). The rhetorical question amounts to a firm denial of the king’s power.

8:6, 7 time and judgment: The phrase means an “appropriate time of judgment.” God will judge everyone; every matter, including judgment, has its set time (12:14).

IN CONTEXT

Death and Life

Ancient people reflected on the inevitability of death. As the Book of Ecclesiastes expresses: “No one has power in the day of death” (Eccl. 8:8). Similar reflections are found in the Gilgamesh Epic, the adventures of Gilgamesh, king of Uruk around 2600 B.C.

The Gilgamesh Epic, composed in Akkadian, has been preserved in two major versions, one from late in the Old Babylonian period (1750–1600 B.C.) and a second by Neo-Assyrian scribes (750–612 B.C.). The Neo-Assyrian version contains a scene in which Gilgamesh, in his search for immortality, passes by Siduri, the divine alewife (who is tending her beer stand on the seacoast). Her advice (in the Old Babylonian version) on the futility of his quest is quite similar to the advice of Ecclesiastes: “Live joyfully” (Eccl. 9:9).

Siduri begins by reminding Gilgamesh that it is impossible for humans to find eternal life, which the gods have reserved for themselves. Her advice to Gilgamesh is to eat, make merry, and rejoice in the feasting while he can. She tells him to enjoy the daily rounds of life: wear clean clothing, bathe himself, play with his children, and enjoy his wife. That is all, she tells him, that is allowed by the gods. Old age and death will overtake everyone. Gilgamesh continued on his search, but found that Siduri’s words reflected reality.

The writer of Ecclesiastes offers readers much the same advice: eat and drink with joy, wear clean (“white”) garments, attend to your body (“oil on your head”), and enjoy your wife (Eccl. 9:7–9). The passage in the Gilgamesh Epic shows that these ideas of Ecclesiastes were known in the ancient Near East as early as the Israelite and Judean kingdoms. Siduri’s speech proves that the idea of resignation to mortality was pondered in the ancient Near East in almost the same terms as it was by the preacher of Ecclesiastes.

8:8, 9 Since the word spirit is paralleled by the “day of death,” the term spirit in this context means “life force” (3:19).

8:10 It was difficult to see the wicked receiving a funeral procession from the city to the cemetery while the righteous were forgotten.

8:11 sentence … is not executed: There are cases when God postpones punishment, letting the guilty person live longer.

8:12, 13 The sharp contrast of the righteous and the wicked in these verses is a hallmark of Hebrew wisdom literature (Ps. 1).

8:14 according … righteous: Although there seem to be some glaring inequities in this present life, we know that God is working out His good purposes (3:16—4:3; 7:15).

8:15, 16 In contrast to the mad search for the meaning of all things is the contentment that a wise, loving God gives to those who will receive His gifts of enjoyment. Here is one of the central themes of Ecclesiastes. eat, drink, and be merry: The Preacher marks the end of the third major section of his book with this refrain. The wicked person (the fool) decides that the best thing to do is to "eat, drink, and be merry" with no thought given to the living God. But the righteous person (the wise) can enjoy life while thinking of God and His good gifts.

8:17 Solomon equates God's work with the activity that takes place on earth. Therefore, it should not be surprising that humans cannot fathom God's activity (3:11; 7:25–29; 11:5–8). The Hebrew word translated attempts can also be translated claims or thinks in this context (the word is translated think in 2 Chr. 13:8).

9:1 In the hand of God means “in God’s control and possession.” love nor hatred: Sometimes in Hebrew two opposites together are a way of saying “everything.” Love and hate are best viewed as words for God’s favor and disfavor.

9:2, 3 Some versions translate the word event as “fate” (2:14). However, there is no hint here of the power of fate as some people in antiquity believed. The word simply refers to an outcome determined by God.

9:4 In this verse, Solomon uses a proverb that says a living lowly creature is preferable to a dead exalted creature. The point is not that death is the absolute end of all things; instead, the point is that while there is life, there is hope of doing something to the glory of God.

9:5, 6 This, again, is not a flat denial of any hope beyond the grave. The point of view is limited to what can be known strictly from a human point of view, “under the sun.” they have no more reward: The Preacher’s point appears to be the same as that in the Gospel of John: One must work while it is still day (that is, while one is still alive), for the night will come when no one can work (John 9:4).

9:7 God meant for all His gifts to be enjoyed. The image of bread and wine is frequently used in Scripture as a symbol of the fact that God gives comfort and cheer to people (Gen. 14:18; 1 Sam. 16:20; 25:18; Neh. 5:15; Lam. 2:12).

9:8 It was difficult in ancient times to keep white garments clean (read the analogy in Is. 1:18). White garments and ointments—oil—were symbols of joy and purity.

9:9 Marriage is the gift of God. “Marriage is honorable” and the marriage bed should be kept “undefiled,” instructed the writer of Hebrews (13:4). Marriage is to be cherished (Prov. 5:15–20) and unfaithfulness avoided (Prov. 5:1–14). vain life: That is, life that passes so quickly.

9:10 It is possible that the apostle Paul had this verse in mind when he wrote, “And whatever you do, do it heartily, as to the Lord and not to men” (Col. 3:23). no work … in the grave: This affirmation is not a denial of a personal future state after death. Yet in relation to this world, the possibilities of working and learning have ceased. If we plan to do anything to the glory of God in this world, we had better do it while we still have time (John 9:4).

9:11–13 We would like to think that the best always win, that the deserving are always rewarded. But our experience shows that these expectations are not always realized. not to the swift … strong … wise … men of understanding … men of skill: These five assets were enjoyed by individuals. But while some planned and counted on their assets, God in the end determined their lot. Who was speedier than Asahel (2 Sam. 2:22, 23), stronger than Samson (Judg. 16:19), wiser than Solomon (1 Kin. 11:1–25), more discerning than Ahithophel (2 Sam. 16:23; 17:5–14), or more learned than Moses (Ex. 2:11–15; Acts 7:22)? Yet each met his limit and was countered by God.

9:14–18 Here is a parable about how an unstoppable military operation against a small city was prevented by the wisdom of one poor but wise man. The conclusion is that wisdom is preferable to strength and should be heeded.

10:1 Just as one fly can ruin a whole batch of ointment, so an ounce of folly will spoil a pound of wisdom.

10:2 In ancient thought, the right hand was the place of honor and favor, while the left hand was the reverse.

10:3 There are times when even a fool acts appropriately, yet he remains a fool.

10:4, 5 conciliation pacifies: This proverb is similar to many ancient sayings that were used to train courtiers and diplomats.

10:6 Folly … dignity: Things are simply not always what we think they ought to be (9:11); but God is still in control and He works His good purposes through events we do not understand.

10:7 servants on horses: In the ancient Middle East, such a reversal of the normal roles of servant and master was felt to be an outrage against society.

10:8, 9 digs a pit (v. 8): The idea of just retribution is still the expectation (Prov. 26:27). quarries stones: There are certain risks attendant to certain occupations.

10:10 The wise person will sharpen the ax. A person of limited training will have to work harder, as though with a dull ax, than someone wiser whose tools are in order.

10:11 A serpent may bite: Along with the preceding verses, the point made here is that an unused skill is wasted.

10:12, 13 It is the inability of the fool to choose his words carefully that will bring about his own destruction.

10:14 who … after him: This rhetorical question about the fool's lack of knowledge about the future is one of the repeated themes of Ecclesiastes. The same question is asked in 3:22; 6:12; 8:7; in part in 9:12; and especially in the grand conclusion of 12:14.

10:15 go to the city: If fools are so untrustworthy in ordinary affairs, how can they be trusted when they express their opinion about the hereafter?

10:16 Pity those with leaders so young or inexperienced that they lose control over their areas of responsibility or who spend their nights banqueting into the early morning.

10:17 Useful nobility expresses itself in a sense of responsibility and deference to social order. This verse is an argument for propriety. proper time: Here is Solomon's case for moderation and orderliness.

10:18 All forms of laziness bring houses and lives into disrepair.

10:19 money answers everything: Rather than being cynical or critical about wealth or the rich, this comment is to be taken in the context of the dissolute nobles (v. 16) and banqueters (v. 17). Wealth for them is only pleasure and a means of having fun.

10:20 a bird of the air: We should watch what we say, for we never know who is listening.

11:1 Cast your bread upon the waters: Verses 1–6 emphasize the element of risk and uncertainty in commercial and agricultural enterprises. Thus, if the preceding proverbs in ch. 10 deal with royalty and leaders, these in vv. 1–6 deal with common people. Men and women must venture forth judiciously if they are ever to realize a gain, even though there is always a certain amount of risk.

11:2 seven, and also to eight: This urges us to be generous to as many as possible—and then some.

11:3 Regardless of which way a tree falls, someone is going to get the use of its wood, so stop worrying that it did not fall on your side (or even hoping that it will).

11:4 will not sow: The person who is so cautious that he must wait for the ideal time before he makes a move is doomed to fail.

11:5 Some works of God defy explanation. who makes everything: The concept of God as Creator in Ecclesiastes is not limited to 12:1. The inability of humans to know God's works apart from knowing Him is one of the themes of this book (3:11; 8:17; 9:12).

11:6 which will prosper: Do not hold back from getting involved. Let the success or failure of a task rest in the hand of God—but get to the task.

11:7 light is sweet: An affirmation of the joy of life, despite all the troubles that the book has presented.

11:8 remember the days of darkness: In appreciating the opportunities of life, we must think more seriously about death. This is contrasted with the joy of working while it is still light.

11:9 If Solomon was the author of this book and wrote it late in his life, then the point becomes even more clear. He was speaking to young people (Prov. 1:8; 2:1; 3:1), encouraging them to learn the lessons that he had learned over the course of his extraordinary life. Walk in the ways of your heart: This verse is not an invitation to live sinfully in sensual pleasure (as Num. 15:39 describes). Instead, it urges young people to enjoy themselves completely while not forgetting that God will review the quality of their life (3:17; 12:14).

11:10 Tragically, youth does not last; it too passes like a vapor. We all seem to discover that "we get old too soon and smart too late."

12:1–8 Most interpreters have argued that this poem is an allegory of old age. This is the view advocated here. Other views include: (1) a description of a winter's day as a metaphor of old age; (2) a description of people's reaction to a fearful thunderstorm; (3) the figure of a ruined house representing the failure of human efforts; and (4) the decay of a house representing death and human frailty.

12:1 Remember now your Creator: Solomon does not call for mere mental cognizance of the person of God; in robust biblical terms he calls for the appropriate actions that go along with that recollection of the living God. For example, when the Lord "remembered" Hannah (1 Sam. 1:19), He did more than call her to mind; He acted on her behalf and she conceived a child. Our "remembering" of Him is to be in thought, word, and act.

12:2 The person is losing his sight.

12:3 Verses 3–6 list the bodily infirmities that increasingly hinder an older person from serving God. If the house stands for the aging body, then the keepers are the arms and hands. strong men bow down: The legs are bent in feebleness and the knees cannot be depended on for support. grinders cease: The teeth, now fewer than before, cannot chew the food as well as they once did. those that look through the windows grow dim: The eyes begin to lose their sight.

12:4 doors are shut in the streets: Just as the jaws of Leviathan are called the "doors of his face" (Job 41:14), so the lips and jaws are possibly intended here. sound of grinding is low: A depiction of toothless old age when eating only soft foods makes little or no noise. daughters of music are brought low: The ability to hear—and thus the ability to make and enjoy music—wanes.

12:5 afraid of height: Things that used to be a regular part of life now become threatening. almond tree blossoms: Hair turns white. grasshopper is a burden: This may refer to the halting step of the elderly as they hobble along on their canes. desire fails: This is generally understood as a reference to a vanishing sexual desire. Then comes death: eternal home.

12:6 Some suggest that silver cord refers to the spinal cord. golden bowl is broken: This may refer to the brain. pitcher shattered at the fountain: One suggestion is that this is a failing heart. wheel broken at the well: The system of veins and arteries radiating out from the heart might have appeared to the ancients like the spokes on a wheel. An alternative explanation of this verse is that each of the four images represent death.

That is, there is no physical representation intended in these images as in those of vv. 3–5. Instead, this verse describes the destruction of four significant objects—a demonstration of the finality of this life.

Old Age Comes to All

Young people commonly think and act as if they were going to live forever. For that reason, Eccl. 12 paints a picture of old age and introduces it to young people with the warning, "Remember your Creator in the days of your youth."

Certainly there are many elderly who defy this portrait. Yet in the main, the conditions mentioned are typical. Ecclesiastes warns the young to remember God before earthly life ends. Several images convey the coming of death and mourning: a silver cord is loosened, a bowl is broken, a pitcher is shattered, a wheel ceases to turn (12:6), the "dust" of the body returns to earth (12:7; compare Gen. 3:19; Job 34:15), and the spirit goes to God, presumably for judgment (Eccl. 12:7, 14).

This is the fate of every human being. No matter how young or old we are, every day each of us is a bit closer to death. Given that reality, Ecclesiastes challenges young people to live unto God, for life is empty and meaningless without Him.

12:7 dust will return: These words refer clearly to the universal fate of the descendants of Adam and Eve. spirit will return: This is a clear allusion to Gen. 2:7. The term spirit is the same used in earlier passages (3:19, 21; 8:8).

12:8 The refrain of vanity—the brevity of life—is here repeated. It is possible that the book originally ended with these words.

12:9 Early on in his book, the Preacher speaks of his pursuit of wisdom (1:12–2:26). It is possible that he speaks of himself here in the third person (as in 1:1, 2). Probably it was an editor under the guiding hand of God who wrote these evaluations of Solomon, much as Joshua or some other editor wrote an evaluation of Moses under the influence of God's Spirit (Deut. 34). pondered … sought out … set in order: The three verbs that describe Solomon's activity may also be translated "weighed … examined … and arranged."

12:10 The Preacher devotes special care to write acceptable words—pleasant words, words of grace—and words of truth. The truth referred to here is the truth from God.

12:11 Just as an ox goad prods an animal in the right direction, so will the words of this book when they are properly understood. well-driven nails: The nails, or "pegs," referred to here are the same as in 2 Chr. 3:9; Jer. 10:4. These are hooks in tents where families hung the clothes and pots needed for everyday life. Here they refer to mental hooks giving stability and perspective to life. by one Shepherd: Kings were typically compared to shepherds, and Solomon is claiming that the source of his ideas is God, the Shepherd of Israel (Ps. 80:1).

12:12 Many other books may weary their readers. Careful study of Ecclesiastes will have the opposite effect as it instructs, warns, and admonishes its readers.

12:13 To fear God is one of the major themes of this book and of wisdom literature in the OT. To fear God is to respond to Him in awe, reverence, and wonder, to serve Him in purity of action, and to shun evil and any worship of anything else in His universe. keep His commandments: The commandments of the Law are in view here. Jesus summed them up as to "love the LORD your God" and "your neighbor as yourself" (Matt. 22:34–40). man's all: We are whole or complete only when we fear God and obey His commandments. What profit is there in living? If we follow what this book has said, we will have a relationship with God and find life in Him.

12:14 judgment: This same teaching is echoed by the apostle Paul in 2 Cor. 5:10. Death is not the end. All of life will be reviewed by our righteous Lord (3:17). Life must be lived through faith with the values of the eternal God in view.

The Song of Solomon

THE SONG OF SOLOMON IS A MOVING LOVE story between a young country girl and King Solomon. In delicate poetry, the lovers express intense passion and deep longing for each other. The young girl compares her love for her husband to the anticipation of a frantic search, while Solomon likens his bride's beauty to picturesque gardens and delicious fruit. Yet even in this eloquent expression of the passion between a bride and bridegroom, there is an exhortation to remain sexually pure before marriage (2:7). In this way, the book celebrates human sexuality within the context of marriage.

The book has not always been understood in this way. Jewish scholars around the time of the birth of Christ interpreted the book allegorically, stating that it describes the love of God for Israel. Similarly, some Christians have taught that the book speaks of the mystical relationship of the Lord Jesus Christ and His bride, the church.

However, one does not need to get into allegorical meanings to understand this book. The Song of Solomon celebrates the beauty and intimacy of married love in a narrative poem. It teaches that a lasting marriage requires dedication, commitment, and strong loyalty between husband and wife. The Song also presents an idealized picture of how human love can be expressed under God's blessing. This is a very important issue. Some critics have claimed that Christianity's standards for marriage ignore or undervalue sexual relationships. But the Song of Solomon refutes this. It reiterates the biblical admonition against sex outside of marriage, but it also affirms that God not only approves of, but also encourages, sexual pleasure within marriage.

Perhaps nowhere in the Bible is the literary culture of the Middle East more apparent than in this book. The genre or literary form of the Song of Solomon is unique in the Bible. It is a lyric idyll, a type of love song. As in the case of the Book of Job, the Song of Solomon reveals its treasures to the patient reader who approaches the book on its own terms, searching for and meditating on its meaning. The form of the lyric idyll displays two features. The first is that speeches and events do not necessarily follow in chronological order. At times the story line remains suspended while the audience views scenes from earlier or yet untold incidents.

A second feature of the lyric idyll is the use of the chorus. In addition to the two characters that carry the story line—the Shulamite and King Solomon—a group of women interrupt certain scenes with brief musical speeches or warnings. Solomon uses the chorus to make transitions from one scene to another, as well as to add emphasis to important themes.

The Song of Solomon retells the romance between King Solomon, the richest king ever to rule Israel, and his beloved bride, who came from a small village in the region of Galilee. Solomon owned vineyards all over the nation. One was close to Baal Hamon in the northernmost part of Galilee near the foothills of the mountains of Lebanon. On one of his visits to this vineyard, Solomon met a young woman. Strangely we never learn her name. She is called simply the Shulamite. For some time he pursued her and made periodic visits to her country home to see her. Finally, he proposed. The Shulamite gave much thought to whether she really loved Solomon and could be happy in the palace of a king. Finally she accepted.

If the Bible is the book about God, then one may well ask what a narrative about human sexuality has to do with theology. This is an even more potent question when one observes that God is never mentioned in the entire text (except possibly in 8:6) nor are there any references to prayer, worship, or piety. In this respect it bears similarities to the Book of Esther, which also does not mention God. Nevertheless, Esther is a story of the redemption of God’s people and includes episodes of prayer, fasting, and thanksgiving. Such themes are notably absent from Solomon’s poetic story, making it unique among the books of the Bible.

To resolve this difficulty, it is important to remember that the Bible not only describes who God is and what God does; it also tells us what God desires for His people. The Song of Solomon provides an example of how God created male and female to live in happiness and fulfillment. People are created as sexual beings. It would be wrong to suggest that the full experience of our humanity is impossible apart from sexual union in marriage, since this would disqualify the widowed, divorced, and celibate—including our Savior, who was celibate. At the same time, God ordained marriage from the beginning of creation: man and woman were to become one flesh (Gen. 2:25).

Because of its emphasis on human love, this book presents an extraordinary variety of expressions for love, perhaps the richest selection in all Hebrew Scripture. But within this celebration of love, the book condemns unchaste relations outside of marriage—and in particular, sexual experimentation before marriage. Indeed, this book may contain the Bible's strongest argument for chastity before marriage. Ironically because of its explicit language, ancient and modern Jewish sages forbade men to read the book before they were thirty (and presumably kept women from reading it at all). We cannot ignore the sexual content of the book, but we can appreciate the context in which it is placed—a godly marriage. The Song of Solomon is necessary reading not only for the married but also for young people who want to understand God's design for marriage.

The author of the Song of Solomon is Solomon, the son of David and the third king of Israel. He is named as the author and his name appears seven times in the book (1:1, 5; 3:7, 9, 11; 8:11, 12). Even so, some have argued that the references to Solomon may be only a stylistic device and the author may have been from a later period. The arguments for this are inconclusive. But the fact that Solomon was known for his wisdom and poetry (1 Kin. 4:29–34) partially substantiates his authorship of this book.

Commentary

1:1 Like the superlative expressions “holy of holies” or “king of kings,” song of songs means “the loveliest of songs.” which is Solomon’s: There are two principal speakers in this book, the woman (the Shulamite) and the man (Solomon). Even though Solomon wrote this book, the point of view is largely that of his bride.

1:2 This prologue to the book forms the emotional setting for all that follows. love: The Hebrew noun used here means sexual love, as it clearly does in Ezek. 16:8 (Prov. 7:18; Ezek. 23:17). This is the Hebrew word that most closely approximates the Greek word eros. In the Song of Solomon, this plural word (a mark of intensity) speaks of divinely blessed lovemaking (used also in v. 4; 4:10; 7:12; compare 5:1).

1:3 ointments: It was customary in biblical times to rub the body with fragrant ointments (oils) after a bath in preparation for a festive occasion (Ruth 3:3). your name: The Shulamite speaks of her beloved’s reputation as akin to a lovely aroma; he was an object of desire to young women everywhere. The term virgins is the same word used at Is. 7:14. The word means women of marriageable age (they are the same as the “daughters of Jerusalem” in v. 5). love: Here the common Hebrew verb meaning “to love” is used of romantic feelings (as in Gen. 24:67); in other passages this verb means to choose someone (an act of the will; Deut. 6:5). Thus this Hebrew verb shares some, but not all, of the meanings of the Greek verb agapao.

1:4 The complexity of the interchanges in this book are illustrated in this verse. The headings help sort out the speakers. The king: This is Solomon; yet aside from the title (v. 1), he is not identified by name as a protagonist until 3:7, 9, 11 (his name in v. 5 is part of a descriptive phrase). chambers: This means the bridal chamber. The verse ends with the thoughts of the young woman as she gazes at her lover: Rightly do they love you employs the verb for love found in v. 3, indicating romantic feelings.

1:5 The Shulamite compares her dark coloring, acquired from long hours working in the vineyards (v. 6) with the lighter complexion of the city maidens. The point here is her class and station in life. Unlike the young women of the court in Jerusalem who had been raised in comfort and conditions of ease, this woman had worked as a field hand under the blazing sun. but lovely: She knows that her beauty is not diminished by her more rugged manner of living. Her groom assures her that this is truly the case (v. 8). The rare term lovely is used to describe physical beauty in this book (v. 10; 2:14; 4:3; 6:4; compare the word in v. 8); in the Psalms this word speaks of the beauty of true worship to the living God (Pss. 33:1; 147:1). O daughters of Jerusalem: These are women who serve as the attendants of the bride. These woman also serve as the chorus in the book. They are the same as the "virgins" of v. 3.

1:6 Her own vineyard refers to her appearance. Unlike the beautiful women of the royal court, the Shulamite had not had the lifestyle or the resources to take much time for her appearance. Still, it was she who swept away the king's heart. The Shulamite uses the word vineyard again with a different twist in 8:12.

1:7 you whom I love: A more literal rendering might be, "whom my soul (my inner being) loves." Here the young woman mentally addresses Solomon, her husband. She pictures him as the shepherd of Israel. one who veils herself: Solomon, as king, was busy with affairs of state. The young bride does not want to veil herself as a prostitute would in order to get his attention, nor does she want to be left alone. She desires to be his true companion.

1:8 If you do not know … feed your little goats: It would be better if she returned to the borders of Lebanon and the life of the farm rather than live alone and anxious in Solomon's palace. The point of this verse is that one should always count the cost of marriage to a particular person before the marriage. O fairest among women: The term fairest is the usual Hebrew word for "beautiful."

1:9 Here is yet another term for love in the book, the rarer word meaning "dear companion" (compare at vv. 2, 3). my filly: In Solomon's time the horse was the companion of kings. Solomon loved horses, particularly those from Egypt. Eventually he had a stable of twelve thousand horses with 1,400 chariots (1 Kin. 10:26).

1:10 Steeds were ornamented with costly harnesses and the most elegant of headgear. In return for her affirmative response to his advances, the king promises costly gifts. She is indeed beautiful, but with the expensive adornments that he will give her she will have an unsurpassable beauty. She is to have necklaces of silver discs and gold beads. Such jewelry is to replace the poor ornaments worn by the maiden.

1:11 ornaments: These are kind words from the women of the court (1:4). Their kindness is remarkable, since each of these women may have hoped to be chosen by the king (as v. 3 indicates).

IN DEPTH

The Sweet-Smelling Aroma of Love

Smell is the most evocative of the senses, and so it is not surprising that the Song of Solomon, like many romantic poems, alludes to numerous scents and fragrances. All have to do with the sweet-smelling aroma of love: • Spikenard (Song 1:12; 4:13–14), a fragrant, costly oil derived from the dried roots and stems of nard, an herb of Asia. It could be used either as an ointment or made into expensive perfume.

• Myrrh (1:13; 3:6; 4:14; 5:5, 13), an aromatic, resinous extract of a stiff-branched tree with white flowers and plum-like fruit. Myrrh was an ingredient in anointing oil (Ex. 30:23) and perfume (Ps. 45:8; Prov. 7:17), and was used in purification rites for women (Esth. 2:12).

• Henna (Song 1:14; 4:13), a large plant whose fragrant white flowers were often exchanged as a token of friendship. Solomon was known to have henna vineyards at En Gedi. The plants were used to make an orange-red dye valued as a cosmetic.

• Cedar (1:17), the aromatic wood of the massive evergreen trees which in Solomon's time covered the hills and mountains of Lebanon (hence the "fragrance of Lebanon," 4:11). Solomon imported enormous quantities of cedar in order to build the temple and other projects, including his palace complex known as the House of the Forest of Lebanon (1 Kin. 5:1–10; 7:1–8)—perhaps the location of the scene described in Song 1:17.

• Frankincense (3:6; 4:6, 14), an aromatic gum resin obtained from the Boswellia tree in northeast Africa and Arabia. The highly fragrant substance was used in the Hebrew religious rites (Ex. 30:7, 34; Lev. 2:1; 24:7) and was considered a symbol of religious fervor. Frankincense was a valuable item of trade in the ancient world.

• Saffron (Song 4:14), a product of crocus blooms which were dried and pressed into cakes. The product was used as a coloring for curries and stews, or as a perfume for floors and especially for weddings.

• Calamus (4:14), or sweet cane, a fragrant, reed-like grass that grew along streams and river banks. The leaves are ginger-flavored when crushed. Calamus is listed as an ingredient of the anointing oil used in Hebrew worship (Ex. 30:23).

• Cinnamon (Song 4:14), a product of the cinnamon tree native to Ceylon. The oil of the tree was used as a perfume both for secular (Prov. 7:17) and religious (Ex. 30:32) purposes.

• Aloes (Song 4:14), the highly valued wood of the large eaglewood tree native to India. It was made into perfume and incense.

• Apples (2:5; 7:8), or possibly apricots, which may have been imported from groves in the Caucasus region to the north of Canaan.

• Mandrakes (7:13), perennial herbs with dark green leaves and small bluish-purple flowers in winter. The plant's spring-time fruit is yellow, fragrant, and sweet. Said to have narcotic qualities, mandrakes were called "love apples" and were used as a love potion (compare Gen. 30:14–16).

1:12 his table: That is, the setting of the wedding banquet.

1:13, 14 This verse refers to an oriental custom for a woman to wear a small bag of myrrh, a perfumed ointment, around her neck at night. All the next day a lovely fragrance would linger about her. The young woman says that beginning that night, it would be her husband who would lie with her. my beloved: Here the noun beloved is related to the word translated "love" in v. 2, referring to sexual love. En Gedi: David, Solomon's father, had found refreshment and protection from the vindictive king Saul in this oasis on the eastern shore of the Dead Sea (1 Sam. 24).

1:15 Behold, you are fair: The word fair means "beautiful" (as in v. 8). my love: This term is used for the first time in the book; it means "dear friend." dove's eyes: The idea is purity, innocence and beauty (4:1; 5:12; compare 2:14; 5:2).

1:16 The word handsome used here is the masculine counterpart of the term translated "fair" in v. 15.

1:17 beams of our houses are cedar: Houses may mean "grand house" or "mansion." As the Shulamite lies on their wedding bed (v. 16), she observes the marvelous cedar beams above her head. The opulence of Solomon's personal and public buildings in Jerusalem is well documented (1 Kin. 7:1–12).

2:1 I am the rose of Sharon. The Plain of Sharon was famous for its flowers and pasturelands. The maiden is saying, I am merely a flower of the plain. I am only one among a host of others.

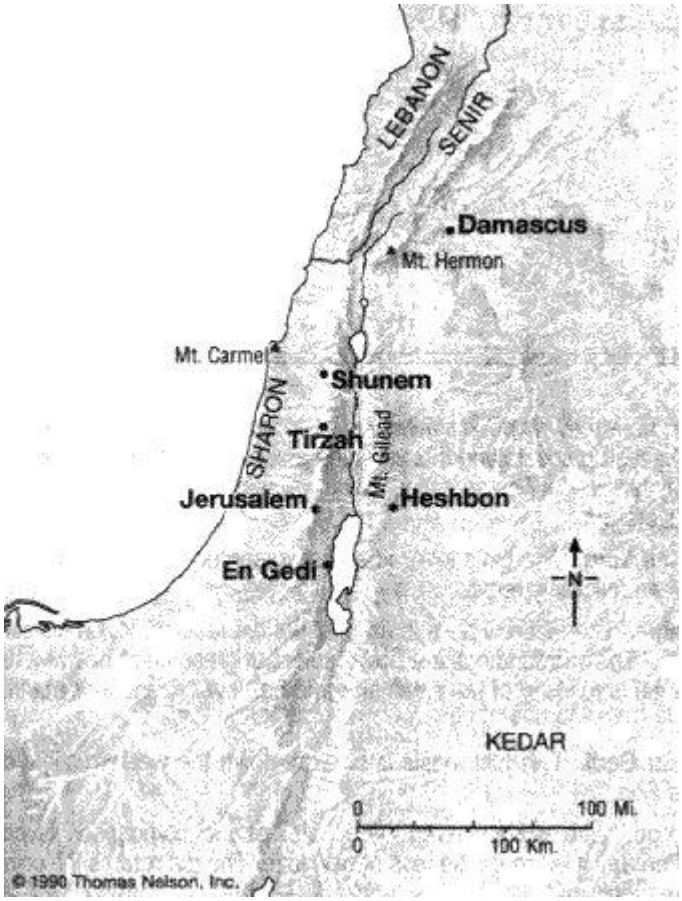
2:2 Solomon takes the young bride's words (v. 1) comparing herself to a simple flower and assures her that, beside her, the fancy women of the city are but thorns.

2:3 The apple tree and the raisin cakes (v. 5) are symbols for sexual passion in ancient love songs.

2:4 the banqueting house: The literal meaning of the phrase is "the house of wine," used because of the role that wine plays not only in feasting, but especially in weddings in biblical cultures (1:2). In the Bible, wine is a symbol of joy (Ps. 104:15) and the drinking of wine is associated with joyful occasions. his banner: This may be the same term as used in Num. 1:52, meaning "standard" or "flag." Even today, Jewish weddings take place under a "banner" or covering. love: This is the first use in the book of the common noun for love related to the verb in v. 3. This noun corresponds somewhat to the well-known Greek noun agape, which refers to a self-sacrificial love for others (1 Cor. 13).

2:5, 6 These verses describe the joy of sexual expression between a husband and wife. raisins … apples: Ancient symbols of sexual passion (v. 3). lovesick: These are the words of one overwhelmed with love.

2:7 Here the Shulamite speaks to her attendants in their virginity and entreats them (I charge you) to maintain their sexual purity until marriage (3:5; 8:4). by the gazelles … does: She beseeches the young women by all things that are beautiful. love: This is the noun used in v. 4, demonstrating that this word may also be used of sexual passion. The association of this charge with the description of sexual intimacy in v. 6 suggests that the warning is against awakening such desires before it pleases—that is, at the proper and appropriate time within the bounds of marriage. While the Book of Proverbs frequently exhorts young men to live in sexual purity (Prov. 7), the Song of Solomon frequently addresses its warnings to young women.



Places Named in the Song of Solomon

From the peaks of Lebanon to the streets of Jerusalem (4:8; 6:4), the love story in the Song of Solomon takes place in a variety of settings. The lovers speak of, and to, each other with several word pictures, including "the rose of Sharon" (2:1), "the lily of the valleys" (2:1), and "the vineyards of En Gedi" (1:14).

2:8, 9 leaping … skipping: This is the young bride's imaginative way of recalling the joy she experienced at her husband's arrival. The same is true of her words for him: gazelle … stag, animals that symbolize virility. windows … lattice: That is, Solomon was looking at her through an opening in the wall.

2:10 my love: A term of endearment meaning "my dear friend" (1:15). my fair one: Solomon describes his bride as "beautiful" (1:8, 15).

2:11–13 the winter is past: By this Solomon means that the time of joy has come; it is the summer of their love. Solomon may have come at a time of great beauty in the fields and forests where the young woman lived; he uses the beauty of creation to describe the ripeness of time for their love.

2:14 Solomon's great find in this young woman is occasioned in part by her shy charm. in the clefts: Solomon speaks of the Shulamite using a figure of speech describing her isolated home in the mountains.

2:15 The Shulamite's brothers called on Solomon to catch them the foxes. Many times they had seen little foxes creep into the vineyards they tended and destroy the roots by gnawing on them. The vine of the budding love of the couple was tender and needed to be protected from these "little foxes," which symbolize the problems of life that may gnaw away at a relationship.

2:16 My beloved is mine, and I am his: The expression describes the mutual intimacy that a married couple experiences. Both belong to each other (6:3; compare 7:10).

2:17 Until the day breaks: Here the woman wishes the king to leave for the night. The book is pervaded with the sense of doing what is right at the appropriate time. Here, she wishes him to flee like a gazelle. Later, she will want him to rush to her like one (8:14).

3:1 on my bed: This is a dream that took place before they were married. The young woman was becoming concerned about what she would be getting into in this royal marriage.

3:2, 3 Her frantic search for her beloved is initially unsuccessful. Twice in these verses she describes him as the one I love. In each case, the wording is “the one whom my soul (or my inner being) loves.”

3:4 At last she finds him, using the same phrasing (the one I love) of vv. 2, 3. In her dream she takes him to her mother’s house. That is, the worry of his absence is intolerable to her; she wants him to move back with her to her familiar home and lifestyle.

3:5 do not stir up: Again there is a strong warning against premarital sex. People should not allow sexual passion to stir before they have gotten to know each other in other ways (2:8–17), until they have worked out the problems of their relationship (the “little foxes,” 2:15–17), and until they have counted the costs of marriage (3:1–4).

IN CONTEXT

A King's Procession

The royal procession described in Song 3:6–11 reflects the splendor and pageantry that marked Solomon's reign. He was known for his wealth (1 Kin. 3:13; 10:23), and Scripture reports on the elaborate ceremony with which he dedicated the temple (1 Kin. 8; 2 Chr. 6). The poem's depiction of Solomon's retinue "coming out of the wilderness" on its way to the royal wedding recalls the comment of the Queen of Sheba, who, having seen the magnificence of Solomon's court, admitted that "the half was not told me."

Some of the noteworthy features of the royal procession include: • Its size (3:6). It creates a great cloud of dust along the road, "like pillars of smoke."

• Its attractiveness (3:6). The dust of the procession is mingled with fragrant wafts of myrrh, frankincense, and other aromatic powders. The observer is drawn toward the spectacle by its delightful scent.

• The royal guard (3:7, 8). Sixty hand-picked men surround Solomon as an escort.

• The elaborate litter (3:9, 10). Solomon's "couch" (3:7) or "palanquin," like so many other furnishings of his court, is made of cedar, imported from Lebanon. The wood is either covered, decorated, or used in conjunction with supports of silver and gold. The cushions, and perhaps the curtains as well, are made from purple, a costly cloth as valuable as gold in the ancient world.

Perhaps on this special occasion the chair is adorned with flowers —"paved with love by the daughters of Jerusalem." The palanquin is probably borne by a detachment of slaves, though the text does not mention them.

• A throng of cheering women (3:11). The women of Jerusalem greet the procession, perhaps singing and dancing as on other festive occasions (Ex. 15:20; 1 Sam. 18:6–7).

3:6 Who is this coming: Contrast the bold, royal journey here with the earlier, playful approach in 2:8. pillars of smoke: This is language reminiscent of a divine visitation (Ex. 19:18). perfumed: The precious ointments here are marks of luxury and royalty; later, on the woman, these elements would be symbols of love (4:6).

3:7, 8 The couch was a sedan chair with poles projecting from the front and back so that a person could be carried by several bearers (vv. 9, 10). The Shulamite was being carried to the wedding and to her groom on Solomon's own couch. valiant men: The term describes war heroes, as v. 8 explains. fear: That is, these warriors were prepared for any threat.

3:9, 10 Apparently Solomon had ordered this couch (vv. 7, 8) to be designed and built especially for the wedding. To the Shulamite, the couch's rich ornamentation of silver and gold is less significant than the fact that the couch represents Solomon's love and care for her (2:4).

3:11 O daughters of Zion: These are the Daughters of Jerusalem (1:5). and see: For a wedding to be recognized in ancient Israel, it had to be a public event. Such a day has always been regarded as a day of gladness (Ps. 19:5). the crown: Solomon's royal symbol was appropriately worn at this wedding.

4:1 Solomon lavishly praises his bride's great beauty. He uses verbal symbols of loveliness to paint a picture of the breathtaking charm of the Shulamite. Dove's eyes (2:14) are a picture of purity, innocence, and beauty (as in 1:15). The bride's veil would have covered the rest of her face, leaving only her beautiful eyes to be seen (2:14; 5:7). The king compared the movement of her flowing hair to the graceful movement of a flock of goats in their descent down from Mount Gilead.

4:2–5 The king rhapsodizes on the perfection of his bride's teeth, her lips and facial features, her neck, and at last her breasts. Scarlet (v. 3) describes luxuriance and beauty; the pomegranate speaks of sweetness; the term lovely is the same rare word used first in 1:5. The tower of David (v. 4) pictures strength and grace; the fawns (v. 5) have exquisite loveliness.

4:6 Until the day breaks: The couple's first night together was a precious time (8:14). the mountain of myrrh … the hill of frankincense: These playful names again give us a glimpse into their passionate love for each other (1:13, 14; 2:6).

4:7 fair: The king has used this term for beauty before (v. 1). However, the difference here is in the word all. Now he rhapsodizes on how perfect his bride is; every part of her is attractive.

4:8 These words demonstrate Solomon's sensitivity to his new bride's emotions at this point. He calls her mind back from thoughts afar off. He says, "Come back with me." His use of the word spouse for the first time is appropriate here on their wedding bed (vv. 9, 10, 11, 12; 5:1).

4:9 My sister, my spouse: This strange pairing of words was based on the idea that in marriage a couple became "related." The woman was dignified as a member of the king's family.

4:10 your love … your love: That is, erotic love.

4:11 lips … honey and milk: The sweetness of his bride's kisses are like food to him (5:1; compare 1:2).

4:12 spring … fountain: Solomon evokes thoughts of refreshment and delight. His use of the words enclosed … shut up … sealed indicate, in a poetic manner, his wife's virginity on their wedding night. This was the treasure she brought to him, and which she adjured the other young women in the court to maintain for their wedding nights as well (2:7).

4:13–15 pleasant fruits: These verses expand the images of the garden and the fountain for sexual love from v. 12.

“beloved”

(Heb. dod) (4:16; 1 Sam. 14:50; Prov. 7:18; Is. 5:1) Strong’s #1730: In Hebrew love poetry, dod is a term of endearment used for a male loved one, usually translated beloved (Is. 5:1). The writer of the Song of Solomon uses this word 32 times. The name David is derived from dod and carries the same sense, meaning “Beloved One.” When dod is used in narrative, it means “uncle” or another close male relative (1 Sam. 14:50).

4:16 The bride is now ready to accept her lover for the first time to her garden. She calls on the wind to blow through. That is, she is ready to make love to her husband for the first time.

5:1 drunk my wine: This verse is a necessary part of the preceding chapter. At the conclusion of their lovemaking, the groom speaks of his complete satisfaction in his beautiful bride.

5:2–7 I sleep: These words begin a section (vv. 2–8) that most likely is another dream sequence (3:1–5). The bride dreams that her lover is coming to her, but she has already washed, removed her robe, and gotten into bed (v. 3). She finally goes to the door to let him in, but he is gone. Her sorrow at this drives her into the city to search for him. The watchmen find her and are hostile toward her.

5:8, 9 The bride asks the daughters of Jerusalem to help her in her search. But they question what is so special about the one for whom she seeks.

5:10 My beloved is white and ruddy. The bride responds to the question of v. 9 with a poem extolling the handsomeness of her husband.

5:11–16 His head is like the finest gold (literally, gold of gold). Gold that has been doubly refined. His eyes with irises surrounded by clear white were perfectly spaced and are set as gems in a ring. His beard upon his cheeks is compared to beds of aromatic plants. His lips are pictured as the dispensers of spices and myrrh. His hands resemble golden cylinders, and his body reminds her of polished ivory. His legs are symbols of strength and stability. They are pillars of marble or alabaster set upon foundations of purest gold. His mouth: The members of Solomon have been described in striking terms. He is, however, no inanimate statue. Most pleasing of all is the voice that emanates from this noble and commanding man. His voice is altogether lovely (i.e., melodious).

6:1 The chorus members now join in the search. In the dream sequence, we suspect that the chorus is well aware of his location. It is only the bride who needs to discover his whereabouts.

6:2 his garden … his flock: This is a change of language from 4:12–16. On their wedding night, the bride presented herself to Solomon as his garden. But he has another "garden" to tend as well, and it is one in which he also takes great pleasure. This is the "garden" of his work, his responsibility as the king of Israel. The flock is the people; the lilies represent the produce of the land. This realization leads to the strong affirmation in the next verse that the husband and wife belong to each other. Another use of the word garden occurs in 6:11.

6:3 I am my beloved's, and my beloved is mine: These words are an inversion of the words of 2:16; compare also 7:10. He feeds his flock among the lilies: With these words the bride comes to terms with the reality that, as much as she and the king are in love, he still has other responsibilities and so does she. His work as king makes him the shepherd of his people, yet his love for her does not necessarily diminish because of his devotion to his work.

6:4–7 beautiful … lovely: The first is the word usually translated "fair" (1:8, 15; 4:1); the second is the rarer word for beauty used first in 1:5. Tirzah … Jerusalem: Solomon idealizes the beauty of these cities, even as people speak of beautiful cities in our own day. army with banners: From a distance, there is a kind of beauty in the sight of an army, especially for a king.

6:8, 9 sixty … eighty: This use of numbers is a rhetorical device to emphasize that the bride alone is Solomon's love. praised: Here is a use of this verb in a context other than the worship of God.

6:10 morning … moon … sun: The king's rapture at the very thought of his wife lifts his soul to the heavens.

6:11 Here the term garden refers to the Shulamite's homeland.

Who Was the Shulamite?

In only one instance does the Song of Solomon identify the bride in the poem as "the Shulamite" (Song 6:13), and no other references directly reveal her identity. Who, then, was this young woman who so passionately became the object of Solomon's affections? Several suggestions have been made: • She may have been a woman from Shunem, a town in the territory of Issachar near Jezreel (Josh. 19:18). If so, she would have been known as a Shunammite, but by interchanging the Hebrew letters lamed ("l") and nun ("n"), which was commonly done, she could also have been known as a Shulamite.

• She may have been Abishag, the Shunammite maiden who was at David's side in his old age (1 Kin. 1:1–4, 15). Upon David's death, one of his sons, Adonijah, requested that he be given Abishag. But this was improper in that Solomon, David's named successor, was entitled to her along with David's other wives and concubines (2:17–22).

• It may be that "Shulamite" could also be rendered "Shelomith," which would make the name a feminine title related to the name Solomon, "the Solomoness."

6:12, 13 The chorus calls the bride back from her daydreams and reminds her that she is Solomon's queen. Shulamite: The term is not a name but a title. It may mean "a woman from the village of Shulam." However, the hometown of the woman is usually thought to be Shunem. Her title sounds very much like the Hebrew pronunciation for the name Solomon. Both words are related to the Hebrew word for peace (shalom). the dance of the two camps: In Hebrew, the word is Mahanaim, the town where David fled as a fugitive from Absalom (2 Sam. 17:24). The woman offers to dance before her beloved so that he might enjoy her beauty in lovely motion.

7:1–4 Solomon rhapsodizes on the beauty of his bride. In the eyes of love, one's lover has a beauty that transcends what others might see. prince's daughter: Although of common birth (1:2), the Shulamite has regal beauty. the curves of your thighs: The Hebrew wording suggests not only her form but the fluid motion of her dance (6:13).

7:5 Your head crowns you like Mount Carmel: The marginal reading crimson, from Heb. karmil, preserves the parallelism with the next clause better. Her flowing tresses and beautiful head are a source of greater delight to Solomon. The king is literally captivated by them.

7:6 This verse summarizes the king's joy in her beauty. fair: This term (here a verb) for beauty is used often in the book (1:8, 15). love: Here he uses the common noun for love as in 2:4.

7:7, 8 palm tree: This is a sexual image that has its basis in the pollination of palm trees. To fertilize a female palm tree, the gardener climbs the male tree and takes some of its flowers. Then he climbs the female tree and ties the pollen-bearing flowers among its branches.

7:9, 10 desire: This word is used only three times in the Bible. Here it clearly means "sexual longing."

7:11, 12 She was familiar with all the environs, but especially the vineyards (1:6; compare 8:12). my love: This refers to a sexual embrace (the same word is used in 1:2).

7:13 From early times, mandrakes were associated with fertility (Gen. 30:14).

8:1, 2 like my brother: The love of the bride for her beloved was so intense that she wished that she had known him dearly his entire life.

A flowering pomegranate. In Bible times the juice of this fruit made a pleasant drink (Song 8:2).

8:2 spiced wine: The wines of the ancient world were often flavored with aromatic spices on special occasions (Prov. 9:2).

8:3, 4 left … right: The repetition of 2:6, 7 punctuates both the joy of sexual intimacy within marriage and the warnings against sexual activity before marriage.

8:5 The king takes his bride back to her home country for a visit. The apple tree symbolizes the place where the Shulamite had been awakened sexually and where her mother had given birth to her.

8:6 A seal is a symbol of possession or ownership. The Shulamite wants the king to feel a total ownership of her in his heart. She is committed only to him; and she wants him to be completely committed to her. As long as she resides in his heart, she feels secure. She knows that love deeply rooted in a heart commitment is intense—strong as death—and passionate—like flames of fire.

8:7 quench … despised: The point of this powerful verse is that true love cannot be destroyed, and neither can it be purchased.

8:8 The Shulamite came from a fatherless home where she had been raised by her mother and brothers (1:6). They alternated between protective concern for her and anger with her. But in her growing up, her brothers had protected her.

8:9 If … a wall: By this the brothers meant that they would praise her for virtue and strength during puberty. if … a door: However, if she were loose, like a swinging door, they would have to protect her from herself and from untoward advances by young men.

8:10 The woman explains that she has been virtuous in her youth—a wall—and she will remain faithful in her adulthood—towers. In this way she discovers peace. How unexpected to find this rich Hebrew word used here of sexual completion.

8:11, 12 Solomon owned many vineyards, some in areas remote from Jerusalem. Baal Hamon ("Lord of Hamon") was a site near Shunem, the town near where the Shulamite may have been raised. It was customary for an absentee owner to lease out a vineyard. As Solomon's vineyard had been entrusted to the Shulamite's brothers, so had the Shulamite. After caring for this vineyard, the brothers earned one thousand shekels profit. But they also cared for and protected the king's other "vineyard," the Shulamite. Now, she requests that her brothers be rewarded with two hundred shekels profit. My own vineyard: This phrase takes us back to 1:6 where the Shulamite makes a play on words with vineyard. Here she sees that vineyard of old (7:12), but indicates that she now has another "vineyard" to tend—her dear husband.

8:13 The companions: This may be a reference to the woman's friends living nearby.

8:14 Make haste: During the period of courtship, the young woman had asked her suitor to run away like a gazelle … stag, lest they become entangled with passion too soon. Now, in their married love, she wishes he would rush to her (4:6). the mountains of spices: That is, she wants him to return to her loving embrace (1:13; 4:6).

The Book of Isaiah

———— ISAIAH WAS A MAN WITH A MISSION. THE LORD had shown him a glimpse of His glorious throne and placed a call on his life. As a prophet, he spoke God's words. For the most part, these were words of confrontation, exhortation, and warning—words that made him extremely unpopular. But even when he faced opposition, Isaiah continued to stand up for the truth. The Lord had called him to warn the people of their headlong rush into disaster. The Book of Isaiah records these prophetic words of warning, but it also records Isaiah's words of promise and hope. One day a Messiah would come who would save, comfort, and bless His people.

Isaiah is filled with prophecies. Understanding Hebrew prophetic literature involves recognizing and interpreting parallelism. The Hebrews used parallelism in poetry and prophecy as a literary technique to emphasize a particular thought. Here is an example: "The ox knows its owner / and the donkey its master's crib; / but Israel does not know, / My people do not consider" (1:3). In the first part of this verse, both the ox and the donkey intuitively know the objects on whom they depend, namely, the owner (provider) as well as the "master's crib" (provision). The second part of the verse contrasts the intuition of animals with the behavior of the Israelites. Israel does not know "its Owner," and even though they are God's "people," they "do not consider" Godprovision. Thus the second half of the verse creates the analogy in parallel with the first half.

Prophetic poetry uses colorful images that point to further meanings. Unlike prose, which addresses historical realities more directly, poetry draws its readers and listeners into spiritual realities with the use of evocative language. Thus, in 42:15 the images of "mountains and hills" represent all sorts of obstacles—both physical and spiritual—to the exiles' return to Jerusalem. The promise that the Lord would "dry up" these obstacles means that He would eliminate all impediments to the exiles' return, just as He had dried up the Red Sea for the Israelites long before. Similarly in 41:18, that the Lord would "open rivers" and make "the dry land springs of water" means He would miraculously provide for the returning exiles in the same way He had provided water from a rock (Ex. 17:1–6).

Another major element in understanding prophetic literature is recognizing that the prophecies themselves and their arrangement often lack chronological perspective or have multiple fulfillments. For example, the same prophecy may speak of both Jesus' First and Second Comings (63:1, 2). Likewise, one prophecy may speak of both the virgin birth of Jesus as well as the birth of Isaiah's son during Pekah's invasion. Moreover, an oracle about the servant Cyrus, the Persian emperor of the sixth century B.C. (41:1–29), may stand next to a prophecy concerning the Servant Jesus (42:1–9). Ultimately, the interpretations of Jesus and the New Testament authors provide a guide for interpreting Old Testament prophecies.

As a prophet, Isaiah spoke to three historical epochs. In chs. 1—39, he delivered his message of condemnation to the eighth-century Israelites, pronouncing judgment on their immoral and idolatrous lifestyles. This judgment came quickly, for during Isaiah's ministry, Tiglath-Pileser III (745–727 B.C.) set out to extend Assyria's rule into the west, and in doing so put pressure on Israel and Judah. In 722 B.C., another Assyrian king, Sargon II, conquered the northern kingdom. Only the nation of Judah was left. But Isaiah predicted that even Judah would fall—as much later it did, in 586 B.C.

In chs. 40—55, Isaiah comforted the future generation of weary exiles —the Jews who thought that God had forgotten them (40:27). In a brilliant series of prophecies, Isaiah presented the case that Israel's captivity was not due to the superiority of Babylon's idols, but to the disciplining rod of Israel's Lord (42:23–25). He predicted the exiles' return and encouraged them to rouse themselves (52:1–10), to flee Babylon (48:20, 21), and to entrust their future to the Almighty (41:14–20).

Finally in the third section (chs. 56—66), Isaiah exhorted the Jews who had returned to the land. This was the period before the temple was rebuilt (58:12; 61:4; 64:10) or perhaps while it was being rebuilt (66:1). Isaiah encouraged these Jews to put away greed (56:9–11), self-indulgence (56:12), idolatry (57:3–10), cynicism (57:11–13), and hypocritical self-righteousness (58:1–5). But he also predicted that the community would be split between true and false worshipers (chs. 65; 66). The complete restoration of Israel was still to come (49:8–26). The promised Messiah would appear in the future (61:1–3). Then Gentiles would join Israel's godly remnant to become the “servants” of the Lord (56:3; 65:1, 15, 16) in a new nation (65:1; 66:8). The ultimate triumph of good over evil would have to await the new heaven and the new earth (65:17–19).

Concerning the authorship of the book, Isaiah the son of Amoz has traditionally been identified as the writer of the entire document that bears his name (1:1). However, since the rise of historical criticism in the late nineteenth century, debate has surrounded the authorship of Isaiah. The book addresses three different historical time periods, and some critical scholars have concluded that there were three different authors for the book.

Because chs. 1—39 address Israel when it was confronting Assyrian invasions during the second half of the eighth century B.C., most scholars have agreed that these chapters were composed by Isaiah the son of Amoz, the so-called Proto-Isaiah (or “First Isaiah”). But chs. 40—55 speak to the discouraged exiles in Babylon in the first half of the sixth century B.C., two centuries after the prophet Isaiah lived. For this reason, some have assumed an anonymous author called Deutero-Isaiah (or “Second Isaiah”) for these chapters. The rest of the book, chs. 55—66, addresses the controversies that surrounded the postexilic community in the second half of the sixth century B.C. Thus this last section has been identified as the work of either Deutero-Isaiah or another anonymous author called Trito-Isaiah (or “Third Isaiah”).

The basis for this elaborate analysis of the Book of Isaiah is the assumption that a Hebrew prophet could only address his contemporaries and not distant generations. According to these critics, a prediction of a future event, such as Isaiah’s prophetic naming of Cyrus two hundred years before that ruler came to power (44:28; 45:1), is simply impossible.

Contrary to the critics’ assumption, a prophet would commonly ask one generation to participate in the future events of another generation. For instance, Moses spoke this way when he addressed the new generation of Israelites at Moab as though they had participated in the events at Mount Sinai (Deut. 5:3); yet none of Moses’ audience, with the exception of Joshua and Caleb, had actually been there (Deut. 1:35–38). Isaiah, who began his career in 740 B.C. and ended it around 681 B.C., also used this technique. He commanded the Israelites to “go forth from Babylon” (48:20) many generations before the Exile in 586 B.C. and the return in 538 B.C. This was a miraculous prophecy of the Israelites’ return from Babylon, a prophecy that would sustain the faith and hope of the exiles, such as Ezra and Nehemiah.

The internal evidence of the Book of Isaiah points to one author, namely, the prophet Isaiah. Unlike books that have multiple authors, such as the books of Psalms and Proverbs, no editorial notices in Isaiah indicate a change of author (2:1; 13:1). Moreover there are numerous linguistic similarities throughout the book, such as the use of relatively rare titles for God, “the Holy One of Israel” and “the Lord of Hosts.” Variations in style between chs. 1—39 and chs. 40—66 may be due to differences in subject matter, changed perspectives, and perhaps even the prophet’s growing maturity. The New Testament confirms the view that Isaiah authored the entire book. For example, the apostle John attributed prophecies from 53:1 as well as from 6:9, 10 to the prophet Isaiah (John 12:38–41). Thus there is no convincing reason to discount Isaiah’s authorship of the entire book.

Commentary

1:1 God mediated His message through the godly Isaiah to Judah, the people of the southern kingdom—specifically to their magistrates, priests, and prophets in Jerusalem. The nation of Israel had been divided into two parts: Judah (the southern kingdom) and Israel (the northern kingdom). While Isaiah's message was primarily for the southern kingdom, it was also for the northern kingdom—the entire nation was heading down a path of sin and idolatry that would end in destruction. Thus in this book, the word Israel sometimes refers to both the southern and the northern kingdoms. Isaiah lived to see the nation of Assyria take the northern kingdom into captivity in 722 B.C. Therefore this record of Isaiah's visions contains the revelations that God graciously gave during the reigns of Uzziah (792–740 B.C.), Jotham (752–736 B.C.), Ahaz (736–720 B.C.), and Hezekiah (729–699 B.C.). Because God never changes, this revelation is still relevant for His people today.

1:2, 3 The indictment against Judah has two parts: (1) Isaiah summons heaven and earth as witnesses to the trial (v. 2) and (2) the Lord, as Plaintiff, indicts Judah, here called Israel (vv. 2, 3).

1:2 Moses, who mediated God's covenant with Israel at Sinai, summoned the heavens and the earth (that is, the entire creation) as a witness that he had duly warned the Israelites that they would be judged by the Lord for their disobedience (Deut. 4:24; 30:19; 31:28). As Jacob and Laban set up a heap of stones as a witness of a treaty between them (Gen. 31:43–55), so the creation is a fitting witness between God and Israel. God's relationship with His people is personal; He compares Judah to ungrateful children (63:8; Ex. 4:22; Hos. 11:1). The Hebrew term translated rebelled means "to refuse to submit to someone's authority and rule" (63:10; 66:24).

1:3 Even an ox and a donkey recognize the owner who feeds them, so they do not rebel against him. But Israel, God's own children whom He "nourished and brought up" (v. 2), had rebelled against Him. Judah's rebellion was incomprehensible and inexcusable.

1:4–9 Isaiah's indictment against Judah has three parts: (1) Judah had been rebellious (v. 4); (2) Judah remained unrepentant, though disciplined

(vv. 5–8); and (3) only God's grace spared a small remnant from annihilation (v. 9).

1:4 sinful nation: Despite God's divine parenting, the people had turned to sin (5:1–7). The Holy One of Israel is Isaiah's favorite title for God. The Lord is holy because He is profoundly different from all of humanity (40:25). He alone is the Creator (45:11, 12) exalted in heaven (6:1–3) and without sin (6:4–7). He alone is the righteous Judge (v. 20) and the Protector of the faithful (10:20; 43:3). Yet the phrase "of Israel" describes the Holy One as sustaining a relationship with His people (Ps. 40:1).

1:5–8 Isaiah first compares the nation's affliction to a badly wounded soldier (vv. 5, 6) and then describes its land as ravaged by war (vv. 7, 8).

1:5 Isaiah answers his own indignant question, Why should you be stricken again? The people would only revolt more and more. More preaching would only make their hearts hard (6:9, 10). In 53:4–6, Isaiah reveals God's gracious response to their hard hearts: the Lord will strike His Servant instead of sinners (53:4–6). Such love can win over even the toughest rebel (Rom. 5:8).

1:6, 7 From foot to head means everyone and everything. Judah's wounds were not closed, bound up (bandaged), or soothed, because the people had refused to repent.

1:8 Daughter of Zion is a beautiful personification of Jerusalem (37:22; 60:14). Actually, the of in this phrase is somewhat misleading. "Daughter of Zion" seems to indicate that Zion has a daughter. In fact, Zion is the daughter—the daughter of the Lord. Booth and hut refer to lean-to shelters used by farmers and watchmen during the harvest.

1:9–17 This invitation to repent falls into three parts: (1) Isaiah's appeal to the rebellious rulers and people of Jerusalem to hear the Lord's instruction (vv. 9, 10); (2) the Lord's scathing indictment and rejection of the people's external, formalistic worship (vv. 11–17); and (3) the Lord's invitation to the people to repent and do justice in order to save themselves from death (vv. 18–20).

1:9 The title LORD of hosts describes God as ruler over all powers in heaven and earth through His command of His angelic armies. The title is a favorite of Isaiah, for it speaks of God's holiness and sovereignty. Judah's survival was not ultimately due to an enemy's weakness but to God's power. Though God punished His sinful people, He always preserved a remnant (6:13; 10:20; 11:16) because He was faithful to keep His promise to Abraham (Gen. 22:16–18; Ex. 34:6, 7; Mic. 7:19, 20; Rom. 9:29; 11:5). The word remnant basically means "survivor" (Num. 21:35; Josh. 8:22). Sodom and Gomorrah were regarded as the epitome of sinfulness; to say that Jerusalem had become like those cities was a scathing condemnation (Rev. 11:8). Elsewhere these words are used as symbols of God's final judgment upon sinners (Amos 4:11; Matt. 10:15; 2 Pet. 2:6).

1:10–15 God desired sacrifices, but not from people who disobeyed Him and mistreated others, even if the sacrifice presented was the best. "To obey is better than sacrifice," said the early prophet Samuel (1 Sam. 15:22, 23). Later prophets agreed (Hos. 6:6; Amos 4:4; Mic. 6:6–8), and so did the Lord Jesus (Matt. 23:23). God judges not only our outwardly pious acts, but more importantly the attitude of our hearts (1 Cor. 4:5).

1:13–15 Here is an itemized condemnation of the people's sacred seasons, New Moons (Num. 28:11–15), Sabbaths (Ex. 31:14–17), and appointed feasts (Ex. 23:14–17). These feasts are condemned as futile because the people did not celebrate them out of love for God.

1:14 God sarcastically refers to the feasts as your rather than "My" New Moons because the people had changed the spirit of God's ceremonial laws from love of Him to manipulation of Him.

1:15 God did not look with favor on the fervent spread out … hands of those who oppressed others, and He would not hear their many accompanying prayers (James 4:1–6).

1:16–20 The invitation to repent has two parts: (1) The people must wash themselves by seeking justice, by rebuking the oppressor, and defending the fatherless (James 1:27). (2) God Himself would wash the people if they were willing and obedient to meet this condition. As the righteous Judge, God both reproves the wicked and defends the innocent (11:4).

1:17, 18 Reason together means "to come to a legal decision." There is no call for a compromise here; the people were to come to an agreement with God concerning the enormous gravity of their sin. God was not declaring His people innocent of wickedness, but He was prepared to pardon their sins if they would repent and turn to Him. God offers us that same forgiveness. He does not deny our sinfulness. Instead, He can forgive us based on the payment for sin in the death of the Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ. Says the LORD: The verb form suggests a repeated offering of grace. Scarlet recalls the picture of "hands … full of blood" (v. 15). God's grace and power can make such bloodstains as white as snow (Rom. 3:21–26). The words scarlet … white also suggest the idea of soiled garments (64:6) that in ancient times were not capable of being cleansed (namely, to whiteness). But God can cleanse anything. He can do this and still maintain His righteousness because Jesus died for sinners (Rom. 3:21–26).

1:19, 20 There was another side to God's offer. If the sinful people did not repent, instead of the promise that they shall eat the good of the land (3:10) stood the threat that they shall be devoured by the sword. The promise and threat were certain because the LORD had spoken them. Here the verb has spoken indicates finality (contrast the verb says in v. 18). While God had graciously extended His offer of mercy over a significant period of time, this was the only offer God made. They could not "cut another deal" with Him (40:5; 55:11).

1:21–31 In these verses, God announced His intent to purify Israel. This announcement falls into two parts: (1) a prophecy of judgment (vv. 21–26) and (2) an elaboration of God's sentence (vv. 27–31). God's purpose for Judah was not final destruction, but purification from social injustice (vv. 25, 26) and redemption from idolatry (vv. 27–31). Idolatry and injustice are inseparable. When people turn from trusting the fair and loving God, they will start oppressing the poor and helpless (Jer. 23:13, 14; Hos. 4:1–14; Amos 2:6–8).

1:22, 23 The debased silver and wine refer to Jerusalem's unjust rulers.

1:24, 25 God's hand had effectively delivered Israel from Egypt. Now that same hand was against the people in judgment.

1:26 God's goal for Jerusalem was that it would become a city of righteousness, a city where the Lord would be faithfully worshiped.

1:27, 28 The Hebrew word for redeemed means "ransomed" or "freed someone from another's ownership through the payment of a price." Zion's penitents, those who turned their back on idolatry and injustice, would find freedom from sin and judgment. Ultimately, like all forgiven sinners, they have justice imputed to them through Jesus Christ and effected in them through the Holy Spirit. Of course, these realities become clear in the NT. Judgment passes, but Zion's beauty will never fade.

1:29 Idolaters shall be ashamed because the terebinth, a sacred tree, and the gardens, sacred groves for fertility rites or the worship of spirits, would fail to save them in the time of judgment (65:3).

1:30, 31 Terebinth represents both the sacred trees (v. 29) and the strong, dominating rulers of Israel. The work of it is perhaps a reference to the injustice of Israel's tyrants (v. 23), which was the opposite of the Lord's righteous work (5:12). no one shall quench: God will rid His creation of the proud through His gracious, purifying judgment.

2:1–5 Isaiah's prophecy about Zion's exaltation falls into three parts: (1) an introduction locating the vision "in the latter days" (v. 2); (2) a vision of Zion established as the chief mountain (vv. 3, 4); and (3) a conclusion exhorting Judah to obey the Law until the vision is fulfilled (v. 5).

2:2 Some have interpreted the phrase in the latter days as pointing to the new epoch initiated by the saving work of Christ and the coming of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost (Acts 2:17). According to this interpretation, this prophecy will be completely fulfilled in the Second Coming of the Messiah (1 Cor. 15:28). Others interpret this passage as referring to conditions in Christ's future kingdom. See the fuller development of this theme in Mic. 4:1–4. Just as the LORD's house (the temple) was a type of the heavenly sanctuary (Heb. 9:24), so presumably the mountain (Mount Zion) was a copy of a heavenly reality (Heb. 9:23, 24; 12:22–24). In the coming kingdom, the city of Jerusalem and its glorious temple will again become prominent. The false gods of pagans had sacred mountains with temples; to raise the Lord's house to the top of mountains, or "as the chief mountain," is to establish Him among the nations as the only true God.

2:3 By quoting the people's words, let us go up to the mountain of the LORD, Isaiah vividly depicts their regenerated hearts, since the unregenerate do not seek God (Rom. 3:11). In OT times, only Israel went up to Mount Zion. But in the kingdom age, all nations go up to the glorious temple. Today the Lord Jesus has authority over all nations and gives eternal life to those who trust in Him (Matt. 28:18–20; John 17:2). When the fullness of the Gentiles has come in during this present age (Rom. 11:1–17), the literal dimensions of this present passage will be fulfilled. Then Israel will be grafted in again, and then the nations will come to Zion. Then the teaching of the Lord Jesus Christ, as King of the earth, will flow from Jerusalem as a beautiful, life-giving nectar.

2:4 Plowshares probably means "hoes." The nations of the earth have been caught up in warfare since the dawn of human history. From time to time throughout history, there has been an elusive dream of world peace. But that dream has never been realized. In the meantime, implements of warfare have become ever more sophisticated, so that in our present day the nations of the earth have weapons and delivery systems that are unimaginably horrific in their potential for the destruction of people and objects. Yet in a future glorious day there will be an end to all weapons and warfare. This will only be possible because of the reign of the Prince of Peace (9:6), the Savior King whose Name is Jesus.

“light”

(Heb. or) (2:5; 9:2; 58:8; Eccl. 2:13; 11:7) Strong’s #216: This word refers to literal or symbolic light. The Hebrew word often denotes daylight or daybreak (Judg. 16:2; Neh. 8:3), but it can also be symbolic of life and deliverance (Job 33:28, 30; Pss. 27:1; 36:9; 49:19; Mic. 7:8, 9). In the Bible, light is frequently associated with true knowledge and understanding (42:6; 49:6; 51:4; Job 12:25), and even gladness, good fortune, and goodness (Job 30:26; Ps. 97:11). The Bible describes light as the clothing of God—a vivid picture of His honor, majesty, splendor, and glory (Ps. 104:2; Hab. 3:3, 4). A proper lifestyle is characterized by walking in God’s light (2:5; Ps. 119:105; Prov. 4:18; 6:20–23).

2:5 Isaiah includes himself with the godly remnant and encourages them: let us walk. Even though they could not see the glorious future of Zion, they continued to place their faith in God’s promises and obey His law. Light is a metaphor for God’s law, which illuminates the path that leads to everlasting life (Ps. 119:105).

2:6–9 The condemnation of Judah for misplaced confidence is in three parts and in the form of a prayer: (1) a judicial sentence (v. 6); (2) a condemnation of Judah’s misplaced confidence in witchcraft, pagan alliances, money, weapons, and idolatry (vv. 6–9); and (3) a concluding prayer that God should not forgive the people for substituting faith in the works of their own hands for faith in Him (v. 9). The Law prohibited the king from accumulating money, weapons, and alliances, in order to keep him dependent on God (Deut. 17:16, 17).

2:6 The exhortation to the house of Jacob was necessary (v. 5), for God had handed it over to destruction. You have forsaken was a present, but not a permanent, condition for the Israelites. To renounce eastern ways and soothsayers, the customs of Mesopotamia, was a hallmark of genuine faith in the God of Israel (Deut. 18:10). They are pleased could be translated “they clasp hands,” suggesting political alliances with foreigners. See 2 Kin. 16:7 for Ahaz’s dependence on the Lord for salvation.

2:7 Horses … chariots signifies “horse-drawn war chariots.” Riding horseback by military forces was unknown in the time of Isaiah.

2:8 The work of their own hands refers to man-made idols in particular.

2:9 Each man humbles himself before things that are themselves debased—idols. Wanting God to uphold moral order, yet intimately knowing God's gracious character, Isaiah implored Him not to forgive those who had turned to idols.

2:10–22 Isaiah predicted that in the day of the Lord, the Lord alone would be exalted. The oracle is in three parts: (1) an introductory command to the proud to hide themselves from the terror of the Lord (vv. 10, 11); (2) a prediction that in the day of the Lord every pretension would be humbled (vv. 12–18); and (3) a concluding command to the righteous to separate themselves from the proud (v. 22). The refrain "the Lord alone shall/will be exalted" (in vv. 11, 17), the refrain "when He arises (vv. 19, 21), and the similarity of wording in verses 11, 17, unite the prophecy by highlighting its theme. In other words, the effect of self-exaltation is confrontation with the only Glorious One. Everything that vaunts itself before the Holy One must be humbled, just as soap bubbles burst in the sun's heat.

2:10 Dust symbolizes the abject humility of the defeated (47:1; Gen. 3:14; Ps. 44:25). The wicked among the Israelites would grovel in the dust before the righteous Lord.

2:11 Lofty looks are the outer manifestation of proud hearts. The refrain the LORD alone shall be exalted highlights the theme of this prophecy and describes the coming, glorious revelation of the risen and exalted Savior King. In that day the Savior will be exalted above all other proud contenders.

2:12–19 The body of this oracle has three parts: (1) a summary statement (v. 12); (2) an itemized account of the lofty pretensions to be humbled, from those in creation (vv. 13, 14) to those made by people (vv. 15–17), followed by a summary statement with an emphasis on idolatry (vv. 17, 18); and (3) a concluding prediction that people will hide themselves at the time of God's judgment (v. 19).

2:12 Lifted up is translated "exalted" in v. 2. Any rival to God's exaltation will be dwarfed. The day of the LORD is any time when the Lord of Hosts is victorious (1:9), be it against Babylon through Media (13:1—14:27), or against Egypt through Babylon (Ezek. 30:2–4), or against Israel through Assyria (1:24; Amos 5:18). Zephaniah 1:14–16 is particularly graphic about that day. The phrase is also used of the past actions of the Lord when He brought about the great victory against Egypt in His deliverance of Israel in the Exodus (Ex. 15:3). Similarly, the day of the Lord's vengeance may also be the time of Israel's deliverance that is to come (34:2—35:10), which is represented as the Lord decisively defeating all the nation's opposition (Joel 3:14–16; Zeph. 2:2, 9; 3:8–20). The day of the Lord has two sides: (1) the night of God's judgment, and (2) the daylight of His salvation after judgment. Isaiah used the term to describe either or both aspects.

2:13–15 The cedars of Lebanon and the high mountains—the exalted things of creation—as well as the high tower and the fortified wall—the exalted things made by humanity—will be humbled so that the arrogant can see the greatness of God.

2:16, 17 The ships of Tarshish were large oceangoing vessels—prized objects that the arrogant made and considered to be more important than God.

2:18 The term idols means "worthless things."

2:19 holes … caves: People will scurry like frightened animals with no place to hide (Matt. 24:16). Terror refers to the dread of the wicked at the sight of God (Ps. 14:5).

2:20, 21 When the formerly precious idols fail the proud at the time of God's judgment, they will contemptuously throw them to the moles and bats, the small, unclean rodents that make people feel squeamish.

2:22 Sever yourselves: Since God will reject proud idolaters, it follows that the faithful should also reject them. How ludicrous to trust in transitory, impermanent man, whose breath is in his nostrils, instead of in the One who gives everyone breath.

A Leadership Vacuum—A Public Crisis

How important is the character and quality of a nation's leaders? Extremely important, according to Isaiah. At the time when Is. 3 was given, the nation probably was prospering under the wise, godly leadership of King Uzziah (around 792–740 B.C.) or his successor, King Jotham (around 750–735 B.C.).

However, Isaiah foresaw a time when God would remove the better leaders (Is. 3:1–3), leaving behind mere "babes" who would have no experience in running the institutions of society and no respect for the wisdom of the past. As a result, these "children" would become selfish oppressors (3:4, 5) who would run roughshod over the needs of the poor (3:14, 15). That happened when Jerusalem fell to Babylon (586 B.C.; 2 Kin. 25:11, 12, 22–26), though no one can say whether that exhausted the fulfillment of Isaiah's prophecy.

The lesson is that a leadership vacuum leads to public crisis. That being the case, we as God's people today do well to prevent that kind of vacuum from forming by: • recruiting and appointing the best people available, leaders of high moral character and outstanding leadership skills; • appropriately paying and rewarding people for their public service; • supporting leaders and working together with them in their efforts to promote good government and prevent social, economic, and moral deterioration; • praying for leaders as they exercise their authority; and • raising up and training our children to be outstanding leaders for the coming generation.

3:1–9 This judgment against Jerusalem and Judah is in two parts: (1) a judicial sentence against anarchy (vv. 1–7); and (2) an accusation of arrogance (vv. 8, 9).

3:1 For links this oracle with the previous exhortation to sever a relationship with an arrogant man (2:22). God takes away Judah's leaders through the sword and exile. No historical reference is given because the truth is universal (2 Kin. 25:18–21).

3:2, 3 Judah's administration was organized around warriors—mighty man, man of war, captain of fifty; sages—judge, elder, honorable man, counselor; religious mediums—prophet, diviner, enchanter; and craftsmen—artisan.

3:4 Because of the Lord's judgment on Judah, the shrewd, ungodly leaders would be replaced by children and babes, meaning inexperienced and incompetent leaders.

3:5 For every one to be oppressed by another describes a state of anarchy. In such an upside-down world, child is against elder, the base against the honorable. In His judgment, the Lord has given over the wicked to their own evil ways.

3:6, 7 During this period of deprivation, society would be so deprived of leadership and possessions that people would qualify for leadership merely by having clothing.

3:8, 9 The people's tongue and look betray their arrogance against God.

3:9 Considered a horribly sinful city (1:9), Sodom had been destroyed by God (Gen. 19). Yet Judeans were parading their defiance against God just like the Sodomites.

3:10–15 This oracle against Judah's leaders is in three parts: (1) an affirmation that God repays good and evil (vv. 10, 11); (2) an accusation that Israel's leaders were leading people astray (v. 12), and (3) a divine lawsuit against the leaders for exploiting their subjects (vv. 13–15; 1:23).

3:10, 11 eat the fruit: Compare this idea with 1:19.

3:12 The lamenting words My people (v. 15) are reminiscent of David's pain over his erring son Absalom (2 Sam. 18:33). The profound difference, of course, was in the shared blame of David and his son. In the case of the Lord and His people, the blame is solely their own.

3:13 to plead: This is a judicial term meaning to plead a case (Mic. 6:1).

3:14 The vineyard represents the nation (5:1–7), used here as a term parallel to the poor. The leaders had taken advantage of the weak in order to plunder them (v. 15).

3:15 Lord GOD of hosts: See the similar usage in 1:9.

3:16—4:1 This oracle against the vain women of Judah has three parts: (1) an accusation that the women were "haughty" and would be humbled (v. 16, 17); (2) a list of the pretentious trappings to be done away with (vv. 18–23); and (3) a depiction of Jerusalem's desolation (3:24—4:1). The oracle expands from the women of Zion (vv. 16–23) to the Daughter { of} Zion, a personification of the whole city (3:24–26), and then back to the women again (4:1). The expansion clarifies that the contrived glory of people is also in view. The oracle also moves from Jerusalem's vain beauty before the Exile, to the shameful conditions of the Exile (vv. 24, 25), to its desolation after the Exile (3:26—4:1).

3:16 The plural daughters of Zion suggests the women of the city as well as a personification of Jerusalem (1:8). Mincing probably means "childlike steps." The prophet shows his scorn for pretense and flagrant display.

3:17 The term secret parts and its parallel head may mean "forehead."

3:18–26 Rope … baldness … sackcloth refer to the conditions of the people who are going into exile. Your men refers to the men of Jerusalem. The gates of Zion mourn because its inhabitants have gone into exile for their sins.

4:1 in that day: This phrase connects this verse with the preceding unit (3:16–26). The once-proud women of Jerusalem (3:16–23) would have to beg a man to father their children and take away their reproach—the fact that they have no children. Most of the men of Jerusalem would have died in the process of defending the city (3:25).

4:2–6 The prophecy of Zion's restoration has three parts: (1) the Branch of the Lord will be glorious (v. 2); (2) the remnant will be sanctified (vv. 3, 4); and (3) the Lord will provide a protective covering over Mount Zion (vv. 5, 6).

4:2 In that day speaks of the future revelation of the glory of the Lord on the earth (2:2–4). The Branch of the LORD has the double sense of the earth yielding its fruit and of Christ yielding spiritual fruit (11:1–5; Jer. 23:5; Zech. 3:8; John 15:1–8). Because Christ humbled Himself, He will be crowned with glory (49:7; 52:13; 53:12; Phil. 2:9–11). beautiful and glorious: Together the words indicate "dazzling beauty." The reign of Jesus the King of Creation will be marked by plenty. The earth will be released from its curse, producing all that God intended it to produce in the beginning (Ps. 65).

4:3 recorded: The record of births in Jerusalem (Ps. 87:5, 6) may be related to the "heavenly book" (Ex. 32:32; Ps. 69:28; Dan. 7:10; Rev 20:12).

4:4 Spirit could mean wind (the hot searing wind of fire), the human spirit, or the Holy Spirit. All three may be intended (11:2; 30:1; 42:1; 48:16; 59:21; 61:1; Luke 3:22). The spirit of judgment … burning means "a fiery judgment." Through the processes of a purging fire, which outwardly consumes the faithless and inwardly purifies the faithful, God will produce a holy city.

4:5 Create is something only God can do; the word also suggests a divine "refashioning." Cloud and smoke recalls God's protective presence at the Red Sea (Ex. 13:20–22), on the tabernacle (Ex. 40:34–38), and in the wilderness (Num. 9:15–23). Here the phrase symbolizes His protective covering over the restored and sanctified Mount Zion. The glory of Mount Zion in the messianic age will be bestowed by God Himself (40:5; 60:2; John 17:10, 22, 24).

4:6 Over the cloud and smoke on each dwelling will be the overshadowing tabernacle, symbolizing God's protection of and communion with His people (Ps. 91:1; Rev. 21:3).

5:1–7 Isaiah's "Song of the Vineyard" is in three parts: (1) an introduction to the allegory (vv. 1, 2); (2) an accusation and sentence (vv. 3–6); and (3) an interpretation of the allegory (v. 7; see Ps. 80:8–16). The body consists of an accusation by Isaiah (vv. 3, 4) and the sentence handed down by the Lord Himself (vv. 5, 6).

5:1–3 Judah is compared to a vineyard that has every advantage. Its failure to produce justifies God's judgment (1:2, 3). Well-beloved … my Beloved: Isaiah speaks about the Lord in endearing terms.

5:2 The Lord, the true Vinedresser, had done everything possible to make the soil ready to grow fine grapes. The term wild grapes means "stinking things" (v. 4). This result was as unexpected as were the rebellious children of 1:2–4.

5:3 My vineyard: The pronoun indicates God's love and pride over His possession—the nation of Israel. All the more reason for God's disappointment in its infertility.

5:4 What more could have been done: When there is a failure in human relationships, we usually expect that both parties bear part of the responsibility. When it comes to the failed relationship between God and His people, the blame falls solely on the people. The Lord did everything He could—from instructing His people to giving them the Promised Land.

5:5 Please let Me tell you may be translated more forcefully as "Now I will tell you." God was not asking for permission; He was warning His people.

5:6 Briers and thorns symbolize the anarchy described in 3:4, 5, which will overtake the land after the Exile. clouds: As God had promised in His covenant with Israel on Mount Sinai, sufficient rainfall would come to the people who were faithful to His commands, but the rain would be withheld if the people were rebellious (Deut. 28:12, 23, 24).

5:7 justice … oppression: These words have similar sounds in Hebrew, as do the words righteousness and cry for help. Choosing similar sounding words is a common technique of Hebrew poetry.

5:8–30 This prophecy consists of six accusations or "woes" that specify the sins of "the wild grapes" (vv. 2, 4) and the nature of their acts of oppression: greed (v. 8), debauchery (vv. 11, 12), cynical unbelief (vv. 18, 19), perversion (v. 20), arrogance (v. 21), and injustice (vv. 22, 23). To these sins are added prophecies of judgment: desolation (vv. 9, 10), captivity or death for the pompous leaders (vv. 13, 14), and humiliation for all (v. 15). The conquering army is depicted in vv. 26–30.

5:8 Till … land: The greedy land barons aimed to control all of the choice land of Israel. God gave the fields, which "shall not be sold permanently, for the land is Mine" (Lev. 25:23) as an inheritance to all His people (Num. 27:7–11). Deprived of these ancestral lands, Israel's citizens had become day laborers or slaves on what had formerly been their family inheritance.

5:9, 10 While invaders could destroy the mansions, only God could bring the drought implied in these verses. Yet both calamities were judgments from His hand.

5:9 without inhabitant: This phrase is also found in 6:11.

5:10 One bath is about six gallons. A homer is about six bushels. One ephah is one-tenth of a homer. The produce of the land would be extremely meager in the time of divine judgment.

5:11, 12 Greed (v. 8) is closely connected with indulgent, egocentric living.

5:11 This verse is a strong condemnation of the abuse of intoxicating drink (beer) and wine (v. 22). For a contrasting example of wine used in a positive context of the enjoyment of God's salvation, read 55:1. inflames them: The life-pattern of these wicked rulers is dissipation.

5:12 The harp and the strings: For a similar idea, read Ps. 33:2. Music was played in ancient Israel both in the worship of the Lord and in times of feasting. Wine was also a part of feasting in biblical times (Prov. 9:2; John 2:10). Here their feasts means "their drinking parties." do not regard … consider: The people were oblivious to the reality of the work of God in their midst (Ps. 10:4). The work of the LORD includes justice, entailing punishing the tyrants and saving the oppressed (vv. 24, 25).

5:13 have gone into captivity: Though the verb is in the past tense, here it refers to something still in the future—the Judeans had not yet gone into captivity. Knowledge refers to a personal involvement with someone or something. thirst: The judgment matches the crime of indulging in alcoholic beverages (vv. 11, 12).

5:14 Sheol is the poetic word for "grave," which is here compared to a gaping jaw that devours the elite rich and the common masses alike. Sheol is portrayed as a monster in Proverbs (Prov. 1:12; 27:20).

5:15, 16 For the exaltation of the Lord alone, see 2:9, 11, 17. The judgment of the wicked is one demonstration of His exaltation.

5:15 the eyes of the lofty: Proud people get little respect from God (Ps. 147:6).

5:16 The Hebrew term rendered hallowed is a form of the verb meaning "to make holy," which basically means "to be distinct," "to be removed," or "to be separate." These words speak of the transcendence of the Lord in His majesty and glory.

5:17 What were formerly mansions surrounded with lush vineyards would become waste places, where lambs and fat ones, those prepared for sacrifice, feed.

5:18, 19 Those who mocked Isaiah's proclamation of the day of the Lord were not simply "falling" into sin; rather, they labored to draw iniquity along, as on a cart. Isaiah named his son, "speed the spoil, hasten the prey" (8:3), perhaps partially in response to this taunt (5:26).

5:20 call evil good: Those who pervert God's evaluation of what is good by calling evil good are heading down a dangerous path—one that leads to judgment.

5:21 At the root of the moral, social, and theological corruption denounced in this prophecy is being wise in one's own eyes—an insensitive, arrogant egotism.

5:22 mighty at drinking wine: See v. 11 on the abuse of wine. The intoxicating drink was probably beer.

5:23 bribe: The perversion of justice by bribery is a serious evil that undermines society.

5:24 As the vineyard yielding only sour grapes is finally judged, so the wicked will finally be cut off without hope.

5:25 The hills—that seem most permanent—trembled, even as the sea "fled" before the anger of the Lord (Ps. 114:3, 7). Their carcasses is a grisly image of the defeated foes of God (34:3; 66:24). The Lord's anger is not turned away even after the horrible judgments of vv. 24, 25. His hand: Often in Scripture, "the hand of God" is a symbol of His grace and salvation (Ex. 15:6). How tragic that the same hand is stretched out to punish His people.

5:26 The Assyrian army, which included many mercenaries (Mic. 4:11–13), literally "trampled down" (v. 5) the pleasant land of Israel. whistle:

The Lord would control this army of judgment, for He would give them their signal to invade (7:18).

5:27–29 The preparations of the Assyrian army were complete; the soldiers were thoroughly ready for war (40:30, 31).

5:29 like a lion: This means that the Assyrians will be prepared to dispatch their prey as easily as a lion might.

5:30 The clouds symbolize judgment.

Isaiah the Prophet

In some ways, Isaiah rejected all that his contemporaries considered valuable: wealth, alliances, military protection, and clever strategies. Though he was rebuffed, Isaiah remained true to his calling. In an extraordinary vision of the heavenly court, God Himself called Isaiah to be a messenger to his people. His calling was glorious, but his task was a challenge. He had to confront the people of Judah with the truth: they had broken the Lord's covenant, rebelled against their God, and would have to face the consequences of their sins (6:1–13; Deut. 28).

Isaiah did not proclaim his message of gloom without feeling. With a broken heart, he cried out: "Lord, how long?" (6:11) How long would Israel remain rebellious? Israel's hypocrisy repulsed him, and he did not shrink from comparing them to the rulers of Sodom and Gomorrah (1:10–20). Yet while he warned the wicked of their tragic fate, he also encouraged the penitent and sorrowing to place their hope in God.

Even Isaiah's name, which means "the Lord saves," served as a sign to the nation (8:18), as did the names of his sons—Shear-Jashub, which meant "A Remnant Shall Return" (7:3), and Mahar-Shalal-HashBaz, which meant "Speed the Spoil, Hasten the Booty" (8:1–4). These names pointed to the Lord's coming salvation. Even though the nation faced the Lord's discipline, salvation would come. A remnant of the Israelites would return to the land and experience God's blessing. In fact, the whole Book of Isaiah revolves around this remnant theology—the judgment of the wicked and the salvation of the faithful.

In one crisis after another—the Assyrian invasions and war against Jerusalem—Isaiah maintained a steady grip on God. He considered human help vain and idolatrous, and he relied only on the Lord for his strength (30:1–5). As Judah's watchman he appealed to the Lord on the people's behalf (59:9–15; 62:6, 7; 64:1, 2). The same mouth that exposed the people's sins fervently interceded for them. Isaiah was not merely a messenger—he was also a watchman, a conscientious guard over the Lord's people.

6:1–13 Isaiah's call to be a prophet of God consists of five sections: (1) the historical setting (v. 1); (2) Isaiah's stunning vision of God (vv. 2–4); (3) his new insight into himself (v. 5); (4) his call (vv. 6–8); and (5) his commission (vv. 9–13).

6:1 King Uzziah died in 740 B.C., signaling the end of an age. This good king (2 Chr. 26:1–15) would be eventually replaced by wicked Ahaz (7:1); the relative prosperity of the first half of the eighth century would be replaced by the Syro-Ephraimite wars and the Assyrian campaigns into Israel. King Uzziah had been one of Judah's best rulers, but he had succumbed to pride (2 Chr. 26:1–5), leading to his leprous condition. When he became proud, God had to discipline him. The throne where the Lord is seated, high and exalted, represents His eternal, sovereign, and universal rule. He is high above all other kings, but at the same time He is concerned about the welfare of His people. Temple means "palace"—the Lord's throne on earth with its counterpart in heaven.

6:2 The seraphim used two of their six wings to cover their faces so that they would not gaze on the Lord's glory. With two of their wings they covered their feet in self-conscious humiliation. And with two they were flying to do the Lord's bidding. The behavior of the seraphim contrasts strongly with the pride of Uzziah (2 Chr. 26:16). All human pride is mocked by the behavior of these angels. They know that in the presence of God there is no room for pomp, no reason for pride.

6:3 Holy, holy, holy: To say the word holy twice in Hebrew is to describe someone as "most holy." To say the word holy three times intensifies the idea to the highest level. In other words, the holiness of God is indescribable in human language. To be holy means to be different, distant, or transcendent. Thus the song of the seraphim is a constant refrain that the transcendence of God is indescribable. Though the Lord is totally different from us—He is perfect—in His mercy He still reaches down to take care of us. The whole earth is full of His glory: The Hebrew word order is, "The fullness of all the earth is His glory." We know that the glory of God transcends the universe (Ps. 113:4–6); yet in order to balance the expression of the transcendence of God in the first half of this verse, the words of the second half emphasize God's closeness to His creation—His involvement with the earth and its people.

6:4 If even the doorposts of the heavenly temple shook in response to God's holiness, how much more will the whole earth (v. 3) shake when the Lord visits it (Matt. 24:29, 30).

6:5 Confronted with this vision of the Lord, Isaiah realized that he was under judgment—that he was undone. He must have thought that he had come to the end of his life. I am a man of unclean lips: Isaiah knew that he was a sinner. He realized that his lips were the only ones not giving God praise in that setting. a people: Isaiah's plight is the plight of every person. No one, in his or her present state, is capable of standing before the Holy One (Ps. 24:3). the King, the LORD of hosts: After contemplating the death of Uzziah (v. 1), Isaiah had seen the King who will never die.

IN FOCUS

“seraphim”

(Heb. seraphim) (6:2, 6) Strong’s #8314: This noun is probably related to the verb saraph, which means “to burn with fire.” These angelic creatures belong to the heavenly host and are only mentioned twice in Scripture—both times in Is. 6. Apparently these beings conduct the worship of God in heaven and are different from the cherubim, who are described in Rev. 4:6–8 as surrounding God’s throne instead of standing above it, as described here (6:2). The relation of their name to burning may be due to their flaming appearance (similar to the fiery serpents of Num. 21:6; Deut. 8:15). But their name probably relates to their role in purification. Fire is a symbol for purity; appropriately one of these fiery beings purified Isaiah’s lips with a live coal (6:6).

6:6–8 Isaiah’s call consists of his inward cleansing (vv. 6, 7), his call to serve (v. 8a), and his acceptance (v. 8b).

6:6 The live coal … from the altar symbolizes both the purification of blood and the fire of the Spirit that enabled the prophet to speak. From that point on, his words would be light to his hearers and power to those who would listen. The fact that a coal from the altar was used reminds us that ultimately all sin is forgiven because of a sacrifice. The sacrifices on the temple altar point to the ultimate sacrifice of the Savior Jesus. God sovereignly and graciously forgave Isaiah’s sin.

6:7 Isaiah had a personal Day of Atonement before the Lord (Lev. 23:26–32). taken away: This word alludes to the Israelite practice of symbolically placing the sins of the people on a scapegoat and driving that goat into the wilderness (Lev. 16). The Hebrew word translated purged means “covered” and is the same term that is rendered “atonement.” The word refers to the process of killing an animal and sprinkling the blood on the altar for atonement.

6:8 At times, the prophets would be invited to participate in the heavenly court (1 Kin. 22:19–22; Jer. 23:18, 22). Here the Lord uses the pronoun Us to mean Himself and His angels (Gen. 3:22; 11:7). Send me: In ancient Middle Eastern religions only divine beings are sent as messengers of the gods. Yet the God of Scripture uses human beings as a matter of course. Only at certain times does He use angels in a direct way to reveal

His will to humankind. Isaiah's willingness proceeded from a grateful heart; he wanted to serve the God who had forgiven him (v. 7).

6:9, 10 Paradoxically, Isaiah's preaching to the religious and arrogant people who keep on hearing was destined to make … their ears heavy (42:20). Only the humble would understand the Lord's message. The more the prophet would proclaim the word of God, the less response he would get from the people. This was a call to a discouraging ministry. In truth, the call of God is for faithfulness to Him, to His word, and to the call itself.

6:11 Understandably, Isaiah's third expression to the Lord (compare vv. 5, 8) was one of incredulity. He wondered how long the people would continue to be unresponsive to his words of truth from God.

6:11, 12 The answer was grim. waste … desolate: These words describe the coming judgment of God on Judah that would lead to the nation's captivity under the Babylonians. Removed men … forsaken places describe the desolation that would follow the conquest by Babylon.

6:13 But … consuming: After the coming Babylonian invasion, the part of the land and the people who remained would be scorched again (5:25). This describes the return from the Exile and the subsequent troubles of Judah in the land. A tenth is one of Isaiah's expressions for the "remnant"; it is only a small percentage of the Israelites. From Israel's blasted stump, God would produce a holy seed (11:1), for He cannot deny the nation He has chosen (2 Tim. 2:13). An immediate fulfillment of this prophecy occurred in Isaiah's time: King Hezekiah repented and showed himself to be part of the holy seed (ch. 38). Ultimately, the holy seed would issue in the Beautiful Branch (11:1). This is the promise of the Savior Jesus.

7:1—12:6 This major section of Isaiah contains a series of prophecies related specifically to the Syro-Ephraimite wars—the invasion of Judah by Rezin and Pekah. These prophecies aimed to call Judah back to faith in God.

7:1 This is an editorial heading to 7:2—12:6 (2 Kin. 16:5). The Book of Isaiah was written over the period of the prophet's lifetime; but chapters 7—12 were set in the context of the Syro-Ephraimite wars. Syria is the later name for the ancient nation of Aram.

7:2—8:10 This section consists of five prophecies (7:2–9, 10–17, 18–25; 8:1–4, 5–10) predicting both Judah's deliverance from the kings of Syria and Israel and its devastation (short of annihilation) at the hand of the Assyrian king.

7:2–9 The introduction to the command to trust the Lord, not Assyria, consists of the historical situation (vv. 2–6) and the oracle predicting the destruction of Ephraim (vv. 7–9). The historical situation consists of what was told to Ahaz (v. 2), what the Lord told Isaiah to say to Ahaz (vv. 3, 4), and what Syria and Ephraim counseled concerning Judah (vv. 5, 6).

7:2 The phrase house of David is a substitute term for the king of Judah, Ahaz. This phrase recalls the Lord's eternal covenant with David in which He promised to give to His servant an eternal seed, throne, and kingdom (2 Sam. 7:16; Ps. 89:19–37). The word Ephraim represents the northern kingdom, Israel. The heart of the nation was moved because Syria had defeated Ahaz earlier (2 Chr. 28:5).

7:3 Shear-Jashub means "A Remnant Will Return." The name of Isaiah's son spoke of a coming Exile and then the salvation of the remaining faithful. All this would occur long after Isaiah's lifetime. Ahaz was probably standing at the aqueduct at the time of this encounter, seeking to secure Jerusalem's supply of water in case of the siege (2 Chr. 32:30).

7:4 God contemptuously dismissed the arrogant kings of Syria and Israel. What Ahaz greatly feared, God considered merely stubs of smoking firebrands drawn from a bonfire. The son of Remaliah is Pekah, king of Israel (v. 1).

7:5, 6 The plotting of Syria and Ephraim was no secret to God, who made it known to His servant Isaiah. Tabel means "Good for Nothing." Syria and Israel wanted to place an incompetent puppet king over Judah.

7:7, 8 It shall not stand: The plans of humankind are futile when they oppose the will of God. Within sixty-five years suggests that one must believe that God will fulfill His promises even beyond the time of one's own death.

7:9 You is plural. The prophet was speaking to the royal family and the nation. Believe and established are a play on the same Hebrew word from which we get our word amen. Believing entails having knowledge of God's Word, accepting that it is true, and placing our trust in the Lord to help us keep it. Believing the Lord is the key to receiving His promises (John 14:1).

7:10 While Isaiah's prophecy was principally addressed to King Ahaz, it was directed to others in v. 13.

7:11 The sign pertains to the prediction in vv. 7–9, the demise of the power of Samaria. In the depth or in the height indicates that Ahaz could ask for any sign he wished.

7:12 not ask … test: In the mouth of the wicked Ahaz, these arrogant words rang hollow.

7:13 The pronoun you is plural here (v. 14). Thus in this verse, Isaiah is speaking to the entire royal line of David. weary: God responded to Ahaz in indignation. This petty and arrogant king dared to refuse the Lord; he would not trust in God even when his enemies surrounded him (v. 12).

IN CONTEXT

Immanuel—God with Us!

Behold, the virgin shall conceive and bear a Son, and shall call His name Immanuel." During the Christmas season, this verse becomes a part of our common vocabulary (7:14): Most Christmas pageants recite the verse, and pastors explain the meaning of Immanuel, "God with Us." How the prophecy was fulfilled in the birth of Christ is recorded in the Gospel of Matthew (Matt. 1:23). But there are still questions that surround this prophecy. For instance, how could the birth of Jesus be a sign to Ahaz?

Sometimes unraveling biblical prophecy can be difficult. This is one of those cases; Christians have interpreted this prophecy in several different ways. Some have thought the anonymous "virgin" may refer to a royal mother—more specifically Ahaz's wife. Thus the child would be Hezekiah, Ahaz's successor. Hezekiah would be a sign to Ahaz that God was in control: The Lord was with Ahaz; He would save Judah from the enemies that surrounded Ahaz, enabling his son to inherit the throne (7:1–3). Yet the reference to the child eating "curds and honey" was a prediction of Assyria's eventual domination of Judah.

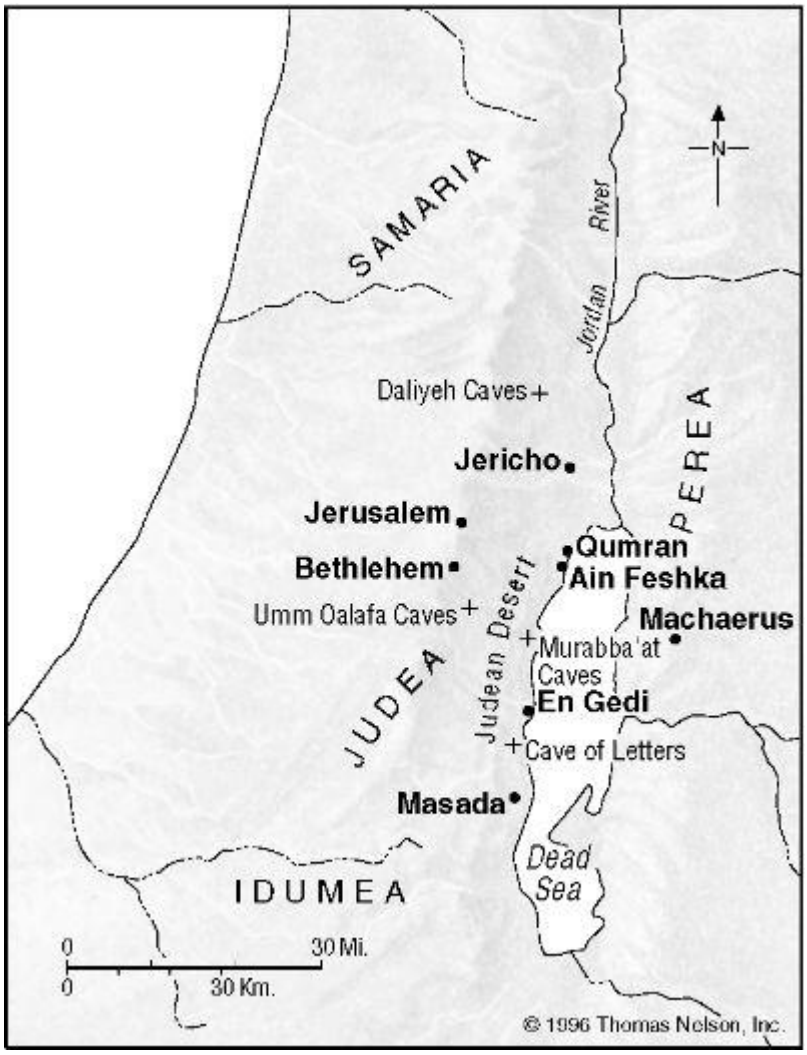
Others have identified Isaiah's wife, "the prophetess" of 8:3, as the "virgin." She was a young woman of marriageable age, another meaning of the Hebrew word translated virgin. The child in this case would be Maher-Shalal-Hash-Baz. According to this view, the child's two names, Maher-Shalal-Hash-Baz meaning "Speed the Spoil, Hasten the Booty," and Immanuel meaning "God with Us," symbolize judgment and salvation. In fact, Isaiah himself described his children as "signs" to the nation (8:18), and he delivered a similar prophecy for this son (compare 7:16 with 8:4).

Some cite the parallel between the prophecy that a "virgin shall conceive" and Jesus' miraculous birth as evidence that this prophecy was fulfilled only in Jesus. Mary was the virgin mother; and the birth of Jesus was the sign of God's salvation. His name would be Immanuel, "God with Us," because Jesus was the Son of God and He lived among us (Matt. 1:23). According to this view, Isaiah's prophecy had no fulfillment prior to Jesus' birth (Matt. 1:18–25).

It is not uncommon for biblical prophecies to have one level of fulfillment in the immediate future, and a final fulfillment many years later in the person and work of the Savior, Jesus. Thus the pregnancy of Isaiah's new wife and the birth of her son (8:3) could have been a sign to King Ahaz. However, this would have been a fulfillment, not the fulfillment. The prophecy was completely fulfilled in the coming of God's only Son to the earth. He is the only Child who can truly be called Wonderful, Counselor, and Prince of Peace (9:6).

7:14 Again you is plural here. Isaiah turns from the king whom he has dismissed in judgment and addresses all who are present. The sign is for many. The word Lord speaks of the sovereignty of God, of His great control over all His creation. The pronoun Himself adds an absolute certainty to the impending sign. The Hebrew word rendered virgin means "a young woman of marriageable age." But the word also connotes the idea of virginity, for the Septuagint, the Greek translation of the Hebrew Bible made in the second century B.C., renders the Hebrew word with a Greek term that specifically means "virgin".

7:15 Curds and honey contrast with "bread and wine" from cultivated lands and symbolically represent the Judean's simple diet after the Assyrian invasion. Thus the Child, similar to Isaiah's son Shear-Jashub (v. 3), would be identified with the remnant.



The Region of the Dead Sea Scrolls

In 1947 a shepherd looking for a stray goat in a cave near Qumran stumbled upon some clay jars containing ancient scrolls. Though these scrolls were all from the first century a.d. or before, the hot and dry climate of the Dead Sea region had preserved them remarkably well. One of the most significant scrolls in the discovery was a complete copy of the Book of Isaiah. Its contents amply confirm the authenticity of later manuscripts. Later searches of the Dead Sea region led to discoveries of scrolls containing the Minor Prophets, near En Gedi, and other biblical fragments in the Murabbaat caves.

7:16, 17 For before: Similar prophecies were spoken of the Child's birth and Isaiah's other son Maher-Shalal-Hash-Baz (8:3): Israel and Syria would be destroyed before this child and Isaiah's son would reach maturity (8:4, where Syria is referred to as Damascus and Israel as Samaria).

7:18–25 This oracle consists of four "woe" prophecies (vv. 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23–25), each of which begins with in that day (2:12). They reveal the details of the veiled threat in verse 17 of how the Lord will judge the unbelievers.

7:18, 19 The invading hordes are compared to swarming insects—the fly and the bee—blanketing Judah, a condition fulfilled in the Assyrian invasions.

7:20 shave … the hair: This was a symbol of humiliation. Hired refers to Ahaz's foolish idea of paying Assyria to save him from the alliance of Syria and Israel.

7:21, 22 in that day: This phrase can indicate times of trouble as here, or periods of blessing (as in 2:2). A young cow and two sheep out of what used to be large herd indicates impoverishment in the time of trouble. The land would be so depopulated and impoverished that the limited fare of curds and honey (v. 15) would look like an abundance.

7:23–25 vines … thorns: The productivity of the land would be greatly reduced in the period of God's judgment. The repetition of briers and thorns in vv. 23–25 is emphatic; in other words, the land would no longer be cultivated.

8:1 large scroll: This message from the Lord was intended to be read and pondered by many people.

8:2 Just as the wicked Ahaz was forced to be a party to the sign regarding the birth of Immanuel (7:10–17), Uriah, an apostate priest (2 Kin. 16:10–16), and Zechariah, presumably a false prophet (not to be confused with the prophet who wrote the Book of Zechariah), were forced to witness to this prophecy.

8:3 Isaiah's wife was a prophetess in her own right. It is possible that this was a new wife, following the death of the mother of Shear-Jashub (7:3).

8:4 spoil of Samaria … king of Assyria: This is a specific prediction of the fall of Samaria to the Assyrians in 722 B.C. This prophecy has to have been written shortly before that time, as the fulfillment would come before the new child would be able to speak.

8:5–10 This prophecy shifts from Syria and Israel's defeat before Assyria to Judah's defeat for unbelief. It consists of three parts: (1) the accusation of Judah's unbelief (vv. 5, 6), (2) Judah devastated but not annihilated by Assyria (vv. 7, 8), and (3) the doom of all Judah's enemies (vv. 9, 10).

8:5 The LORD also spoke to me again: This phrase introduces a new prophetic section and reminds the reader of the source of the prophetic images in the Book of Isaiah.

8:6 These people is "this people" in Hebrew, the same construction as in v. 11. The gentle waters of Shiloah picture the sustaining presence of the Lord; He had quietly supplied the Israelites their needs, such as pure water. Shiloah may have been a little stream that flowed through an aqueduct (7:3) to carry the water from the spring Gihon on Jerusalem's east side (2 Chr. 32:30) to the Pool of Siloam (Neh. 3:15) in the lower or southern end of the city. rejoice: The Judeans rejoiced because they thought they were going to defeat the kings of Israel and Syria through Ahaz's strategy of hiring the armies of Assyria. They looked for the salvation that a mere king could offer instead of appealing to the King of kings for protection.

8:7, 8 The River refers to the Euphrates, but also conveys the image of pagan gods. neck: Assyria would devastate Judah, but not completely annihilate it (ch. 37). wings: In the middle of v. 8, the image of Assyria as mighty waters changes to the image of a bird of prey. Isaiah bestows the name of the promised Child, Immanuel (7:14), on Judah, for it would be preserved only because God was with that nation (v. 10).

8:9 Far countries refers to the many nations that made up Assyria's international army (5:26; 7:18). Gird yourselves … be broken: The nations would do the will of God, but in turn would be destroyed.

8:10 It will not stand: The Lord would defeat the purposes of Judah's enemies; all their councils would come to nothing. This promise concludes the prophecies of 7:1–8:10. The Child whose name would mean God is with us (v. 8; 7:14), was a sign not only of the destruction of Syria and Israel (7:17), but of all of God's enemies, including Assyria.

8:11—9:1 After an introductory summary (v. 11), this prophecy consists of two cycles: (1) Judah is commanded to trust in the Lord or perish, a command reinforced by Isaiah and his children, who serve as signs to Judah (vv. 12–18). (2) Judah is commanded to walk in the light of Isaiah's prophecies or be thrown into utter darkness (8:19—9:1).

8:11 Strong hand signifies a powerful sense of the Lord's inspiration (Ezek. 1:3).

8:12 Do not say: The commands in vv. 12, 13, 15, 19 are in the plural. Perhaps Isaiah's adversaries were labeling his rejection of an alliance with Assyria a conspiracy.

8:13 Hallow means to treat as holy. Your fear indicates a sense of reverence, awe, and wonder. Your dread indicates fright and terror. If the people want to be frightened, they should be frightened of God. If they want to respond to God correctly, they should treat His name with awe and fear Him (Ex. 20:20).

8:14 God is a sanctuary for believers, but a stone of stumbling for unbelievers (Ps. 118:22; Luke 20:17, 18; Rom. 9:33; 1 Pet. 2:6–8). Both the houses designate both the northern and the southern kingdom, that is, both Israel and Judah.

8:15 stumble … broken: The wicked will not prevail for long (v. 10).

8:16 Testimony refers to a legal transaction. Law refers to God's instruction revealed through Isaiah. Isaiah's disciples put his prophecies in the form of a legal transaction probably to prove their authenticity when they were fulfilled (vv. 1, 2; compare Jer. 28:9; 32:12–14).

8:17 wait … hope: These words indicate a confident expectation that God would meet the needs of His people and deliver them from disaster

(40:31; Ps. 40:1). Ultimately, the hope of Isaiah would be fulfilled in the Savior Jesus (Heb. 2:12, 13).

8:18 children: Isaiah, whose name speaks of the salvation of God, and his two sons, whose names speak of the impending judgment of God, were signs and wonders in Israel—that is, they were symbols (20:3). Mount Zion: The place of the holy temple was a mirror of God's dwelling in the highest heaven.

8:19, 20 In the fertility religions of Canaan, mediums and wizards would deliver divine revelations. who whisper and mutter: But the best one could get from these perverted "prophets" was garbled muttering. Seek the dead indicates that the people were involved in necromancy, namely, the practice of conjuring up the spirits of the dead in order to influence events (29:4; 65:4).

8:21 They refers to the wicked who refuse to revere God (v. 13). It refers perhaps to the implied darkness of v. 20. curse: For similar usage, see Ex. 22:28; Lev. 24:15, 16.

Be Careful of Counsel

As you make decisions and strategize plans, you'll do well to gain counsel from wise, trusted confidants. In fact, Proverbs says that utilizing input from many counselors offers safety (Prov. 11:14). Their variety of opinions tends to ensure success (15:22; 20:18; 24:6).

The people of Isaiah's day could have benefited by heeding wise counsel, but they had a hard time distinguishing good counsel from bad. So Isaiah contrasted the two. Reliable counsel …

• listens carefully to God (Is. 8:11); • is not quick to identify "conspiracies" (8:12); • avoids acting solely out of fear (8:12); and • praises and respects the Lord (8:13).

Unreliable counsel …

• ignores God's Law and testimony (8:19, 20); • allows anger to distort things (8:21); and, • leads to trouble and anguish (8:22).

Can you identify the sources of good and bad counsel in your life? Would anyone be able to mention you as a source of wise counsel and advice?

8:22 The prophets commonly used the imagery of darkness to indicate judgment (5:30). The synonyms for darkness in this verse describe not only moral and spiritual blight, but also the invasion of Assyria that took away liberty and brought foreign oppression.

9:1 Nevertheless the gloom: This line completes the thought of 8:22 and promises a dramatic change to come. That change would be the explosion of light found in the Good News: Jesus can free us from the darkness that comes from our sin (Eph. 5:8). The ancient tribal allotments of Zebulun and Napthali (Josh. 19:10–16, 32–39), which included Galilee, were the first to feel the brunt of the Assyrian invasions (2 Kin. 15:29). The three phrases at the end of the verse—the way of the sea, beyond the Jordan, Galilee of the Gentiles or "nations"—indicate administrative districts of the Assyrian conqueror Tiglath-Pileser III as a result of the three campaigns he waged in the west around 733 B.C.

9:2–7 This seventh prophecy in the context of the Syro-Ephraimite war is climactic: An ideal monarch will come who will bring an end to war and usher in universal peace. The light that will replace the darkness of Assyrian oppression will be a Child, God incarnate (7:14). His four compounded throne names (v. 6) depict His divine-human nature as well as His universal program of salvation.

9:2 Have seen: The future event is described by the prophet, under the impulse of the Spirit, as having already occurred. Light stands for God's blessings, presence, and revelation (2:5), that is incarnate in Jesus (58:8; 59:9; 60:1, 2, 19, 20; John 8:12). Shadow of death means "deep darkness" (compare 60:2; Ps. 23:4). Here this Hebrew word complements the more commonly used word for darkness.

9:3 joy of harvest … divide the spoil: The agricultural society knows no greater joy than that of harvest. A soldier knows no greater joy than that of a finished battle when his side has won, he is still alive, and there is now booty to divide. Contrast the joy of harvest in this verse with the lack of joy at harvest in 16:10.

9:4 yoke … staff … rod: These three images of oppression emphasize the suffering of the people during the period of foreign domination. The pronoun his refers to Assyria, which boasted of the heavy yokes it imposed on its captive peoples (10:27). The day of Midian refers to the defeat of Midian (10:26; Judg. 6—8).

9:5 warrior's sandal: Assyrian armies were marked by the noise of the marching of many feet. Garments rolled in blood from past battles was a deliberate scare tactic to frighten enemies in an impending battle. All of these emblems of warfare were to be burned in the coming day of the reign of the divine Child (v. 6).

9:6 Born speaks of the Child's humanity and given of His deity. Wonderful, Counselor is one name, meaning "wonderful divine Counselor" (11:1–5). Mighty God indicates that the Lord is a powerful Warrior (10:21). Everlasting Father describes a King and Father who provides for and protects His people forever (40:9–11; Matt. 11:27–30). Thus the word Father is used here of the Savior's role as an ideal king. Prince of Peace is the climactic title (2:4; 11:6–9; 53:5; Luke 2:14; Rom. 5:1). The Child is the true Prince—the One who has the right to reign and who will usher in peace. The four double names combine aspects of Jesus' deity and His humanity. Together, these four double names assert the dual nature of the Savior: He is God become man.

9:7 Of the increase may be translated "to Him will increase." Government and peace may be rephrased as "peaceful reign." The risen Lord Jesus brings His rule of peace to the believer's heart in the present age. Moreover, He will establish the kingdom of God, which will be His reign of peace. The fact that this coming Child will occupy the throne of David forever fulfills God's promise to David (2 Sam. 7:8–16; Ps. 89:19–37; Luke 1:32, 33).

9:8—10:4 This passage contains a judgment against the northern kingdom: the Lord will destroy it and its capital, Samaria. The accusations and judicial sentences in this section indicate that the Lord is both Judge and Punisher (9:11, 14, 19; 10:4).

9:9, 10 Bricks refers to the mud brick walls common in ancient Israel. The people were planning to make their buildings more grandiose, not taking into account the fact that the Lord was about to destroy the buildings completely because of His judgment on their sins.

9:11 The adversaries refers to the Assyrians who were used by the LORD to punish the northern kingdom.

9:12 The Syrians were to the east of Israel and the Philistines to the west.

9:13 Turn indicates repentance and a desire for restoration.

9:14, 15 Head and tail is a figure of speech for all leaders.

9:16 cause them to err: For a similar usage, see 3:12.

9:17 Young men … widows denotes every person. Everyone had turned from the faithful worship of God. All of Israel had been contaminated with evil, hypocrisy, and foolishness (read 1 Cor. 5:6 for an exhortation not to let wickedness corrupt the church).

9:18, 19 The fire of wickedness is matched by the fire of the wrath of the LORD.

9:18 Wickedness refers both to the sin itself and to its destructive consequences.

9:19, 20 No man shall spare his brother refers to anarchy (3:4, 5). right hand … left hand: These figures of speech indicate an insatiable hunger and the consequent ruin that would occur in the day of judgment.

9:21 Manasseh fought Ephraim (Judg. 12:4); then together they fought Judah (but see 11:13).

10:1 Woe is a chilling word when spoken by God (5:8–23; 10:5; 18:1); here the Lord condemns the leaders who write laws that perpetuate evil in the community.

10:2 The needy are regularly seen in Scripture as those to whom the righteous should show true piety. When godly people reach out to help those who cannot help themselves, they display pure, biblical religion (James 1:27). Conversely, the mark of the ungodly can be seen in their oppressive actions against people who cannot help themselves. They set themselves up for the sure judgment of God (v. 3).

10:3 From afar refers to Assyria. To whom: The wicked could not turn to God, for they had refused to do so before and had ignored God's warnings (8:6).

10:4 Prisoners refers to the Israelites being led away into exile.

10:5—11:16 This section moves beyond the wasting of Israel to the subsequent destruction of Assyria and the deliverance of Judah.

10:5–34 This salvation oracle has two major sections: (1) Assyria's doom (vv. 5–19) and (2) the remnant's salvation (vv. 20–34).

10:5 And … indignation may also be translated "even the staff in My indignant hand." rod of My anger: Though God sovereignly uses sinners as instruments of His will (7:17; 13:5), they will be held accountable for their own wickedness. Thus God shows that He is just in all His ways (Hab. 1—3).

10:6 The ungodly nation is Judah (vv. 11, 12).

10:7, 8 in his heart: The purpose of the arrogant Assyrians was to continue their path of uninterrupted conquest. But God had different plans for them (v. 12).

10:9 Calno … Damascus: This is a list of cities that had already fallen to the Assyrians.

10:10, 11 idols … images: The Assyrians had conquered the nations who had false gods; surely, they believed, they would also have an easy time against Jerusalem and her idols. Though only the living God was to be worshiped by the Israelites, they had repeatedly broken that command (Ex. 20:4–6; Judg. 2:19).

10:12 The fruit is the king's speech cited in vv. 13, 14. arrogant heart … haughty looks: For a similar idea, see 2:11; 3:9; 9:9.

10:13 By the strength of my hand: The wicked are quick to take credit for their successes. The righteous correctly give praise to God for their accomplishments.

10:14 as one gathers eggs: That is, the conquests, the wicked brag, were child's play. The nations they had ravaged provided no more opposition than a hen when one gathers eggs.

10:15 An implement in the hand of its user has no reason for boasting; Assyria was merely a tool in the hand of God. It had no reason to boast.

“hosts”

(Heb. tsebaah) (10:16; Gen. 2:1; Pss. 103:21; 148:2) Strong’s #6635: This word comes from a verb meaning “to fight” or “to serve.” Angels are said to be hosts because they serve God (1 Kin. 22:19; Ps. 103:20, 21; compare Luke 2:13). The heavens are under the command of God and render Him worship, thus they are also called host (45:12; Neh. 9:6; Ps. 33:6). The term also commonly refers to combat troops (2 Kin. 5:1; 1 Chr. 7:11, 40). “The armies of the LORD” is an expression used once for the children of Israel, and twice for God’s army of angels (Ex. 12:41; Josh. 5:14, 15). Of the nearly five hundred uses of this word, almost three hundred are in an expression such as “the LORD of hosts” (1 Sam. 17:45), a title describing God’s power. On two occasions, the NT writers transliterated this Hebrew title as “the Lord of Sabaoth” to describe the awesome might of God (Rom. 9:29; James 5:4).

10:16 leanness … burning: These words describe the coming judgment of the Assyrians, who had become fat because of their acts of conquest.

10:17, 18 The Light of Israel is a wonderful title for God (9:2; 58:8; 60:1, 19, 20). The Lord Jesus is described as a “Light” of Israel as well (John 1:1–13). His thorns … his forest refers to all persons and possessions in the Assyrian Empire. What people count as honorable or despicable will mean little before God’s burning judgment.

10:19, 20 The remnant is the portion of Abraham’s offspring that God preserved. The Hebrew word used here for remnant is different from the words used in 1:9; 6:13. depend: Finally there will be a people whose trust will be unchangeably in the Lord.

10:21, 22 as the sand … A remnant: Most of the people of the northern kingdom were carried off into captivity. But some Israelites made their way to Judah and became part of the southern kingdom. These people and their descendants would act as a remnant by preserving the names of the northern tribes among the people of God.

10:23 determined end: This powerful language contrasts with the vagueness of false prophecies among the nations.

10:24 Lord GOD of hosts: For a similar usage, see 1:9. O My people: The language here expresses the loving care of the Lord for His people. They need not fear the armies of the Assyrians.

10:25 a very little while: From the viewpoint of eternity, the period of trial is exceedingly brief.

10:26 slaughter of Midian: Despite its powerful and ruthless armies, Isaiah prophesied that Assyria would go down in Israelite history alongside the Midianites and the Egyptians, as a foe miraculously vanquished by the Lord (Is. 10:26). That is exactly what happened. on the sea refers to God's great triumph over Pharaoh at the Exodus (Ex. 14; 15).

10:27 in that day: For a similar idea, see 2:12. The meaning of anointing oil here is uncertain. If it means "fat," the image may be of a strong, fattened ox breaking its yoke.

10:28–32 These verses depict Isaiah's vision of the king of Assyria's relentless march south over difficult terrain from Aiath—that is, Ai. Ai was ten miles north of Jerusalem on a point overlooking the city.

10:28, 29 The cities as listed in these verses are closer and closer to the capital at Jerusalem. Each town conquered was another step toward the impending defeat of the holy city.

10:30, 31 Lift up your voice: The language turns to that of panic. The actions are those of a frightened people facing defeat and disaster.

10:32 daughter of Zion: The army was near Jerusalem itself. The pronoun he refers to Assyria, the enemy.

10:33, 34 The bough is the king of Assyria and the thickets are his army. The point is that God will bring judgment on the instruments that He used to judge Israel.

11:1–9 This celebrated salvation oracle about the King of Peace (4:2; 7:14; 9:6) consists of three sections: (1) His endowment (vv. 1, 2); (2) His righteous rule (vv. 3–5); and (3) His kingdom of peace (vv. 6–9).

11:1 A Rod from the stem of Jesse (1 Sam. 16:10–13) represents the new and greater David. As David inaugurated a kingdom of righteousness and peace, the new David, the "rod" or "root" from David's line (53:2), will establish an incomparably greater kingdom. The words Rod and Branch are messianic terms. They are figurative words for the great descendant of the household of David, the Seed of the Woman promised in Gen. 3:15, Jesus Christ Himself (Matt. 1:17).

11:2 Spirit: As in the case of David (1 Sam. 16:13), the Messiah would be empowered by the Holy Spirit (4:4; 42:1; 48:16; 59:21; 61:1; Luke 3:22), the Agent for establishing God's kingdom (Gen. 1:1, 2; Judg. 3:10; 6:34; 1 Sam. 10:6). The first readers of the Hebrew Scriptures likely thought that the term Spirit was just another way of speaking about God with awe or wonder. In the NT, we learn that the term refers to the third Person of the Trinity (Matt. 28:19). Solomon prayed for wisdom and understanding (1 Kin. 3:9), the administrative skill to govern the people according to the principles of righteousness and justice (Deut. 1:15–17). The Messiah will embody all this; He will be the ideal King (33:6). The Holy Spirit's counsel is not advice, but authoritative plans and decisions. the fear of the LORD: The Messiah would demonstrate in all His life the correct response to God: He would honor and obey Him (Ex. 20:20). The people of God in all ages are under orders to respond to Him with reverential awe (Lev. 19:14; Prov. 19:23).

11:3 Delight refers to the sense of smell. There may be an allusion to the incense burned at a coronation ceremony. Whereas "fear of God" usually means a standard of moral conduct known and accepted by humankind in general, the fear of the LORD in this case may refer to the standard of moral conduct known through special revelation and accepted by the faithful.

God's Anger Brings Peace

Critics of Christianity sometimes point to God's wrath as a contradiction in His supposedly loving character. "How can you say that God is a God of love when the OT says that He is going to 'strike the earth with the rod of His mouth'?" (Is. 11:4) they scornfully ask.

One response is to observe that God's wrath is not exactly like the anger that human beings often display. People often vent their rage in vindictive, selfish ways that may dissipate emotion but do little to promote true justice. By contrast, God's wrath is based in His just and righteous character (11:5). When He judges people and nations, it is not because He feels hurt, but because wrongs need to be righted. His wrath comes against evil and wickedness.

Furthermore, God's anger results in a righteous outcome—peace (11:6–9). When human beings vindicate themselves, their wrath often leads to more violence, suffering, and bitterness. But God's judgments will ultimately produce peace on earth because they serve true justice and do away with those who are committed to injustice and unrighteousness.

11:4, 5 In this context, judge does not mean to bring people to account, but to act on their behalf. As the judge of His people, God sentences the wicked and offers protection and defense for the innocent and oppressed. rod of His mouth: The Messiah will conquer by His speech (49:2; Heb. 4:12; Rev. 19:15).

11:6–9 This picture of cruel beasts miraculously regenerated with a new nature that makes them protect their natural prey depicts a reign of peace and security. This can only be realized in the return of the Messiah to establish the kingdom of God (65:17–25). In God's peaceful kingdom, carnivores will become herbivores; natural enemies will become companions; and little children will play safely near the dwellings of formerly venomous snakes.

11:6–8 a little child shall lead them: In the coming kingdom, a youngster will be able to lead formerly wild animals. This is a way of emphasizing the end of terror, fright, and danger in the coming kingdom.

11:9 In ancient times, the knowledge of the LORD was limited and spotty; there is coming a glorious age in which there will be no limit to access to divine truth. As the waters cover the sea means "thoroughly." God will make Himself known throughout the earth.

11:10 in that day: This verse forms a single prophetic vision. The exalted Root of Jesse will attract the Gentiles to His resting place (2:3). This is a prophecy of the coming of people of all nations to the knowledge of God. Thus, in the OT, the Lord expresses His concern for the salvation of other nations (Gen. 12:1–3). World mission was not a new idea with the Great Commission (Matt. 28:18–20). Banner is a rallying symbol. Jesus the Messiah is the banner for the gathering of peoples from all over the earth.

11:11–16 This prophecy concerning the second Exodus (51:9–11) consists of the regathering of the exiles (vv. 11, 12), their unity in opposition to God's enemies (vv. 13, 14), and an allusion to the first Exodus to show how much greater is the second one (vv. 15, 16).

11:11 The second time may refer to the remnant coming back to the land in 538 B.C., in contrast to the first Exodus from Egypt. Beyond that, it could also refer to the remnant's coming to Christ in the present age (Rom. 11:5), or to its future return to Christ (Rom. 11:11–27). From Assyria … and the islands of the sea indicates the whole earth (v. 12).

11:12 the four corners of the earth: This figurative expression is similar to the words of Acts 1:8: "to the end of the earth." The Messiah will gather disciples from all over the world.

11:13 Ephraim … Judah: Not only will God destroy the enemies of the Israelites and Judeans, but He will also remove their ancient enmities (9:20, 21).

11:14 upon the shoulder: The image is that of a bird of prey attacking another bird. The Philistines, Edom, Moab, and Ammon, Israel's traditional enemies, may represent the adversaries of the Messiah's kingdom (a similar use of the word Assyria is found in Mic. 5:6).

11:15 Mighty wind is an allusion to Ex. 14:21–27. The River refers to the Euphrates. dry-shod: As God had provided a dry passage across the Red Sea in the first Exodus, so in the second Exodus He would remove any physical barrier that would hinder the return of His people.

11:16 A highway symbolizes the certainty of the return, for no obstacles would hinder the Lord's returning exiles (35:8–10; 40:3, 4; 57:14; 62:10). In the day: The reference here is to the first Exodus (v. 11).

12:1–6 This hymn of praise for God's salvation by the restored remnant after the second Exodus (11:12–16) resembles Moses and Miriam's hymn of praise after the first Exodus from Egypt (Ex. 15). The song consists of a hymn of thanksgiving by the remnant for their salvation (vv. 1–3), and a hymn of thanksgiving proclaiming His salvation among the nations (vv. 4–6). Ultimately, this is an end-time psalm of praise (as is 42:10–17), a poem to be sung in the future kingdom by the redeemed of the Lord in His glorious presence.

12:1 in that day: For a similar idea, see 2:12. The first you is singular, representing the remnant as an individual. angry: The anger of God had caused the people to be dispersed among the nations (5:25; 9:12); His grace would lead to their regathering.

12:2 God is my salvation: This psalm of redemption is based on the first psalm of redemption in Exodus (Ex. 15:2; Ps. 118:14). YAH, the LORD, by its repetition, emphasizes that Israel's covenant-keeping God—and not the nations—brings salvation (26:4). My strength and song may be rephrased as "my strong song" or "my song of strength" (Ex. 15:2).

12:3 You in vv. 3–5 is plural. The Hebrew poets often associate the concept of water with salvation (Ex. 17:1–7). In an arid land, the provision of wells and springs was regarded as a divine gift (55:1).

12:4 As in the Psalms, this hymn uses several terms for the praise of God. Praise means "to give public acknowledgment" or "to declare aloud in public." Call upon His name may be rephrased as "proclaim in His name." Declare means "to make known." Make mention means "to cause to remember." Each of these verbs designates public, vocal acknowledgment of the wonders and works of God. among the peoples: Like Ps. 117, this is a poem of international evangelism.

12:5 Sing to the LORD: The principal audience of sacred songs is God Himself (Ps. 33:1). excellent things: In Ex. 15:1, the root of this term is translated "triumphed gloriously." all the earth: This emphasis fits the same line of thought found in Ps. 19:1.

12:6 Cry out and shout may be rephrased as "shout aloud in great joy." Inhabitant of Zion originally referred to the people who returned from captivity in Babylon. The future singers of this psalm will be the people in the kingdom of the Messiah. They will celebrate Him and His salvation. in your midst: In the coming age of the reign of King Jesus, He will be in the midst of His people (Zeph. 3:16–18).

13:1–27:13 The Book of Isaiah takes a major turn at 13:1. The focus in this extended section is first on the Lord's judgments against the nations (chs. 13—23): Babylon and Assyria (13:1—14:27), Philistia (14:28–32), Moab (15:1—16:14), Damascus (17:1–14), Ethiopia (18:1–7), Egypt (19:1—20:6), Babylon (21:1–10), Edom (21:11, 12), Arabia (21:13–17), Jerusalem (22:1–25), and Tyre (23:1–18). This prophecy of judgment is followed by an end-time prophecy that is sometimes called "the little apocalypse of Isaiah" (chs. 24—27).

13:1—14:27 The oracle against Babylon consists of seven sections: (1) the assembly of the army of the Lord of Hosts (13:1–5); (2) the announcement of the day of the Lord (13:6–18); (3) the annihilation of Babylon (13:19–22); (4) the salvation of Israel (14:1, 2); (5) Israel's mocking dirge for the king of Babylon (14:3–21); (6) the destruction of Babylon (14:22, 23); and (7) the destruction of Assyria (14:24–27).

13:1, 2 The word burden comes from the root meaning "to lift up" or "to bear." It is as though the prophet were heavily laden with a message from God that he must deliver due to its sheer weight (Nah. 1:1; Hab. 1:1). Babylon was the crown jewel of the Assyrian Empire. This oracle may refer to its destruction around 689 B.C. when Sennacherib quelled a rebellion there. Yet the Lord's overthrow of Babylon, "the glory of kingdoms" (v. 19), symbolizes His triumph over the world (v. 11). Babylon is the epitome of religion and culture in the ancient Middle East. Thus the oracle is indirectly against all nations, especially Assyria (14:24–27). Peter uses the term Babylon symbolically in the NT (1 Pet. 5:13) as does John (Rev. 14:8; 18:2, 10–21) to refer to any enemy of God's kingdom.

13:3, 4 Sanctified ones refers to the victorious armies of the earth who rejoice, wittingly or unwittingly, in the Lord's exaltation (45:1–7; Joel 2:11). Many people represent all nations, who will be instruments in God's hands for judging sinful nations, though they themselves are sinners.

13:5 Far country … end of heaven refers to the whole earth (11:11, 12). His weapons of indignation: The nations are the tools God will use to vent His wrath against Babylon.

13:6 The day of the LORD refers to a time of unusual activity of God in the lives of people, for judgment or for mercy. At hand is also translated "near." The basic idea of the term is not that of approaching a fixed date, but that the day of the Lord is about to burst into one's world. The day of the Lord is imminent—able to happen at any time—not because people have almost reached it as a destination, but because it may burst in upon people without further warning. The title the Almighty is the Hebrew name Shaddai (Ex. 6:3; Ps. 91:1).

13:7, 8 limp … melt … afraid: These images describe the depth of the people's fear. a woman in childbirth: This is a familiar image of stress in the poetry of the Bible.

13:9, 10 Will not give their light symbolizes the dark aspect of God's judgment. It is as though heaven blushes at the thought of the awful wrath of the Lord against wickedness. The imagery in vv. 10 and 13 may be drawn from and or merged with the final destruction of the cosmos (34:4).

INSIGHT

The Failure of the Stars

Isaiah predicted that the heavenly bodies would fail to give light when the day of the Lord came against Babylon (Is. 13:10). This suggested the catastrophic destruction that God would bring on this evil empire. Darkness would descend on a nation that exalted itself above all others (14:12–15).

Isaiah's prophecy may also have been mocking the Babylonians' reliance on astrology and astronomy to make plans and interpret history. Calendars surviving from the Assyrians and Babylonians show that they linked important events such as battles, floods, famines, and the death of kings to the movement of the stars and planets. (These artifacts have helped modern-day researchers carefully estimate the dates of these events and construct a fairly accurate timetable of ancient history.) Thus, if the stars were to fail, the Babylonian worldview would fail as well, leaving the nation in utter confusion.

13:11 iniquity … arrogance … proud … haughtiness … terrible: The common element is pride, which brings the nations down (2:6–22).

13:12 mortal: The Hebrew word speaks of the inherent weakness of humanity (Ps. 8:4).

13:13, 14 heavens … earth: The shaking of the cosmos, including the sun, moon, and stars—which were worshiped by the pagans—symbolizes the overthrow of all that unbelieving humans exalt as rivals to God (2:12–18).

13:15, 16 Everyone … children … houses … wives: In the ancient Middle East, the brutality of war extended to everyone, regardless of age, gender, or station.

13:17, 18 The Medes, who lived in what is today northwest Iran, were fierce enemies of the Israelites. Significant for dating this prophecy is the fact that Persia, which conquered the Medes in 550 B.C. and in conjunction with the Medes conquered Babylon in 539 B.C., is not mentioned. silver … gold: The point is that the Medes will not be bought off with bribes.

13:19 In 4:2, the same Hebrew word translated glory here is translated "beautiful" to describe the Branch of the Lord. The ascriptions of beauty to Babylon are not exaggerations; the city at its zenith must have been spellbinding.

13:20 It will never be inhabited: The fulfillment of this prophecy should not be sought in a specific event, but in the general principle that the kingdoms of this world would not endure. Places that once were fabled for their great structures will become so desolate that even desert peoples would not pitch tents there.

13:21, 22 The language of these verses is that of the ancient Middle Eastern curse. The animals named in these verses ominously represent that which is unclean, unholy, uncivilized, and unsettled (34:14, 15; Rev. 18:2). The godly people of ancient Israel would have no associations with such animals.

14:1, 2 These verses relate the salvation of Israel in the midst of the judgment on the King of Babylon. The judgment of sinners, represented by Babylon, was necessary for the Lord to establish Immanuel's kingdom (7:14; 9:1–6; 11:1—12:6). These two verses form an oracle of blessing on Jacob in the context of the Lord's burden of wrath against Babylon (chs. 13; 14).

14:1 Still may also be translated "again," in which case it refers to the second Exodus, the return of the remnant from Babylonian captivity (11:15, 16). choose: The Lord will make His choice in Israel. Strangers will join the returning Israelites as they did in the first Exodus (Ex. 12:38). But in this case, the strangers will be loyal adherents of the Lord.

14:2 people will take them: For the development of this idea, see Ezra 1:1–8. captive: For the development of this theme, see Eph. 4:8.

14:3–21 These verses are Israel's mocking dirge for the King of Babylon.

14:3 Hard bondage is an allusion to the first Exodus (ch. 12). Rest recalls the freedom from Egyptian servitude (Deut. 5:12–15).

14:4–23 This taunting lament has four stanzas presenting four scenes: (1) the earth's rest now that the tyrant of Babylon is gone (vv. 4–8), (2) Sheol's astonishment when Babylon arrives there (vv. 9–11), (3) heaven's expulsion of Babylon after he ascends there (vv. 12–15), and (4) the people of Babylon's consignment of him to an shameful burial for his tyranny against them (vv. 16–21). The first and last scenes are more literal; the middle ones draw their imagery from ancient Near Eastern mythology. Chronologically the third stanza precedes the first two.

14:4 the king of Babylon: No particular king of Babylon is indicated (13:1). Proverb refers to a highly figurative poem. oppressor: This is the same term used in 9:4 of an unnamed Assyrian tyrant.

14:5, 6 The staff and the scepter were symbols of authority and power in the ancient Middle East (9:4). struck: The Babylonian kings had paraded their tyranny in order to intimidate any who dared to oppose them. But now the Lord in judgment was breaking their instruments of oppression. cypress: The Babylonian kings boasted of the splendid trees they carted off from the lands they pillaged to build their own palaces.

14:7, 8 At rest and quiet may be rephrased as "utterly quiet." This is the security that comes after the tyrant is dead. cypress trees rejoice: The trees are personified, describing the joy of the formerly oppressed people

(35:1; 44:23; 55:12). No woodsman: The trees would no longer be cut down to construct machines of war.

14:9–11 excited: The commotion in hell when the king of Babylon arrives contrasts sharply with the rest on earth when he is gone. The Hebrew word for the dead is similar in connotation to our word ghost: it speaks of the dead in a frightening manner (Prov. 9:18). The defeated subjects of the Babylonian tyrants are pictured as sitting on thrones, while the king is given a blanket of worms.

14:12 Fallen from heaven is a figure of speech meaning cast down from an exalted political position. Jesus said, "And you, Capernaum, who are exalted to heaven, will be brought down to Hades" (Luke 10:15), and apparently with the same meaning, "I saw Satan fall like lightning from heaven" (Luke 10:18). The name for Lucifer in Hebrew literally means "Day Star," or the planet Venus. The poetic language of this verse describes the aspiration of this brightest star to climb to the zenith of the heavens and its extinction before the rising sun. This is an apt summary of the failed goal of the king of Babylon (v. 4), who wanted to grasp universal and eternal domination. Tertullian, Milton, and others have linked this passage to the career of Satan on the basis of Luke 10:18, but the text does not specifically make this connection.

14:13 above the stars of God: The description is of a star that wanted to be grander than other stars. In this highly poetic language, Isaiah describes a king whose longing for glory was unlimited. Mount of the congregation is an allusion to a mythological mountain where the heavenly deities were thought to assemble. Farthest sides of the north probably refers to Mount Casius in northern Syria, the mountain believed by the Canaanites to be the realm of the gods (Ps. 48:1, 2).

14:14 I will be like the Most High is the most outrageous of the arrogant desires of this Assyrian or Babylonian king. He wanted to surpass the Most High, a term for the Lord that is often used in connection with the nations of the world (Pss. 87:5; 91:1, 9; 92:1).

14:15 Sheol: See the reference to hell in v. 9. The word lowest depths renders the same Hebrew word translated "farthest sides" (in v. 13). This is an example of comic justice for this king who wished to ascend to the heights of the gods and even the Most High Himself. The Pit is a synonym for Sheol often used together with it (Jon. 2:2, 6).

14:16 man … tremble: Isaiah compares this king to the One who can truly shake the earth (13:13).

14:17, 18 The house of his prisoners refers to exile. Unlike Cyrus, who sent the exiles home, the king of Babylon kept them captive.

14:19 out of your grave: The ancients believed that a proper burial was exceedingly important. The king's memory would be trampled by the people whom he abused in life. abominable branch: Contrast this with the Beautiful Branch, the Messiah (11:1). This is an "anti-Messiah" figure.

14:20 The brood … shall never be named: This evil king's posterity will not be remembered.

14:21 his children: None would survive the wicked ruler, lest they follow in his evil steps.

14:22 I will rise: The Lord Himself is behind the destruction of this arrogant king (v. 5). Whereas Israel will have a remnant (10:20), Babylon will not have anyone left.

14:23, 24 porcupine … marshes: The former beautiful city of Babylon (13:19) would become a wild, inhospitable place.

14:25–27 My land … My mountains: The Lord asserts His sovereignty. yoke … his burden: In 9:4, these same terms are used of the Assyrian menace.

King Hezekiah Heeds Isaiah

Upon the death of King Ahaz (Is. 14:28), the Philistines are believed to have sent representatives to Judah to invite Ahaz's successor Hezekiah to join them in rebelling against Assyria. The offer is interesting, given that only a few years before the Philistines had captured numerous cities and villages in western Judah (2 Chr. 28:18). Furthermore, Ahaz had made Judah a tributary of Assyria during the later years of his life (2 Kin. 16:7–9; 2 Chr. 28:21).

Apparently the Philistines perceived Hezekiah to be a different man who would be willing to throw off the Assyrian yoke. As it turned out, they were right. For a while, Hezekiah quit paying tribute (2 Kin. 18:7) and strongly resisted the Assyrians, even when they sent a force to besiege Jerusalem (18:13—19:37; 2 Chr. 32:1–21).

Nevertheless, the Philistines misread Hezekiah by apparently assuming that he would ally his people with theirs. Instead, the new king consulted God, who used Isaiah to warn him against any Philistine alliances (Is. 14:29–32). In fact, he eventually attacked the Philistines and recaptured much of Judah's lost territory (2 Kin. 18:8).

14:28–32 After an introduction (v. 28), the oracle against Philistia falls roughly into two cycles: (1) the annihilation of the Philistines and the preservation of God's poor and needy (vv. 29, 30) and (2) the destruction of Philistine cities and the founding of Zion (vv. 31, 32).

14:28 King Ahaz died in 720 B.C.

14:29 Rod is probably a metaphor for the Assyrian king (10:5). its offspring will be … serpent: More trouble would come upon Philistia; it would have nothing for which to rejoice.

14:30 Like Babylon (v. 22)—but unlike Israel—Philistia would have no future, for it would have no remnant.

14:31 The gate of a walled city was its weakest point. When the gate fell, the city could be taken. The Assyrian army would come from the north. No one will be alone speaks of the close ranks of the Assyrian army.

14:32 founded Zion: The destruction of Philistia would leave no refuge for the Philistines. The only place they could go to be saved would be

Jerusalem, the city built by God. That would be the place to which the poor of all nations could come, becoming God's people (Ps. 87).

A city wall uncovered in the excavation of Dibon, one of the leading cities of Moab. Isaiah predicted the destruction of the cities of Moab (Is. 15:1, 2).

15:1—16:14 The oracle against Moab has five parts: (1) an editorial superscript (15:1); (2) the sudden, devastating destruction of Moab (15:2–9); (3) a plea from Moab for shelter in Zion (16:1–5); (4) a reflection contrasting Moab's former pride with its fallen state (16:6–12); and (5) a postscript (16:13, 14).

15:1 For the origin of the people of Moab, see the story of Lot and his daughters in Gen. 19:30–38 (Num. 22—25; Deut. 1:5). burden: For similar phrasing, see 13:1. Ar and Kir were cities of Moab (16:7, 11; Deut. 2:9; 2 Kin. 3:25). This passage is marked by a lavish listing of cities and settlements in Moab. These words reflect a love of place, a focus on the contours of the land. There are twenty-one sites or geographical locations in Moab mentioned in chs. 15 and 16. Further, Moab is mentioned by name seventeen times in the two chapters. The verbs laid waste … and destroyed are also repeated for dramatic emphasis.

15:2 He refers collectively to Moab. High places were sites of pagan worship (16:12). weep … wail: This refers to the mourning over the destruction of the cities of Moab. Baldness and having one's beard cut off were aspects of mourning rituals.

15:3 Sackcloth and weeping were part of Middle Eastern mourning rites (Gen. 23:2; 37:34; 2 Sam. 1:11, 12).

15:4 armed soldiers: The weeping would extend even to hardened fighting men.

15:5 My heart refers to Isaiah, who felt sympathy for Moab (16:9–11). Zoar was a southwestern border city of Moab on the south end of the Dead Sea. The Ascent of Luhith is also mentioned by Jeremiah in his lament over Moab (Jer. 48:5).

15:6–8 The waters and green grass of the oasis could not survive the numerous refugees.

15:9 The term Dimon sounds like blood in Hebrew. Lions: Fleeing from one tragedy after another in their flight southward, the refugees turn to Judah in the west for asylum (16:1–5). As would be the case with Israel (1:9; 6:13; 10:20; 11:16)—but not with Assyria (14:22) and Philistia (14:30)—a remnant would survive in Moab.

16:1 The lamb is a collective for the thousands gathered from Sela to the wilderness and sent as tribute to the ruler of Judah (Num. 32:4; 2 Kin. 3:4).

16:2 Wandering bird is a sad description of the hopeless condition of the daughters of Moab, the women of the nation.

16:3 Take counsel may also be translated "make plans." Moab would find salvation in the shadow of Zion (2:2–4).

16:4, 5 Moab's salvation ultimately lies in the coming One, Jesus the Messiah, whose throne will be established (9:1–7; 11:1–5; Amos 9:11, 12; Acts 15:16, 17).

16:6 Pride is a regular target of the Lord's judgment (2:5–22; 13:11).

16:7 Kir Hareseth is another name for Kir (15:1).

16:8 Vine is a figure of speech for Moab (compare Israel's description as a vine in 5:1–7). Sea may refer to the Dead Sea because it is the nearest large body of water to Moab.

16:9 Heshbon and Elealeh were among the principal settlements in ancient Moab (15:4).

16:10 Contrast the lack of gladness in this verse with the ecstatic joy of 9:3.

16:11 Kir Heres is an alternative spelling for Kir Hareseth (v. 7) or Kir (15:1). Isaiah the prophet expresses his determination to one day rejoice over Moab. This is a promise of its future restoration.

16:12 high place … sanctuary: As long as the people worshiped false gods, they would be doomed to pain, judgment, and recurring trouble (15:2).

16:13, 14 A former prophecy against Moab (15:1) would be realized within three years, perhaps referring to the quelling of a rebellion against Sargon in 715 B.C. However, a remnant would remain (15:9). Moab had far more hope for salvation than did either Babylon or Philistia.

IN CONTEXT

The Fall of Damascus

Occasionally in the world's history, an individual city serves as the key to a particular region. For example, Hong Kong has become a gateway to and from China. Vancouver is a gateway for many Asians into North America. For years, Berlin was a tightly controlled place of passage between East and West.

In the ancient world, Damascus was the doorway to and from the area we know today as Palestine. Damascus, the oldest continually inhabited city in the world as far as we know, served as a front line of defense in the north for a league of allied cities to the south. Therefore, Isaiah's startling prophecy of Damascus's fall (Is. 17:1) must have shocked the Israelites who heard it. If Damascus were to fall, all its allies were likely to fall as well, like a series of dominoes.

That is exactly what happened. Damascus, the capital of Syria, had joined together with the northern kingdom to attack Judah in about 734 B.C. The southern kingdom hired the Assyrians to come to its rescue (2 Kin. 16:7, 8; 2 Chr. 28:21), and by 732 B.C. Damascus was captured and its ruler, King Rezin, was killed (2 Kin. 16:9)—just as Isaiah had predicted. The city never again regained the prominence it had previously enjoyed.

17:1—18:7 The oracle against Damascus falls into seven parts: (1) an editorial superscription (17:1); (2) the desolate ruin of Damascus (17:2, 3); (3) the ruin of Israel, which is left only a remnant (17:4–6); (4) the anticipation that in the future people will trust Israel's God (17:7, 8); (5) the accusation that Damascus replaced God with pagan deities (17:9–11); (6) a proclamation of doom upon the nations "who plunder us" (17:12–14); and (7) a prediction that a powerful nation will bring tribute to the Lord (18:1–7).

17:1, 2 burden: For similar phrasing, see 13:1. cities … flocks: Where people once lived, conditions would be suitable only for flocks (14:23).

17:3 Fortress may refer to Samaria, the capital city. Ephraim designates northern Israel. Since Damascus, the capital of Syria, was allied with Ephraim, the oracle of God's judgment was against both nations.

17:4 In that day: For a similar phrase, see 2:12.

17:5 harvests: The nation of Syria would be "harvested" of its people. The term Rephaim is the Hebrew word for "shades" or "ghosts." Thus the Valley of Rephaim is the Valley of Death.

17:6 A remnant would be left (10:20) even though it would be pitifully small. It is thus something of a misnomer to continue to speak of the "lost tribes" of Israel. The fact that God promised a remnant from Israel means that they were never all "lost."

17:7 The verb translated look means "to look with interest" or "to look with favor." Holy One: For a similar idea, see 6:3.

17:8 Altars refers to pagan worship. work of his hands: For similar wording, see 2:8; 31:7. Asherah was represented by wooden images (27:9), which were part of the sexual cults of Baal worship among the Canaanite peoples.

17:9 In that day: For a similar phrase, see 2:11. His strong cities (contrast the "Rock" in v. 10) will become as fragile as a little branch.

17:10 You refers to the northern kingdom. forgotten: For background, see Deut. 8:11–20. The people had committed the very sin that God warned them not to: they had forgotten the God who had saved them from slavery. The language recalls the first Exodus; the Lord is called the God of your salvation and the Rock (compare Ex. 15:2; Deut. 32:4).

17:11 Make your plant to grow may allude to the ancient practice of force-blooming potted plants and allowing them to die. Pagans believed that this reenactment of the life cycle would secure fertile fields. But even after performing this rite, the harvest would be in ruin. Just as the choice vines of the Lord's vineyard disappointed Him (5:1–7), so His errant people would find their harvest hopes shattered.

17:12 Many people refers to the nations that plunder Israel (v. 14). Seas and mighty waters speak of chaos and death (8:7; Ps. 46:3).

17:13 Chaff, which lacks life, value, and stability, was threshed and winnowed on windy mountains or hilltops. When God judges the unrelenting, roaring seas—the nations that plundered God's people—they will become mere tumbleweed rolling before the whirlwind of God's judgment.

17:14 Sennacherib's army would be destroyed between eventide and morning (37:36–38). us: Isaiah identifies himself with his plundered people.

18:1–7 This message, probably directed to the Ethiopians, consists of two parts: (1) a command to the Ethiopians emissaries to carry a message to a powerful nation, probably their own people (vv. 1, 2), and (2) the message itself (vv. 3–7). The message predicts that all nations will clearly perceive (v. 3) that God will quietly make His burning presence felt (v. 4) when He brings judgment at the perfect time (v. 5) and in an exhaustive way (v. 6), after which the powerful nation will bring tribute to Him (v. 7).

18:1 Ethiopia, called Cush in the Bible, was at the southern end of Isaiah's world. A Cushite dynasty took over Egypt in 715 B.C. and probably sent ambassadors to Jerusalem. Cush may have been a Hebrew term for black African peoples (Num. 12:1; Ps. 87:4).

18:2 Sea may refer to the Nile River, from which small rivers branched. Tall and smooth (v. 7) probably designates the peoples along the entire stretch of the Nile River. Perhaps the term smooth refers to the ancient Egyptian custom of shaving the whole body.

18:3 banner: For the use of this word to refer to salvation instead of judgment, see 11:10, 12.

18:4, 5 The figure of God working in rest speaks of His indescribable power and unlimited sovereignty. God is steady in His work. His judgment will be felt like clear heat in sunshine. This is another example of a bad harvest (17:10, 11).

18:6 God's judgment will be so extensive that the carcasses of His victims will be devoured in the summer and winter.

18:7 the place of the name: Note how closely the Lord identifies with Mount Zion. This was the one place for the true worship of God.

19:1—20:6 The oracle against Egypt falls into three parts after the historical superscription (19:1): (1) the collapse of Egypt before the Lord (19:2–15); (2) the salvation of Egypt in the Lord (19:16–25); and (3) a specific historic fulfillment of the collapse of Egypt at the time of Sargon (20:1–6).

19:1 the LORD rides on a swift cloud: For similar imagery, read Pss. 18:10; 68:4; Matt. 26:64.

19:2–15 After proclaiming the Lord as the ultimate cause of Egypt's collapse (v. 2), the oracle singles out (1) the failure of Egypt's many gods resulting in anarchy (vv. 2–4), (2) the failure of the Nile leading to economic collapse (vv. 5–10), and (3) the failure of its ancient and vaunted wisdom resulting in hopeless defeat (vv. 11–15). The language, in contrast to chapter 20, is not historically specific but stylistic and symbolic.

19:2 The political anarchy of Egyptians against Egyptians has religious roots; their many gods failed them.

19:3 The spirit of Egypt: The principal key for understanding the world of ancient Egypt is the concept of maat, an Egyptian word for "order." When God brought Moses to confront Pharaoh (Ex. 5—14), it was maat that was under attack. God would attack the Egyptians in the future as He had in the past.

19:4 Cruel master may be an allusion to Pharaoh's tyranny against Israel (Ex. 6:9).

19:5–10 The disruption of the waters and all that is related to them marks God's attack on the nation.

19:10 The foundations and those who make wages together may be a figure for the whole economic spectrum, from wealthy managers to day laborers.

19:11, 12 you … your: In verse 11, Isaiah addresses the scribes; in verse 12, he addresses the pharaoh.

19:11 Zoan was the capital of Egypt at this time. Son here refers to a member of a guild. Egypt was famous for its wise men (1 Kin. 4:30), who, as disciples, learned the wisdom of ancient kings.

19:12 Where are your wise men: The Lord taunts those who consider themselves wise and learned. True knowledge comes from the fear of the Lord (Prov. 1:7). For a similar idea, see 1 Cor. 1:20.

19:13, 14 Noph or Memphis was Egypt's ancient capital.

19:15 Nothing will work for Egypt to save it. Its deliverance is only in the Lord (vv. 16–25).

19:16–25 The prediction of Egypt's salvation in the Lord is divided into four parts by the phrase in that day (vv. 16, 18, 19, 23, 24), moving in an ascending order from (1) "fearing" Judah because of the Lord of Hosts, who works through it (vv. 16, 17), and so is the beginning of wisdom (Prov. 1:7); (2) to taking a pledge of allegiance to the Lord (v. 18); (3) to knowing God as Savior (vv. 19–22); (4) to becoming part of the one nation under God (v. 23), the blessed nation that brings blessing to the earth (vv. 24, 25). Interpreters differ over whether the prophecy is historically specific or metaphoric, drawing its imagery from Isaiah's world (11:14) and Israel's experiences. The former option is unlikely, for it would entail a contradiction between this prophecy that fortells Assyria's future salvation (vv. 24, 25) with other prophecies that predicted Assyria would be annihilated without a remnant (14:22). Egypt, representing the Gentiles, will recapitulate Israel's history of redemption (vv. 21–25). The prophecy probably finds fulfillment, though not its consummation, in the nations one day going to heavenly Mount Zion (2:2–4) under the rule of Christ (4:2; 9:7; 11:4, 14; Rom. 10:11–20).

19:17, 18 Five cities will speak the language of Canaan and swear by —take an oath of allegiance to—the LORD of hosts (1:9). These new habits spring from the miracle of regeneration—a radical transformation of their nature. With the words City of Destruction, Jewish scribes were probably belittling the "City of the Sun," known by its Greek name Heliopolis, by deliberately changing the word meaning "sun" to the word meaning "destruction." This is similar to the deliberate change of the name of Ahab's wife to the name Jezebel (1 Kin. 16:31).

19:19 Altar and pillar may allude to the patriarchs Abraham and Jacob respectively (Gen. 12:8; 28:22).

19:20 The words oppressors and saviors may allude to the Judges (Judg. 2:18).

19:21, 22 The Egyptians will know probably alludes to Israel's experience in the Exodus (Ex. 6:7; 7:5).

19:23, 24 A highway signifies the removal of alienation and separation (11:16). Historically, Egypt and Assyria were enemies.

“blessing”

(Heb. berakah) (19:24; 65:8; Deut. 11:27; 33:1) Strong’s #1293: The significant Hebrew word translated blessing expresses several ideas, namely to fill with potency, to make fruitful, or to secure victory. In Is. 19:24, the word alludes to God’s promise to bless all nations through Abraham’s descendants (Gen. 12:3). When people offer a blessing, they wish well or offer a prayer on behalf of themselves or someone else (Gen. 49; Deut. 33:1). OT patriarchs are often remembered for the blessing they gave to their children. When God gives a blessing, He bestows it on those who faithfully follow Him (Deut. 11:27), providing them with salvation (Ps. 3:8), life (Ps. 133:3), and success (2 Sam. 7:29).

19:25 My people and the work of My hands, titles for Israel (10:24; 60:21), are applied here to the converted Gentiles, symbolized by Egypt and Assyria (56:7; 65:1).

20:1 Tartan was one of the three chief officers of the Assyrian empire (2 Kin. 18:17). Ashdod was the leading city when the Ethiopian pharaoh, Shabako, fomented rebellion against Sargon II, king of Assyria, in 713 B.C. Ashdod fell to Sargon in 711 B.C. An inscription mentioning Sargon by name has been dug up in ancient Ashdod.

20:2, 3 Isaiah replaced wearing sackcloth, the garb of spiritual mourning, with walking naked and barefoot, signs of being exiled into captivity. servant: For a similar usage, see 41:8. Three years means "involving three years," a minimum of fourteen months. a sign and a wonder: For a similar usage, see 8:18.

20:4 Esarhaddon, king of Assyria, conquered Egypt and fulfilled this prophecy in 671 B.C.

20:5, 6 They and this territory probably refer to the nations bordering the eastern shore of the Mediterranean Sea, who looked to Egypt to save them from Assyria. This would include Judah.

21:1–10 The oracle against Babylon, after an enigmatic superscription (v. 1), consists of a dreamlike vision of Babylon's fall (vv. 2–9) and its significance to Judah (v. 10).

21:1 Wilderness means "desert." The phrase Wilderness of the Sea may be a sarcastic parody of Babylon, whose southern region on the Persian Gulf was called the "Land of the Sea."

21:2 Elam, a major part of Persia, and Media were allied in 700 B.C. Perhaps as part of the Assyrian army (5:26) they helped bring about the fall of Babylon in 689 B.C., since they certainly did so in 539 B.C. (11:11; 13:17). Its sighing may refer to the sighing Babylon inflicted on others, or to its own sighing under Assyrian oppression.

21:3 Perhaps Isaiah was distressed by the report of Babylon's fall because it meant that Babylon could not save Judah from the Assyrians.

21:4 Though Isaiah longed for the fall of Babylon, he feared its consequences to Judah.

21:5 Having summoned Babylon's princes to eat and drink, Isaiah summoned them again to anoint the shield in preparation for battle (Dan. 5).

21:6 Lord here means "Master." The watchman is probably Isaiah.

21:7 A chariot of donkeys probably means "donkey riders" and a chariot of camels probably means "camel riders." The Persian army used donkeys and camels.

21:8, 9 In the daytime … every night suggests "continually"—a display of Isaiah's faithfulness to his calling.

21:10 My threshing is a metaphor for the punishment coming on Judah.

21:11, 12 This brief oracle against Dumah, an oasis in northern Arabia, consists of an editorial superscription (v. 11), a question by sleepless Edom to Isaiah about how much of the night is left (v. 11), and Isaiah's enigmatic response that night accompanies the new day (v. 12).

21:11 Dumah was located at the intersection of the east-west trade route between Babylon and Edom and the north-south route between Palmyra and Edom. Dumah played a vital military and economic role in the relationship between Mesopotamia and Edom, and its fate greatly affected Edom. Seir is Edom (34:5–17; Gen. 32:3). Watchman refers to the night patrol, who kept watch on the city. The metaphor refers to the prophet Isaiah, who as a guard on the walls could see the dawn—the light of salvation—in the east before others. What of the night may be rephrased as: “What is left of the night?”

21:12 and also the night: Dumah’s future was grim. Relief from Assyrian domination would be followed quickly by Babylonian domination.

21:13–17 The oracle against Arabia, after the superscription (v. 13), has three parts: (1) an address by Isaiah to Teman to provide for Arabian refugees fleeing from battle (vv. 13–15); (2) an address by the Lord to Isaiah confirming and elaborating upon Arabia’s defeat (vv. 16, 17); and (3) an epilogue guaranteeing the prophecy (v. 17).

21:13 Dedanites may be the refugees described in v. 15. Dedan was about ninety miles southeast of Tema (v. 14).

21:14 Tema was about two hundred miles southeast of Dumah (v. 11).

21:15 The drawn swords are those of the Assyrians and Babylonians.

21:16 Kedar was a relatively fertile region in the northwestern part of the Arabian desert in which Dedan and Tema were located (60:7). Its refugees would be driven deeper into the desert.

22:1–25 After the superscription (v. 1), the oracle against Jerusalem consists of five parts: (1) a contrast between Jerusalem's blind revelry and Isaiah's appalling vision of its selfish rulers having fled the city, leaving it to be plundered (vv. 1–4); (2) Isaiah's detailed vision of the city's fall (vv. 5–8); (3) Isaiah's indictment of Jerusalem for its misplaced confidence in its defenses instead of in the Lord (vv. 8–11); (4) Isaiah's indictment for its response of merrymaking instead of repenting (vv. 12, 13); and (5) a final vision confirming that this last apostasy sealed Jerusalem's doom (v. 14). The vision is followed by an example of Jerusalem's blindness in Shebna, the city's steward (vv. 15–19), whose weakness is contrasted with the ability of his successor Eliakim (vv. 20–25).

22:1 burden: For similar phrasing, see 13:1. Valley of Vision sarcastically describes Jerusalem. Mount Zion is ironically personified in its valleys from which it could see nothing. Instead of partying on housetops, the ailing city should have been in its prayer closets.

22:2, 3 In the prophet's vision, the rulers are not slain with the sword while heroically defending the city, but are captured while fleeing to save their own skins (2 Kin. 25:4–6).

22:4, 5 daughter of my people: For a similar reference see 1:8.

22:6, 7 Kir is Elam. The Elamites may have been part of the Assyrian army (5:26). gate: The same army that plundered Babylon (21:2) will arrive at Jerusalem's gates.

22:8 The House of the Forest is the nation's armory (39:2).

22:9–11 The defense of the city depended upon the availability of water within its walls. Hezekiah addressed this need by digging a tunnel beneath the city, connecting the lower pool in Jerusalem's southwestern valley with the old pool, the source of water in the eastern valley.

22:12, 13 Called for weeping and for mourning … But instead, joy and gladness: God demanded repentance and renewal; the people instead turned to pleasure and parties. eat and drink: At times, this is a proper response to adversity (Eccl. 2:24; 3:13); but to use food, drink, and sensual pleasures as a means of shielding oneself from righteousness before the Lord is disastrous (Luke 17:26–29).

22:14 no atonement: When one rejects the salvation that comes from the living God, there is none other.

22:15–19 Isaiah's message against Shebna, a representative of blind, selfish leadership, falls into four parts: (1) an introductory prophetic formula in v. 15a; (2) an accusation against Shebna for attempting to memorialize himself in death (vv. 15, 16), followed by a judicial sentence to death in disgrace (vv. 18, 19); (3) a description of what a steward should be, as exemplified in Eliakim (vv. 20–24), followed by a proclamation that he too he must fall (v. 25a); and (4) a concluding prophetic formula (v. 25b).

22:15 Steward refers to a high government official who was responsible for caring for the king and his dominion.

22:16 Here refers to Silwan, on the eastern side of the Kidron valley, overlooking the City of David. By hewing himself a sepulcher on high, Shebna rivaled the king (2 Chr. 16:14), to whom he should have been a father (v. 21).

22:17 throw you away: An impressive grave is no defense against God.

22:18, 19 The large country refers to Assyria. drive you out: Shebna was demoted to a secretary by the time of the Assyrian siege (36:3, 22).

22:20 Eliakim was an official whom God would honor in place of the arrogant Shebna (v. 15).

22:21 The pronoun your refers to Shebna (v. 15). The word father suggests the self-sacrificing love of Eliakim for citizens of Jerusalem.

22:22 The steward had the key that gave him an audience with the king (Matt. 16:19; Rev. 3:7).

22:23 A peg suggests one who is firmly in place, namely, a reliable person (but see 22:25). Glorious throne suggests that Eliakim will bring honor to the memory of his father's house in contrast to the shame Shebna had brought to his master (v. 18).

22:24 All vessels is a metaphor for all of the inhabitants, both the influential and the insignificant.

22:25 the peg that is fastened in the secure place: The reference here appears to be Eliakim (v. 20). Even the noble Eliakim could not sustain the burden of government. Only Immanuel could do that (9:6, 7).

“burden”

(Heb. massa) (23:1; 2 Kin. 9:25; Jer. 23:33) Strong’s #4853: This noun is a derivative of the verb nasa which means “to lift up” or “to carry away.” Massa refers to something that is taken or carried such as a present, tribute, or message. It is also translated oracle (Jer. 23:33) when God uses His prophets to convey judgment against someone or some nation. Isaiah frequently used this term in what are commonly known as the “oracles against the nations,” where he spoke of God’s judgment on different kingdoms (13:1; 15:1; 17:1; 19:1; 21:1, 11). Translating the word as burden emphasizes that Isaiah carried and delivered God’s indictments against the nations.

23:1–18 The oracle against Tyre consists of two main parts (following the superscription in v. 1): the fall of Tyre (vv. 1–14) and the restoration of it (vv. 15–18). As in ch. 13, the language is stylized, general, and symbolic, not historically specific.

23:1–6 The fall of Tyre is represented as a grim report (v. 5), spreading to the ships at sea expecting to dock at Tyre (v. 1), to Sidon on the Phoenician coast (vv. 2–4), to Egypt (v. 5), and finally to Spain (v. 6).

23:1, 2 burden: For similar phrasing, see 13:1. Tyre was besieged several times over a period of about four hundred years before it was finally laid waste by Alexander the Great in 332 B.C. Cyprus had close commercial ties with Tyre (Ezek. 27:6), as did Solomon (1 Kin. 5:1, 8–11). The pronoun it refers to the report that Tyre had fallen.

23:3, 4 Shihor, a synonym for Egypt (Jer. 2:18), brought its coveted grain to Phoenicia, bringing revenue to Tyre, the marketplace for the nations. Sidon, the other prominent city along with Tyre, depended on the Mediterranean sea for its livelihood, which is personified here as a bereft father.

23:5 Egypt would be in agony because its profitable trading partner was gone.

23:6, 7 Tarshish is Tartessus in Spain and represents the most distant place to the ancient Israelites (2:16). Whose feet … to dwell is a personification of Tyre's colonies. Tyre's large merchant fleet transversed the Mediterranean Sea. Their colonies were sprinkled throughout the Mediterranean world in support of their shipping empire.

23:8 crowning: Tyre crowned its trading merchants with wealth and prestige.

23:9 dishonor the pride: For a similar idea, see 2:12–19.

23:10–12 Oppressed suggests "crushed" in war. virgin daughter of Sidon: It is possible that this phrase is used as a parody. Jerusalem is the Lord's daughter; Tyre is merely a pretender.

23:13, 14 Since the Chaldeans had not escaped the siege towers of the Assyrians who raised up or laid bare the foundations of Babylon's palaces, neither would Tyre.

23:15 Seventy years symbolizes a full measure of time, a lifetime.

23:16 The forgotten harlot who, in her old age, sings songs to be remembered is a metaphor for the restoration of Tyre.

23:17 Will deal is a translation of the Hebrew verb “to visit.” Though the verb can express God’s merciful visitation on His people, here the verb is used to express God’s judgment (24:21). Commit fornication is a metaphor for Tyre’s forming economic alliances with anyone that enriched her, regardless of ethics.

23:18 Tyre’s pay would be set apart, or “regarded as holy,” for the LORD (18:7; 60:5–11). This was not a violation of Deut. 23:18, which forbade bringing a harlot’s pay to the temple. Tyre’s destruction was part of the Lord’s war against the unrighteous. The spoils would belong to Him as the Victor (Deut. 2:35; Josh. 6:17, 19).

The Wasteland

Damage to the earth's environment seems to be on the rise today. Yet current ecological difficulties pale in comparison to what the world will experience someday under God's judgment. Isaiah envisions a virtual wasteland in which nothing remains untouched (Is. 24:1).

Why will the earth be plundered, polluted, burned up, and destroyed? Because it languishes under the curse of a broken covenant (24:5, 6). Humanity has turned away from God, and the world must be destroyed before it can be made anew.

It will be made anew, but not before "the wine fails, the vine languishes, { and} all the merry-hearted sigh" (24:7). In other words, joy will be turned to gloom. Society will break down, as evidenced by boarded-up houses (24:10), a depressing sight already common in many cities today. Likewise, the city "gate" will be destroyed (24:12), meaning that urban life and commerce—indeed, everything the city stands for—will be ruined. The world will be left like so many war-ravaged areas today: without government, police, hospitals, and food; wracked by disease, desolation, and death.

This somber outlook for the world leaves little room for comfort. It assures us that in the end God will reign (24:23), but the point seems to be that our world is ultimately headed for judgment. If we are sobered and saddened by that message, then perhaps Isaiah's words have had their intended effect.

24:1—27:13 The section describing the Lord's "burdens" against particular nations (chs. 13–23) is now placed in a larger framework that depicts God's triumph over the entire earth for His elect. Chapter 24 focuses on God's overthrow of the corrupted earth; ch. 25 focuses on the responsive praise to His actions. Chapters 26 and 27 focus on God's efforts for His people.

24:1–23 Chapter 24 consists of five stanzas: (1) the desolation of the earth because of sin (vv. 1–6); (2) the end of revelry in the city (vv. 7–13); (3) glory to God, but grief over the earth (vv. 14–16); (4) the hopelessness of flight, for the whole earth shakes (vv. 17–20); and (5) the vision of God reigning on Mount Zion over the cosmos (vv. 21–23).

24:1 Scatters is an allusion to Gen. 11:9. The Lord had scattered the inhabitants of the earth in the past at the tower of Babel; He would do so again.

24:2, 3 As … debtor: Wealth and power will make no difference. Both will suffer for wickedness before God.

24:4 The earth mourns: For a similar idea, see Rom. 8:22.

24:5 laws … ordinance … everlasting covenant: The usual language concerning a breach of the covenant is applied more generally to the wicked nations. Perhaps these words speak of that innate sense of right and wrong —the conscience—that God has given to all humankind, but which everyone violates (Rom. 1:18–32; compare Acts 24:16).

24:6 Left may also be translated "remnant" (10:20, 21).

24:7 New wine is simply a synonym of the standard word for wine.

24:8, 9 Mirth and joy represent the same Hebrew word.

24:10 Confusion is translated "without form" in Gen. 1:2.

24:11, 12 cry for wine: For a similar image, see Zeph. 1:13.

24:13 shaking … gleaning: People in desperation continue to seek for a single olive or for grapes.

24:14 They refers to those who love God's Law and who have suffered for righteousness.

24:15 dawning light … the sea: The imagery suggests the east (the dawn) and west (the Mediterranean Sea). From east to west, everyone should give the Lord the praise that is due to Him.

24:16 But I said: The prophet could not join the oppressed's hymn of praise because he saw the awful treachery that would precede the rejoicing (33:1; Dan. 7:28; 8:27).

24:17, 18 Windows may be an allusion to the Flood (Gen. 7:11). In the OT the word means “openings.”

24:19, 20 The earth shall reel: This is an end-time prophecy of coming doom, to be followed by renewal in the age of Messiah Jesus.

24:21 The Hebrew word for punish means “to visit” (23:17). The host of stars (Jer. 33:22) is identified with fallen angels (Matt. 24:29; Rev. 12:4, 9). kings of the earth: The idea is that all of God’s enemies, whether in the heavens or on earth, will face His judgment.

24:22 prisoners: For a similar idea see 2 Pet. 2:4.

24:23 reign: In the end times, the reign of the Father and the Son will be united (52:7; 1 Cor. 15:24; Rev. 4:1—5:14). Mount Zion: This anticipates the glorious reign of the Savior King in the age of renewal from Zion’s throne. His elders may be a reference to angelic beings who attend God’s majesty.

25:1–12 This poem celebrating God's destruction of the sinful earth falls into three parts: (1) a hymn of praise by Isaiah (vv. 1–5); (2) the Lord's feast on Mount Zion celebrating His destruction of death (vv. 6–8); and (3) a hymn of praise by the congregation (vv. 9–12).

25:1 Wonderful things refers to the wonders only God can do. Faithfulness and truth may be rephrased as "absolute truth."

25:2 Any proud city is in view here (24:10). never be rebuilt: For a similar idea, see 24:20.

25:3 The terrible nations are those addressed in chs. 13—23. The pairing of glorify (24:15) and fear speaks of the absolute submission to God of all people (Phil. 2:10).

25:4 The repetition of the word strength and the use of the terms refuge (57:13) and shade is similar to the listing of terms for protection in Ps. 91:1–3.

25:5 The use of the term terrible ones, or nations, three times in vv. 3–5 emphasizes divine judgment on the nations represented.

25:6 mountain: For a similar usage, see 2:2. A feast of wine on the lees refers to the best wine. Fat things full of marrow refers to the choicest food. The feast is similar to the one prepared by Wisdom in Prov. 9:1–6.

25:7 The surface of the covering and veil refer to a "shroud." This is a promise of the end of death (v. 8).

25:8 Death is often pictured as an "enlarged mouth" by the poets of the Bible. Paradoxically, the Lord will swallow up death. Lord is the title meaning Sovereign or Master; the word GOD represents the divine name Yahweh, ordinarily translated LORD. wipe away tears: This promise is given anew in Rev. 7:17; 21:4. the LORD has spoken: The promises are as sure as the eternal character of God (1:20).

25:9 Note the change from "my God" (v. 1) to our God. This verse is the faithful's song of praise. Be glad and rejoice may be rephrased as "be exceedingly happy." Salvation is deliverance from constraint, whether it is falling into a pit (Ps. 40:2) or the constraint of sin and death.

25:10, 11 Moab symbolizes the proud. for the refuse heap: This phrase refers to water mixed with dung—a very unpleasant image.

25:12 He will bring down: This will be the work of the Lord.

26:1–27:1 This poem consists of three sections: (1) a pilgrim's song celebrating the city of God (26:1–6); (2) a song of trust in God (26:7–19); and (3) an encouraging promise that God will punish evil (26:20—27:1).

26:1–6 After a superscription (the first part of v. 1), the song consists of the faithful pilgrims' celebration of their "strong city" (vv. 1–3), a command to trust in the Lord (v. 4), and an affirmation that the "lofty { earthly} city" on earth will be destroyed.

26:1 In that day: For a similar phrase, see 2:12. The pilgrim's strong city presumably is Mount Zion (2:2; 60:14).

26:2 Open the gates is the language of a pilgrim song (Ps. 118:19, 20).

26:3 The Hebrew expression translated perfect peace is literally "peace, peace"; compare the word holy in 6:3. Immanuel will inaugurate this superior kind of peace (9:6; 11:6–9).

26:4 Trust means "to commit oneself fully to." YAH, the LORD is an emphatic designation of God (12:2).

26:5, 6 Line after line asserts the destruction of the lofty city (v. 1) by the power of God.

26:7–19 The song of trust contrasts (1) the present trust of the righteous (vv. 7–9a) with the need of the wicked to learn righteousness through future judgment (vv. 9b–11); (2) the present oppression of the faithful (vv. 12, 13) with God's past judgment on the tyrants (v. 14); and (3) blessings on His nation (v. 15) and their present unfruitful labors (vv. 16–18), with their future resurrection from the dead (v. 19).

26:7 uprightness; O Most Upright: The relative uprightness of the righteous is put into the context of the absolute uprightness of the Holy One.

26:8 waited: For a similar idea, see 40:31 (compare Ps. 40:1).

26:9 in the night … early: The prophet describes his relentless search for God.

26:10 The wicked show contempt for God's grace (Rom. 2:4). Majesty is translated "excellent things" in 12:5.

26:11 Your hand: The works of God are ignored by the wicked (5:12). The fire of may also be translated "the fire upon."

26:12 True peace comes only from the Lord (26:3; John 14:27).

26:13 Other masters included rulers of Egypt in the past, rulers of Assyria in the present, and rulers of Babylon in the future. Make mention of Your name refers to God's character as learned through past experience.

26:14 They are dead: The prophet saw the future demise of the enemies of God's people. In contrast to the faithful (v. 19), these people will not rise.

26:15 You have increased the nation: The repetition of this expression emphasizes both its certainty and its magnitude.

26:16 The pronoun they refers to the faithful nation.

26:17, 18 a woman with child: A woman can endure labor pains for the sake of the joy that follows. The faithful remnant of Isaiah's time endured oppression, but brought forth wind, a metaphor for meaningless labor.

26:19 Isaiah, addressing his faithful peers, assures them that their dead will rise in resurrection (Job 19:26; Dan. 12:2). Dew is a picture of new life and blessing (Ps. 133:3; Hos. 14:5). It is often alleged that the faithful in the OT period had no real hope for resurrection, that their hope was solely to enjoy living in the Promised Land in this life. Yet, here is a verse that clearly indicates otherwise (Ps. 23:6).

26:20—27:1 The prophet's encouraging promise consists of a contrast between the momentary distress for God's people (v. 20) and the future punishment for tyrants (v. 21) and a use of poetic imagery to underscore the punishment of all evil (27:1).

26:20 My people refers to the faithful, righteous remnant. Their sufferings under the Assyrian tyrants were but for a little moment, and were not worthy to be compared to the eternal joy that would follow (26:19; 54:7; Ps. 30:5; 2 Cor. 4:17).

26:21 Comes can also be translated "is about to come." When the earth discloses the blood of the poor and needy that it has swallowed from the hands of ruthless tyrants, it will bear testimony against those evil people; the Lord will avenge them (Gen. 4:10).

27:1 Punish links this verse with 26:21; this verse is the climax of the preceding section. As in the case of the serpent Lotan in the Ugaritic myths, Leviathan was a mythological, dragonlike deity who symbolized chaos and who battled unsuccessfully against God (Job 3:8; 41:1; Ps. 74:14). serpent … reptile: Isaiah borrows the imagery of this battle myth to teach that God will triumph over all who oppose Him. in the sea: See Ps. 93 for a development of this theme.

27:2–13 This prophecy is a song about the Lord's restoration of His vineyard, Israel (vv. 2–6); a contrast of the Lord's discipline of Israel (vv. 7–9) with His annihilation of its oppressors (vv. 10, 11); and a promise that the Lord will regather the exiles to Mount Zion (vv. 12, 13).

27:2 The vineyard is Israel (5:7; 27:6). Red wine contrasts with "wild grapes" (5:2). This was God's intention for His people—He wanted them to produce, as it were, delectable wine.

27:3 I … keep it contrasts with "I will lay it waste" (5:6). Water it every moment contrasts with "no rain on it" (5:6). Lest any hurt it contrasts with "I will take away its hedge" (5:5). This passage is a complete reversal of the judgment recorded in ch. 5.

27:4 Fury is not in Me contrasts with "For all this His anger is not turned away" (5:25). Who would set briers and thorns contrasts with "there shall come up briers and thorns" (5:6).

27:5 peace: For a development of this theme, see 9:6; 11:1–16; 26:3.

27:6 Those who come refers to the regathered exiles (v. 13).

27:7 Has He: The two questions that begin with these words expect a negative answer. struck Israel: The Lord struck the nations fatally (14:22, 30), but not Israel (10:24–26).

27:8 Sending it away refers to the Exile (v. 13).

27:9 iniquity … covered: See 40:2 for another statement that Israel's punishment atoned for its guilt. Wooden images: For a similar usage, see 17:8.

27:10, 11 the fortified city will be desolate: For a similar idea, see 25:2, 10–12; 26:5, 6.

27:12 Thresh refers to harvesting a crop by flailing, such as beating an olive tree. the River to the Brook of Egypt: These geographical references mark out Israel's ideal homeland—from the Euphrates to the Wadi el-Arish (Gen. 15:18).

27:13 The great trumpet is a figure of speech for assembling troops (Ex. 19:16, 19; 1 Sam. 13:3; 2 Sam. 6:15; Matt. 24:31; 1 Cor. 15:52; 1 Thess. 4:16).

28:1—35:10 This section consists of six woes (28:1; 29:1, 15; 30:1; 31:1; 33:1), including woes to future rulers (28:1—29:24); woes for accepting foolish counsel (30:1—31:9), with an appendix promising salvation in God the King (32:1–20); and woes against Assyria, which give promise of Zion's future glory (33:1—35:10).

28:1–29 The woe oracle against the northern kingdom's rulers (vv. 1–13) was to serve as an example to Judah's rulers (vv. 14–29). Note the word therefore in v. 14.

28:1–13 The woe oracle consists of an indictment of the northern kingdom's drunken political leaders (vv. 1–4), contrasted with the ideal future King (vv. 5, 6); an accusation against its religious leaders for drunkenness (vv. 7, 8) and for debunking God's true prophets (vv. 9, 10); and the sending of a messenger (vv. 11, 12) with the announcement of judgment (v. 13).

28:1 The crown of pride refers to Samaria. drunkards: The biblical writers regularly condemn the abuse of wine, drunkenness, and debauchery (5:11, 12). Ephraim: This name sometimes refers to all of Israel (7:2–9).

28:2 The strong one refers to Assyria, which is compared to hail that strips a plant of its leaves and mighty waters that sweep away the stalks (8:7, 8; 17:12, 13).

28:3, 4 crown of pride: This phrase is repeated from v. 1. The repetition of many phrases is for emphasis; but there is a sadness in this repetition. The people of Samaria and Ephraim ought to have enjoyed their beauty and verdant valleys. They were to lose everything, however, because of their incessant idolatry, namely, their refusal to acknowledge the Lord alone as the living God.

28:5 In that day: For a similar phrase, see 2:12. The true crown of glory (29:17–24; 30:18–33; 32:1—33:24) stands in contrast to the false one (vv. 1–4). remnant: For similar references, see 1:9; 10:19–23.

28:6 The spirit of justice will prevail in the messianic age (11:1–5; 42:1–4).

28:7 They also refers to the religious leaders, the priest and the prophet.

28:7 There is a natural limit to the strength of alcohol that can be obtained without distilling, a process unknown in biblical times. Great quantities of grain were used to make beer, which was more of a food or thin gruel than today's beer. Numerous warnings in Scripture show that drunkenness was a problem.

28:9, 10 Will he teach was spoken by the hardened leaders against Isaiah.

28:9 A child was weaned between the ages of three and five, the time for elementary moral education, which is described in v. 10.

28:10, 11 The stammering lips were those of the Assyrians, who would become the teachers of Israel because of Israel's own failed leadership (33:19).

28:12 In place of the rest that comes from faith, Israel's oppressors would teach with a rod.

28:13 The word of the LORD would take the shape of discipline in the form of foreigners with stammering lips teaching their morals to Israel, who should have learned from God.

IN CONTEXT

A Covenant with Death

In the ancient world, worshipers prayed to both demons and deities of death to spare them, or they wore amulets to protect them from death by warding off the divine beings. Such amulets are commonly found in Middle Eastern archaeological digs, including Judah and Israel.

The god of death in Syria-Palestine was Mot. The Ugaritic myths from Ras Shamra, Syria, depict Mot as having an insatiable appetite for living beings and, in the end, devouring all life. In Canaanite thought, Mot, the bringer of death, struggles with Baal, the bringer of life. Mot's victories result in death and destruction on earth, while Baal's victories bring life-giving rains and good crops.

Isaiah confronts some leaders of Jerusalem who anticipated a coming destruction (Is. 28:14–22). The "overflowing scourge" (v. 2:15) pictures a "flood," a metaphor used throughout the ancient Near East for military destruction. These leaders believed that by making a covenant with Mot they would be safe. Mot, they supposed, would protect them when the devastation passed through. Isaiah answers that their "covenant with death," their bargain with Mot, offers no real security (vv. 18, 19). All Mot can deliver is death itself.

28:14–29 Isaiah's prophecy against Judah's scoffing rulers has two parts, introduced by hear (vv. 14, 23): (1) first to the threatened judgment (vv. 14–22), and then (2) to a wisdom instruction showing that God has given the simple peasant more sense of right judgment (v. 26) than the scoffing rulers (vv. 23–29). The two sermons end with reference to the Lord of Hosts, first as the author of destruction (v. 22), then as the "wonderful in counsel" (v. 29).

28:14–22 The threat of judgment consists of an accusation against Judah's unrighteous rulers of cynical mockery of Isaiah's threats (vv. 14, 15), of a renewed threat (vv. 16–21), with a renewed appeal to them not to mock (v. 22).

28:14 Scornful men are worse than "fools"; beyond choosing what is bad, they despise what is good (Ps. 1:1).

28:15 covenant with death … lies … falsehood: These phrases are probably Isaiah's way of describing the people's covenant with Egypt. Overflowing scourge is likely the prophet's way of describing the Assyrian reprisals (10:26; 28:2). The scorners have sarcastically thrown Isaiah's warnings back in his face.

28:16–22 The threat of judgment has two parts: the Assyrian army will be the immediate cause (vv. 16–19), and Lord of Hosts will be the Ultimate Cause (vv. 20–22).

28:16, 17 Therefore: In response to the people's scoffing, the Lord promises to establish His future kingdom on the sure foundation of justice and faith. I lay refers to the future, "I will lay." The apostles identified the stone for a foundation as Jesus Christ (1 Pet. 2:4–6). hail … waters: For similar descriptions, see v. 2.

28:18, 19 As often as: The Assyrian army trampled through Israel many times.

28:20 The too-short bed and the too-narrow covering give a false promise of security and comfort, an apt figure for the people's ill-advised, obstinate alliance with Egypt.

28:21 At Mount Perazim, God broke forth like a mighty flood (2 Sam. 5:20; 1 Chr. 14:11; compare vv. 2, 15, 17, 18). In the Valley of Gibeon, He brought forth hail (Josh. 10:10, 11; compare vv. 2, 17). God's judgment on Israel was unusual, or "alien," in that He rarely struck out in wrath against His own sinful people. The Hebrew Scripture is not a record of the wrath of God, but of His long patience toward His erring people, whom He still desires to call "My people" (Ex. 6:2–8).

28:22 Mockers comes from the same Hebrew root as "scornful men" in v. 14. Lord GOD of hosts: For a similar usage, see 1:9. upon the whole earth: For a similar idea, see 24:1–23.

28:23–29 The sermon praising the wisdom of the peasant farmer, after an introductory admonition "to hear" (v. 23) has two parts: his wisdom in planting (vv. 24–26) and in threshing (vv. 27–29). Each concludes by pointing to the Lord as the Author of wisdom in right judgment (vv. 26, 29). The scoffing rulers, by contrast, have foolishly mocked the Lord.

28:24, 25 The idea being conveyed in these verses is that there is a pattern to farming, just as there is a pattern to life.

28:26–28 A threshing sledge would have been too large a tool for such a finely ground product as cummin.

28:29 wonderful in counsel: For a similar idea, see 9:6. The wisdom that the farmer uses in vv. 24–28 to tend his crops comes from God, the source of all good counsel.

29:1–14 The second woe is against Jerusalem for its hypocritical religion—specifically its empty worship (vv. 1–8) and its blind prophets (vv. 9–14).

29:1 Ariel probably means “altar hearth” (Ezek. 43:15, 16). The destruction and bloodshed in Jerusalem would make the city appear like an altar. The repetition of the term Ariel indicates the Lord’s sorrow over the sorry state to which His city had fallen. where David dwelt: David made Jerusalem his capital and planned the temple that Solomon would later build in that city. These words show God’s continuing love for His servant David, the prototype of the coming King Jesus. Add year to year is a sarcastic reference to repetitious, empty ritual (1:10–17).

29:2 Heaviness and sorrow may be rephrased as “grievous sorrow.”

29:3 Siege refers to the Assyrian siege of the city in 701 B.C.

29:4, 5 Voice … like a medium’s refers to the forbidden, deceptive “voices” for which the medium supposedly served as a channel. The strong voice of the city of Jerusalem would become merely a whisper (8:19).

29:6 Punished is literally “visited,” a word sometimes used for bringing salvation. thunder and earthquake and great noise … storm and tempest … fire: The Lord’s coming to His people is described using the imagery of the elements that accompanied Him at Sinai (Ex. 19:16–19) and when He fought for Israel (19:1; 30:27; Judg. 5:4, 5; Ps. 18:7–15; Hab. 3:3–7).

29:7, 8 all the nations: For a similar usage, see 5:26. Ariel: The term is also used in v. 1 for the city of Jerusalem. As a dream means “quickly passing,” almost “unreal.”

29:9, 10 Pause … Blind: Whereas the religious leaders of Israel were physically drunk (28:7), those of Jerusalem stagger not from intoxicating drinks, but from ignorance of the Lord and His ways. Deep sleep is from a Hebrew word used also of Adam’s sleep (Gen. 2:21), a supernatural stupor. prophets … seers: The visions that God had given were not appreciated or obeyed.

29:11, 12 The literate represent the religious leaders who found Isaiah’s prophecies sealed due to their own spiritual blindness (Rev. 5:1). The illiterate represent the common people.

29:13 The people’s mouths and lips spoke the right things, but their inner nature was far from God.

29:14 God's marvelous work includes both judgment on the proud and salvation for the lowly (vv. 17–24). wisdom … shall perish: For a similar idea, see 1 Cor. 1:18–31.

29:15–24 The third woe oracle, directed against Israel's unbelieving counselors, consists of an accusation that the counselors had turned the religious world upside down by seeking to manipulate God rather than submitting to Him (vv. 15, 16), and the promise that God would turn the counselor's social world upside down by deflating the pretentious and elevating the lowly (vv. 17–24).

29:15 The word counsel refers to making alliances instead of running to God for assistance.

29:16 potter … clay: For a similar idea, see 45:9.

29:17 Lebanon is a symbol of the earth's might (2:13; 10:34; 33:9). Fruitful field, or "garden," is the opposite of Lebanon, a forest.

29:18 Those who were once deaf and blind to the words of the book will miraculously understand it (vv. 9–12).

29:19 poor: For a similar usage, see 61:1.

29:20 terrible one: For similar references, see 13:11; 25:3, 4; 49:24. scornful: For a similar reference, see 28:14.

29:21 By a word refers to false testimony. Lay a snare may include the miscarriage of justice through legal technicalities. By empty words refers to winning a case through lies or clever arguments.

29:22 redeemed Abraham: For additional information, see Acts 7:2–4. Jacob shall not now be ashamed: Based on God's covenant with the patriarchs, the Lord gave a renewed promise of deliverance and blessing to the Israelites.

29:23, 24 My hands: God Himself will bring about the redemption of His people. Holy One of Jacob refers to the One whom Jacob regarded as holy; it is a variant of the expression "Holy One of Israel."

30:1–33 In the previous chapter, Isaiah denounces those who seek human support, instead of depending on the Lord. In chs. 30 and 31, Isaiah addresses the specific folly of depending on Egypt. This woe oracle consists of a condemnation of dependence on Egypt (vv. 1–17) and a promise that the Lord will save Israel and destroy Assyria (vv. 18–33).

30:1–17 The "woe" to stubborn rebels of Judah for trusting Egypt, instead of the Lord, consists of reproof for misplaced confidence (vv. 1–7) and of a judicial sentence for rejecting God's word (vv. 8–17).

30:1–7 The reproof consists of an accusation that they repudiated faith in God for faith in Egypt (vv. 1, 2) and a prediction that Egypt will fail them (vv. 3–7).

30:1 This is the fourth woe in 28:1—35:10. The rebellious children are Hezekiah's advisers. To the sin of injustice they add the sin of devising plans independently of God. My Spirit is another way of speaking of God (11:2).

30:2 the shadow of Egypt: The contrast, of course, would be trusting in the "shadow of the Almighty" (Ps. 91:1).

30:3 Shame refers to deep humiliation.

30:4 His ambassadors may be the people from Judah who went from Zoan (19:11–13) in the Delta to Hanes, some fifty miles south of Cairo.

30:5 Shame and reproach speak of an intolerable humiliation.

30:6 The burden against the beasts was due to the fact that they vainly carried Judah's gifts through the wilderness to Egypt (vv. 7–11).

30:7 Rahab, which literally means "Storm" or "Arrogant," was a dragon from pagan mythology who was pictured as resisting creation. Both the Rahab and Leviathan are symbolic of the forces of evil in the universe that God will destroy (51:9).

30:8–18 The sentence consists of two cycles: (1) reproof for rejecting God's word (vv. 8–11, 15), and (2) the report of His judgment (vv. 12–14, 16, 17).

30:8 The oldest writing tablets discovered so far can be dated to about 1350 B.C. They were found in A.D. 1986 in a shipwreck off the coast of southern Turkey. Until this discovery, the oldest tablets were those found in a well at Nimrud, near Nineveh, dating from about 700 B.C. The original writing surface was a coating of wax.

30:9 That can mean "because." Law refers to the prophet's instruction, which is from the Lord Himself (v. 15).

30:10 Do not see: For a similar usage, see Mic. 2:6.

30:11 To cease: This was the most flagrant of the people's wicked words.

30:12 To not choose to obey the Lord is to reject Him, even to despise His message. trust in oppression: For a similar idea, see 1:15–17; 29:20, 21.

30:13, 14 A bulge in a high wall and the breaking of the potter's vessel signify that judgment would come suddenly and completely. A shard is a piece of broken pottery.

What's the Hurry?

Perhaps you feel rushed or caught on a treadmill, always focused on a deadline, always thinking about what is happening next rather than what is happening right now. The people of Isaiah's time were consumed with anxiety about the Assyrians. They were busily making plans and preparations in case the enemy invaded. But God warned them the key to withstanding the threats of Assyria was not in frenetic activity, but in quiet, confident trust in Him (Is. 30:15). It was not that wise planning had no value; it did. But faith in God demands a certain amount of ceasing from work to reflect on one's situation and the Lord's ability to handle it.

Conventional wisdom urges us to pause and smell the roses occasionally. Scripture calls us to pause and worship the Lord regularly (Ex. 20:8–10). This principle of a balanced, measured approach to life was established at the end of the first work week in history, when God paused in His work to consider what He had accomplished (Gen. 1:31—2:2).

Why not spend time right now to reflect on your life—where it has come from, where it is, and where it is going. Reflect on your relationships—the conversations you have had, the memories you have gained. Are you willing to take the time to find God in your life?

30:15 Returning entails repentance. rest: For a similar idea, see 28:12. Quietness and confidence may be rephrased as "utter trust." Trusting in God's strength instead of our own is the only way we can find true rest.

30:16 Instead of trusting in the Lord, the people were depending on Egypt for horses and chariots to defend the land (31:1).

30:17 One thousand shall flee: The point is that the nation will be utterly routed (Deut. 32:30).

30:18–33 This promise of salvation consists of (1) the basis for blessing found in God's justice (v. 18), (2) the promise of Judah's deliverance (vv. 19–26), and (3) the threat of Assyria's destruction (vv. 27–33).

30:18 God's justice demands that the Assyrian oppressors be punished (Judg. 2:16). God's gracious character and His mercy are balanced; they interact with His justice and the fact that He will be exalted.

30:19 You shall weep no more: A similar promise is given in 25:8. the sound of your cry: For a similar idea, see Judg. 2:18.

30:20 bread of adversity: The Lord was giving the Israelites meager rations as though they were in prison (1 Kin. 22:27). But after judgment the Lord would provide salvation: Israel's eyes would see (29:24). Teachers probably refers to the prophets (v. 10).

30:21 Walk in it contrasts with "turn aside" in v. 11. The people had been living in such a way that they were oblivious to their spiritual teachers (v. 20); now they would be taught by the Spirit of the living God.

30:22 Defile means "to desecrate by destruction" (2 Kin. 23:4–14). Unclean thing refers to something soiled by menstruation; the idea is to get rid of it.

30:23, 24 The promises that were part of the original Mosaic covenant were in force again. rain: Blessing would extend from field to flock (Deut. 28:11, 12).

30:25, 26 on every high mountain … light of the sun will be sevenfold: These phrases emphasize the magnitude of the coming salvation. waters: The coming of ample rainfall and strong streams are associated with the blessing that comes from trust in God (32:2; 41:17, 18). When the towers fall is associated with the collapse of human pride (2:12–17).

30:27–33 The prediction of Assyria's destruction consists of two cycles: (1) one of attack (vv. 27, 28 and 30, 31), and (2) one of rejoicing (v. 29 and v. 32), and then concludes with a notice about the king's funeral pyre (v. 33).

30:27 The name of the LORD refers to His character, as memorialized in His saving acts throughout history. Comes refers to the Lord's coming in a storm (29:6).

30:28 His breath describes the sound of the Lord's voice as a roaring, overflowing river. neck: For a similar image, see 8:8.

30:29 song … in the night: In times of festivals, singing would extend long into the evening. The Mighty One literally means "Rock" (Ps. 144:1).

30:30, 31 Here God's voice is compared to the thunder (Ps. 29:3, 4; contrast v. 28). descent of His arm: The strong arm of God had delivered the Israelites from Egypt, now His arm would descend in judgment (Ex. 6:6). Assyria: Only here in this section is the enemy nation mentioned by name.

30:32 tambourines: For additional references to this instrument, see Ex. 15:20; 1 Sam. 18:6. And in battles: These were soldier-musicians; they were to be ready to fight or to play music as the occasion demanded.

30:33 Tophet, located south of Jerusalem, was the place where the valleys of Hinnom and Kidron met. It was probably a deep, wide pit containing a bonfire of blazing wood, where children had at times been burned to death as offerings to pagan deities (2 Kin. 23:10; Jer. 7:31, 32; 19:6, 11–14). The area has filled in significantly through the centuries. Brimstone is a reminder of the fiery destruction of Sodom (34:9, 10; Gen. 19:24).

31:1–9 The fifth woe oracle reaffirms the fourth oracle (30:1–33); it too was addressed to those who replaced faith in the Lord with reliance on Egypt. This oracle consists of a condemnation of dependence on Egypt (vv. 1–3), and a promise that the Lord will save Mount Zion (vv. 4, 5) and destroy Assyria (vv. 6–9).

31:1 Woe to those who go down to Egypt: For a similar idea, see 30:2. Look means "to look with interest" or "to look with respect." Seek the LORD here entails consulting His prophets for direction (29:9, 10; 30:1).

31:2, 3 The house of evildoers refers to Judah. Their help refers to Egypt. Both Egypt and Judah will perish together.

31:4, 5 Lion connotes the LORD of hosts (1:9) and His resolve to fight the enemy. The multitude of shepherds refers to the Assyrian officers. Mount Zion and hill are synonyms. Birds flying about pictures the Lord's passionate commitment to defend Jerusalem. Passing over is a technical term used for the destroying angel who "passed over" Israel in destroying the Egyptians and defending Israel (Ex. 12:13, 23).

31:6, 7 revolted: For an explanation of the rebellion, see 30:1. throw away: For a similar idea, see 30:22. your own hands have made: For similar wording, see 2:8; 17:8.

31:8 Not of man refers to the death angel that destroyed Sennacherib's vaunted army (37:36).

31:9 A banner was a rallying point for a battle. The princes would be too dispirited to rally for the cause. fire: For similar imagery, see 10:17, 18; 30:27, 30, 33.

32:1–20 The fifth woe (ch. 31) concludes with a prophecy about leadership (vv. 1–8) and its effects (vv. 9–20). Paradoxically, generous leaders (vv. 1–5) produce abundance and permanent security (vv. 16–20), whereas the miserly (vv. 6, 7) produce false security and desolation (vv. 9–14).

32:1 The prophecy concerning this king is fulfilled in the Lord Jesus Christ (7:14; 9:1–7; 11:1–5; 28:16; John 10:11, 16). The princes are His "undershepherds" (1 Pet. 5:2–4).

32:2 The four similes for the future King's protection and provision of His people contrast with Israel's present incompetent leadership (28:7; 29:9, 10; 30:1, 2; 31:1, 2).

32:3, 4 Clear eyes and listening ears are figures for the future sensible leadership, in contrast to the present senseless, foolish leadership. The people's eyes and ears would also be opened (6:9, 10; 29:18, 24; 35:5; 42:7); similarly, they would have a heart that is understanding and a tongue that speaks plainly.

32:5–7 The contrast between the way the noble and foolish speak comes from the person's heart (v. 4). If a person meditates on evil, that person will speak and act treacherously. destroy the poor with lying words: For a similar idea see 29:20, 21.

32:8, 9 The term complacent is used three times of these women (vv. 9, 10, 12); it is derived from the verb meaning "to trust." Thus the word can also be rendered as "assured" and "secure" (vv. 17, 19). Though the wicked erroneously relied on Egypt for their security (31:1), the righteous placed their trust in the Lord and obtained true security.

32:10–12 Mourning women in the ancient Middle East removed their clothing and wore sackcloth around their waists (Gen. 37:34).

32:13, 14 thorns and briers: For similar usage, see 5:6; 7:23. palaces … pasture: These images speak of the complete ruin of Jerusalem in the day of God's judgment.

32:15 The new age depends on the creative work of the Spirit (11:2; 42:1; 61:1; Ezek. 36:26, 27; Joel 2:28, 29) who originates on high, in God's dwelling (33:5). This is in contrast to going "down to Egypt" (31:1).

Justice in the Wilderness

Perhaps like many people you think of the countryside as a gentle, quiet refuge from the complications of urban life. However, in Bible times, rural areas were generally places without law and order, where everyone "did what was right in his own eyes" (Judg. 21:25). It was the city that tended to offer peace and protection.

For that reason, Isaiah's vision of justice in the wilderness (Is. 32:16) was a remarkable promise. The key to the transformation would be the presence of the Spirit (32:15). However, the Spirit would not impose God's peace on unwilling people. Rather, peace would be the fruit of seeds sown in righteousness (32:17).

The Lord challenged the complacent women of Judah to wail for the woeful consequences that would befall their corrupt, escapist society (32:9–13). However, God promised to intervene. The city would be secure, not because of its walls, but because the Spirit would defend it.

Regardless of whether you live in an urban area, Isaiah's vision of God's peace is instructive. As you sow the seeds of righteousness in your community, you give the Spirit an opportunity to bring a blessing on you and your neighbors. Those "seeds" may involve feeding the hungry, shutting down a business based on immorality, or simply praying for civic leaders. Whatever action you take, know that the Spirit can multiply your efforts many times. "The fruit of righteousness is sown in peace by those who make peace" (James 3:18).

32:16 fruitful field: This is a reversal of the judgment predicted in 29:17.

32:17, 18 The Hebrew words translated assurance and secure are related to the Hebrew word translated "complacent" in v. 9.

32:19, 20 Hail may refer to Assyria (28:2).

33:1–24 The sixth woe differs from the others in that it is addressed to Assyria, not to Judah. By focusing exclusively on Assyria's defeat and Judah's salvation, the prophecy magnifies Judah's exalted King (vv. 3, 5, 10). This woe oracle consists of an introduction of the main themes of the oracle (vv. 1–6); an emphasis on Judah's need for salvation, the Lord's provision of that need (vv. 7–13), and its spiritual impact on sinners (vv. 14–16); and a conclusion showing the majestic King in His beauty (vv. 17–24).

33:1–6 The introduction prophecies the destruction of the destroyer (v. 1), the Lord's response to the remnant's prayer (vv. 2–4), and the transformation of Zion (vv. 5, 6).

33:1 You refers to Assyria, who treacherously (21:2; 24:16) broke its treaties (2 Kin. 18:13–37).

33:2 be gracious: For a similar idea, see 30:18. The besieged remnant, including Isaiah, had waited for the Lord in prayer (37:14–20) and in confident expectation (40:31). salvation: For a similar reference to God as the only place to find salvation, see 12:2.

33:3 When You lift Yourself up speaks of an exaltation of the heavenly King (vv. 5, 10) as He rises to demonstrate His glory and vindicate His justice. Scattered is an allusion to Moses' song of praise (Num. 10:35).

33:4 The plunder of God's war with His enemies belongs to the Lord, the true Victor (23:18; 34:2). It will be gathered as swiftly and completely as the caterpillar and locusts can strip a field, since the Lord's judgment will come quickly without warning (1 Thess. 5:2).

33:5 exalted … on high: This chapter presents the "rising glory" of the Savior King over His people, defending them against Assyria and all others. Justice and righteousness may be rephrased as "true justice."

33:6 Wisdom and knowledge … fear of the LORD: The Messiah's characteristics (11:2) will also characterize His city.

33:7–13 With all of Judah's hope gone (vv. 7–9) the Lord responds (v. 10) by destroying Assyria (vv. 11, 12).

33:7, 8 Valiant ones may sarcastically refer to three officials of Judah who conferred with the Assyrians (36:3, 22). Judah's ambassadors wept bitterly because Assyria took their gifts, but continued to besiege Jerusalem (v. 1). With the treaty between Assyria and Judah broken, the highways were not safe.

33:9 Sharon was on the western coastal plain. Bashan was on the east side of the Jordan. All of Israel's most verdant areas, from Lebanon in its far north (35:2) to Carmel in the northwest, are desolate after Assyria has ravaged the land.

33:10 Now … Now … Now: The King is about to assert His authority (vv. 5, 16).

33:11 You refers to Assyria (v. 1). chaff … stubble … fire: The grandeur of Assyria would be consumed quickly.

33:12 The burnings of lime—all that is left from burning lime is dust—and thorns … in the fire indicate the thoroughness and swiftness of Assyria's destruction (27:4).

33:13 Hear: For a similar call for all to acknowledge the Lord as Sovereign, see 34:1.

33:14 Who among us shall dwell: This is the language of a pilgrimage psalm (Pss. 15:1; 24:3). burnings: For a description of God as a consuming fire, see Deut. 4:24; 9:3; Heb. 12:29.

33:15, 16 walks righteously: For a similar description of the person who can approach the Holy One, see Pss. 1:1, 2; 15:2; Gal. 5:22–25; Eph. 5:1, 2. Who stops … shuts: These words do not advocate ignoring social evil, but refusing to take part in it. On high refers to God's dwelling (v. 5)—the place the righteous will go to live with God forever.

33:17 The King is the Lord (v. 22). The land of the Lord's dominion will stretch very far off (26:15).

33:18 The scribe … who weighs refers to those who took the tribute (2 Kin. 18:14).

33:19 stammering tongue: For a similar idea concerning Israel's enemies, see Deut. 28:49.

33:20 The feasts were celebrated from the heart (30:29), and not perfunctorily (29:1). Not be taken down implies that the Exile is over. Judah's immediate salvation merges with its ultimate deliverance.

33:21 Judah would be protected figuratively by broad rivers, like those at Tyre (23:1–3) and Thebes (Nah. 3:8). However, no intimidating ship would be on the rivers, because God Himself would defend Judah.

33:22, 23 Note that the Lawgiver is associated with other acts of mercy (Deut. 6:1–3; John 1:14–18); the giving of the Law was God's way to point out the correct path for the Israelites to follow. This was merely another expression of His mercy.

33:24 Sickness and sin will be removed in the coming kingdom of the glorious Savior.

34:1—35:10 Two prophecies form an appendix to the sixth woe (ch. 33): (1) the fertile land of the plundering nations will be transformed into a desert (ch. 34) and (2) the desert will be transformed into fertile land (ch. 35).

34:1–17 This prophecy of judgment consists of two parts: (1) judgment on all the nations (vv. 1–4) and then (2) judgment on Edom representatively (vv. 6–15; read 22:15–25, 25:10–12; 63:1–6 for similar specifications). The prophecy is followed by an epilogue guaranteeing the prophecy (v. 16, 17).

34:1 nations: For a similar reference, see 5:26. Let the earth hear: For similar calls for all the world to listen to Isaiah's prophecy, see 1:2; 33:13.

34:2 Indignation is a strong term used to describe the wrath of God. Destroyed means "to devote to destruction." Because the Lord had defeated His enemy, the spoils were to be devoted totally to Him by burning them (23:18).

34:3 The blood of the slain would be so great that it would create mudslides.

34:4 The host of heaven here refers to pagan deities (24:21; 2 Kin. 17:16). be dissolved: See the similar language of 13:10, 13. heavens … rolled up like a scroll: The old cosmos will give way to the new (51:6; Matt. 24:29; Rev. 6:13, 14; 21:1).

IN CONTEXT

A Deadly Demon

The prophet Isaiah describes the total desolation that God would visit upon Edom for its hostility to God (Is. 34:2, 5). Among the descriptions of God's wrath is the sole reference in Scripture to a well-known Mesopotamian demon named Lilith. Later Jewish tradition connected the name Lilith with the Hebrew word for night, giving the traditional English translation "night creature" (v. 14). However, as a Mesopotamian name, Lilith comes from the Sumerian word lil, meaning "wind" or "spirit."

The earliest records and amulets from Mesopotamia show that people there feared the Lilu, a group of particularly malevolent demons. Lilith herself was believed to attack both babies and mothers in childbirth, eating their flesh and sucking their blood. The only protection from the Lilu was to call upon the king of demons for help.

Jewish inscriptions and amulets describe Lilith in a similar fashion, but with additional features. She was known as a woman with long hair and wings, attacking men who slept alone. Jewish incantation bowls have been found that petition God to defeat and bind Lilith as she seeks her human prey.

For Isaiah and his listeners, the threat of Lilith finding "a place of rest" (v. 14) among humans was nothing but terrifying. Where once the Edomite cities housed wisdom and life and cultured society, there would now be wasteland. Edom would become uninhabitable, the domain of wild animals and wild beasts. The nobility that once led the land would be gone (v. 12). No human would dare to dwell in the area (v. 10), for Lilith ensures its perpetual desolation.

34:5–17 The Lord's judgment on Edom consists of (1) its becoming a sacrifice to God (vv. 5–7), (2) a desolation (vv. 8–12), and (3) a place for unclean, wild animals (vv. 13–17).

34:5 The Lord's avenging sword moves from demolishing the pantheon of heaven (v. 4) to Edom (63:1) in particular. Curse comes from the same root translated "destroyed" in v. 2. Edom is "devoted to destruction."

34:6 Blood and slaughter link Edom's destruction with that of the nations (vv. 2, 3). Sin must be atoned for by sacrifice, either of the sinner himself as here (Ezek. 33:10), or by the substitutionary sacrifice of Christ (52:13–15).

34:7 Oxen and bulls may represent Edom's troops or leaders.

34:8 vengeance: The Lord secures His sovereignty and keeps His community whole by saving His wronged subjects and punishing their guilty oppressors.

34:9, 10 Brimstone and burning pitch may be allusions to Sodom and Gomorrah (30:33; see Gen. 19:24; Ezek. 38:22).

34:11 The pelican, porcupine, owl, and raven are all unclean creatures of remote, uninhabited places (Deut. 14:14–17). In the day of God's judgment, Edom would become a wasteland. The Hebrew words translated confusion and emptiness are translated "without form and void" in Gen. 1:2. Edom will be returned to chaos.

34:12 There will be no nobles or princes in the desert.

34:13–15 For a similar description of these unclean desert creatures, see 13:21, 22.

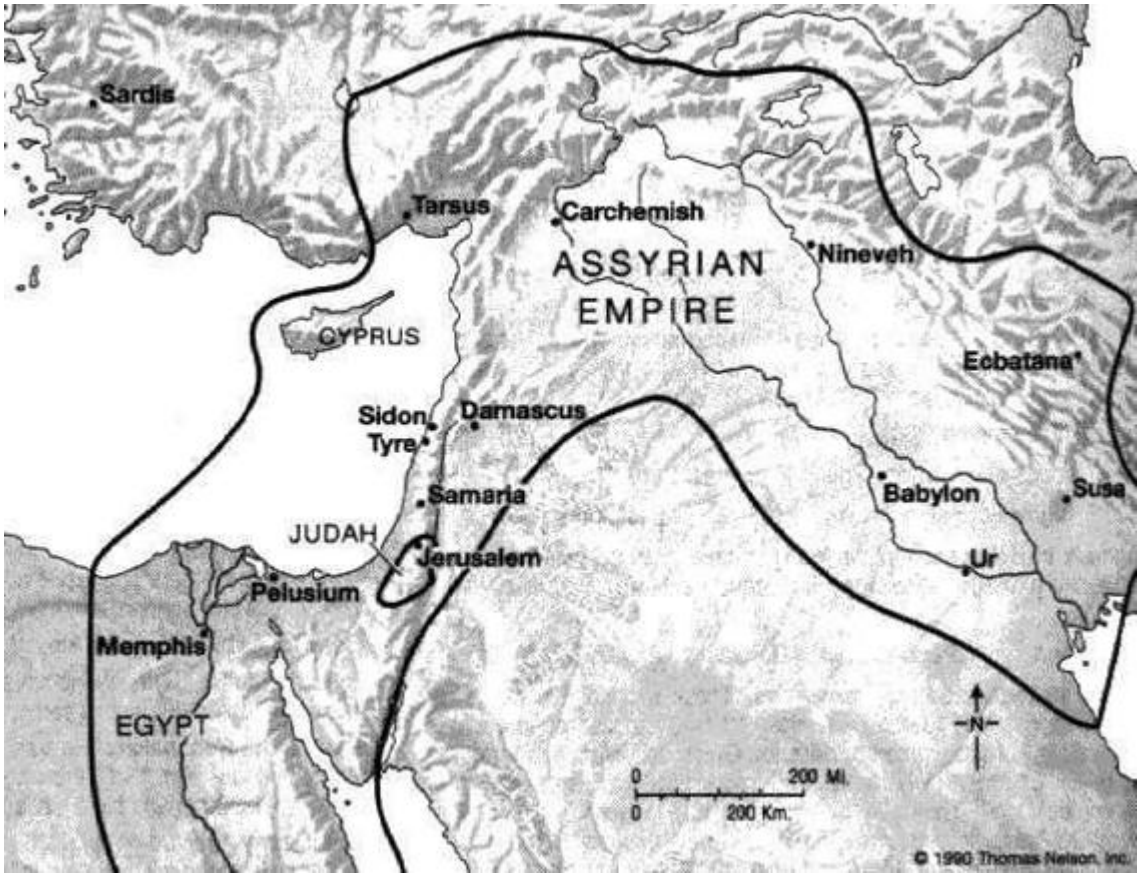
34:16 The book of the LORD may refer to the prophecy found in vv. 1–15.

34:17 As God gave Israel the Promised Land by lot in the sacred assembly (Josh. 18:10), so in His judgment He divided Edom among the unclean animals.

35:1–10 The poem prophesies (1) the reversal of earth's barrenness to fruitfulness, giving encouragement to the fearful (vv. 1–4); (2) a reversal from infirmity to health and from wilderness to water (vv. 5–7); and (3) a secure, holy highway whereby the redeemed can come back to Zion (vv. 8–10). Physical and spiritual salvation are merged in terms of an earth free from fear, injustice, sickness, and death. Chapters 36—39 show that this is more than assertion. History began to reverse itself when God, in miraculous fulfillment of Isaiah's prophecies, supernaturally judged Assyria at Jerusalem's gate and saved the faithful remnant within it.

35:1 wilderness … desert: The Spirit of God will make the earth fruitful again (32:15). rejoice: The joy of the elements of creation is a reflection of the joy of God's people at the arrival of His salvation (14:7, 8; 44:23; 55:12).

35:2 glory of Lebanon … Sharon: This is a reversal of the judgment of 33:9. The glory of the LORD would be seen in the return of the captives from Babylon (40:5).



The Assyrian Empire (650 B.C.)

By 650 B.C. the Assyrian Empire, whose capital was Nineveh, stretched from the Persian Gulf in the east through the fertile crescent into Palestine and beyond, embracing for a short time all of Egypt in the southwest. Judah paid tribute to Assyria during the reign of Manasseh, even though it was technically a free zone.

35:3 Strengthen the feeble hands: This phrase is cited in Heb. 12:12 (Josh. 1:6, 7, 9, 18). We can reassure ourselves with the knowledge that our Savior is coming. In that day, justice will be restored.

35:4 save you: When the Lord comes, He will offer salvation (Luke 19:10). vengeance: See the use of this word in 34:8.

35:5, 6 eyes … ears … lame … tongue: This prophecy of healings was fulfilled in the physical and spiritual healings of Jesus (61:1; Matt. 12:22; Luke 4:18; 7:22). opened … unstopped: For similar usage, see 29:18; 32:3.

35:7 The habitation of jackals speaks of the coming reversal of the devastation God had brought on the land (34:14). Reeds and rushes speaks of the reversal of the destruction described in 19:5, 6.

35:8, 9 The promise of a safe highway is a reversal of the judgment in 33:8; 34:10 (11:16; 40:3, 4; 57:14; 62:10). ravenous beast: Ferocious animals could make traveling dangerous in the ancient world.

35:10 the ransomed: The restored Babylonian exiles symbolize political and spiritual exiles and the physically and spiritually blind, deaf, and lame of all times and places. The Lord would come to rescue them from their tragic predicaments. come to Zion with singing: For a description of this scene, see 12:1 (compare Ps. 126:1–6). sorrow and sighing: For more detail, see 25:7, 8.

This stone monument, known as the prism of Sennacherib, gives the Assyrian account of Sennacherib's invasion of Jerusalem (Is. 36; 37).

36:1—39:8 This historical bridge between chs. 1—35 and 40—66 consists of two parts: (1) Hezekiah's faith in the face of an Assyrian threat (chs. 36; 37) and (2) Hezekiah's mixed faith in the face of illness (chs. 38; 39).

36:1—37:38 This section validates Isaiah's predictions that the Lord would (1) destroy Judah through Assyria (36:1), (2) besiege Jerusalem (36:2–22), (3) deliver the faithful remnant (37:1–35), and destroy the Assyrians (37:36–38). Isaiah proclaims that sin compounded with misplaced confidence brings defeat; conversely, repentance and faith in the Lord brings deliverance (2 Kin. 18:13—19:37; 2 Chr. 32:1–23).

36:1 The fourteenth year of King Hezekiah's sole reign was 701 B.C. all: In his annals, Sennacherib mentions forty-six cities that he attacked.

36:2 The Rabshakeh may have been the king's personal advisor. great army: For the defeat of this fighting force, see 37:36. aqueduct: For a similar reference, see 7:3.

36:3 Eliakim … Shebna: For further details, read 22:15–23.

36:4, 5 Only the Assyrian leader is referred to here as king, not Hezekiah. This is an indication of the Assyrians' perspective on their own status.

36:6 Judah had refused to listen to Isaiah's insistence that reliance on Egypt was worthless (19:14–16; 30:3, 7; 31:3). Here they were given the same warning from their enemy.

36:7 taken away: Hezekiah had destroyed the idolatrous high places and altars that his father Ahaz had built, see 2 Kin. 18:1–5; 2 Chr. 31:1–3.

36:8 riders: Micah referred to Jerusalem's soldiers as merely a "troop" (Mic. 5:1) compared to the enormous international army of Assyria (Mic. 4:11).

36:9 one captain of the least: Judah had no hope of defeating the force that surrounded him.

36:10 The LORD said to me: Ancient Middle Eastern conquerors liked to claim that the gods of their defeated enemies had joined their side (2 Chr. 35:21). These words about the Lord were no more than a boast.

36:11, 12 Aramaic was the language of international diplomacy during this period.

36:13, 14 The Rabshakeh spoke in Hebrew to be deliberately provocative: he wanted his words to be understood by the citizens of Jerusalem. deceive you: The Rabshakeh structured his speech so that he would quickly discourage those who heard it.

36:15–17 take you away: The Assyrians commonly exiled the people groups they conquered (2 Kin. 15:29; 17:6).

36:18–21 The Rabshakeh assumed that different gods were worshiped in Samaria than in Jerusalem, so he repeated some of the same sentiments articulated by the Assyrian king in 10:10, 11.

36:22 The words of the enemy would not bring pleasure to Hezekiah. The torn clothes indicated that the messengers were bearing bad news (37:1).

37:1 Sackcloth was a sign of mourning, repentance, and humiliation (20:2, 3; 1 Kin. 20:31; Neh. 9:1; Dan. 9:3). went into the house of the LORD: For a related passage, see 1 Kin. 8:33, 34.

37:2, 3 Eliakim … Shebna: One of Isaiah's prophecies condemns Shebna for his arrogance (22:15–23).

37:4, 5 For more references to the remnant, see 1:9; 10:20.

37:6–10 The Lord commonly reassured His servants with the words: Do not be afraid (7:4; 35:4; Gen. 15:1; Josh. 1:9). We have no reason to fear if our trust is in the all-powerful God (Heb. 13:6).

37:11 utterly destroying: See 34:2 for another use of this term.

37:12–15 Hezekiah prayed: Hezekiah had learned to turn to God for help in his times of need (30:1). For another of Hezekiah's prayers, see 38:2, 3.

37:16–21 Because you have prayed to Me: God's gracious response was a direct answer to the prayer of a godly king. Though God can certainly work His will without our prayers, He has chosen to faithfully answer the prayers of His people.

37:22 virgin: Cities are often personified as female in the Scriptures. This imagery speaks of Jerusalem as a "daughter" being threatened by an attacker. Yet Jerusalem prevails and overcomes her assailant. Daughter of Zion is an endearing term for the city of Jerusalem. Just as the Lord called Israel His son (Ex. 4:22), so He looked upon Jerusalem as His daughter (1:8).

37:23 reproached and blasphemed … raised your voice … lifted up your eyes on high: The folly of the wicked of all ages is epitomized here. Anyone who lifts himself or herself up against the living God deserves the same strong words from the Almighty (vv. 28, 29). Holy One of Israel: The Lord embodies perfect holiness: He is completely different or set apart from all of creation (40:25); He alone is entirely sinless (6:4–7). Yet God chooses to enter into a relationship with His people, the Israelites (Ps. 40:1).

37:24 Chariots were the most prized military hardware of the time. height of the mountains: See 2:12–16; 14:13, 14 for other occurrences of these arrogant words.

37:25 dug and drunk water: Deserts cannot stop Assyria's king; he presents himself as invincible. The king boasts that he has dried up Egyptian streams. But the Lord will dry up the Egyptian sea (11:15; 44:27).

37:26–29 your rage against Me: This accusation picks up the point of the indictment in vv. 23, 24. The Assyrians dragged prisoners away with a hook in the nose; soon they would get the hook! The Lord's judgment was coming. For another use of the image of a hook, see Ezek. 38:4.

37:30–32 Assyria had promised to feed the Judeans; but only God could guarantee that the people would eat (36:16, 17). The third year could have been as early as thirteen to fifteen months from that time; any part of a year was counted as a year.

37:33 thus says the LORD: God gives His final sentence against the Assyrian tyrant.

37:34, 35 defend: For similar expressions of the Lord's protection of Jerusalem, see 27:3; 31:5. for My own sake: The Lord would save and protect the city for His own honor, for He had established the city for the worship of His holy name. For similar wording, see 43:25; 48:9, 11; contrast 42:21. for My servant David's sake: God maintained His promises to David (9:7; 49:8; 2 Sam. 7:8–16; 1 Kin. 8:17–20; Ps. 89:19–37).

37:36 This verse is the fulfillment of God's promise to take vengeance on those who trouble His people (34:8). the angel of the LORD: Often a visitation from the angel of the Lord brought deliverance to God's people, as in the incident with Balaam (Num. 22) and the appearances to Gideon (Judg. 6:11, 12) and Manoah (Judg. 13). At other times the angel of the Lord came in judgment (2 Sam. 24:10–25). Here the angel of the Lord delivers His people by fighting for them (Ex. 15:3).

37:37 The Assyrian king Sennacherib returned home in defeat to his palace at Nineveh, located on the Tigris river. To the many relief sculptures that adorned the walls of his home, he added a scene of his victory over Lachish (36:2; 37:8). But he omitted the disaster at Jerusalem in his written record of the campaign.

37:38 Death in the house of Nisroch contrasts with life in the house of the Lord (37:14; 38:20). Esarhaddon began his reign in 681 B.C.

38:1—39:8 Although Hezekiah trusted in God to heal him (38:1–22), he failed when the Babylonian envoys visited him. After his recovery, he paraded his own glory, not the Lord's (39:1, 2). Thus he implicitly placed his confidence in military strength and political alliances instead of the strength of the Almighty God. Because of his unbelief, Judah would go into exile (39:3–8).

38:1 In those days refers to a time before the events recorded in chs. 36, 37 (v. 6). These earlier events are presented after Jerusalem's deliverance from Assyria, for that deliverance was not the last word for either Hezekiah or Jerusalem.

38:2 prayed: For another prayer of Hezekiah, see 37:15.

38:3–6 loyal heart: For similar descriptions see 2 Kin. 18:3–5. Hezekiah wept bitterly because apparently at that time he had no male heirs. Hezekiah lived an additional fifteen years (v. 5); Manasseh, the successor to his throne, was twelve when Hezekiah died (2 Kin. 20:21—21:1).

38:7 sign: For a related reference, see 7:11–14.

38:8 Bringing the shadow on the sundial … backward symbolized the divine extension of Hezekiah's life.

38:9–20 Hezekiah's thanksgiving song celebrating his healing consists of (1) a report of his lament (vv. 10–14) and (2) a report of the Lord's deliverance (vv. 15–20). His personal deliverance modeled the future national deliverance (41:8–11).

38:9 the writing of Hezekiah: Scriptures attest to King Hezekiah's interest in devotional literature. Apparently he instructed his scribes to compile some of the proverbs of Solomon (Prov. 25:1). Furthermore, he ordered the Levites to worship God with the psalms of David and Asaph. The following song of praise (vv. 10–20) has some affinities with those psalms (2 Chr. 29:30).

38:10, 11 Sheol: For additional references to Sheol see 5:14; 14:9, 11; 38:18. Hezekiah was mourning the fact that he was dying at an early age.

38:12 Pulling up a tent represented impermanence (33:20; 2 Cor. 5:1). Hezekiah's life was quickly passing away.

38:13–17 for my own peace: Hezekiah models an exemplary attitude to hardship: he accepted trials as part of God's good plan for him. For a development of this theme, see Rom. 8:28. sins: The forgiveness of sin and healing are two different aspects of God's salvation (53:5; Matt. 8:14–17; Luke 5:17–26). Apparently Hezekiah's poor health was connected to his sin. Yet not all sickness is due to one's own sin (Job 42:7–11; John 9:2, 3).

38:18 cannot thank: Praise for healing can only be offered while a person is alive (Ps. 6:5). Hope for temporal life cannot be extended beyond death, but hope for eternal life remains beyond death (Ps. 22:22–31; 2 Tim. 1:10; Heb. 2:10–12; 1 John 5:11, 12).

38:19 father … children: For a similar idea of the righteous teaching their children of God's faithfulness, see Ps. 22:30, 31.

38:20 sing: For a song of praise to God our Savior, see 12:1–6.

38:21 Them may refer to the court physicians. poultice: All healing is of God, who may and often does mediate it through medicine and the skills of health care professionals.

38:22 Depending on one's attitude, the request for a sign may express either unbelief (Matt. 12:39; John 6:30) or faith (v. 7). The healing of a boil would be the sign that the Lord would save Hezekiah (v. 20, 21).

39:1 At that time … sick: For the background see ch. 38. The letters were probably about rebellion against Assyria. recovered: The miracle of the sundial (38:8) would have held special interest for the astronomy-minded Babylonians (2 Chr. 32:31).

39:2–4 The fact that Hezekiah showed his treasures instead of praising God suggests that he was trusting in his might and the armies of the nations like Babylon, instead of in the Lord.

39:5, 6 LORD of hosts: This is the same title as used in 1:9. It describes the Lord as Commander in Chief of the angelic armies.

39:7, 8 Eunuchs were royal officials or servants. In ancient times, these servants were often castrated to keep them from being a threat to the king's harem. For further references to eunuchs, read 56:4; Dan. 1:3–6.

IN CONTEXT

A Second Isaiah?

One of the most impressive of the "near" prophecies of Isaiah is the specific, extended description of a monarch whose birth was 150 years in the future from Isaiah's time. This, of course, is regarded as quite impossible by many critical readers of the Bible. Thus, they argue that a "Second Isaiah" who lived after the events of Cyrus and the return from Exile must have penned the words of chs. 44—55.

However, what is one to say of Isaiah's words concerning the coming of the Savior King? Must these passages also be dated after the event? And what will one say concerning the passages that describe the millennium, heaven, and the eternal state? The unbelieving logic that denies Isaiah, the son of Amoz (1:1), the authorship of chs. 40—55 could also be used to argue that large portions of the book have actually not yet been written, for they discuss events still future!

The point of the extended references to Cyrus in ch. 41—46 is that only the living God could have made this specific prophecy before the fact (45:3). Those who suggest "Second Isaiah" wrote these sections after the fact have gutted the section of faith, wonder, and miracle. Heroditus could write of Cyrus after the fact; but only the living God could call him by name (as He gives names to the stars, 40:26) before he was born (45:3). The same God who named Cyrus also named the Messiah (9:6), and even the place of His birth (Mic. 5:2).

40:1—55:13 This section is addressed to the Babylonian exiles in a prophetic manner. This book of comfort, written about 150 years before the time of Cyrus, promised the exiles from Judah that they would return to Jerusalem (40:1, 2), where God would meet them in the form of the Suffering Servant (42:1–4)—the same One who would become a great King (7:14; 9:6, 7; 11:1–5). The restoration after the Exile pointed to the coming of the Lord's kingdom. In Isaiah's prophecy, this first taste of salvation merges with predictions of the full salvation that Jesus Christ would bring.

40:1–8 This prophecy consists of addresses by three heavenly heralds. The first calls upon the others to comfort the exiles because their time of servitude has ended (vv. 1, 2). The second calls for building a highway so that all may see the coming of the Lord (vv. 3–5). The third guarantees the vision (vv. 6–8).

40:1 Comfort is used to address all of the people of Zion (v. 9) with words of God's mercy. This verb, repeated for emphasis, denotes the announcement of an end to the people's suffering. The message reversed the exiles' complaint (Lam. 1:2). This consolation was fulfilled in the birth of Christ (Luke 2:25). My people … your God evokes the covenantal relationship between God and Israel (Ex. 6:7).

40:2 Here the word Jerusalem represents the exiles. The Lord would end their period of exile and restore them to the city of Jerusalem. Warfare refers to Israel's hard servitude in Babylon, from which they were about to flee (48:20, 21). Double may mean "the equivalent" or "the right amount."

40:3 crying in the wilderness: The voice is heard in the wilderness, calling the people there to ready themselves for the coming of the Lord. The analogy is based on the anticipated coming of a magnificent ruler from a distant land. The people who lived in the area of his intended visit would do everything possible to prepare the road for his arrival. Prepare means "clear away the obstacles" (57:14; 62:10). Highway represents the hearts of people who must be spiritually prepared by repentance for God's glory to be revealed on the earth (Luke 3:3–20).

40:4 valley … mountain: For a similar description, see Zech. 14:1–11. While the highway of v. 3 was to be prepared by the people of the Lord, the changes required in v. 4 could be accomplished only by divine action.

40:5, 6 The glory of the LORD began to be revealed in the restoration of the captives of Judah from the Exile (44:23). More grandly, the glory of the Lord would be displayed in the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ (4:2; Luke 2:29–32; John 1:14). The ultimate revelation of the glory of the Lord will be in His glorious kingdom (60:2; Zeph. 3:14–17), where the Savior King dwells in the presence of His people for all eternity (Rev. 22:1–5). All flesh refers to all humankind. the mouth of the LORD has spoken: The importance of this prophecy is underscored by the language of divine oath.

40:7, 8 breath of the LORD: This phrase pictures God's wrath on the wicked as the summer wind that blows on the grass and dries it up (40:24; Jer. 4:11). But the word of our God stands forever: These words offer full assurance of the reliability, stability, and eternal nature of the divine word. The Son of God fulfills the Word (Matt. 5:17, 18), is the Word (John 1:1–18), and lives forever.

40:9–11 Isaiah summons Zion to join the heavenly heralds (vv. 1–8) in proclaiming to the other cities of Judah the coming of the victorious Lord to shepherd His people.

40:9 In this section of Isaiah (40:1—55:13), Zion is an endearing term for the remnant who have remained faithful to God. The good tidings are that God has come to rescue His enslaved people. Behold your God: Compare John 1:36; 19:5.

40:10 The Lord GOD might be rephrased "the LORD, the Master." The Lord's strong … arm figuratively brings His mighty acts of judgment and deliverance (48:14; 51:5, 9; 52:10; 53:1). Reward describes the spoils of victory—namely, the delivered people. The rescued exiles merge with the messianic community (65:15, 16). Work is a synonym for "reward."

40:11 In the ancient Middle East the ideal king was often depicted as a shepherd (Ps. 23; John 10). Gather the lambs with His arm is a description of the Father's love for His people (Mic. 5:4).

40:12–31 This oracle, proclaiming the Lord as the only source of eternal strength, addresses five questions: (1) Who is the Creator? (vv. 12–17); (2) To whom may He be compared? (vv. 18–20); (3) Who rules the kingdoms of this world? (vv. 21–24); (4) To whom may He be compared? (vv. 25, 26); and (5) Why are you despondent, Jacob? (vv. 27–31).

40:12 Who: The answer is "God, Creator of the cosmos, and Israel's Lord" (vv. 15–17). A span is the width of a stretched-out hand. The verse dramatically imposes images of God's might.

40:13, 14 directed: These questions are an attack against Marduk, a Babylonian deity, who needed the assistance of other gods in creating the world.

40:15 a drop in a bucket: Wicked nations have no power to thwart the purposes of God (Ps. 2:1–6). The word scales links the answer in this verse to the question in v. 12: Who has measured the dust of the earth? Its sovereign Creator has.

40:16 to burn: Lebanon's forests were proverbial in the ancient Near East (for example, see 33:9; 35:2; 37:24). As a measure of power to withstand the living God, however, the sum of them barely would make a sputtering pressed log.

40:17 Worthless is the same term used to describe the primeval chaos (Gen. 1:2).

40:18 liken God: The God of Scripture is incomparable; there is no one else like Him (40:25; 46:5; Ps. 113:4–6).

40:19 goldsmith: Many idols were made with wood, then overlaid with gold (41:6, 7; 44:9–20; 46:6, 7). Silver chains kept the idol from moving or falling.

40:20 too impoverished: The poor had to choose the best wood available and then hope it was good enough. Note the satire in these words. What is the value of the prayer of a poor man to a plain idol? What is the value of the prayer of the rich to one covered with gold? To both questions, the answer is "none."

40:21, 22 Have you not known: The questions here and in v. 28 express God's incredulity at worshipers of idols. Even though the worship of the Lord reached back to the foundations of the earth (Gen. 4:26; Rom. 1:19, 20), these people chose idols over the true worship of the living God. The circle refers either to the horizon or to the apparent hemisphere over the earth. The point is that God is not to be confused with His creation. stretches out the heavens: Creation is the work of the God of Israel: only He deserves our praise.

40:23, 24 nothing … useless: For a similar expression of the insignificance of entire nations before the might of the living God, see v. 17. planted … blow … wither: This imagery describing God's judgment is similar to that in vv. 6–8.

40:25 To whom then will you liken Me: This and the following question in this verse form part of an important biblical theme, namely, the incomparability of God (v. 18). Since God is the Holy One, He is distinct from all others.

40:26 Lift up: Human beings are responsible to discern the greatness of the Creator in His creation and are held guilty for suppressing such discernment (Rom. 1:18–32). created: For similar descriptions of God's creative work, see 4:5; 41:20; 43:1; 45:18; 65:17, 18. These things refers to the heavenly bodies. The Babylonian deities were identified with the heavenly bodies. The words here would have had particular relevance to Israel as they learned to say no to Babylon and yes to the Lord. by number: Each of the stars is known to the Creator; to each He has given a name (Ps. 147:4).

40:27 My way is hidden from the LORD does not question God's omniscience, but His good will. Would the Lord bless His people? The Israelites had a just claim because God had promised to make them a blessing to the nations (Gen. 12:3; 28:13–15).

40:28, 29 Have you not known: The Lord repeats this rhetorical question for emphasis (v. 21). God is not only everlasting—transcendent over time—but also the Creator of the ends of the earth—transcendent over space. He is omnipotent and inscrutable. Neither faints nor is weary refers to how God meets the needs of His people: the Lord will never let His people down (Ps. 121:3, 4). power to the weak: Strength is a gift of God (Jer. 9:23).

God Helps Young People at Risk

Youth is supposed to be a time of energy and vitality. But what happens when extreme circumstances sap the life out of young people, robbing them of enthusiasm and rendering them too weak to go on?

God has pledged Himself to help young people at risk (Is. 40:30–31), as well as those who are lowly and despised, poor and needy, thirsty and hungry (41:17). This concern for people living on the margins of life is a theme that punctuates and permeates Isaiah's prophecy. And more often than not he urges people of power and means to do something about the needs of their at-risk neighbors.

If you work with young people at risk for "fainting" from the demands of life, or if you yourself are close to giving up because of the circumstances weighing you down, you can take comfort from God's promises for strength. The key is "waiting on the Lord"(40:31), expecting Him to supply what you cannot.

40:30 youths: The point is that human strength cannot compare with the power of God.

40:31 To wait entails confident expectation and active hope in the Lord —never passive resignation (Ps. 40:1). Mount up … run … walk depicts the spiritual transformation that faith brings to a person. The Lord gives power to those who trust in Him. eagles: The eagle depicts the strength that comes from the Lord. The Lord describes His deliverance of the Israelites in Ex. 19:4 as similar to being lifted up on an eagle's strong wings. In Ps. 103:5 the strength of people who are nourished by God is compared to the strength of the eagle.

41:1—42:17 In this prophecy the Lord puts the nations on a trial to show them that He alone is God because only He can predict the future. The trial consists of two cycles (41:1–20; 41:21—42:9) followed by a praise hymn (42:10–17). In each trial cycle, there are three elements: (1) a call of the nations to trial (41:1, 21–24); (2) a prediction of the coming of Cyrus (41:2–7, 25–29); and (3) a celebration of the victories of the Servant (41:8–20; 42:1–9).

41:1 Keep silence: Divine calls for silence usually anticipate judgment (Zeph. 1:7). Coastlands includes Lydia in Asia Minor, which was conquered by Cyrus (51:5). Renew their strength contrasts strength that results from faith with unassisted human strength.

41:2 One from the east refers to Cyrus, king of Persia (559–530 B.C.; 46:11). Since God had made a covenant between Himself and Abraham (v. 8), He delivered the exiles in righteousness, a synonym for salvation in Isaiah (45:8; 46:13; 51:6; 56:1). God, who has authority over the nations, gave the nations to Cyrus as a ransom for Israel (43:3).

41:3 Cyrus advanced so fast it was as though his feet did not touch the ground.

41:4 first … last: For similar references concerning God's sovereignty over all of time, see 44:6, 10; Heb. 13:8; Rev. 1:8, 17. The Lord is eternal not only in that He is not bound by time, but also in that He is Master of time. I am He: For similar uses of this phrase, see 43:13; 46:4.

41:5 The pronoun it refers to the conquests of Cyrus (vv. 2, 3).

41:6, 7 This verse satirizes assistance from idols in contrast to the sure help from the living God (vv. 10–16). The goldsmith was working on the idol that presumably could save the people. For a similar reference to this occupation, see 40:19. Here the pronoun it refers to an idol (2:8).

41:8 Servant refers to one highly honored by the Lord. There is no higher position to which a person can aspire. The term was bestowed on the person chosen to administer and advance God's kingdom (Ex. 14:31; 2 Sam. 3:18). In chs. 40—55, the title of servant is bestowed implicitly on Cyrus (45:1–4) and explicitly on God's prophets (44:26), the nation of Israel (44:21; 45:4), and particularly on the Lord Jesus Christ (42:1–4; 52:13). Abraham: The Lord calls him friend (Gen. 18:17, 18; 2 Chr. 20:7; James 2:23).

41:9 The ends of the earth probably refers to Mesopotamia (Gen. 11:31; 12:1) and perhaps Egypt (Gen. 15:13). The term indicates God's sovereign rule over the earth (v. 4). The Lord had punished Israel (42:18–25), but had not cast them away (29:22–24).

41:10 The Lord's command to the Israelites to fear not contrasts with the fright of pagans in vv. 5, 6. God had bared His right hand at the first Exodus in order to destroy the power of Pharaoh (Ex. 15:6): the phrase indicates His sovereignty and strength over all who oppose Him (40:10).

41:11, 12 The people of God are given renewed assurance that their formidable enemies will be brought to nothing (40:17, 23).

41:13 The Lord will hold the exile's right hand (42:6) just as He held the hand of Moses (63:12). The Lord is with them; they have nothing to fear.

41:14 Exiled Israel seemed as feeble and despicable as a worm (Job 25:6; Ps. 22:6). Redeemer refers to the family protector of distressed relatives, who would avenge murders (Num. 35:19) and redeem indentured slaves (Lev. 25:47–49). A redeemer could also purchase land for a relative or marry a widow whose first husband was childless (the role of Boaz in the Book of Ruth). When the Lord is called the Redeemer the title highlights His zeal to defend, protect, and purchase back His people (49:26).

41:15 The lowly "worm" (v. 14) would be transformed into a threshing sledge (28:27) that removes mountains, the symbols of opposition and the location of pagan temples and palaces (Mic. 1:3–5).

41:16 winnow: As threshed grain is tossed in the air to separate the chaff, so the victorious people of God would have complete control over their enemies.

41:17 The poor and needy refers to the exiles moving homeward across the desert. thirst: God will meet the people's most basic needs. For a related reference, see 44:3.

41:18 rivers … fountains … pool of water … springs of water: In the first Exodus, the people of Israel were often concerned about water (Ex. 17:1; Num. 20:2). The returning exiles would also need water in the second Exodus (v. 17), but God's provision would be bountiful.

41:19 in the wilderness … tree: The abundant water supply would also lead to the Lord's massive plantings of trees and vegetation (35:1, 2).

41:20 The people's reception of God's power and care is the primary concern. the hand: God's hand indicates His power and strength (40:10; 41:10). created: Only God can truly create (4:5; 40:26).

41:21 King of Jacob: This title for God pictures His special relationship with His people (43:15).

41:22 The former things probably refers to prophecies of judgment by earlier prophets, and some prophecies spoken by Isaiah in chs. 1–35 (42:9, 21–25; 43:9, 10; 46:8, 9; 48:3). Latter end of them may also be translated "their glorious future." The phrase things to come may refer to the mighty acts God would do through Cyrus. Ultimately, things to come refers to the gathering of God's people and the establishment of Christ's kingdom on earth. The point is that idols cannot tell the past or the future, but the Lord God can.

41:23 that you are gods: This is part of the satire (vv. 21, 22). Do good or do evil is a way of saying "do anything."

41:24 The word indeed assumes a period of silence between v. 23 and v. 24. The supposed "gods" were mute. An abomination is something that causes revulsion.

41:25, 26 from the north … From the rising of the sun: The conquest of Media by Cyrus (550 B.C.) made him master of the territories north of Babylon. Cyrus, who did not personally know God (45:4), nevertheless called on God's name when he released the exiles (2 Chr. 36:23; Ezra 1:1–4).

41:27 The pronoun they refers to the "former things" and "things to come" (of v. 22). One who brings good tidings refers to the prophet Isaiah.

41:28, 29 These verses present the futility of the nations; they do not have any true understanding of reality, whether past, present, or future (41:26).

“servant”

(Heb. ebed) (20:3; 42:1; 2 Sam. 10:19; Jer. 7:25) Strong’s #5650: This noun is derived from a verb meaning “to serve,” “to work,” or “to enslave.” While ebed can mean slave (Gen. 43:18), slavery in Israel was different than in most places in the ancient Middle East. Slavery was regulated by the Law of Moses, which prohibited indefinite slavery and required that slaves be freed on the Sabbath (seventh) year (Ex. 21:2)—and the Year of Jubilee—the fiftieth year (Lev. 25:25–28). Sometimes the Hebrew noun can refer to the subjects of a king (2 Sam. 10:19). But usually the word is best translated servant. God referred to His prophets as “My servants” (Jer. 7:25) and spoke of the coming Messiah as His Servant, the One who would perfectly obey His will (42:1–4; 49:1–6; 50:4–9; 52:13—53:12).

42:1 Behold: The Lord formally presents His Servant. The title My Servant is identified with Jesus Christ in the NT (Matt. 12:15–21). Isaiah may have foreshadowed Him, but only Christ brings universal justice (v. 4) and an everlasting covenant (v. 6). uphold: When God upholds a person, nothing can bring him down. For a similar idea, see 41:10. The Servant—that is, Jesus—possessed the Holy Spirit (4:4; 11:2; 48:16; 59:21; 61:1; Luke 3:22), who empowered Him to bring justice to the world.

42:2 The Hebrew word rendered cry out means "to cry out in distress." The phrase cause His voice to be heard in the street suggests the same idea; the Servant's rejection is heard for the first time (49:4; 50:5, 6; 53:4–9).

42:3 The phrase a bruised reed represents the poor and needy (41:17; 42:7). The phrase not break is an understatement for the positive equivalent: "mend" or "restore." A smoking flax represents those who have almost lost their faith and hope in the Lord. The Servant will come to restore the poor and needy and encourage people in the faith (Matt. 11:5).

42:4 law: The Servant will be more than another Moses (Deut. 18:15–18; Acts 3:22–26); He will mediate the New Covenant (2 Cor. 3:3; Heb. 8:7–13).

42:5 The Lord God introduces Himself as the source of all physical and spiritual life—breath and spirit—for He will enable the Servant to free people from death and spiritual darkness (vv. 6–9).

42:6 Called, hold, keep, and give are expressions parallel to the words of v. 1. In contrast to Cyrus, who brought political deliverance (41:2), the Servant in righteousness will deliver Israel from sin. The Servant will institute a new covenant binding Israel to the Lord (49:8). The prophets refer to this new covenant as a "covenant of peace" (54:10; Ezek. 34:25); an "everlasting covenant" (which is also associated with the Davidic covenant; 55:3); a "new covenant" (Jer. 31:31–34); and most often simply as a "covenant." The people refers to the Gentiles (60:3). Christ is the true light of the world (9:2; 49:6; 60:3; John 8:12; 9:5; Acts 26:17, 18, 23), and Christ's followers should reflect His light (Matt. 5:14).

42:7 To open … darkness is metaphorical language drawn from the Babylonian captivity; it indicates spiritual sight and salvation from sin's bondage (6:9, 10; 29:18, 24; 32:3; 35:5, 10; 61:1). Christ gave sight to the blind to show that He had the power to give everyone spiritual insight (v. 16).

42:8 My name: The fact that God reveals His name to His people is an indication of His wondrous grace (Ex. 3:14, 15). My glory: Here and in 48:11 this phrase is parallel to God's name.

42:9 former … new: For a similar idea, see 41:22. The former prophecies had come to pass; God through Isaiah was announcing new prophecies, and these too would come to pass.

42:10, 11 You who go down to the sea … the wilderness and its cities: The command is for all people to sing. The new song celebrated the second Exodus from Babylon, just as Moses' song celebrated the first Exodus from Egypt (Ex. 15:1–21). ends of the earth: For a similar use of this phrase to describe the honor and praise God will receive from all the world, see 41:5.

42:12 Glory links this hymn with the Servant's song (v. 8).

42:13 man of war: For a similar description of God as a Warrior, see Ex. 15:3. The Lord is completely sovereign: He will fight for His people even when they are exiles in a foreign land (vv. 14–17). The zeal of the Lord is also described in 9:7. He shall prevail against His enemies: A similar promise that the Lord will eventually triumph is found in 41:11, 12.

42:14 The phrase held My peace describes the Lord's patient delay in acting (48:9; 57:11). A long time most likely refers to the seventy years of captivity (2 Chr. 36:21). Now indicates the introduction of a new age (43:1; 44:1). woman in labor: The words not only speak of her cry, but of the timely bringing forth of the new age begun with the restoration.

42:15 mountains … rivers: These words refer to all obstacles in the way of returning to the land from Exile. The word dry up is an allusion to the Exodus through the Red Sea (Ex. 14:16–29; Ps. 66:6) and entrance into the land through the Jordan River (Josh. 3:14–17).

42:16, 17 Blind refers to the state of the exiles, forming a link with the Servant's task (v. 7) and the Lord's accusation against Israel (v. 18). Make darkness light echoes the first Exodus (Ex. 13:21, 22). For similar references to darkness and light, see 58:8, 10; 59:9; 60:1, 2.

42:18–25 This prophecy, justifying the Exile as punishment, consists of (1) an address by the Lord to the exiles, accusing them of being blind and deaf to His mighty acts (vv. 18–22) and (2) an address by Isaiah accusing the exiles of sin (vv. 23–25).

42:18, 19 The people of Israel were deaf because they would not listen (vv. 23, 25) and blind because they would not see (vv. 7, 16). The Lord turned the exiles' implicit accusation that He was deaf and blind (40:27) against them (6:10). My servant: Isaiah uses the title servant for Israel (41:8) because that nation was supposed to be God's messenger (44:26) to the nations (Gen. 12:3).

42:20, 21 The LORD is well pleased: For a similar use of this phrase to express God's good will, see 53:10. for His righteousness' sake: In punishing Israel for its sin, the Lord exalted His law.

42:22–24 Israel was robbed and plundered first by the Assyrians (10:6) and then by the Babylonians (39:6). These words link the Lord's speech with Isaiah's in v. 24. No one said Restore until Cyrus commanded the exiles to return to Jerusalem (Ezra 1:2–4).

42:25 For similar descriptions of God's anger, see 10:5; 28:21.

43:1 Thus says the LORD emphasizes the Author of the prophecy and the certainty that it will be fulfilled (49:8; 50:1; 56:1). The words created and formed allude to the creation of the human race in Gen. 1; 2. The Hebrew verb translated created means "to fashion anew"—a divine activity, and is the same key word used in Gen. 1:1 (40:26; 41:20; 45:12, 18; 57:19; 65:17, 18). The second verb formed means "to shape," to fashion as a potter, and is used in Gen. 2:7 of God fashioning the body of the man from the dust of the earth. The use of these verbs here suggests that the Lord's creation of Israel as a people was as decisive an act as His creation of human beings at the beginning. In the same way, the NT describes Christians as new creations in Christ (2 Cor. 5:17; Eph. 2:10). by your name: The Lord's use of name demonstrates His intimate relationship with the Israelites. He had revealed His name to the people (Ex. 6:2–8) and declared their name to Pharaoh (Ex. 4:22).

43:2 Pass through the waters is an allusion to the crossing of the Red Sea (Ex. 14:21, 22) and the Jordan River (Josh. 3:14–17). Walk through the fire is a metaphor for protection in danger (Ps. 66:12); consider the Lord's protection of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego in the fiery furnace (Dan. 3:25–27).

43:3 LORD your God: The God of all creation declares Himself to be the God of the Israelites; He had every right to be their God and to call them His people, because He had saved them from the Egyptians. For more on this divine title, see Ex. 6:2–8. Holy One of Israel: For a similar usage of this divine title, see 1:4. The Hebrew word for Savior comes from the verb meaning "to save," the word from which the name Jesus is derived (Matt. 1:21).

43:4 Israel is considered precious because of God's sovereign grace (Deut. 7:6–8).

43:5, 6 Fear not: God's people are to fear Him—that is, hold Him in awe and reverence. Being sure of His presence, they need not be afraid of anything or anyone else. Israel's descendants are called by the Lord My sons and My daughters (Hos. 11:1). east … west … north … south: For a similar idea, see 11:11. ends of the earth: For similar phrases, see 11:12; 24:14–16; 41:25. The Lord will gather all His people together—all those who praise His name and follow Him.

43:7, 8 As a blind and deaf witness, the nation of Israel did not fulfill the prophecy of restoration (42:18–20).

43:9, 10 You is strongly contrasted by "I" at the beginning of v. 11. witnesses: The people of Israel had witnessed the great works of God in their midst (Ex. 4).

43:11–13 These verses form a magnificent celebration of the sovereignty of God (14:24, 26, 27; compare Num. 23:19). no foreign god: The Hebrew text contains merely the word foreign; the word god is implied. The point is that only the living God was at work in the Israelites' midst. savior: This same Hebrew term is used in v. 3. before the day: The Lord was always at work—saving, protecting, guiding, and disciplining His people. The concluding line of the song of praise—there is no one … My hand—is quoted from Deut. 32:39.

43:14 Thus says the LORD: The same phrase is used in v. 1 to emphasize the ultimate source of this prophecy: God Himself. The Lord is described as a Redeemer because He zealously defends, protects, and purchases back His people (49:26). In ancient Israel, a redeemer was a family protector of distressed relatives. For a similar use of this title, see 41:14. Babylon: For a description of Babylon's destruction, see Jer. 51:1–44. The Chaldeans were a people who settled in lower Mesopotamia and founded the Neo-Babylonian Empire.

43:15–17 With the titles of the LORD (Ex. 3:14, 15), Holy One (1:4), Israel's Creator (40:26; 41:20), and your King (41:21), the living God declared His intimate relationship with the Israelites. He was not only their God, but also the One who created their nation and ruled over them.

43:18 The Lord commanded the people not to remember the past (46:9, 10). The kingdom of Israel inaugurated at the first Exodus and the conquest of the Promised Land would be insignificant compared to the new kingdom God would establish. former things refers to the prophecies of judgment by Isaiah and other prophets (42:9, 21–25; 43:9, 10; 46:8, 9; 48:3). the things of old: For a related passage, see 65:16.

43:19, 20 A new thing refers to Cyrus' command for the exiles to return to Jerusalem; the fall of Babylon and Israel's restoration (v. 20); and the restoration of all things (65:17–19). For a similar use of this phrase, see 48:6. a road in the wilderness: The Lord would give the exiles an unobstructed route back to the Promised Land (40:3–5). rivers in the desert: Even in desolate regions the Lord would refresh His people (41:18, 19).

43:21–28 In this trial scene (41:1–42:13; 43:8–13) the Lord finds Israel guilty of sinning against Him by not worshiping Him (vv. 22–24), and instead making Him weary with their sins (v. 24), treating His forgiveness with complacency (v. 25), and sinning against Him from the beginning (vv. 26, 27). The verdict is clear: His destruction of the temple's leaders was deserved (v. 28; 42:18–25).

43:22 The Lord's accusation was that the people had not worshiped Him in the way He prescribed and with the motivation He demanded. You identifies the exiles with their fathers, since the exiles did not have any opportunity to offer sacrifices.

43:23, 24 The exiles' ingratitude—Nor have you honored Me—contrasts with the Lord's forbearance—you have burdened Me.

43:25 for My own sake: The Lord chooses to save and forgive. This arises out of His own character. For similar phrases, see 37:35; 42:21; 48:9, 11.

43:26 State your case: More than once through Isaiah, the Lord asks Israel to answer His charges (41:21; 45:21).

43:27, 28 First father refers to Abraham (51:2). Despite his many acts of faithfulness, Abraham also had sinned (Gen. 12:18, 19; 20:9). Israel's false religious leaders (Mic. 3:9, 10) are called your mediators in contrast to "My mediators." Princes of the sanctuary refers to the leaders of the priests in Jerusalem (1 Chr. 24:5).

Israel—Chosen for Service

In what sense was Israel a "chosen" nation (44:1, 2)? As Isaiah makes plain, God chose the Israelites to carry out a mission. His choice was based on sovereign purpose and strategy. Israel's assignment was twofold: to serve as the family through whom the promise and blessing of the Messiah would come (compare Gen. 12:1–3; 15:5–7; 17:4–8), and through Him to be a spiritual light to the other nations of the world (Is. 42:6–7; 44:8; 49:6).

The Hebrews, beginning with Abraham, were given a missionary task to live in the light of what God had revealed to them. He placed them in a strategic locale, and enabled them to build a house of prayer for all nations (1 Kin. 8:41–43). Grateful obedience and faithful witness were the proper responses to God's call.

44:1 Now: The call to listen immediately is featured in 42:14; 43:1. servant: For a similar usage of the title servant for the nation of Israel see 41:8.

44:2 Thus says the LORD: This emphatic statement emphasizes that God authored the prophecy and thus it is certain to come to pass (43:1). made … formed: The Lord demands an audience with Israel, for He is their Creator, see 43:1, 7. Fear not: Since the Lord is the all-powerful One, Israel had nothing to fear. This same encouragement not to worry is found in 43:5. Jeshurun, meaning "Upright One," is a poetic word for the nation of Israel (Deut. 32:15).

44:3 Pour water may refer either to miracles during the exiles' journey home (43:19–21) or to blessings on those who had returned to the Promised Land (41:17; 55:1). pour My spirit: Moses prayed for the Lord's Spirit to come on all Israel (Num. 11:29); the prophets foretold it (Joel 2:28–32), and Christ fulfilled it (32:15; Acts 2:14–36).

44:4 Luxurious grass symbolizes prosperity.

44:5 The repatriated would proudly identify themselves with the Lord. The name of Israel would no longer be associated with a worm (41:14).

44:6–23 This passage describes another fact-finding trial like the one in 41:1—42:17; 43:8–13. Between the command not to fear (v. 8) and the command to remember (v. 21) and return (v. 22), there is an extended, biting satire on idolatry (vv. 9–20). An exhortation to nature to praise Israel's redeeming Lord concludes the oracle (v. 23), which contains many allusions to the Song of Moses (Deut. 31:30—32:43).

44:6, 7 Thus says the LORD: This emphatic statement refers to the truthfulness of what follows (43:1). King of Israel: For background see Ps. 99. Redeemer: This term is also used in 41:14 and refers to the zeal with which the Lord acts to defend his people. First … Last: God is completely sovereign over time (41:4). Besides Me there is no God: For a similar idea see Deut. 32:39.

44:8 Do not fear: A similar command is given in 43:5. When God is on your side, you do not need to fear anything or anyone else. You are My witnesses: The people of Israel had already witnessed great miracles on their behalf (43:10). Rock: The image of a rock represents stability and protection (Ps. 62:2, 6, 7). For a similar description of God, see Deut. 32:4, 15, 31.

44:9–20 This satire against idolatry consists of (1) an introduction condemning idols and those who make them (vv. 9–12), (2) the main section showing the absurdity of idolatry by describing how metal and wooden idols are made (vv. 12–17), and (3) a didactic conclusion against idol makers (vv. 18–20). The prophet Isaiah was speaking to the future generation, warning them of the foolishness of worshiping idols (40:19, 20; 41:21–29; 42:17).

44:9 an image: This is the term used in the Second Commandment to describe an idol (Ex. 20:4). Useless is translated "without form" in Gen. 1:2.

44:10 The Hebrew has the words god and image together, stressing the absurdity of worshiping an image molded by human hands.

44:11, 12 be ashamed: When all people come face to face with God, it will be a day of shame for those who rejected Him in this life.

44:13, 14 While people were made in the image of God (Gen. 1:26–28), idolaters made gods in the figure of a man (Deut. 4:16; Rom. 1:23).

44:15, 16 Isaiah was particularly struck by the absurdity of using one part of a log for burning and the other part of the very same log as an object of worship.

44:17, 18 you are my god: This is a scene of complete hopelessness (57:13); an idolater prays for deliverance from a powerless piece of wood. Worshiping and depending on any object made by human hands—such as money—is just as hopeless.

44:19 abomination: For another use of this word communicating revulsion, see 41:24. a block of wood: The awful truth was that people were worshiping objects made from God's creation instead of the Creator Himself.

44:20 He feeds on ashes: Compare the two banquets in Prov. 9:1–6, 13–18.

44:21 My servant: The nation of Israel is often described as God's servant (41:8). formed you: This verb suggests that the formation of the nation was a decisive act on the part of God (43:1). not be forgotten: Though the exiles might have thought God had forgotten (49:14, 15), the Lord unambiguously declared that He would remember the nation He had created.

44:22 blotted out: The idea of total forgiveness of sins is also found in 40:2; 43:25. The word redeemed describes God as buying back His people.

For the Lord as Redeemer, see 41:14.

44:23 The songs (12:1–6) of the heavens and earth (1:2; 49:13), the forest (35:1, 2) and every tree (14:7, 8; 55:12) mirror the joy of God's people at the arrival of salvation. glorified Himself: The Lord honors Himself when He saves because it demonstrates to the world His mercy and His power (40:5; 42:8; 43:7).

44:24—45:13 This salvation oracle proclaiming Cyrus as the Lord's anointed to save Israel consists of an expanded introduction concerning its Author (44:24–28), a direct address to Cyrus summoning him to service (45:1–7), and concluding commands to the heavens to rain the Lord's blessings and to the earth to receive them (45:8). In a twofold epilogue, the Lord reproves anyone who faults His sovereignty (45:9, 10), and asserts His right as Sovereign to fashion His own tools.

44:24 Thus says the LORD: Because the Lord says this, it will come to pass (43:1, 14; 44:2, 6, 24). Redeemer: This same title is used in 41:14. It pictures the Lord's zeal to defend, protect, and purchase back His people. who formed you: That God formed Israel pictures His desire for them as a nation and His constant loving care on their behalf. For a similar idea, see 43:1.

“diviners”

(Heb. qasam) (44:25; 1 Sam. 6:2; Ezek. 21:23) Strong’s #7080: This term refers to people who attempt to foretell the future through occult practices. Diviners are often mentioned along with other practitioners of the occult—all of whom were forbidden in Israel (Deut. 18:10–22). False prophets, such as Balaam, practiced divination, and the penalty was death (Josh. 13:22; Jer. 27:9; 29:8; Ezek. 22:28). Diviners brought judgment not only on themselves but also on their nations (Deut. 18:10; 2 Kin. 17:17, 18; Mic. 3:6, 7). Divining was practiced by several methods: calling up the spirits of the dead, casting arrows as lots, consulting images, looking at the organs of a dead animal, or interpreting dreams and visions (1 Sam. 28:8; Ezek. 13:23; 21:21, 29; 22:28; Mic. 3:6, 7; Zech. 10:2). Diviners charged fees for their services.

44:25 Babblers refers to the diviners (2:6, 8; 8:19; Deut. 18:10, 11). wise: These were people wise in their own eyes, but not wise toward the Lord. For a similar description, see 29:14.

44:26 performs the counsel: This idea is explored in more detail in 41:1—42:13; 43:8–13; 44:6–8. Israel was to be both the servant (41:8) of the Lord, and His messenger (42:19) to the nations (Gen. 12:3). You shall be inhabited: This same promise is found in Jer. 32:15. built: The rebuilding of the temple and the resettlement of the land after the devastation by Babylon inaugurated the new age (58:12; 61:4).

44:27 Deep refers either to the moat protecting Babylon or to the obstacles blocking the returning exiles (42:15). This may be an allusion to the chaotic waters resisting creation (Gen. 1:2); the Red Sea blocking the first Exodus (43:16–19; 51:10); or the Jordan River opposing the entrance into the Promised Land (Josh. 3:14–17).

44:28 Cyrus: Here Isaiah mentions by name the king of Persia who would allow the Israelites to return to Jerusalem in 538 B.C. (Ezra 1:1–4). For a less specific reference, see 41:2. Shepherd is a title for an ideal king (40:11; Mic. 5:4).

Ruins of the palace of one of the Persian kings at Persepolis. Isaiah declared that God would use King Cyrus of Persia as His "anointed" to return the Jewish people in exile to their homeland (Is. 45:1–7).

45:1 To be anointed, literally to be “Messiah,” indicates appointment to an office, usually as king (61:1). The bestowal of this unique and exalted title on the Persian king, after it had been used in Israel of such notables as the patriarchs (Ps. 105:15), David (Ps. 2:2), and the coming Messiah (Dan. 9:25), must have shocked the Israelite audience of Isaiah (vv. 9, 10). Why would the Lord appoint a foreign pagan to carry out His will? The double doors, which were part of the gates connected with Babylon’s defensive moat, were not shut when Cyrus captured Babylon (44:27).

45:2 I will go before you: This was the Lord’s promise to Cyrus, similar to His promise to His people of old. Babylon had one hundred gates of bronze.

45:3, 4 have not known Me: Cyrus knew that the Lord had appointed him, but he did not know the Lord God personally (Ezra 1:2).

45:3 Treasures of darkness is an allusion to the fabled wealth of Sardis captured by Cyrus in 546 B.C. Who call you by your name refers to the specific naming of Cyrus by the Lord before Cyrus became king (compare 43:1). In this prophecy, the Lord had named Cyrus as both “shepherd” (40:11; 44:28) and “anointed” (v. 1).

45:4 For Jacob My servant’s sake: God anointed Cyrus to establish again the people whom He loved (43:1).

45:5, 6 From the rising of the sun to its setting means everywhere (Ps. 113:3). No other person or object can compare to the holiness and power of our living Creator. He is sovereign over everything—both good and evil. The symbols of light and darkness (Ex. 10:21–23) are clarified by the words peace and calamity (47:11; Amos 3:6).

45:7, 8 Righteousness and salvation are used as synonyms in the Book of Isaiah (46:13; 51:6; 56:1). In the Middle East people commonly believed that the fertility of the earth and the maintenance of the social order depended on the king’s right relationship with a deity. Because Cyrus was anointed by the true God, heaven would shower its blessings on earth.

(Heb. hoy) (5:8; 45:9; 55:1; Jer. 23:1) Strong’s #1945: This interjection was primarily used by the prophets at the opening of a section where the evil practices of a particular person or group was denounced (Jer. 23:1). It is found at the beginning of judgment oracles against foreign nations, drawing attention to a threat by God (10:5). These judgment oracles frequently occur in a series, as in ch. 5 (5:8, 11, 18, 20, 21). A prophet could use the word woe to express personal feelings of despair or lament (24:16). Yet even then, the prophet was typically expressing God’s lament and condemnation of wickedness (Jer. 22:13–17). Jesus used an equivalent expression (Gk. ouai) when He cursed Chorazin and Bethsaida (Matt. 11:21) and later the scribes and Pharisees (Luke 11:44).

45:9–13 The epilogue counters the objections against the Lord’s appointment of foreigner Cyrus as His anointed shepherd (44:28; 45:1). It develops in two parts: (1) from analogies of the sovereign rights of a creator over his creation and a father over his children (vv. 9, 10) and (2) to the Lord’s sovereignty over Israel (v. 11), over all creation (v. 12), and finally over Cyrus (v. 13).

45:9, 10 Woe: For a similar use of this word see 5:8. Maker: For similar references to God as Creator see 29:23; 43:1; 45:11. potsherd: Why should a created being question the Creator? A piece of pottery does not question the potter. For similar references see 29:16; Jer. 18:6.

45:11 Thus says the LORD: This emphatic statement points to the certainty of these words (43:1, 14; 44:2, 6, 24). things to come: For similar phrases, see 41:22, 23.

45:12 Created is the same verb used in Gen. 1:26–28 (43:1).

45:13 The pronoun him refers to Cyrus (44:28; 45:1). Though the Lord gave Cyrus a handsome reward (vv. 3, 4) to ransom His people (43:3), this was not the reason Cyrus sent the captives home.

45:14–25 These prophecies predict worldwide salvation through Israel (14:1, 2; 19:23–25; 49:23; 54:3; 60:11). The nations of Africa will join Israel in worship (v. 14). Idolaters will be ashamed, but Israel will be saved forever (vv. 15–17). The Creator and Redeemer will not be thwarted in His purposes (vv. 18, 19); only He can predict the future, for only He controls it

(vv. 20, 21). All nations will eventually bow before Israel's God (vv. 22–25).

45:14 After the Lord handed over Egypt, Cush, and the Sabeans to Cyrus as a ransom (43:3, 4), they would hand themselves over to Israel and its Lord. come over: For a similar reference, see Ps. 68:31. You and yours are both feminine singular, referring to the Daughter of Zion (1:8; 40:9). Bow down to you indicates submission to the Lord and recognition of His presence with His people in Zion (2:2–4).

45:15, 16 God hides Himself in His wrath (8:17; 54:8; 55:8, 9), but He reveals Himself in the Scriptures (48:5–8).

45:17 an everlasting salvation: These words of divine promise are echoed in 51:6.

45:18 Created and formed are used as synonyms as in the Book of Genesis (compare Gen. 1:27; 2:7). Both verbs identify the Lord as the Creator and do not focus on the way He accomplished His grand act of creation. In vain is the same term used in Gen. 1:2. The Lord created the earth to be inhabited, not to be desolate, as the Assyrians and Babylonians had left the land of Israel (6:11; 7:18, 19; 27:10, 11; 33:9; 44:26, 28).

45:19 Pagan diviners pronounced their mysterious and ambiguous oracles in secret and dark places. The Lord's prophets proclaimed the truth openly to all who would listen.

45:20 Draw near together: For similar ideas see 41:1, 21, 22; 43:9; 44:7.

45:21 The pronoun this refers to the universal salvation begun with Cyrus's decree that Israel return home (44:24—45:13).

45:22 no other: For additional references to God's incomparability, see 40:25; 45:5.

45:23 I have sworn by Myself: The Lord's promise to Abraham was sworn by His own person (Gen. 22:16; Heb. 6:13). The certainty of the Word of the Lord is emphasized strongly in the Book of Isaiah (40:8). The Lord's promise that to Me every knee shall bow will be fulfilled in Jesus Christ (Rom. 14:11; 1 Cor. 15:24, 25; Phil. 2:10, 11).

45:24, 25 Those who are incensed against God will have no share in His eternal kingdom (50:11; 66:24).

46:1–13 This collection of salvation oracles are all spoken by the Lord, and all are addressed to the stubborn exiles. They begin with similar imperatives, “Listen” (v. 3); “Remember” (v. 8); “Listen” (v. 12); and they share the common theme that the Lord is truly God.

46:1, 2 Bel, meaning “Lord,” was a title of Marduk, Babylon’s chief deity. Nebo, Marduk’s son, was the god of fate, writing, and wisdom. Ironically, each of these gods is said to bow down, to stoop along with their idols. In pagan thought, the idols and the gods that they embodied were inseparable. The heavy idols that were expected to bring deliverance were themselves dragged away into captivity.

46:3 An unbelieving remnant (1:9; 10:20) is likely being referred to here, judging by the parallel words, “transgressors” (v. 8) and “stubborn-hearted” (v. 12; see 1:2; 48:1–5; 57:4). carried from the womb: For a similar image of the Lord carrying the nation of Israel, see Deut. 1:31.

46:4, 5 Old age indicates the Lord’s never-ceasing care. I am He: Note in this verse the emphasis God places on His activities on behalf of His people; the Lord Himself and no one else would save Israel (41:4). liken Me: This is the third time the incomparability of God is asserted in this section of Isaiah (40:18, 25).

46:6, 7 The pronoun they refers to the idol makers (40:19, 20; 41:6, 7; 44:9–20). They bear it: In contrast to the living God who carries and supports His people (v. 4), idols have to be carried by those who worship them.

46:8 Transgressors refers to the unbelieving remnant (v. 3).

46:9, 10 the end from the beginning: For a similar description see 41:4. As the Sovereign of the cosmos, God can do anything He desires. His pleasure (Ps. 147:10, 11) includes the salvation of His people (Zeph. 3:17) and the worship of their hearts (John 4:23, 24).

46:11 A bird of prey from the east refers to Cyrus (41:2) and to the speed and power of his conquests (41:3). The point is that God may use any tool He wants to accomplish His purposes on earth (Rom. 9:14–23).

46:12 As there were those in the first Exodus who longed to return to Egypt (Num. 14:3), so in the second Exodus there would be those who refused to leave the comfort and security of Babylon and Persia.

46:13 Righteousness is a synonym for salvation in Isaiah (41:2; 45:8; 51:6; 56:1). Salvation from the Exile was not only certain, but near (51:5). Israel My glory: In spite of the Israelites’ long history of rebellion (Ex.

32), God loves His people Israel and has never utterly cast them aside (Rom. 11:1).

The Purpose of Prophecy

Perhaps you think of prophecy as having mainly to do with predictions about the future. That's understandable, since prophets in Bible times sometimes foretold what would happen in the future (for example, Is. 7:14–17; 45:1–7; Jer. 28:12–17). However, the purpose of prophecy goes beyond merely informing people about things to come. There are at least two additional reasons why God spoke through the OT prophets: First, prophecy shows that the Lord is God. A god who cannot reveal himself to human beings is unlikely to command much respect. But through prophecy, the Lord has made Himself known in compelling ways. For example, He demonstrated His omniscience by revealing to the Israelites what would happen in the future, something no pagan idol could do (48:5). He also demonstrated His power through the prophets in ways that left no doubt about who He is (1 Kin. 18:36–39).

Second, prophecy announces Gods word. Closely related to God's revelation of Himself through prophecy is His communication of truth that He wants people to know. Prophecy is often referred to as the "word of the Lord" (Is. 1:10; 28:14; 38:4); in fact, it is often prefaced by the words, "thus says the Lord God" (7:7; 10:24; 22:15). Thus prophecy is revelation from God. It brings to light truth that would otherwise would remain unexpressed.

The point of these revelations is not merely to inform, but to declare what is true, and then to tell people how they should live in light of what is true. Sometimes prophecy helps to warn people about the consequences of their actions, and sometimes it encourages them when circumstances appear to be desperate. But whatever its effect on people, the purpose of prophecy is to proclaim God and His word.

47:1–15 The humiliation and exile of Babylon's gods (ch. 46) left Babylon's inhabitants exposed to the same fate. Isaiah predicted Babylon's fall in a mocking funeral song aimed at discouraging Babylon and encouraging Israel. The poem has four stanzas (vv. 1–4, 5–7, 8–11, 12–15).

47:1 O virgin daughter of Babylon: The language is sarcastic. Babylon had acted as though she were "God's daughter." She was about to discover that she was the daughter of the Chaldeans. No longer would she be thought of as a heavenly princess—tender and delicate.

47:2, 3 Grinding meal was a usually work for female slaves (Ex. 11:5). Uncover the thigh suggests doing menial labor with overtones of the shame of indecent exposure. Babylon would lose its status and privilege. Nakedness indicates disgrace, impropriety, lack of dignity, and vulnerability (Gen. 9:22, 23).

47:4 In contrast to the humiliated Babylon, Israel had a Redeemer (41:14). The LORD of hosts (1:9) would deliver the nation of Israel.

47:5 The similar structure of vv. 1, 5 link the first stanza (vv. 1–4) with the second stanza (vv. 5–8).

47:6, 7 Babylon's cruel abuse of Israel when the Lord had given them into Babylon's hand would be avenged, as in the case of the Assyrians (10:1–19; 49:25). a lady forever: Babylon was arrogantly boasting that it would remain an empire, "the Lady of Kingdoms" (v. 5; compare Dan. 4:30), throughout all time. This amounted to blasphemy.

47:8, 9 Hear is addressed to the wicked "daughter," Babylon (vv. 1, 5; see 1:8). Babylon had deified itself with the statement I am (v. 10). They had tried to usurp the Lord's unique attribute: Only the Almighty has an existence that is not dependent on another (45:5, 6, 18, 21, 22; 46:9). This wicked self-deification mirrors the boasting of the king of Tyre (Ezek. 28:11–19). Babylon is no longer considered a virgin (v. 1), but instead is a widow. The imagery of the loss of children suggests the loss of hope in the future. Contrast Babylon's fate with that of Zion (49:21–23; 54:1–6).

47:10 Wickedness, wisdom, and knowledge refer to the same idea as "sorceries" and "enchantments" in v. 9 (Dan. 2; 5; contrast with 11:2). No one sees me: The selfish pride of the wicked is based in part on believing that there is not an all-knowing, all-seeing God in the universe.

47:11 The word therefore links Babylon's pretensions of "knowledge" (v. 10) with the just judgment that the nation did not know.

47:12–14 The command to stand matches the Lord's introductory commands in vv. 1, 5. The word sorceries links the final stanza with the earlier ones (vv. 9, 10).

47:15 Babylon's fate would also overtake those with whom it had labored, its ancient merchants, on whose trade it depended for its wealth. Compare the arrogance of the king of Tyre based on Tyre's successful trading (Ezek. 28:16, 18).

48:1–11 This passage, addressed to all Israel, condemns the people for hypocrisy (v. 1), idolatry (v. 5), arrogance (v. 7), and treachery (v. 8). At the same time, the oracle promises the people salvation for the sake of the Lord's name (vv. 9–11). The tone is similar to 42:18, 19; 43:22–25; 46:1–13. The oracle has four parts: (1) summoning Israel to hear the address (vv. 1, 2); (2) a charge that Israel's unbelief is without excuse because the Lord had revealed that it was He who was helping them (vv. 3–5); (3) a prediction of future salvation (vv. 6–8); and (4) a promise that the Lord will defer judgment for the sake of His name (vv. 9–11).

48:1 Hear is an urgent appeal to "deaf Israel" (6:9, 10; 48:6, 8). Jacob … Israel: For a similar use of these names, see 41:8. called by the name: For related descriptions of Israel as called by God, see 43:1, 7; 63:8.

48:2, 3 The holy city is Jerusalem. The citizens of Jerusalem professed to lean on the God of Israel (Rom. 9:6).

48:4 Obstinate means "hard" (46:12; Ex. 32:9; Deut. 9:6, 13). Iron and bronze here are metaphors for rebelliousness (Jer. 6:28).

48:5 Despite Israel's knowledge that no idol had helped them, Isaiah anticipated that in the future they would attribute their salvation to some god other than the one Lord.

48:6 New things include the career of Cyrus (v. 14); the fall of Babylon and Israel's restoration (v. 20), which inaugurated the messianic age (v. 16); and the restoration of all things (65:17–19). To be able to declare … hidden things, the Lord must know and control the future.

48:7, 8 As God unfolded His plan of redemption, He created events that Israel had not heard about before. God knew that if the Israelites had possessed such knowledge, they would have acted treacherously, claiming "Of course I knew them."

48:9 The Lord works out everything for His praise (42:8–12; 43:21). Defer My anger means to be "longsuffering" (Ex. 34:6).

48:10 Refined, a reference to judgment (1:25; 4:4), talks of the Babylonian captivity. Furnace is an allusion to Israel's suffering in Egypt (Deut. 4:20; Jer. 11:4).

48:11 For My own sake: The Lord shows His settled will to maintain the integrity of His great name (v. 9). God's acts of mercy are His own initiative, springing from the depths of His mercy (37:35; 42:21; 43:25). My glory is a parallel expression to "My name" (42:8), as is the expression

“My praise” in v. 9. profaned: For descriptions of how Israel had desecrated God’s name, see Ezek. 20:8, 9; 36:21–23.

48:12–22 This section, directed to all Israel, encourages the unrighteous to participate in the Lord’s redemption of the nation from Babylon. The Lord (1) presents Himself as the sovereign Creator (vv. 12, 13), (2) shows that He alone predicted Israel’s salvation through Cyrus (vv. 14, 15), (3) promises to come to the people in the form of His Servant (v. 16), and (4) promises peace and posterity to those who obey Him (vv. 17–19). Isaiah follows the divine speech with an exhortation to flee Babylon (v. 20) and participate joyfully in the second Exodus (vv. 21, 22).

48:12 called: For a similar reference to God’s calling of Israel, see 42:6. First … Last: For a similar description of God’s sovereignty over all time, see 41:4.

48:13 Earth and heavens refer to the entire cosmos (13:13; 40:21, 22; 51:6, 13).

48:14 Assemble yourselves probably was addressed to the nations; the pronoun them likely refers to the idols of the nations (41:21–23; 43:9; 45:20, 21). The pronoun him refers to Cyrus (41:2, 25; 45:13; 46:11), a designation made explicit in 44:28—45:1.

48:15 I, even I draws attention to the source of this prophecy: the living God. called: For a similar reference to this calling, see 41:2.

48:16 Me refers to the Servant, Jesus (42:1–13; 61:1), who has spoken through His prophets (1 Pet. 1:10, 11). Lord here means “Master,” suggesting that the speaker is the Servant (50:4). For additional references to God’s Spirit, see 11:2; 30:1; 42:1; 59:21; 61:1; Luke 3:22.

48:17 The Lord teaches and leads through His servants (Deut. 5:27), His prophets, and His Son.

48:18 A river supplies abundant water to produce luxuriant growth (41:18; 66:12; Amos 5:24). The waves of the sea speak of power, constancy, and increase.

48:19 Sand recalls God’s promise to the patriarchs that the Israelites would become very numerous (Gen. 22:17; 32:12).

48:20 By putting the command declare into the present tense, the future salvation is brought vividly into the present (40:9–11; 44:23; 46:1–4). Go forth: The people are told to leave Babylon, forsaking its comforts (Gen. 12:1; Ex. 12:31). proclaim: For examples of proclamations, see 12:1; 44:23; 49:13.

48:21 They did not thirst is an allusion to God’s provision of water during the first Exodus (41:17–20; 43:16–21; Ex. 17:1–7; Num. 20:2–11). waters … from the rock: For a NT perspective on these miracles, see 1 Cor. 10:4.

49:1–13 This second song of the suffering Servant (42:1–13) consists of two parts: the Servant's soliloquy (vv. 1–6) and the Lord's oracles to Him (vv. 7–9). The song is followed by Isaiah's elaboration (vv. 9–12), and it concludes with a hymn of praise (v. 13).

49:1 coastlands: The Servant's mission pertains to the whole earth (41:1). Matrix means "womb" (Gen. 25:23; Ruth 1:11).

49:2 Through the preaching of His mouth, the Servant will conquer the earth (11:4). like a sharp sword: For similar descriptions of Jesus' speech, see Eph. 6:17; Heb. 4:12; Rev. 1:16. Shadow suggests protection (30:2, 3; 51:16). Because the Servant's mission was hidden until He was sent, it would be more effective (48:6–8).

49:3 Israel may refer to the quintessential Israel—the Savior Jesus—who would come to redeem national Israel (v. 5). In whom I will be glorified: In partial fulfillment of this prophecy, Jesus prayed to His Father, "I have glorified You on the earth. I have finished the work which You have given Me to do" (John 17:4).

49:4 The Servant's complaint that He labored in vain (26:17, 18) points to His rejection by the nation of Israel and His suffering (42:2). reward: The Servant will be vindicated (50:8) and will be rewarded after His death (53:8) and resurrection (53:10).

49:5 The political mission of Cyrus to bring Jacob back from Babylon (44:28; 45:13) foreshadows the spiritually redemptive mission of the Servant to free His people from their captivity to sin (42:7).

“salvation”

(Heb. yeshuah) (49:6; Job 30:15; Ps. 67:2) Strong’s #3444: This word describes deliverance from distress and the resultant victory and well-being. The term occurs most often in Psalms and Isaiah, where it is frequently used along with the word righteousness, indicating a connection between God’s righteousness and His saving acts (45:8; 51:6, 8; 56:1; 62:1; Ps. 98:2). This word can be used for a military victory (1 Sam. 14:45), but it is normally used of God’s deliverance (Ex. 15:2; Ps. 13:5, 6). The expressions “the salvation of the LORD “ and “the salvation of our God” speak of God’s work on behalf of His people. The expression “the God of my salvation” is more private in nature, referring to the deliverance of an individual (12:2; 52:10; Ex. 14:13; 2 Chr. 20:17; Pss. 88:1; 98:3).

49:6 light to the Gentiles: The Servant fulfills the call of Abraham (Gen. 12:1–3) and the nation of Israel (Ex. 19:5, 6) to be a blessing to other nations. After Jesus’ death and resurrection, the great commission of global evangelism is carried on by His apostles (Acts 13:47; 26:23) and those who succeed them to the end of the age (Matt. 28:18–20).

49:7 Paradoxically, the King who humbles Himself to become the servant of rulers will Himself receive homage from them (4:2; 45:24; 52:15). Kings will also bow down to His people (v. 23).

49:8 In an acceptable time, in contrast to the day of vengeance (34:8; 61:1; 2 Cor. 6:2), the Lord will hear the Servant’s complaint that His mission toward Israel was in vain (v. 4). The Lord will crown His Servant as King to restore blessing on the famished earth (45:8). The pronoun them refers to Israel.

49:9 Go forth is an allusion to Isaiah’s command for the exiles to leave Babylon (48:20). The imagery of feeding in pastures implies that the Servant would be Israel’s Shepherd-King (40:11).

49:10 The word thirst is an allusion to 48:21. Heat and sun may be allusions to Ps. 121, a psalm of pilgrimage. The word guide may be an allusion to the first Exodus (42:16; 48:21; Ex. 15:13).

49:11 Mountains, which were once barriers (2:2, 13, 14; 42:15), will become highways, the means of salvation (vv. 22, 23). The pronoun My before both mountains and highways is significant: God the Creator is the sovereign Owner of all creation.

49:12 The north and the west indicates the universal salvation of all Israel (11:11, 12; 43:5, 6). These oracles are addressed to all Israel and all the earth (48:1; 49:1). Sinim was a district on the southern frontier of ancient Egypt.

49:13 Sing: The Lord is the Creator of music (12:1–6; 44:23).

49:14–26 This section consists of two complaints of Zion (vv. 14, 24), followed by the Lord's reassuring responses to them (vv. 15–23; vv. 25, 26). The aim of the two sections is to cause Israel and the nations to know that the Lord of Israel is the eternal God (vv. 23, 26).

49:14 Zion represents the exiles (40:1, 9). The complaint The LORD has forsaken me resembles that in 40:27–31. The Lord disciplined the Israelites briefly because of their sin (54:7; Lam. 5:20–22).

49:15 The Lord says: I will not forget you. The nuance of the verb suggests an even stronger assurance, "As for Me, I am unable to forget you."

49:16 inscribed: This may refer to the Lord's command for the names of the tribes of Israel to be inscribed on the stones of the priest's ephod (Ex. 28:9–12). When the priest was in the temple, the engraved names would remind God of His covenant with Israel. Your walls are continually before Me: The Creator God has His thoughts focused on the welfare of His people (Ps. 40:5).

49:17 Cyrus gave the edict to rebuild Jerusalem (44:28). The restored sons of Zion would carry out the decree. Zion's would-be destroyers were the Babylonians (2 Kin. 25:8–10).

49:18 As I live: This is an oath formula. The Lord swears by His own eternal person (Gen. 22:16). Zion's returning "sons" were a splendid ornament, like the jewels of a bride (61:10).

49:19 Desolate means "childless" (54:1).

49:20, 21 The complaint that the place is too small is in fact a cause for rejoicing (54:1–3; Zech. 2:4, 5), because it means the Lord would cause His people to grow. This prophecy points to the return of the exiles to Jerusalem, for under Ezra and Nehemiah the exiles built a relatively small city (Ezra 2; Neh. 7). Some view the ultimate fulfillment of this prophecy to be the gathering of the Lord's people at the coming of Jesus' kingdom.

49:22 I will lift My hand in an oath: God swears by His own character. Standard is often translated "banner" (11:12). The return of the Israelites from the nations and not only from Babylon shows that the future salvation of all Israel is in view (Rom. 11:26).

49:23 The nations that had enslaved Israel had served Israel as foster fathers and nursing mothers (14:2; 43:6; 60:9).

49:24, 25 Israel asks rhetorically: Shall the prey—captive Israel—be taken from the mighty—Babylon? Apparently Israel expects a negative answer to this question, but the Lord responds affirmatively. He would contend with the mighty, terrible Babylon (Jer. 50:33, 34) and free His people.

49:26 oppress: Cannibalism was not unknown during the horrible famine of a siege (9:20; see Deut. 28:53–57; 2 Kin. 6:24–31; Lam. 4:10; Zech. 11:9). I, the LORD … Mighty One of Jacob: The last couplet is a celebration of the name and character of the living God. The Almighty asserts that He is the One who can powerfully save His people (Ex. 3:14, 15; 34:6, 7).

50:1–3 In this prophecy, the Lord defends Himself (42:18–25; 43:22–28) against the implied accusation brought by the unbelieving exiles of the second generation, that He was unwilling or unable to save them.

50:1 Though the Lord had put away Israel, as a husband might put away a wife, it was for only a short period of exile (54:5–7; 62:4) and not permanently. Permanent exile would have required a certificate of divorce (Deut. 24:1–4). If the Lord had issued one, He could not have taken Israel back (Deut. 24:1–4; Jer. 3:1, 8). No prophet suggested that God had completely broken His covenant; rather, they predicted God's faithfulness to a remnant who would return (Mic. 4:9, 10). Your mother refers to Jerusalem, more specifically, the inhabitants of the preceding generation that had gone into exile. If the Lord had sold Israel to creditors (Ex. 21:7; 2 Kin. 4:1; Neh. 5:5), He would not have any authority over their destiny. But the Israelites had sold themselves because of their own iniquities (42:23–25). Therefore God as their Redeemer could buy them back (41:14; 52:3).

50:2 God came to Israel at the time of the Exile through the prophets He sent. Later God came to this earth through His Servant and Son, Jesus (41:9). But no one answered Him (6:9, 10; 66:4). Is My hand shortened: For a variation of this rhetorical question, see Num. 11:23. dry up the sea: The Lord alluded to His parting of the Red Sea and the Jordan River to evoke images of His strength (43:16, 17; 44:27; 51:9–11).

50:3 Blackness may be an allusion to the ninth plague of Egypt, when the Lord made darkness cover the earth (Ex. 10:21).

The Dangers of the Tongue

People tend to be known by what they say. Words may strike fear in others, they may reveal the speakers to be foolish, or they may be a source of help or comfort to other people. In a passage that probably pertains to the coming Messiah, Isaiah said the Lord's Anointed would "know how to speak" by receiving instruction from God (Is. 50:4). As a result of this divine tutelage, He would be able to speak appropriately to the weary. How much more do the rest of us need help in knowing what to say, given our sinful condition. Scripture repeatedly warns us about the power and danger of our words. As Scripture frequently shows, they can: • cut like a sword (Pss. 57:4; 64:3); • be as dangerous and poisonous as a snake (Ps. 140:3); • convey lies with the impact of a bow (Jer. 9:3); • strike down other people like an arrow (Jer. 9:8); and • curse and demean others (Hos. 7:16).

What is the impact of your words on other people? Does what you say build others up or tear them down?

50:4–11 The third Servant song consists of a soliloquy by the Servant (vv. 4–9), and the prophet's address to believing and unbelieving Israel (vv. 10, 11).

50:4 The title Lord GOD is emphasized in this section (vv. 5, 7, 9). The title Lord means "Master"; the word GOD represents the divine name (Yahweh). The Lord educated the Servant's tongue through suffering. The word learned is translated elsewhere as "disciple" (8:16). weary: Unlike unbelieving Israel (Jer. 31:25), the Lord awakens the Servant's ear to hear (contrast 42:18, 19).

50:5 opened: The idea is the same as that in Ps. 40:6—the opening of the ear canal as a symbol for hearing and obeying. not rebellious: Contrast 1:2.

50:6 People sometimes struck the back of a fool (Prov. 10:13; 19:29; 26:3). Jesus suffered this humiliation (42:2; 49:4; 53:12; Matt. 27:26; John 19:1). Pulling someone's beard was a sign of contempt and disrespect (2 Sam. 10:4, 5; Neh. 13:25). shame and spitting: This prophecy was fulfilled in the suffering of Christ (Matt. 27:30).

50:7 The Lord is the Servant's only source of help (41:10, 13, 14; 49:8). The phrase not be disgraced means to be honored (49:7; 52:13). Like a flint indicates determination in the face of opposition (Ezek. 3:8, 9). For this prophecy's fulfillment in Christ, see Luke 9:51.

50:8 justifies: God would view this One as completely righteous. This prophecy was fulfilled in Christ (1 Tim. 3:16).

50:9 the Lord GOD will help Me: See the same voice of confidence in the Lord in Ps. 118:6–12, another prophecy of the suffering of the Savior Jesus.

50:10 Who … fears the LORD: The fear of the Lord—that is, the reverence or awe of God—is the beginning of true wisdom (Prov. 1:7).

50:11 Those who kindle a fire means those who are self-reliant, instead of walking in the light of the Lord and His Servant (2:5; 42:6). When the Light comes into the world, some will choose darkness (John 3:17, 18). Torment indicates God's punishment for unbelief.

51:1–8 Three oracles (vv. 1–3, 4–6, 7, 8) are linked by the same imperative, “Listen” (vv. 1, 4, 7); the same speaker, the Lord (except v. 3); the same addressees, the faithful exiles; and the common theme of comfort as a result of the coming salvation.

51:1, 2 Look links the metaphor of v. 1 with its interpretation in v. 2. The metaphors rock and pit are interpreted in v. 2 as referring to Abraham and Sarah.

51:3 Zion replaced Eden. Both were walled-in places of fellowship with God, free from sin, and guarded by cherubim so that only God’s people could enter (Gen. 3:24; 3:7).

51:4 The Servant is the light of the peoples (42:6; 49:6; John 3:17, 18).

51:5 The day of the Lord is always near (2:12; 56:1; Zeph. 1:14; 1 Thess. 5:4–11; James 5:8); here the reference is to the restoration from Exile (46:13). The coastlands (41:1), like the exiles, wait for the Lord. The verb translated wait has to do with confident expectation and active hope (40:31; Ps. 40:1).

51:6 Heavens and earth suggest the entire cosmos (13:13; 40:21, 22; 48:13; 51:13). The old cosmos will vanish away and grow old (34:4; Heb. 1:10, 11), and those who dwell in it will die (v. 8). Only God’s people will inherit the new cosmos. Righteousness, a synonym for salvation in Isaiah (45:8; 46:13), will last forever (45:17; 56:1).

51:7 In whose heart is My law refers to those who are bound to God by the provisions of the New Covenant (42:6; Jer. 31:33). The reproach of the exiles anticipates the rejection of the Servant (50:4–11).

51:8 righteousness … forever … salvation: The interrelationship of salvation, righteousness, and eternality can also be seen in v. 6.

51:9–16 This oracle bases Israel’s salvation on the Lord’s past mighty acts at creation and the Exodus. It consists of three sections: (1) a call to the Lord to stir up His might as in days of old (vv. 9–11); (2) the Lord’s response, recalling those acts and chiding the people for forgetting Him (vv. 12, 13); and (3) a recounting of His gift of prophecy (vv. 14–16).

51:9 Awake implies that the Lord appeared to be asleep (40:27; Ps. 44:23). The Lord’s strength at creation in subduing the sea is the subject of Ps. 93. Isaiah’s prayer is based on God’s promise (50:2), and poetically addressed to God’s strong arm (41:10; 51:5). Rahab was a mythical serpent that resisted God’s creation of the universe (Job 7:12; Ps. 74:13, 14). This imagery, possibly borrowed from Canaanite myths, also represents the Lord's defeat of Egypt—the nation that resisted the creation of Israel (30:7). The language here associates the Lord's creative work in the first Exodus and in the second Exodus (the return of the exiles) with His creative act of transforming the chaos of Gen. 1:2 into the cosmos of Gen. 2:1 (27:1).

51:10, 11 dried up: For similar references, see 42:15; 50:2. The Lord's victory at the Red Sea (Ex. 14:21, 22) is probably represented by the imagery of a pagan myth in which the sea opposed the creating deity. The probable allusion is supported by the … deep, a term used for the primeval chaotic waters of Gen. 1:2. The Exodus is placed within the broader framework of God's power over evil.

51:12 The Lord responds to the double imperative of v. 9, "Awake, awake," with the doubled pronoun I, even I.

51:13 stretched out: For a similar description of creation, see 40:22. oppressor: For a graphic depiction of the punishment of Israel's oppressors, see 49:26.

51:14 Captive exile literally refers to the exiles in Babylon. The meaning extends to all who experience the darkness of sin and alienation from God (48:20; 49:9).

51:15 Who divided the sea … roared: The sea represents all that is evil and in opposition to the Lord (Ps. 93).

51:16 Your mouth refers to the words of the Servant (41:9; 44:26; 50:4). shadow of My hand: For a similar use of the phrase, see 49:2.

51:17–23 This salvation oracle urging Jerusalem to have faith in God consists of two parts: (1) Mother Jerusalem (49:20, 21; 50:1) must awaken herself from her staggering stupor (vv. 17–20), and (2) the prophet asks the people to hear the Lord's promise that He will transfer the cup of His anger from them into the hands of her enemies (vv. 21–23).

51:17, 18 Awake, awake: The same double imperative is found in v. 9 (contrast 40:1). drunk … the cup: For similar imagery see Jer. 25:15–29; Lam. 4:21; Ezek. 23:31–34.

51:19, 20 These two things refers to the desolation of the land and the destruction of the people. at the head of all the streets: A similar image of destruction is used in Lam. 2:19.

51:21–23 The cause of drunkenness was not wine, but the cup of trembling, the terror of God's judgment. those who afflict you: Israel's oppressors would be made to drink "the cup of … fury" (v. 22).

52:1 The double call to the Lord to Awake, awake is also used in 51:9, 17. Holy city (48:2) contrasts with uncircumcised and unclean Babylon. Jerusalem (1:8; 40:1, 9) is commanded to awake because she is forever free of her despicable oppressors. Zion: The exiles are identified by their home city (40:1, 9). Zion's strength is like beautiful garments that adorn a queen mother (61:10). The Babylonian hordes would not only be expelled (49:17), but would no longer come to Zion (Nah. 1:15; Rev. 21:27; 22:14, 15).

52:2, 3 Arise … sit down evokes the image of a queen ascending her throne. Loose yourself: For similar images of freed captives, see 42:7; 48:20; 51:14.

52:4 to dwell there: The wording suggests that Israel was dependent on Egypt's hospitality; but the text assumes the Egyptians betrayed that trust. Without cause does not mean that Israel was without sin (42:23–25), but that Israel had not wronged either Egypt or Assyria.

52:5 Here refers to Babylon. God's justice demands that those who make Israel wail will be punished and that Israel will be delivered. My name is blasphemed: For a similar charge, see 37:23, 24.

52:6 My people refers to the redeemed exiles. Know My name is an allusion to Ex. 3:13, 14; 6:2. The Lord glorifies His name by predicting and fulfilling the promise of redemption pledged in v. 3.

The Suffering Servant

A midst a declaration of the Lord's coming salvation (52:7–12; 54:1–10), Isaiah places a portrait of the Suffering Servant (52:13—53:12). Despised and rejected (53:3), wounded and bruised (53:5), this unattractive Servant would know heartache and sorrow. What was the reason for His suffering? His life could not be the cause, for He was blameless, speaking only the truth (53:9). Yet the Servant would be led to prison and then to death for our sins (53:6–11).

Three other passages in Isaiah focus on the Servant and are called the "Servant songs" (42:1–4; 49:1–6; 50:4–9). The first song celebrates the Servant as the One who will establish justice for all (42:4). The second highlights the deliverance that the Servant will provide. He will restore Israel and become a "light to the Gentiles." The third emphasizes the God-given wisdom of the Servant. All this culminates in the description of the suffering and death of the Servant in ch. 53, the final Servant song.

Though at times Isaiah refers to the nation Israel as a Servant (49:3), the preeminent Servant of the Lord was clearly a unique person, a suffering Messiah yet to come (53:6). New Testament authors such as Matthew understood Jesus' teaching and preaching as a direct fulfillment of Is. 42:1–4 (Matt. 12:15–21). Philip used one of the Servant songs as a starting point for evangelism (53:7, 8). The Ethiopian eunuch asked him to explain the passage "He was led as a sheep to the slaughter" (53:7, 8; Acts 8:31–34). Philip introduced him to Jesus, the One who was led to His death for the sins of all humanity.

52:7 The vision is of the feet of the one who runs from the scene of battle across mountains to the city waiting for news (2 Sam. 18:26). The glorious message of this runner is salvation, meaning "victorious deliverance" (49:8). This is good news or glad tidings. The idea appears in the NT as "to tell the Good News." The message Your God reigns stands behind all history; the Lord controls every power on earth.

52:8 Your watchmen refers to those who long for salvation (21:11; 62:6).

52:9, 10 The LORD has made bare His holy arm in order to fight majestically (40:10; 51:9; Ex. 6:6). the ends of the earth: For similar uses of this phrase, see 45:22; 48:20.

52:11 Depart! Depart: For another use of a double word, see 51:9, 17. Touch no unclean thing: For other passages concerning separation, see 2 Cor. 6:17; Heb. 12:14; 13:13; 1 Pet. 2:1–12; Rev. 18:4. In the first Exodus, Israel carried out silver and gold from Egypt; in the second Exodus, the priestly nation would bear the vessels made from those elements (2 Kin. 25:14, 15; Ezra 1:7–11; 5:14, 15).

52:12 Before and rear guard are allusions to the pillar of cloud and fire that protected Israel in its flight from Egypt (42:16; 49:10; 58:8; Ex. 13:21, 22; 14:19, 20). the LORD … the God of Israel: The pillar of cloud and fire actually stood for the Lord Himself (Ex. 33:9–11).

52:13—53:12 The fourth of the Servant Songs forms the central unit of chs. 40—66, predicting the Servant's death for the sins of His people. The passage consists of three sections: (1) The Father praises the work of the Servant (52:13–15); (2) Israel confesses that it has despised Him (53:1–9); and (3) the prophecy expands on the significance of the Servant's death (53:10–12). This passage is cited many times in the NT, where the Servant is identified with Jesus Christ (Luke 22:37; 24:27, 46; 1 Cor. 15:3; 1 Pet. 1:11).

52:13 Exalted and extolled and be very high may refer to three successive events, describing the Servant's resurrection, ascension, and glorification (Rom. 4:24, 25). Or the three phrases might simply emphasize the great exaltation of the Lord's servant (Phil. 2:9–11).

52:14 So His visage was marred … more than the sons of men: People would be horrified at the Servant's appearance; He would be so disfigured that He would no longer look human.

52:15 The nations are represented by their kings. Shut their mouths is a token of stunned respect. For what had not been told … they shall consider: Romans 15:21 refers to this passage. What they are told is the report of ch. 53.

53:1 Who has believed: This rhetorical question, quoted in John 12:38 and Rom. 10:16, expects a negative answer. The word report is related to the verb "they heard" in 52:15. Our refers to the believing remnant in Israel. Arm refers to God's great work (40:10; 52:10; Ps. 118:22, 23).

53:2 Tender plant refers to a shoot rising from a plant's stem or root. A root out of dry ground suggests Christ's rejection by Israel (49:4; 50:6). No form or comeliness indicates that the Servant did not have a majestic manner.

53:3 He is despised and rejected: For related references describing the rejection of the Servant, see 42:2; 49:7; 50:6 (compare Mark 9:12). Man of sorrows does not indicate that the coming One would be humorless or dour, but He knew better than anyone the havoc that sin brings into human life. Because He is a "Man of sorrows," He is able to comfort those who experience sorrow.

53:4 He has borne: The Savior Jesus came to suffer and die for the sins of others (53:6, 11, 12; Matt. 8:17; Heb. 9:28; 1 Pet. 2:24). Griefs—or pain—and sorrows—or sickness—refer to the consequences of sin. The people considered Christ to have been smitten by God because the law said, "he who is hanged { on a tree} is accursed of God" (Deut. 21:22, 23; Gal. 3:13).

53:5 The repetition of the pronouns He, Him, and His for our and we underscores the fact that the Servant suffered in our place. The chastisement … His stripes: For a similar reference, see 1 Pet. 2:24. Peace sums up the Servant's ministry of reconciliation, justification, adoption, and glorification (2 Cor. 5:17–21). By saying that they were healed (v. 4), the remnant expressed its faith in what God had announced in 52:13.

53:6 All we like sheep have gone astray: For a NT perspective, see 1 Pet. 2:25.

53:7 Opened not His mouth speaks of the Servant's willingness to die for sinners; it also marks His dignity and authority (Matt. 26:67, 68; 27:12–14; 1 Pet. 2:23). as a lamb to the slaughter: For similar imagery, see John 1:29, 36; 1 Cor. 5:7; Rev. 5:6, 12; 13:8.

53:8 cut off from the land of the living: This language clearly indicates that the Servant would die.

53:9 Often in Hebrew poetry, the rich appear as synonymous with the wicked. Joseph of Arimathea was a rich man, but he was not wicked (Matt. 27:57–60). at His death: The Hebrew term rendered death is in the plural, as a focus on the deep significance of Christ's death.

53:10 it pleased the LORD: The OT pointed to the doctrine of the atonement long before Jesus died for our sins (1 Cor. 15:3 where Paul speaks of the doctrine coming from "the Scriptures"). The atonement was part of God's eternal plan (Eph. 1:4–7). The Father was pleased that His Son should die because it would cover up the sins of many and reconcile them to Himself (v. 11). Offering refers to the "trespass offering," the sacrifice of a ram in order to secure the Lord's atonement for sin (Lev. 5:6, 7, 15; 7:1; 14:12; 19:21). Here the prophet Isaiah describes the Servant Jesus as a trespass offering. His seed refers to the spiritual seed, born to the Servant after His death (Gal. 3:26–29).

53:11 Knowledge means having insight into one's mission (52:13). Justify means to acquit from guilt and to declare righteous (5:23).

53:12 As the great King, the Lord will divide the spoil of victory with His Servant (41:8; 52:13). Great and strong correspond to the Servant's condition after His rejection, suffering, and death.

54:1–10 In this salvation oracle (49:14–23), the Lord promises Zion that He has not forsaken her, but will give her many offspring. In vv. 1–3, Zion is a barren woman who gives birth to numerous children. In vv. 4–10, Zion is a forsaken wife who receives an everlasting covenant of peace.

54:1 Sing: For similar commands to sing, see 12:6; 44:23; 49:13. Zion (1:8; 40:1, 9) had not labored with child because Cyrus returned the exiles without any pressure from the Israelites. The increase that began in the restoration from exile (51:1–3) continues today, for the NT applies this verse to "the heavenly Jerusalem" (Heb. 12:22), "the mother of us all"—the church (Gal. 4:26, 27). Salvation depends on sovereign grace.

54:2, 3 The Arabs of the desert, known as the Bedouin, live in tents made of dark goat hair. The floor plan of these tents is rectangular with an interior curtain dividing the tent into two parts. A standard tent is made of 6 to 8 lengths of cloth held up by 9 interior poles. The overall size can be up to 6 by 10 yards. Large tents are made twice the size of a standard tent.

54:2 As a husband encourages his wife, the Lord encourages Zion, the mother of His people, to enlarge the family tent for her many children (49:19, 20).

(Heb. yarash) (54:3; Deut. 5:33; Josh. 12:1; 19:47) Strong’s #3423: The Hebrew word translated inherit means to “take something from someone else and possess it for yourself.” The word is frequently used to describe the Israelite conquest of Canaan (Deut. 5:33; Josh. 12:1; 19:47). At times the word can be translated dispossess (Num. 33:53) and may even mean “impoverish” (1 Sam. 2:7). In 54:3, the prophet Isaiah uses this word to describe Israel’s expansion. The nation would expand so much that they would take possession of the land of other nations (11:14). Isaiah was prophesying that Israelites would increase in number so much that they would be like a nomad who has so many children that he has to expand his tents to accommodate them all (54:2).

54:3 Expand is an allusion to Gen. 28:14, where the same Hebrew word is translated “spread abroad.”

54:4 The shame of your youth refers to Israel’s infidelity, that led to the Egyptian and Assyrian oppression (52:4; Jer. 31:19; Ezek. 16:1–6). The reproach of your widowhood refers to the Babylonian exile (vv. 6–8).

54:5 The point of the titles LORD of hosts (1:9), Redeemer (41:14), and God of the whole earth is that God did not forsake Zion out of necessity or weakness (50:1–3). Neither did He forsake Israel permanently (v. 7).

54:6 The LORD calls Zion to be His wife (62:4, 5). Like a woman forsaken … you were refused refers to Zion’s experience in exile (40:27; 49:14; 50:1).

54:7 God’s anger against His elect is for a mere moment (26:20; Ps. 30:5). Great mercies speaks of the affections of God in nurturing, maternal terms.

54:8 Kindness may also be translated “loyal love.” I will have mercy: That is, “I will love you as only a mother can love.”

54:9, 10 As the Lord had sworn to Noah that the waters … would no longer cover the earth (Gen. 9:11), so He swore to Zion after the Exile that His covenant of peace (42:6; Ezek. 34:25) would not be removed. Contrast this with the mountains and hills, symbols of strength and permanence, that had been removed from sight in the Flood (Gen. 7:19, 20).

54:11–17 In this salvation oracle, the Lord addresses devastated Zion, first promising the rebuilt city greater glory than before (vv. 11–13) and then protection (vv. 14–17).

54:11, 12 walls of precious stones: For a more detailed description of the New Jerusalem, see Rev. 21:18–21. The afflicted one is Zion or Jerusalem (51:21).

54:13 The children … taught by the LORD include those taught by Christ (Jer. 31:34; John 6:45), who had "the tongue of the learned" (50:4).

54:14–17 The tongue that speaks propaganda is one of the weapons of war (ch. 36). The Lord will condemn the accusers of His people even as He equipped His Servant (50:7–9; Luke 21:15; 1 Cor. 1:20). Throughout the rest of Isaiah, the word servants refers to all saints, Jews and Gentiles (56:6–8; 63:17; 65:8, 9, 13–15; 66:14), the spiritual offspring of the Servant.

55:1–13 Chapters 40—55 conclude with two related invitations: (1) to come to the Lord and participate in the Davidic kingdom (55:1–5) and (2) to seek the Lord and find pardon (vv. 6, 7). The promise is sure because God's grace is unfathomable (vv. 8, 9) and His word will certainly be fulfilled (vv. 10–13). The invitations, first addressed by the Lord to the exiles, are now held out to everyone (Rev. 21:6; 22:17).

55:1, 2 Ho is an exclamation of pity. Everyone: The ones addressed at first are the covenant nation, the remnant who respond to God. But they will be the means for bringing the same message of God's salvation to the nations (v. 5). Thirsts is a metaphor for desiring what satisfies a person's spirit (41:17; 44:3; Pss. 42:1, 2; 63:1; Matt. 5:6). Waters is a metaphor for the enjoyment of salvation in God (John 4:10–14; 7:37). Wine and milk are symbols of complete satisfaction (v. 2). Not only does God's salvation supply what is necessary for life, but it also provides what brings joy. You who have no money … buy expresses that salvation cannot be bought, but is a free gift for those who desire it (52:3; Deut. 8:3; Rom. 6:23).

55:3 Incline your ear and Hear are synonyms for come to Me. The everlasting covenant (54:10) refers to the Davidic covenant and to the New Covenant. The sure mercies of David are God's promises of an eternal Offspring, throne, and kingdom (2 Sam. 7:12–16; 1 Kin. 8:23–26; Ps. 89:19–37). The pronoun Me includes the Servant of the Lord, Jesus the Messiah (48:16; 61:1). you: The promises of the Davidic covenant are extended to all who come to God; they are fulfilled in Jesus Christ (4:2; 7:14; 9:6; 11:1–5) and His church (Rom. 16:20).

55:4, 5 God's fulfillment of the promises to the house of David, climaxing in the resurrection of Christ, serves as a witness to the nations (43:10, 12; 44:8). Jesus Christ is a leader … for the people (42:6; 49:6; Dan. 9:25; Heb. 2:10; 12:2).

55:6, 7 To seek the LORD is to seek His word (Amos 5:6, 14; Acts 17:27).

55:8, 9 God's gracious thoughts exceed all human imagination (64:4; Rom. 11:33; 1 Cor. 2:9; Eph. 3:20). No one can fathom the depths of His wisdom.

55:10, 11 bring forth: For a similar reference, see 2 Cor. 9:10. God's word is similar to rainfall; it produces fruit (Ps. 147:15–20). Just as water enlivens and strengthens a withering rose, God's word produces life in the hearts of sinners.

55:12 The phrase go out refers historically to the Exodus from Babylon (48:20, 21; 52:11, 12). The singing of the elements of creation is a way of describing the singing of God's people. The rejoicing of the people at the Lord's salvation will be so full that it will seem that mountains, hills, and trees join in the chorus and applause (14:7, 8; 44:23).

“sign”

(Heb. ot) (7:14; 19:20; 55:13; Gen. 1:14) Strong’s #226: The Hebrew word translated sign refers to something that is marked off or made distinct. God gave circumcision to Israel as a sign of their covenant relationship with Him, the fact that they were set apart for Him (Gen. 17:11). The word was also used to call attention to a particular event and God’s promises surrounding that event. For instance, the rainbow is a reminder of the Flood and God’s promise to refrain from destroying the earth with a flood again (Gen. 9:13). God promised to provide a clear sign of the coming Messiah in His virgin birth (7:14). The counterpart of this word in the NT (Gk. semeion) is used widely by the Gospel writers (Matt. 16:4; Mark 8:12; John 2:11) to refer to Jesus’ miraculous signs, which confirmed His divinity.

55:13 Instead of the thorn shall come up the cypress tree: This expression symbolizes the replacement of God’s judgments with salvation (compare 5:6; 32:13; 41:19). Everlasting sign recalls the rainbow after the Flood (19:20; Gen. 9:8–17).

56:1—66:24 The prophecies in these concluding chapters are addressed to those who returned to the land of Israel before the rebuilding of the temple in 520 B.C. The temple was still in ruins (63:18; 64:8–12), but its rebuilding was foreseen (56:6–8). The restored worshiping community faced the question of who would be admitted into the religious community (ch. 56). As before the Exile, Israel continued to struggle with idolatry (57:1–13), hypocrisy (ch. 58), injustice (59:1–8), and spiritual malaise (64:1–7).

56:1 about to come: God's salvation is always near (51:5; Phil. 4:5). My righteousness is a synonym for My salvation (41:2; 45:8; 46:13; 51:6).

56:2 Keeps from defiling the Sabbath (Ex. 20:8–11) epitomizes righteousness, for the Sabbath was the sign of the covenant (Ex. 31:13–17; Jer. 17:21–27; Ezek. 20:20, 21). Since keeping the Sabbath revealed clear commitment to the Lord, it was closely associated with righteousness and justice.

56:3 In speaking of the proselyte who joined himself to the LORD, Isaiah was not speaking of the foreign wives that returning exiles married. Ezra and Nehemiah would have to purge the restored community of these unconverted pagans (Ezra 9). Isaiah was prophesying of foreigners who would be converted to the worship of the true Lord (44:5). These were foreigners who would demonstrate saving faith and thus be counted among those "born in Zion" (Ps. 87).

56:4, 5 eunuchs: Probably some of the male exiles were castrated so that they could serve in the Babylonian and Persian courts (39:7; Dan. 1:3). A place and a name may be rephrased as "a memorial monument." For Isaiah, this memorial is better than that of sons and daughters because it symbolizes an everlasting name, or everlasting life, in the temple. Not be cut off is an idiom for preserving one's name through one's offspring. The phrase links this passage with 55:13.

56:6, 7 house of prayer: Inclusion in the covenant community involves intimate communion with God (Ps. 15:1; Matt. 21:13). for all nations: People of other nations who came to a living faith in God were met with a joyful welcome (2:2–4; 1 Kin. 8:41–43). Jesus also spoke of joy in heaven over a repentant sinner (Luke 15:7).

56:8 Outcasts refers to the exiles (11:11, 12).

56:9 The unclean, ravenous beasts summoned to attack the ungodly community are hostile nations (18:6; Jer. 12:8, 9; Ezek. 34:5, 8, 25; 1 Cor 15:32). In ancient Eastern religions, demons and spirits were often believed to appear as animals.

56:10 The pronoun His refers to the Lord. Watchmen, those who ought to warn the city of approaching danger, refers to prophets (21:6; Jer. 6:17; Ezek. 3:17; 33:2–7) who do not fear God. The ungodly watchmen leave the people defenseless.

56:11, 12 greedy dogs: The dog was not highly regarded in biblical culture, and to the Jews they were unclean. Shepherds is a metaphor for rulers (40:11; Ezek. 34:1–6).

57:1, 2 Peace here refers to the final state of the righteous who rest in their deathbeds (3:10, 11; 53:5; Phil. 1:21–23). No one understood that the righteous were being spared the judgment to come (2 Kin. 22:19, 20).

57:3, 4 offspring: For similar references, see 1:4; Ezek. 16:3, 45. Adulterer and harlot allude to the perverse Canaanite fertility rites that threatened the culture of ancient Israel.

57:5 Green tree was associated with pagan fertility rites (1:29, 30; 1 Kin. 14:23; Jer. 2:20). Slaying the children was associated with the worship of Molech and with demon worship (30:33; 2 Kin. 23:10; Ps. 106:37, 38; Jer. 7:31).

57:6 Immoral idolatry was the people's portion or lot, instead of the Lord (Deut. 4:19, 20; Pss. 16:5; 142:5).

57:7 A high mountain refers to a place for idolatrous practices (Jer. 3:6; Ezek. 16:16; Mic. 1:3–5). The word bed is associated with sexual aspects of idolatry (Ezek. 23:17; Hos. 4:13). sacrifice: Animal and grain offerings were also part of pagan worship. There were enough similarities between true and false worship for people to be confused (compare "wisdom" and "folly" in Prov. 9).

57:8 Remembrance may refer to a pagan cultic symbol in the home. made a covenant: This phrase, which has so many associations with true religion, is here used in the context of obscene behavior associated with pagan worship. nudity: The Hebrew word is the regular term for hand. Here it appears to be a euphemism for the male genitals.

57:9 King probably refers to the Ammonite god Molech (1 Kin. 11:7), whose name means "king." Sheol here alludes to the gods of the underworld, perhaps associated with necromancy.

57:10 There is no hope: The people persisted in worthless idolatry. The people's way is detailed in vv. 5–9. They found a counterfeit life in immorality and idolatry that would only lead to permanent death (Rom. 1:18–32).

57:11, 12 of whom have you been afraid … not remembered Me: For a related passage, see 51:12, 13. Lied here refers to infidelity to the Lord. The Lord held His peace by not sending judgment immediately (42:14; 48:9; 2 Pet. 3:9).

57:13 Let your … idols deliver you: The thought is pitiful (44:17). The worshiper of idols was appealing to a work of his own hands for deliverance. the wind will carry them all away: The idols are like worthless chaff (Ps. 1:4). But: This word shows that there is an appeal in the denunciation. Each judgment text is a call for repentance. puts his trust: This verb is used of a little chick finding shelter under its mother's wings (4:6; 25:4; Ruth 2:12).

57:14 This verse is based on 40:1–4. The phrase one shall say resembles "The voice of one crying" (40:2). Heap it up resembles "Every valley shall be exalted" (40:4). Prepare the way repeats the appeal of 40:3 (11:16; 35:8–10; 62:10). Stumbling block probably refers to the idolatry described in vv. 3–13.

57:15 This verse matches Ex. 34:6 as a defining passage for understanding the biblical view of God: Though God is completely unapproachable, He reaches down to lift up those who humble themselves before Him. High and Lofty may be rephrased as "Exceedingly Lofty" (2:11; 6:1; 52:13). This is one of the ways in which Isaiah describes the transcendence and holiness of God. He is above everyone—perfect and holy. inhabits eternity: Not only is God eternal, without beginning or ending, He transcends time itself. In this way He is able to give all of His time to each of His people; He is not bound by the succession of moments that limits our experience. High and holy may be rephrased as "unsearchably high" (32:15; 33:5, 16). Contrite and humble may be rephrased as "genuinely humble," referring to those who submit and repent under God's judgment (Pss. 34:17, 18; 51:17; 1 Pet. 5:6).

57:16 God will not contend forever, for humans will always fail. Therefore, in His sovereign grace, the Lord "created" salvation (54:9; 57:19; Gen. 8:21, 22; Ps. 130:3, 4).

57:17 I hid: For a related reference, see 1:15. I was angry: For a similar reference to the Lord's anger, see 54:7, 8. Covetousness violates God's covenant (56:11; Ps. 119:36; Jer. 22:17).

57:18 I … will heal: The Lord is the Physician (30:26). I will … lead him: For similar imagery describing the Lord's guidance, see 40:11; 42:16. Mourners refers to those who lament the destruction of Jerusalem (66:10).

57:19 fruit of the lips: For an explanation of the fruit, see Heb. 13:15. Peace, peace indicates "genuine peace." Contrast the false use of this phrase in Jer. 6:13, 14; 8:10, 11. far off … near: For a similar reference, see 56:7, 8 (compare Acts 2:39; Eph. 2:13, 17).

57:20 cannot rest: Contrast v. 2. The fate of the wicked is also described in 56:9–12; 57:3–13. troubled sea: For a similar analogy comparing the wicked to turbulent waters, see Jude 13.

57:21 There is no peace … for the wicked: This phrase is also found in 48:22.

58:1 Isaiah was to alert the people as loudly and clearly as a trumpet (Ex. 19:19; 20:18; Hos. 8:1; 1 Cor. 14:8). Transgression is related to the Hebrew verb translated “rebelled” in 1:2.

58:2 They seek Me daily contrasts with the seeking called for in 55:6. Ordinance is translated “justice” in 56:1. The hypocritical religionists delight in approaching God in ritual worship (29:13).

58:3, 4 Formerly, the nation fasted in times of national calamity (Jer. 36:9; Joel 1:14); later, fasting became part of the liturgical calendar (Zech. 7:2, 3; 8:19; Luke 18:12). This sermon may have been delivered on the Day of Atonement when the people of Israel afflicted their souls (v. 10; Lev. 16:29). You take no notice: A similar attitude is expressed in Mal. 3:14. Paradoxically, Israel finds pleasure in fasting, but not in keeping the Sabbath (vv. 13, 14). The accusations, you … exploit all your laborers and you fast for strife and debate, expose the hypocrisy of the people’s worship. Instead of ceasing their normal pursuits and setting the day aside to fast and pray, they strike with the fist the laborer who does not work. Will not may also be translated “cannot.”

58:5 Is it a fast that I have chosen: For related passages, see 1:10–15; Amos 5:21–23; Mic. 6:7. The people’s fast was not an acceptable day to the LORD because it focused on self-righteousness and not on justice for others. Bow down and spread out refer to the mourning ceremonies that accompanied fasting (2 Sam. 12:16; Joel 1:13, 14). Like a bulrush is meant to signify humility (42:3).

Worship and Service

What is your concept of worshiping the Lord? Attending a church service at which you sing hymns, read Scripture, recite prayers, listen to a sermon, and partake of holy communion? All of these practices can lead to worship, but Isaiah shows that true worship goes beyond that (Is. 58:6, 7, 9, 10).

In Isaiah's day, there were apparently plenty of religious people, but not many responsive people. They "afflicted their souls" with fasting, "delighted" to know God's ways, inquired about "the ordinances of justice," and enjoyed their worship services (58:2, 3). But little if any of their piety translated into action. Yet they expected God to answer their prayers and bless them. Through Isaiah, God said that true worship is not just a weekly ritual, but a daily lifestyle. It may begin in a house of prayer, but it ends up in the public square.

What might that "public-minded" worship look like in today's world? What would it mean for believers as they respond to the hungry, the homeless, the prisoner, the wage-earner, the debtor, the poor, and the hopeless? There is no easy answer, but one fact is clear: as Isaiah told the people of his day, God cannot be expected to shower good things on His people as long as they withhold good things from others (58:8, 9, 11, 12).

So what starts with worship ends in service. Today that means that the church gathered for worship on Sunday becomes the church scattered for service on Monday through Saturday. Building believers leads to believers rebuilding their communities. Worship and service form a seamless robe.

58:6 To loose, to undo, to let … go free, and break every yoke are synonyms of genuine righteousness (Ezek. 18:16–18). Yoke is a metaphor for social oppression.

58:7 the hungry … the naked: For similar expressions of the duty to take care of the poor, see Job 31:16–23; Matt. 25:35, 36. The poor who are cast out refers to those whose lands and houses were confiscated in payment of debts.

58:8 The light dawned with the advent of Christ (v. 10; 9:2; 10:17; 59:9; 60:1–3; Luke 1:78, 79). Righteousness refers to salvation (56:1). The glory of the LORD probably alludes to the pillar of cloud and fire in the desert (4:5, 6; Ex. 13:21; 14:20). rear guard: A marching army needs an alert rear defense (52:12).

58:9 The pointing of the finger was a sinister gesture (Prov. 6:13).

58:10 The afflicted soul here contrasts with the hypocritical affliction described in v. 3.

58:11 A watered garden and a perennial spring are similes for prosperity and the blessings of God's salvation.

58:12 Build the old waste places presupposes that the restored exiles had not found the spiritual and economic resources to rebuild Judah (44:26, 28; 61:2, 4; Ezek. 36:10; Hag. 1:2–9). The coming of Christ rebuilt the house of David (Amos 9:11, 12; Acts 15:15–17).

58:13 Doing your pleasure probably refers to commerce (vv. 3, 4; Amos 8:5). Holy day clearly indicates that in vv. 2–9 the Lord was not rejecting ritual altogether (66:23).

58:14 This blessing is based on the Song of Moses in Deut. 32:9, 13.

59:1, 2 the Lord's hand is not shortened: For related passages, see 40:10; 50:2. The Lord's ear, unlike Israel's (6:10), is able to hear.

59:3 your hands are defiled with blood: For similar passages on the people's guilt, see 1:15; 59:7; Ezek. 7:23. Your lips have spoken lies: For related passages, see 33:15; 59:13; Mark 7:21–23; Rom. 3:10–18; Gal. 5:19–21.

59:4 Calls for justice probably means to help the poor in the law courts (Job 9:16; 13:22). No one would plead the case of the poor fairly (1:17; 5:23; 59:14). Conceive evil and bring forth iniquity is translated "conceive trouble and bring forth futility" in Job 15:35.

59:5 Hatch … eggs and weave the … web signify the deliberate, calculated wickedness in the courts (32:7; 59:4).

59:6 Their webs will not become garments illustrates the futility depicted in v. 4 and the ultimate failure of the schemes depicted in v. 5 The wicked power structures would prove worthless (Job 8:14, 15).

59:7, 8 This passage is cited in Rom. 3:15–17 to document the universality of sin. Their feet … make haste to shed innocent blood: The people run without forethought into evil (Prov. 1:16). thoughts of iniquity: Contrast 55:7–9. Those who deny peace to others will themselves not know peace (57:21). crooked paths: For similar images of the wicked person's way of life, see Prov. 2:15; 10:9; 28:18.

59:9 Therefore links Israel's repentance with the prophet's reprimand. With the pronoun us, Isaiah identified himself with his people's sins (Ezra 9:6, 7; Dan. 9:5). The words justice and righteousness refer to God's salvation (46:13). Light and darkness refer to salvation and doom respectively (9:2; 42:16; 58:8, 10; 60:1–3). The Book of Isaiah, like the Gospel of John, makes much use of the words light and darkness as a way to contrast eternal life and death, truth and falsehood (John 1:4–9; 3:19–21; 8:12; 9:5; 12:35, 36).

59:10 The people grope … like the blind in fulfillment of the covenant curse on those who were disobedient (Deut. 28:29).

59:11–13 The people growl out of frustration. moan: For related images of the people's despair involving doves, see 38:14; Ezek. 7:16.

59:14 Justice and righteousness speak here of ethical conduct (v. 4).

59:15, 16 Justice refers here to salvation (vv. 9, 10). The Lord, using the first person, expresses the thought of this passage in 63:5. no man: God's salvation does not depend on humans (Ezek. 22:30). no intercessor:

Contrast the intercession of the Servant in 53:12. His own arm figuratively represents the Lord as a warrior (42:13; 49:24, 25; 51:9; 52:10). Righteousness refers to the Lord's victorious salvation (46:13; 51:6, 8; 56:1).

59:17 The Lord's breastplate and helmet are taken up by His saints in their battle against the devil (Eph. 6:14–17). garments of vengeance: For a more detailed description of the Lord who comes to judge but also to save, see 63:1–3.

59:18 Recompense to His enemies is translated "fully repays His enemies" in 66:6. Coastlands indicates that the Lord's adversaries were distant nations (41:1). However, He judged wicked Israelites as well (65:6, 7). Only the repentant will be blessed (vv. 9–15, 20).

59:19 From the west … from the rising of the sun is another way of saying everywhere. When the enemy comes could also mean "when He comes as an enemy" (35:4).

59:20 The Redeemer will come in the person of Jesus Christ. For other prophecies of the Redeemer see 41:14. turn from transgression: For similar appeals to turn from sin in the prophecies of Isaiah see 1:17–19; 30:15; 31:6; 59:9–15.

59:21 Them refers to the repentant (v. 20). My Spirit: For similar references see 11:2; 30:1; 42:1; 48:16; 61:1; Luke 3:22. You and your in this verse are singular, probably with reference to Isaiah. God's Spirit and words would be given to all Israel so that all would become prophets of the living God (44:3).

60:1 Arise is addressed to Zion (v. 14). shine: Zion is both the recipient of God's light and the reflector of it. light: Isaiah's prophecies often emphasize the contrast between light and darkness to symbolize the contrast between eternal life and death, salvation and judgment (9:2; 10:17; 58:8; 59:9; 60:19, 20).

60:2 As was the case during the Exodus from Egypt, darkness is on the wicked while God's light is on His people (Ex. 10:23). Deep darkness elsewhere describes a cloud enfolding the glory of God (Ex. 20:21), and serves as a warning of His impending judgment (Jer. 13:16).

60:3 Gentiles is translated "nations" in 2:2–4. In the earlier passage, they come to heavenly Zion to be taught of God; here they come to bring tribute (vv. 5, 11, 13). Isaiah foresaw a day when not only would the righteous remnant in Israel be devoted to God, but so would the redeemed from all peoples. Christ is the light to kings (42:6; 49:6).

60:4 Lift up your eyes … they come to you is cited from 49:18. Your sons … your daughters is cited from 49:22. Those verses were addressed to exiles and primarily concerned their return to the land, while this verse is addressed to the few restored exiles and looks to a greater return that is still in the future (11:11).

60:5 become radiant: See "shine" in v. 1. wealth of the Gentiles: For similar phrases, see Hag. 2:7; Zech. 14:14.

60:6, 7 Camels, animals of burden, carried gold and incense. Midian was famous as a caravan leader and trader (Gen. 37:28, 36). Ephah was one of Midian's sons (Gen. 25:4). The allusion to Sheba, renowned for its wealth, links this city with Solomon's (1 Kin. 10:1–13; Ps. 72:10). proclaim the praises: The nations would not bring just their wealth; they would accompany their gifts with public, vocal acknowledgment of the wonder of God (1 Kin. 10:9; Heb. 13:14, 15).

60:8 The ships' sails resemble a fast-moving cloud and doves returning to their roosts.

60:9 The reference to the ships of Tarshish (2:16) alludes to the wealth of King Solomon (1 Kin. 10:22).

60:10 Foreigners, such as Hiram king of Tyre, helped build the first temple (1 Kin. 5); today Gentiles are building up the church, the temple of the Lord (Eph. 2:11–22). Wrath is translated "indignation" in 34:2.

60:11 Zion's gates shall be open continually both because the city is secure and because the doors must be open in order to accommodate the great influx of the wealth of the Gentiles (v. 5). For the "gates of Zion," see Ps. 87:1–3. This verse is alluded to in Rev. 21:24, 25.

60:12 The nation and kingdom that does not serve Zion, where Christ now reigns (Acts 2:29–36), shall perish (John 3:18; Heb. 2:3; 9:27; 10:27). In the coming kingdom, there will be no opposition to the reign of the Savior-King.

60:13, 14 As the glory of Lebanon—its luxurious cypress, pine, and box tree—glorified the first temple (1 Kin. 5:10, 18) so it will beautify the temple again (vv. 5–7). Formerly, the place of the Lord's feet was the ark of the covenant (1 Chr. 28:2); later it was the temple (Ezek. 43:7), and then the whole earth (66:1).

60:15 The new sanctuary will be greater than the old one because it is eternal, rich, and spiritual (vv. 17, 18). you have been forsaken: For related ideas, see 49:14, 21; 50:1; 54:6.

60:16 This verse is modeled on 49:26. In the earlier verse, the nations serve Israel; here they enrich it. milk the breast of kings: This line, representing great wealth, demonstrates clearly that the prophet was using figurative language.

60:17 The new temple will be made of better-than-necessary metals—gold, silver, bronze, and iron—symbolizing by exaggeration its exceedingly great and enduring wealth. Peace and righteousness are personified as officers and magistrates respectively (26:3; 48:18).

60:18 Judging from the figurative language in vv. 15–22, especially v. 17, God's Salvation and Israel's Praise will be the city's defense (Zech. 2:4, 5).
